And if any doubt, can a man be happy when his outward comfort is gone? Doubtleſs he may: For a man is never unhappy, but when he hath loſt that wherein happineſs doth conſiſt. The happineſs of a godly man doth not conſiſt in his outward comforts, in riches, in health, in honour, in civil liberty, or humane relations; therefore in the loſs of theſe he cannot be unhappy. His happineſs conſiſts in his relation to, and acceptance with God, in his title to, and union with Jeſus Chriſt. While he keeps theſe priviledges (and theſe he ſhall keep for ever) what hath he loſt, if he loſe all beſides theſe? He hath not loſt any thing diſcernable, out of his eſtate. Suppoſe a man were worth a million of money, and he ſhould loſe a penny, would you think this man an undone man? No: his eſtate feels not this loſs, and therefore he hath not loſt his eſtate. If a man ſhould buy a thouſand meaſures of Corn or Cloth, and ſhould loſe the given handfuls of the one, or inches of the other, would ye ſay, that this man hath loſt either his corn or his cloth? All the things of the world (and they only are looſable) which a godly man hath, are not ſo much to his eſtate as a penny to a million; they are indeed no proper part of his eſtate, they are but an additional overplus to his eſtate; as the handful of grain, or inch of cloth, are no part of the meaſure agreed or bargained for; only ſo much that ſpeech of Chriſt imports, Mat. 6. 33. Seek firſt the Kingdom of God, and the righteouſneſs thereof, and all other things ſhall be added or miniſtred to you; your kingdom is whole and ſafe to you, though you have not theſe: Theſe things are extrinſecal and foreign to all that, which I reckon upon as your eſtate; God having given us Chriſt, caſts us in the creatures, as not coming upon any account in that vaſt act of his free love and bounty: And ſhall we account him unhappy, who hath loſt theſe things, which were never brought to account as any part of his happineſs? Then happy ſtill, though corrected. And which is yet more, correction takes nothing from the ſtock, but it addeth ſomewhat; correction brings in a revenue of profit with it. They (ſaith the Apoſtle, meaning our earth-parents) chaſtened us after their own pleaſure, but he for our profit. What profit? Do Houſes and Land, Gold and Silver, bloſſom from the correcting rod? Surely they may: But he means better profit then theſe, and a far more noble merchandize: Gold and Silver are poor and baſe, to the profit which comes in by chaſtenings; Grace and holineſs come in this way: He for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holineſs, Heb. 12. 10. We want nothing of the happineſs in heaven, but ſo much holineſs as we ſhall have in heaven. Surely then whatſoever affliction takes away, it cannot take away our happineſs, forasmuch as it makes us greater ſharers in, and partakers of holineſs.

And the corrected children of God are unhappy only in the opinion of other men, not in their own: When did you ever hear any of them ſay, they were unhappy, becauſe they were corrected? I do not remember, that I ever read or heard any of them ſay, O unhappy we, who are thus afflicted! Salvian anſwered this Objection well, when he ſaw many ſcandalized at the afflictions of the godly, thinking theirs a very ſad and pitiful condition: Do you hear them complaining (ſaith he) or did they ever complain to you? No man is to be accounted miſerable in another mans ſenſe, but in his own. You make the complaint, not they. The truth is, a holy heart can bear trouble with more eaſe, then a carnal heart can ſee it. Paul (whoſe whole life, after converſion, was but one continued affliction) was ſo far from complaining and ſaying, O unhappy man that I am! that he rejoyced in tribulation, and was but as ſorrowing, yet alwayes rejoycing. I confeſs, it becomes us to be more ſenſible of corrections, then of perſecutions; the former being uſually, ſufferings upon our defects in Grace, and the latter upon our higheſt actions and puttings forth of Grace. It becomes the Saints to be humbled under corrections; but who hath heard them (when they were themſelves) complaining of corrections? I have often heard them bleſſing God for corrections; I have often heard them ſay, it was, and it is good for us, that we have been corrected; And while the Saints write their afflictons upon the Inventory of their goods, we have no reaſon to put them to account, or caſt them up among their evils.

Quamvis ſanctli videantur ignorantibus eſſe miſeri, non poſſunt tamen eſſe aliud quam beati. Nemo alieno ſenſu miſer eſt, ſed ſuo. Nulli enim beatiores ſunt quàm qui ex ſententia ſua & voto agunt. Humiles ſunt religioſi, hoc volunt: Pauperes ſunt, pauperie delectatur. Lugent, tugere geſtiunt, &c. Salv. De gub. Dei. l. 3.

Laſtly, A godly man cannot be unhappy while he enjoyes God: And he uſually enjoyes God moſt, when he is moſt afflicted. A wicked man is never unhappy in his own thoughts, till he hath loſt his god, ſuch a one as he is, his riches, his pleaſure, his credit; theſe he makes his god, inſtead of a better; indeed, inſtead of him who is beſt of all: Theſe are loſeable gods, and ſo his happineſs may ſoon be loſt; but he that once enjoyes the true God, can never loſe him, and therefore can never loſe his happineſs.

That of Saul; is one of the ſaddeſt ſpeeches in all the Book of God, 1 Sam. 28. 15. I am ſore diſtreſſed, for the Philiſtines make war againſt me, and God is departed from me. When trouble comes, and God departs, when ſickneſs and poverty make war upon a man, and God be departed from a man, O how unhappy! What words can expreſs the unhappineſs of ſuch a man? But they who can take liberty, and eſtate, and life from us, cannot take God from us; and if God ſhould take all theſe from us, he will not, he cannot (becauſe he hath promiſed he will not) take himſelf from us: I (ſaith the Lord) will never leave thee nor forſake thee, Heb. 13. 5. And if God forſake us not, happineſs cannot; for he is our happineſs.

A Heathen could ſay, it was unbecoming a Roman ſpirit, to cry out (in his loſſes) I am undone, while Cæſar was ſafe. It is infinitely below a Chriſtian ſpirit to ſay, I am undone, while Chriſt is ſafe: ſuch language is groſſeſt Barbariſm in all the Churches. They who cannot loſe either their ſouls or their Saviour in the worſt condition, cannot be unhappy in any condition, much leſs then under the fatherly correcting hand of God.

in

Behold, happy is the man whom God corrects, is a truth which no ſtorms of trouble ſhall ever ſhake or weaken.

Therefore deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Almighty. That's the inference.

The word which we tranſlate [deſpiſe] hath various ſignifications, and they will all be profitable for the clearing of this point; therefore I ſhall open them diſtinctly: and give ſome brief Notes upon every one in order.

מאס Significat ſpernere, faſtidire, reprobare vel rejicere aliquid cum faſtidio, tanquam vile & contemptum. Sept. reddunt aliquando per ἐξουθενέω, & hic per ἀπαναίνω, ne renuas aut averſeris. * Ut ſicut faſtidio illis fuiſſet Deus optimus, ita etiam faſtidio illis ſint creaturæ, & ſua ipſorum voluptates.

First, It ſignifies to reject a thing, or caſt it off with loathing; when a mans ſtomack turns againſt ſome meats, or they go againſt his ſtomach, loathing ariſes from it. So the word is uſed, Numb. 11. 20. When the people murmured becauſe they wanted fleſh, God threatneth them with ſatisfying their deſires: Fleſh would you have? You ſhall have fleſh: It is a threat; But how ſhall they have it? You ſhall not have it one day, nor two dayes, nor five dayes, neither ten dayes, nor twenty dayes; but you ſhall have fleſh even a whole moneth, until it come out of your noſtrils, and it be * loathſom unto you, or till you your ſelves deſpiſe it. It is moſt juſt with God, that they who loath his will, ſhould at laſt loath their own deſires; and that the creatures ſhould not long pleaſe them, who take no heed to pleaſe the Creator. The leaſt mixture of Gods diſpleaſure ſowres our ſweeteſt contents, and makes our very pleaſures loathſom.

Where alſo (by the way) we may obſerve the great difference between earthly and ſpiritual things: The beſt of earthly things, uſed too much or too often, grow loathſom. Angels food (Manna or Quails) will not go down long with us. But Chriſt, the ſpiritual Manna, and all heavenly things, the more we have of them, and the longer we are dieted with them, the more we ſhall delight in them: Theſe will not loath us, after two, or five, or ten, or twenty dayes, or after a whole moneths feeding on them: No, we ſhall feed on them dayes without number, or the whole day of eternity, without any loathings; uſe and delight ſhall never ceaſe or abate; appetite ſhall renew every moment, though our enjoyment be but one and the ſame. Yea, the Saints ſhall be ſo far from loathing the pleaſant cup of glory, that they ought not to loath, and (Chriſt ſtrengthning them) they ſhall not loath the bitter cup of ſorrow: their ſtomachs ſhall not turn, though dieted more then two, or five, or ten, or twenty dayes with the bread of adverſity, and the water of affliction. That is the firſt ſence of the word, in alluſion to nauſeating at the ſight or long uſe of meat: Loath not the chaſtening of the Lord.

Or the word may ſeem to carry a reference to phyſick or medicines, as well as meat, which you know is many times given in a bitter pill, or in a diſtaſtful potion: the ſick man is apt to loath the potion brought him, and turn his head away from it; what, he take it, no not he. He had rather die, then drink ſuch a draught; he is ready to throw it againſt the wall, and ſpill it on the ground rather then drink it: But then his Friends or the Phyſitian perſwades with him; be not angry, though it be loathſom to your ſtomach, yet it is wholeſom for your body: it is an enemy only to your diſeaſe, therefore loath it not. So here Eliphaz (as it were) brings in God ſtanding like a Phyſitian or a Father, or a tender Mother at the beds ſide, where a ſick Child or a friend lies, uſing many intreaties or perſwaſive reaſons to take a bitter potion; my child, or my friend, do not loath, do not deſpiſe, no nor diſtaſte this medicine, do not caſt it away; though it be bitter in your mouth, yet take it down, and the effects of it will be ſweet to your whole body. We find in Scripture, afflictions compared to a cup: Our Lord Jeſus calls all his ſufferings for our ſalvation, a Cup, and it was a cup tempered with the venom and poiſon, with the gall and wormwood of all our ſins; it was a loathſom potion indeed, and ſuch as would have turned the ſtomachs of all Men and Angels to have drunk it. So much of the firſt ſence of the word, as it ſignifies loathing, whether in reſpect of meats or medicines.

Now foraſmuch as here is a charge given under this notion, not to loath chaſtenings; We may obſerve,

There is, or poſſibly may be an averſneſs in the beſt of Gods children for a time, from the due entertainment of chaſtenings.

He ſpeaks as if moſt were loth to take them down, and therefore he exhorts, not to loath them: Even the Lord Jeſus Chriſt (ſo far as he was partaker of our nature) ſeemed to loath the bitter cup of ſufferings. Hence he prayed hard, once, and again, yea a third time, Father, if it be poſſible, let this Cup paſs from me, (Matth. 26. 39.) Yet at another time, he ſpeaks as if he had been athirſt for that Cup, and angry with Peter who would have hindred his draught, The Cup which my Father giveth me, ſhall I not drink it? Joh. 18. 11. and ſhortly after, he indeed drank it up to the bottom. Affliction is alſo a bitter Cup to the Saints, and they (as Chriſt) pray again and again, yea thrice againſt it; becauſe to ſenſe, no chaſtening ſeemeth joyous but grievous, Heb. 12. 11. though grace perſwades them to drink it, and faith gives them a taſte of much ſweetneſs, when they have drank it: As a ſick man is backward to take a diſtaſtful medicine, till his reaſon hath overcome his ſenſe; ſo a godly man is unwilling to bear afflictions, till his faith hath overcome his reaſon: nor can he quietly endure the troubleſom ſmart of the rod, till he is aſſured of the peaceable fruits of righteouſneſs, which grow from it, to thoſe who are exerciſed by it. When the Apoſtle is carried upon thoſe Eagles wings of aſſurance, to ſee a houſe not made with hands eternal in the Heavens, then he groans earneſtly under the burden of his earthly tabernacle, and deſires to die; yet looking upon death, he ſaw no form or comelineſs in that, why he ſhould deſire it; and therefore he ſeems to correct himſelf, at leaſt to draw his mind plainer with the next drop of his pen; Not for that we would be uncloathed, but cloathed upon, that mortality may be ſwallowed up of life. He ſpeaks ſomewhat like a man, who in a time of heat, haſtily ſtrips himſelf to go into the water, but putting a foot in, and finding it cold, calls for his cloaths again. The Apoſtle in a true holy heat of ſpirit had in his deſires almoſt ſtript himſelf of his body, but putting a foot into the grave, he found that ſo cold, that he had no great mind to it, and therefore had rather keep on the cloathing of his body, and have a ſuite of glory over it, then lay it down. The Saints deſire to live with Chriſt; but in it ſelf, they deſire not to die: They had rather their mortality ſhould be ſwallowed up of eternal life, then their temporal life ſhould be ſwallowed up of mortality. They that have grace, like not the diſ-unions of nature. Now as it is in the caſe of death (which is to the Saints the laſt and greateſt affliction) ſo likewiſe in the caſe of all afflictions, which are as renewed and leſſer deaths: Though they embrace and kiſs them (both in a holy ſubmiſſion to the will of God, and in an aſſured expectation of their own good) yet they have nothing pleaſing in them; much, which creates ſo much loathing, that the beſt do but need counſel and encouragement to take and digeſt them.

And then if there be ſome averſneſs even in the beſt from theſe potions of affliction, tempered with the mercy and goodneſs of God; no wonder if there be an abhorrence in wicked men, from thoſe deadly potions, mixt only with his wrath and juſtice. The Pſalmiſt preſents the Lord to us, with a cup in his hand (Pſal. 75. 8.) In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, the wine thereof is red (which notes fierce wrath) and it is full of mixture: (This mixture, is of judgments, plagues, and puniſhments, this is the portion of their cup, Pſal. 11. ult.) But what will the Lord do with this mixed cup? who ſhall ſip at the top of the cup, he tells us not; but he is expreſs, whoſe the bottom is, He poureth out the ſame (ſome drops are ſpilt here and there) but the dregs thereof, all the ungodly of the Earth ſhall wring them out and drink them. Alas they loath it, their ſtomachs turn at it: They have not been brought up to drink dregs, they have had their wine well refined, and ſparkling with ſpirits in chriſtal glaſſes; and how can they get this down? They who have drunk ſo willingly and freely of the cup of ſin, ſhall be forced whether they will or no to drink the cup of judgment. And it is not a ſip or two ſhall ſerve their turns, they muſt drink all, dregs and all; they ſhall drink it to the bottom, and yet they ſhall never come to the bottom; they have loved long draughts, and now they ſhall have one long enough, there is eternity to the bottom: If a cup of affliction, which (in the effect) is a cup of ſalvation, be ſometime or for a time, nauſeous to the godly, how deadly ſick will the ungodly be, who muſt for ever drink a cup of wrath and death?

Secondly, The word which we tranſlate deſpiſe, notes the rejecting of a thing as unprofitable or unuſeful: That which a man deſpiſeth, he thinks he ſhall have no good by it: Things which are unprofitable are deſpicable: So the word is uſed (Pſal. 118. 22.) The ſtone which the builders refuſed or deſpiſed, is become the head ſtone of the corner. There were maſter builders in the Church, who (when they ſurveyed all ſorts of materials or ſtones for their fabrick of faith) looking upon the perſon of Chriſt, thought him fit only to caſt out among the rubbiſh, as altogether unuſeful; they layed him by, as a refuſe-ſtone, who is the head corner ſtone, both the ſtrength and beauty of the whole building. Thus the word is very appliable to the preſent Text: refuſe not corrections, as unprofitable and uſeleſs: Say not (as the Jews of Chriſt, Can any good come out of Nazareth? ſo) can any good come out of chaſtenings? Deſpiſe not the chaſtening of the Almighty.

And from this notion of the word, we may obſerve a ſecond prejudice againſt the rod: Even the Saints are ready to conceive afflictions to be unuſeful, and that they could well enough ſpare, and be without their troubles. A natural eye never ſees nor finds any thing but dammage by affliction; and a ſpiritual Eye doth not alwayes ſee the advantage that comes by them. Yea, he may ſometime ſay of an affliction, it will be my undoing, and the ruine of my houſe, and yet afterwards find it as a corner ſtone, the choiceſt outward means, which (through the bleſſing of God) hath united the walls both of his ſpiritual and civil building, the frame both of grace within, and comforts without. The Apoſtle Peter, hath a ſtrange Parentheſis (1 Pet. 1. 6.) For having told them of their rejoycing in the ſafety of their ſpiritual eſtate, being kept (or ſecured as with a Garriſon from Heaven) by the power of God, through faith unto ſalvation. Though now for a ſeaſon (if need be) ye are in heavineſs through manifold Temptations, or afflictions. Obſerve how he puts an If need be, or a ſuppoſition of neceſſity upon the afflictions of believers. As if he had ſaid, ye who are the Candidates of eternity, and heirs of ſalvation, may judge your ſelves paſt the rod or the ferula, and think, now ye have need of nothing but comfort or rejoycing in the hope of that ſalvation, ready to be revealed; but I tell you, you may have need of heavineſs yet, before you come to Heaven: and of manifold temptations, for the removing or ſubduing the corruptions of your hearts, before you enter upon your incorruptible inheritance. We are apt to conceive chaſtnings to be of no uſe, when they are as neceſſary as our daily bread; therefore deſpiſe not chaſtnings, as uſeleſs or unprofitable.

Thirdly, The word is applied often to the rejecting of a thing or perſon, as low, diſhonourable and diſgraceful: In this ſence alſo it is appliable here. Deſpiſe not chaſtning: That is, do not think thy ſelf diſgrac'd when thou art chaſtiſed: The heart of man is naturally full of pride, Man is a proud piece of fleſh. Nor doth he reſent any thing more, then his diſhonour; many can bear the pain of the croſs, better then the ſhame of the croſs. It is very obſervable to this purpoſe, how the Apoſtle deſcribes the Lord Chriſt in his ſufferings, Heb. 12. 2. He endured the croſs, deſpiſing the ſhame: as noting, that his being above the ſhame of the croſs, bore up his ſpirit under the croſs. To deſpiſe ſhame, is to look upon that, which the world accounts ſhameful, not only as deſpicable in it ſelf, but as not hurtful to us: When a man deſpiſes an enemy, as Goliah diſdained David (1 Sam. 17. 42.) he preſumes himſelf above his enemies power to hurt him: So to deſpiſe ſhame is to make nothing of it, or to think our ſelves no whit the worſe for it; yea rather to think our ſelves honoured by it. And until in this ſence we can deſpiſe ſhame, we ſhall deſpiſe correction and the croſs. Who is it almoſt, that finds not this the hardeſt Text in all the Chapter of afflictions? Zedekiah was more afraid to be mocked by the fugitive Jews, then to be a priſoner to the King of Babylon, Jer. 38. 19. If a man be poor, preſently he thinks he is diſgraced: if he be weak, he doubts he ſhall be contemned: if he looſe his eſtate, he fears he ſhall looſe his credit in the world: he was a man of place, ſome-body among his neighbours, but now he ſhall be ſlighted. Suffering for well doing, is our crown; ſuffering for evil doing, is our ſhame; but it is no ſhame to ſuffer.

Fourthly, To deſpiſe a thing, notes the ſlighting of it, as if we did not think it worth while, to take any notice of it; and ſo this will be the ſence, Deſpiſe not thou the chaſtnings of the Lord; that is, do not ſlight the chaſtnings, do not lightly paſs them by, do not look upon them as inconſiderable, as not caring what God doth with thee or thine. When God layes his hand upon us, he would have us lay it to our hearts. As it is our duty to be affected with mercies, ſo likewiſe with chaſtnings. If a malefactor ſhould ſay to the Judge, do what you will with me, I care not; or a child to the Parent, correct me as long as you will, I care not; how unnatural were this? This is properly to deſpiſe afflictions. Some are like Leviathan in this ſence (Job 41. 27.) They eſteem Iron as Straw, and Braſs as rotten Wood: They make nothing of the acts or inſtruments of Gods diſpleaſure. This is groſs deſpiſing. But beſides every undervaluing, or inadvertency of the correcting hand of God, hath a degree of this deſpiſing it. That exhortation ought never to be forgotten, which ſpeaketh to us, as unto children, Heb. 12. 5. My ſon, deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him. The Greek word imports, the Littling, or thinking of them little. Do not think the chaſtnings of God little, do not little, or ſlight them in thy thoughts. Neither faint when thou art rebuked, that is, do not think thy afflictions ſo great, that thou muſt needs ſink and faint under them. Theſe are the two extreams, into which our hearts uſually run when chaſtnings are upon us. Some err by neglecting the hand of God, as light; and others by fainting under it, as too heavy. As a good heart takes notice of, or will not deſpiſe a little, the leaſt comfort; ſo it will take notice of, and not deſpiſe a little, the leaſt croſs. When a man hath a ſmall loſs in his eſtate, if he ſay, this will not undo me, I can bear this, I will fare as well, and go as fine as ever for all this, ſuch ſpeeches or thoughts are a deſpiſing of the chaſtening of the Lord. We are to obſerve the hand of God taking away, as well as giving a penny. So when a man hath a little fit of ſickneſs, if he ſay, I ſhall rub out this well enough, this is to deſpiſe the chaſtning of the Lord: We are to bleſs God for every hours health, and to be ſenſible of his hand in every hours ſickneſs, or aking joynt.

Every affliction is a meſſenger from God, it hath ſomewhat to ſay to us from Heaven; and God will not bear it, if his meſſengers be deſpiſed, how mean ſoever: If you ſend a child with a meſſage to a friend, and he ſlight and deſpiſe him, you will take it ill. I remember what the ſtory relates of Galienus the Emperor, who, when the report came to him, that Egypt was loſt, what then (ſaid he) cannot I live without the flax of Egypt? And when the report was brought that a great part of his Dominion in Aſia was waſted: Cannot I live (ſaid he) without the delicacies of Aſia? To ſpeak thus from a principle of mortification toward the creature, is the character of an excellent ſpirit; but to ſpeak thus from a contempt of the providence of God, is the character of a proud, or of a ſtupid ſpirit. When we hear of the loſs of a child, of a friend, or of a loſs in our eſtate; to ſay, what then? I can bear that well enough, I have more children, other friends, eſtate enough beſides that, this (I ſay) is a high deſpiſing of affliction.

There is one thing further, in the fifth place, obſervable in this word, Deſpiſe not thou the chaſtnings of the Lord. The word is an extenuation or a leſſening of the ſence. The Holy Ghoſt intends more then is expreſſed; for the truth is, when he ſaith, Deſpiſe not, &c. His meaning is this, ſhew reverence, highly prize and eſteem the chaſtning of the Lord. As (for inſtance) when the Apoſtle ſaith, in 1 Theſ. 5. 20. Diſpiſe not prophecying. Do you think this is all that is due unto an Ordinance of God, that a man ſhould not deſpiſe it? Surely no, he means then, prize prophecying highly, have it in great eſteem: So in 1 Tim. 4. 12. and Tit. 2. 15. when he ſaith, Let no man deſpiſe thy youth, is that all the Holy Ghoſt means? That Timothy a godly Paſtour ſhould only not be deſpiſed by his people? No, his meaning is, that they ſhould honour, reſpect and reverence him, as one that watched over them in the Lord. I might give you divers other Scriptures, where, when the Holy Ghost only forbiddeth the sin, he intendeth the duty or grace in strictest opposition to that sin. So here, Despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty, layes this charge and duty upon us, highly to esteem the chastening of the Lord; we must put afflictions amongst our comforts, and rank them with our blessings. Not to despise, is but the first step beyond sin, but that includes the last and furthest step of duty, which becomes us under chastenings.

So much of the act forbidden, despising. Now, for the object, chastening. The original verb signifies to instruct, or to teach; so it is translated, Chap. 4. vers. 3. Thou hast instructed many. Instruction is both by words and blows. The wisdom of God mixes a rod with his word, and chastening with teaching: Therefore it is promiscuously used in Scripture, sometime for teaching, and sometime for chastening. Chastening belongs properly to children, who are wanton and ungovern'd, who have a bundle of folly in their hearts, which the rod of correction driveth out. To be chastened, hath a double aspect upon us; First, upon our priviledge: Secondly, upon our weakness. To be chastened, notes our priviledge and relation, as children, unto God our Father. He hath revenges for his enemies, but chastenings are a part of his childrens portion; yet in that we are chastened, it taxes us of weakness; we are but children, foolish, unruly, wanton, and therefore we go almost all our dayes, with a rod at our backs. Though the Saints on Earth, compared among themselves, are some children, and others men; yet all the Saints on Earth, compared with those in Heaven, or with what themselves shall be in Heaven, are children, and therefore they have what fits their state, chastening and correction. This chastening is sometime put for revenge, or the exactest and severest retribution of justice; thus it is said, Prov. 7.22. That the foolish young man caught by the subtil harlot, went after her as a fool to the correction of the stocks; that is, as a wicked man goes to punishment. And when the Prophet describes the sufferings of Christ, which were vindictive in the highest degree, he expresses it in this word, The chastisement of our peace was upon him (Isa. 53.5.) Though Christ were the infinitely and most entirely beloved Son of his Father, yet he did not chastise him as a son, but as an enemy or malefactor; for he chastened him in our stead, and under the same notion, that we must have been chastened, who were enemies and malefactors. So then, the word signifies sometimes judiciary chastening, but here fatherly chastening; which will yet appear more clearly, in opening the last term of this verse, which shews us the efficient cause of this chastening. The Almighty.

Despise not the chastening of the Almighty.] The chastening rod is in the hand of Shaddai, the Almighty. This is one of the glorious names of God.

And he is so called, First, from his power, to go thorough with what he takes in hand: His work never sticks in the mid-way for want of strength to bring it to the end. Despise not the correction of an Almighty hand. Further, the word notes not only power enough to correct, but power to destroy, spoil and lay all waste before him. God hath gained this Title or Attribute, from destroying or wasting his enemies. Some of the Rabbins design the Original of it, to that special act of his destroying power, The drowning of the old world; he shews his Almighty power in destroying and pulling down, as well as in making or setting up this goodly frame. To this the holy Prophets are well conceived to allude, when they say that, Shod, scil. Destruction, commeth from Shaddai, The Almighty. We have it in two expres Texts, Isa. 13.6. Howle ye, for the day of the Lord is at hand, it shall come as a Destruction from the Almighty; it shall come as Shod from Shaddai. So (Joel 1.15.) Alas for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come. It will be profitable for us to consider, under what name God is expressed, when he is chastening his own children.

Nonnulli putant שַׁדַּי esse ex verbo שָׁדַי sufficit, & litera ש, quæ supplet locum & sensum relativi Ascher, & ita denotat Deum sibi sufficientem, & qui omnibus largitur sufficientiam, respondens Græco αὐτάρκης Drus.

Secondly, Others derive this name from the conjunction of two Hebrew words, whereof the one (Dai) signifies, it Sufficeth, or is sufficient: and the other, though it be but a letter (Shin) yet it supplieth the part or place of the Relative (Ascher) which, and so the word put together sounds thus much, Who is sufficient, or who is all-sufficient; Despise not the chastening of him that is all-sufficient. Thou art under his correction, who doth not take from thee, because he wants himself; who doth not let thee want, because his own store is spent, out of which he used to supply thee. He alone hath sufficiency in himself, and he is at all times all-sufficient for all others, and gives sufficiency to as many, as he pleaseth. That of the Apostle fills this signification of the word, Act. 17.25. Neither is he worshipped with mens hands, as if he needed any thing; for he giveth to all, life and breath, and all things.

Alii deducunt שַׁד à שָׁדַי Quod Mammam significat, quasi māmosū dicas, quod omnia alat. Drus.

Thirdly, The word is conceived to come from Shad, which in the Hebrew signifies a breast, the mothers breast or pap, by which she suckles her child. And answerable to this notion, in most of those places, wherein God is expressed in that act of his providence, making fruitful, and giving increase, he hath this name, Shaddai: as noting, that he hath the Great Milky Breast, which nourishes and suckles, which feeds and strengthens all creatures: that is, the word, his blessing, not only makes fruitful and multiplies, but preserves and keeps alive. Thus, Gen. 49.25. the Patriarch, old dying Jacob, blesses his son Joseph in this form, And by the Almighty (Shaddai) who shall bless thee with blessings of Heaven above, blessings of the deep that lies under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb. His Father Isaac had sent him to Padan-Aram under the influences of the same blessing, almost in the same words, (*Gen.*28 3.) God all-mighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee. And the Lord himself speaks thus to Jacob, when he appeared the second time to him, after his coming from Padan-Aram. I am (El-Shaddai) God Almighty, be thou fruitful and multiply, Gen. 35.11. that is, I can make thee fruitful, and multiply thy posterity, and I can feed them, as fast as they multiply, and give thee fruit for thy family, as well as make thy family fruitful. Thou shalt not over-charge me with the greatness or numerousness of thy house. Trouble not thy self, let thy children be my care, at my finding, how many soever they are, let my purse pay for all: I am El-Shaddai, God Almighty. So then, as the justice and exact wisdom of God are set forth in the former branch under the title Elohim, Happy is the man whom God, (Elohim) corrects; so (least we should think of God under that notion only) his power and all-sufficiency, his goodness and tenderness are set forth in the next branch, Despise not the chastening of the Almighty. You are under the rod of Shaddai, an All-powerful, an All-sufficient, an All-nourishing God. The verse following seems to joynt in with, and suit this fully, He makes sore, and he bindeth up; he woundeth and he healeth; one part shewing us God, as a Judge, wounding and making sore; the other, as an all-sufficient Friend, and Father or Physitian, healing and binding up. Take two or three Notes, from the consideration of the name, under which God is here expressed.

First, The lightest chastenings come from a hand that is able to destroy.

When the stroak is little, yet a great God strikes. Although God give thee but a touch, a stripe which scarce razes the skin: yet he is able to wound thee to the heart. Know, it is not because he wants power to strike harder, but because he will not, because he is pleased to moderate his power; thou hast but such a chastening, as a child of a year old may well bear; but at that time, know, thou art chastened with a hand able to pull down the whole world; the hand of Shaddai, The Almighty gives that little blow. Men seldom strike their brethren, less then their power; they would often strike them more, their will is stronger then their Arm. But the Lords arm is stronger (in this sence) then his will. He doth but chasten, who could destroy. And this carries a mighty perswasion with it, not to despise the chastening of the Lord, how little soever; for he can strike harder, if thou slightest this. He can break thy bones, who hath not yet broken thy flesh. Fear him (as our Lord Christ argues, who, though at the present he hath made thy head only to ake a little, yet) can kill thy body, and after he hath killed, hath power to cast into Hell.

Pondus est in voce שַׁדַּי noli spernere clementiam ejus in quo vivis, qui te uno momēto potest comminuere. Coc.

Secondly,

Secondly, In that afflictions come from Shaddai, a God all-sufficient, God would have us conceive in all our troubles;

That, when he takes away any or all created comforts from us, yet he is himself all-sufficient for us.

When we are chastened by the loss of any good things, Shaddai doth it, who hath the power of all good things in his hand. When he takes away riches, or health, or relations, if he doth not take away himself from us, we cannot be comfortless, for all-sufficiency stands by us.

Lastly, He dealeth with us, but as a tender nurse, or mother in all his chastenings. The mother strikes the child a little blow with one hand, and gives it the breast with the other; she gives it a little tap with one hand, and a spoon with the other. Consider your chastenings, they are the chastenings of Shaddai, who, as a tender mother, hath a breast ready to nourish, and a spoon to feed, while he chides or chastens. And if by greater afflictions, he wounds or makes you very sore, you shall not want careful dressing and assured healing.

Vers. 18. For he maketh sore, and he bindeth up; he woundeth, and his hands make whole.

This verse contains an exemplification of the former ground, why we should not despise the chastening of the Almighty: For if it should be objected against the former assertion (Happy is the man whom God correcteth.) Where is this happiness? Is there happiness in sores and wounds, in sickness and weakness, in poverty and in wants? Who cannot easily want this happiness, and not complain? Eliphaz seems to answer for God in this Text. If your faith cannot come up to believe this, stay but a while, and your sense shall teach it you. Who would not be glad of a wound when he knows he shall have Shaddai for his Chirurgion. If you will not allow a man is happy, when he is sore; will you not allow him happy, when his sore is bound up by such a hand? If you will not grant a man is happy, when wounded; you cannot deny him happy, when he is thus healed. The Almighty will not leave them in their sores, in their wounds: As he hath a rod, so he hath a swath; as he hath a sword, so a salve. His plaister is ready for your wound, and his medicines for your diseases. It is true of God above all others, One and the same hand smites and cures. Thus of the general meaning and connexion of this verse.

He maketh sore.] The word is used in the second Chapter of this book, vers. 13. of Job's friends, that they stood silent, for they saw his grief was great, or his soreness was very great. It notes the grief and soreness, either of mind or body; some translate, He woundeth: But the next clause bears that distinctly, or we may joyn both, the one, as the cause, the other, as the effect, He maketh sore by wounding.

And bindeth up.] The word is appliable to any kind of binding. First, To the binding of captives in prison with chains. Secondly, To the binding of ornaments upon the head, Ezek. 29. 9. Thirdly, It is used metaphorically for binding to obedience or punishemt, Job 34. 17. Shall even he that hateth right govern? The Hebrew is, shall he bind; because Governors bind their subjects or servants, either to do what they command, or to suffer what they inflict. Fourthly, It is also applied by a metaphor to the binding up of those civil breaches or ruines, which are upon a people, Isa. 3. 6, 7. A man shall take hold of his brother, &c. saying, be thou a ruler, and let this ruine be under thy hand. In that day shall he swear, saying, I will not be a Healer, or a Binder up. Fifthly, It is used for the applying of ligatures, with which the medicine or plaister is bound upon the wound or sore; and this word doth therefore also signifie the healing of a wound, because the due binding of the wound is one half of the patients cure, and a very great part of a Chirurgions skill, as the learned Physitians observe in their Discourses about wounds and Chirurgery; Ligature contributes so much to healing, that the same word serves for both, or either. Now (Shaddai) the Almighty is admirable at this, when he hath made a sore, he can make an exact Ligature. We often find these two together, Psal. 147. 3. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. The Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 34. 4.) complains of the false Prophets, Because they did not heal, that which was sick, and bound not up, that which was broken. They had neither skill nor conscience, either spiritually to break hearts, or when they found them broken to bind them up. They knew not how to fasten Gospel promises and holy counsels upon the heart, that the wounds of it might be closed, and were therefore Physitians of no value.

There are two interpretations given of these words, He maketh sore, and he bindeth up.

First, Some expound them by an Enallage of the Participle for the Verb, thus, He maketh sore, and he bindeth up; that is, He making sore, bindeth up; as if the very act, by which God smites, had an influence upon the healing and a tendency to the restoring of his afflicted ones, He making sore, bindeth up. We find such constructions frequent in Scripture, Isa. 65. 22. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: That is, They building, another shall not inhabit, and they planting, another shall not eat. The negative is not fixed upon their building, &c. but upon other inhabiting. And so, Deut. 22. 4. Thou shalt not see thy brothers Ass, or his Ox fall down by the way, and hide thy self from them: That is, Thou seeing thy brothers Ass or Ox fall down, shalt not hide thy self from them: A man sometimes could not but see his brothers Ass or Ox fall down: but he seeing, must not at any time, hide himself from them, that is, not succour them; so (by the way) that phrase of hiding may be interpreted, by that of the Prophet (Isa. 58. 7.) Thou shalt not hide thy self from thy own flesh. But to the point, here we see, He maketh sore, and bindeth up; may congruously to other Scripture speakings, be rendred, He making sore, doth bind up; as if the wound were a part of the cure, and the sore a plaister. We know that a wound in nature is sometime a part of the cure: it is a common and a necessary practise in Chirurgery (and to that the Holy Ghost may allude in this place) when they perceive a wound or a sore, to which medicines cannot well be applied (and so unfit for healing) either to make a new wound in the whole flesh, or to make the first bigger. The murderer wounds to kill, and the Physitian wounds to cure. He comes, as it were, arm'd with instruments of cruelty. The patient whose flesh is to be launced cries out, but yet he launces him. The patient whose flesh is to be seared, cryes out, but yet he sears him. He is cruel to the wound, while he is most kind to the wounded.

An ignorant man would wonder to see a Chirurgion, when he comes for healing, make the wound wider, yet so he must do, and he doth it upon urgent reasons. As when the orifice is not wide enough to let in the medicine, or to let out the corruption, or cannot admit his searching instruments to the bottom; in such cases, he saith, Unless I increase your wound, I cannot cure it. Thus often times the Lord is compelled to wound, that he may heal; or fit our wounds for healing. Our wound is not wide enough, to let out the sinful corruption of our hearts, to let in the searching instruments and corrasives of the Law, or the balm and comfortable applications of the Gospel.

We may Observe from this sence of the words,

That, The woundings and smitings of God, are preparatories for our cure and healing.

It is said (Isa. 53. 5.) of Christ, that with his stripes we are healed: and it is in this sence a truth, that we are healed with our own stripes: We are healed with the stripes of Christ meritoriously, and we are healed by our own stripes preparatorily; the stripes of Christ heal us naturally, our own stripes heal us occasionally: or his in the act, ours in the event. (Prov. 27. 6.) Faithful are the wounds of a friend, his wounds are faithful, because he wounds in faithfulness: The healings of many are unfaithful. They heal the hurt of the daughter of my people deceitfully, is the Lords complaint by the Prophet, they skin over the wound, but they do not cure it. Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, it shall be an excellent oyl which shall not break my head, Psalm 141. 5. Much more may we say, Let the righteous Lord smite me, and it shall be a kindness to me; let the righteous Lord reprove and correct me, it shall be as an excellent oyl, which shall not break mine head; it shall heal my my heart: How healing then are his salves, whose very sores are a salve?

Illa est vox Domini, percutiam & ego sanabo; hoc faciunt medici. Ferum gestant & curare veniunt. Clamat secandus & secatur; sævitur in vulnus ut homo sanetur. Aug. in Psa. 50. Chirurgus sæpe vulnus infligit, & ferro sibi spacium ad commodam curationem aperit.

Secondly, Take the words in the plain rendring of them, noting only thus much, that God makes sore, and bindeth up; so we have two distinct acts, often ascribed to God in a figure, to set forth judgment and mercy, the afflictions and deliverance of his people (Hos. 6. 2.) Let us return unto the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. (1 Sam. 2. 6.) The Lord killeth, and maketh alive. (Deut. 32. 39.) See now, that I, even I am he, and there is no God with me; I kill, and I make alive, I wound, and I heal. Hence observe,

It is the property of God to take care of all the sicknesses, sores or evils of his people.

As God is the great corrector and instructer of his people, so he is the great Physitian of his people: If he make a wound, he will take care for the healing of it; he doth not make sores, and leave others to bind up. Mighty men wound, but they take no care for healing; they can impoverish and spoil, but they care not to repair; they can pull down and root up, let who so will build and plant. Shaddai, the Almighty God doth both; if he break thy head, come to him, humble thy self before him, and he will surely give thee a plaister, which will cost thee nothing but the asking. And whereas he doth not willingly afflict or grieve, he doth most willingly comfort and heal the children of men, Lam. 33. 3. He speaks of it as a pain to himself to make us sore; but to make us sound, is his delight and pleasure. Satan is the Abaddon, the destroyer, and he only destroyes; he makes wounds, but he heals none; he kills, but he makes none alive.

The second Branch of the Verse [He woundeth, and his hands make whole] is but a repetition of the same thing, yet with some addition, or heightning of the sence. To make sore, and bind up, are not so deep either in judgment or in mercy, as to wound and make whole.

The word used for wounding, imports a dangerous and deadly wound, or to make a man all gore blood. It signifies to strike quite through; and it is divers times applied, to note that stroak which God gives his worst enemies, Psal. 68. 21. But God shall wound the head of his enemies, or, he shall strike them quite through the head. ver. 23. He shall dip his foot, or make it red in the blood of the ungodly. And, Psal. 110. 5. The Lord shall strike through Kings in the day of his wrath. Hence observe,

That, God sometimes makes very deep and great wounds in his own servants.

Such wounds, as by the sight of the eye, you cannot distinguish them from the wounds of his mortal enemies. He strikes through both heads and hearts of his own people: Or as Simeon said to the blessed Virgin Mary, Luke 2. 35. A sword pierceth through their soul also. But then lastly note,

God never makes a wound too great for his own cure.

The power of God to save, is as great as his power to destroy; his healing power and his wounding power, are of the same extent; his justice cannot out-act his mercy; both are infinite.

And not only doth he heal the wounds which himself makes, but he can heal the wounds which men make; even all the wounds which the utmost power and malice of man can make. He is able to do more good, to shew more mercy, then all creatures are able to do hurt or mischief. We find the state and condition of a people sometimes so wounded and sick, that men have despaired of recovery; being consulted, they may answer, your sore cannot be bound up, and your wound cannot be healed, your estate is gangreen'd and past cure: Lo, he said, as was toucht before, (Isa. 3. 8.) In that day shall a man swear, saying, I will not be an healer, for in my house is neither bread nor cloathing. Alas, I heal you! I cannot heal you; your troubles are past my skill to remedy or redress. Thus man is sometimes at a stand, he cannot heal what men have wounded; but God is never at a stand; your old festered sores, and rankled wounds which have taken wind, discourage not his Chyrurgery. When a people are in such a pickle or pitiful plight, as the Prophet Isaiah describes the Kingdom of Judah, in chap. 1. 56. The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint: from the sole of the foot, unto the head, there is no soundness in it, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores; they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with oyntment. When (I say) the case of a people is thus, and they can get no healer: yea, though a people (like the woman, Mark 5. 25.) have had an issue of blood (in bloody battels, which is now almost Englands case) many years, and have suffered many things of many Physitians, and have spent all that they have, and are nothing bettered, but rather grow worse; yet if Christ do but touch such a sick, diseased, bleeding people in mercy, and they touch him in faith, they shall be healed, and their fountain of blood will immediately dry up. Or if their condition requires some longer operation, he can effectually take such a course for their cure; he is abundantly furnished with all instruments and abilities for the making of a perfect cure.

It is well observed, that three things are necessary for a Chyrurgion.

First, He must have an Eagles eye; one that is good at healing, had need be good at seeing.

Secondly, He must have a Ladies hand, soft and tender, to handle the sore gently.

Thirdly, A Lions heart, a stout strong heart; for if he faint, how shall his Patient keep up his courage?

These three are exceeding necessary in Chyrurgery about natural bodies; but much more in Chyrurgery about Civil and Ecclesiastical bodies, the healing of Churches and Kingdoms. And where shall we find, whither shall we send for Physitians, qualified with this Eagles eye, to look into all our sores and sickness? with this Ladies hand, to deal gently and tenderly with our wounds? with this Lions heart, stoutly and couragiously, without fears and faintings, to go through with the work? Well, if men should not be found thus furnished, the Lord is: He hath an Eagles eye, an all-seeing eye, seven eyes of providence and wisdom, to look through our sores, and into all our distempers: He hath (as in allusion we may speak) a Ladies hand, soft and tender, to deal gently and graciously with a people; he can dress our wounds, and pain us little, scarce be felt while he doth it. And he hath the Lions heart, infinite courage and strength of spirit, to undertake the most gastly wounds, or swoln putrified sores. Let us therefore rest our selves assured, that whatsoever our personal or our National sores, our personal or our National wounds be, be they what they will, or what we can call them, desperate, incurable, such as have discouraged many from medling with their cure, or sham'd those that have; yet our Shaddai, the almighty God, can bind them up and heal them, fetch the core from the bottom, and close the skin upon the top, so tenderly dress, and so perfectly cure them, that a scar shall not remain, unless it be to mind us of his infinite skill and goodness, or of our own duty and thankfulness.

VERS. 19, 20, 21.

He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.
In famine he shall redeem thee from death, and in war from the power of the sword.
Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue; neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.

ELiphaz still prosecuteth his former Argument, to take Job off from despising the chastenings of the Almighty spoken of at the seventeenth verse. And having shewed, first in general, that they are happy whom the Lord corrects: And secondly, That the Lord heels as well as wounds, is as ready to bind up, as to make the sore; he illustrates this by giving,

First, An assurance of deliverance from evil, and that,
1. In the general, at the nineteenth verse.
2. By an enumeration of particular cases of greatest dangers and outward evils.

And secondly, To shew the happiness of those whom God corrects, he gives an assurance of positive blessings, which shall in due time be heaped upon their heads, whom God had before wounded with sorrows, and loaded with afflictions.

The nineteenth verse is a promise of deliverance from evil.

evil. He shall deliver thee from six troubles, yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

To deliver, notes here, the snatching or pulling of a man out of the hand of an enemy, out of the mouth of danger.

The Hebrew word for [trouble] comes from a Root, which signifies to straighten or to narrow a thing up in a little compass; and so by a Metaphor, to vex and trouble; because they who are straightned in any kind, are pained and troubled. And when we hear of any trouble, we usually say, such are in straights. And this word is often translated a straight (2 Sam. 24. 14.) I am in a great straight, saith David, when he was put upon that hard election, between Sword, Pestilence and Famine. So, Judg. 11. 7. & 1 Sam. 13. 6.

The holy Language expresses an Enemy or Adversary by this word, because an Enemy puts upon straights, and so, to much trouble.

And to raise the force of this word to the highest, it is used to signifie the pangs and throws of women in childbearing, in which the mother labours in grievous straights, while the infant labours for enlargement. Troubles ever meet us in, or bring us into straights; they may well change names, which are so near in nature; I find the word so translated here, in some Books, He shall deliver thee in six straights, and in seven; when thou art so encompast about, shut in and encircled by evils on every side, that thou knowest not which way to move or turn, much less to go out; then the Lord will give enlargement, and either find a way out for thee, or make one, as he did for Israel at the red Sea, through those mighty waters.

In six, yea, in seven.] This phrase of speech is very considerable: Some numbers in Scripture, have a kind of eminency or excellency in them: I intend not any large discourse about numbers; only in brief. Those three numbers, Three, Six and Seven, are applied to a special signification by the Holy Ghost. A great number, a perfect number is expressed by any one of these three numbers; A threefold cord (that is, a cord of many or sufficient folds) is not easily broken, Eccles. 4. 12. Three times thou shalt keep a feast to me in the year, Exod. 23. 14. Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord, ver. 17. The Candlestick had three Branches, Exod. 25. 32. And three cubits was the height of the Altar, Exod. 27. 1. Three Cities of refuge were appointed for the man-slayer, Deut. 19. 7. And the addition made is of another three, v. 9. Three witnesses gave the compleatest evidence requirable; as Two, the least admittable in the Law, Deut. 17. 6. That (besides a rule) there was a mystery in most of these, I think no man doubts; though what the mystery was, may be presumption in any man to determine. Of this we are sure, that the highest mystery and perfection of all numbers and things, is found in One Three, That Three in One, The sacred Trinity: And in the common speech of most, if not of all Languages, Thrice happy, Thrice great, Thrice honourable, note a man advanced to the very pinacle of Happiness, Greatness and Honour. The Number Three, or the Numeral Thrice, imply a compleatness in all Numbers.

That the number six notes perfection, may be seen in the work of Creation: The Lord could as easily have made the world in six, or in one moment, as in six dayes; but the Lord saw it good, to take a compleat number of dayes, for so compleat a work. God threatens Gog, his perfect and compleat enemy, with a compleat punishment, or with judgment in perfection, (The Justice of God can be as compleat in punishing, as the malice of man can be in sinning) Ezek. 39. 2. I am against thee, O Gog, the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal, I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part of thee; so we translate: yet in the Margin of our Books, we find the Hebrew thus, I will strike thee with six plagues, or, I will draw thee back with a hook of six teeth.

Seven is a famous number, implying, First, Multitude. Secondly, Perfection: The barren hath born seven (saith Hannah in her Song, 1 Sam. 2. 5.) that is, many, she is a compleat mother, she hath a flourishing family, many children. And in opposition to this (Jer. 15. 9.) She that hath born seven, languisheth, that is, she that hath had many children, now hath none. Seven Devils were cast out of the woman (Luke 8. 2.) that is, a multitude of Devils: So the seven Spirits, the seven Churches, the seven Trumpets, the seven Seals, the seven Vials, &c. in the Revelation, speak the compleatness and perfection of each in their kind, whether good or evil: And that is appliable to the particular sence of the Text (Prov. 24. 16.) The just falleth seven times a day; that is, he falleth often, almost continually into trouble, and yet he rises again, God delivers him. The Hebrew word Shebange, is near in sound to our English seven; and to note that seven is a compleat full number, the same Hebrew word signifies seven and full; seven and satisfied or compleat. And the word to swear, is of the same extraction in that Language, with the word seven; the reason is added, because in or about an Oath, many and important causes and grounds are required.

But to pass from single numbers, I shall consider them in construction or conjunction, as here six and seven. He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee. Some understand this strictly and precisely of those two numbers six and seven; and expound the Text by the enumeration of those six or seven particular evils made by Eliphaz in the following verses: For having said in general, that God will deliver his in six troubles and in seven, he reckoneth up several troubles, and gives us (as it were) a Catalogue, or a particular of those evils by name, amounting to six or seven; as, 1. Famine. 2. War. 3. Scourge of the Tongue. 4. Destruction. 5. Evil Beasts. 6. Hurtful Stones. Here are six; and if a seventh evil come upon thee, in seven no evil shall touch thee.

But I rather take this expression, six, yea seven, to be a fixed number put for an unfixed, a certain number for an uncertain; and that uncertain number to be a great number, the greatest number, any number imaginable. We find this kind of speaking frequently in Scripture: In the thirty third of this Book of Job, v. 29. Lo these things God works twice and thrice; which we translate, these things God works oftentimes. When numbers are doubled with an encrease in the latter, it notes a mighty growth of the whole number. Twice and twice (we know) is but four times; but twice and thrice, may be more then five times; twice and thrice is oftentimes, no man knows how often.

We find the number next above this in the same signification; three and four, are put for many, very many (Amos 1. 3.) For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four: Some understand it of three or four special sins, of which Damascus was chiefly guilty; namely, 1. Idolatry. 2. Incest. 3. Luxury. 4. Oppression. Or, Three may be taken for a Cardinal number, and Four for an Ordinal, for the Fourth, as if some fourth sin were so sinful, and had such a malignity in it as the Lord would not pardon. Thus Four is put for the fourth, Prov. 30. 15, 18, 21, 29. Three things are never satisfied, yea, four things say not it is enough. That is, a fourth thing (sc. fire being the most unsatiable of all the rest) saith not it is enough. The copulative particle (and) is often in Scripture taken comparatively, for much more, Psal. 125. The Mountains are round about Jerusalem, and the Lord is about his people; so the Hebrew: we translate by a comparative of similitude; As, So: but more emphatically to the scope of the place, by a comparative of excess. Thus, as the Mountains are about Jerusalem, sc. to fortifie and defend it; so much more is the Lord about his people to fortifie and defend them. In this sence we may take the copulative And, in Amos. For three transgressions, the Lord would not turn, &c. but much more for a fourth, would he not turn away the punishment thereof. The former three, were enough to provoke the Lord to destroy you; but for this fourth, he is resolved to be irreconcileable, and will destroy you. Others add Three to Four, which make seven, as if the Holy Ghost had said, for seven (that is, manifold) transgressions of Damascus, I will not turn away, &c. But rather take the numbers distinct for Three and Four, that is, for the many, for the multitude of transgressions committed in Damascus, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Not that the mercies of God are exceeded by any number; or that, because they had gone on to sin three and four times, that is, very often times; therefore the mercy of God was at a stand, and could go on no further; but these numbers three and four, note the boundless impenitency of those Syrians, or their malicious persecutions of the people of God, dayes and times without number. They turn not from their transgressions, theirs are three and four, they will never have done; therefore I will begin to punish, or I will never have done punishing; I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Such forms of speech are frequent in heathen Authors, when they would enlarge or multiply the sence.

Again, The Numbers Seven and Eight, have a greater Emphasis in Scripture (Eccles. 11. 8.) Give a portion to seven and also unto eight. That is, Give much, and give to many; give (yet discreetly) to all comers: We must not stint nor bound our charity; Give a portion to seven, give to many; and if there come more, give to more, give also unto eight. Charity prefers some, but she refuses none, who are meet objects of charity, And when the Lord would shew what choice and store of able men, both for counsel and action, his people should have in times of dangers and invasions, he propheſies by Micah, that the people shall speak thus (Chap. 5. 5.) When he (sc. the Assyrian) shall tread in our palaces, then shall we raise against him seven shepherds, and eight principal men, that is, we shall muster multitudes of wise, valiant, faithful men, every one of which may be fit to command or direct in chief; Seven shepherds, and eight principal men.

So then, He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven, &c. is as if the Holy Ghost had said by Eliphaz, O Job, The Almighty Shaddai, of whom I have spoken to thee, is of such power, and hath such an unwearied arm, that he is able to deliver thee, not only in one, or two, or three, or many troubles, but he can deliver thee in six, yea in seven, in all thy troubles; let the number of thy afflictions be as great as thou canst imagine. The power and malice of men cannot multiply thy troubles faster, then the power and goodness of God can multiply thy deliverances; yea, if he pleases, he could perfect seven deliverances for thee, before they can lay the plot of one trouble against thee. Observe hence in brief,

First, Deliverance it is of the Lord.

He shall deliver thee.] Whatsoever the instruments are, by which deliverance is brought to you, or in whose hand soever deliverance is put; know, that the work and procurement of it, is from above. It is the priviledge of God, and of God alone to be a Deliverer; and he hath deliverance at his command, Psal. 44. 4. Command deliverance for Jacob. Man must humbly petition for, and beg deliverance: But God stands not intreating the creature, or debating the matter with Kings and Princes, with the strongest and most hard-hearted Pharaohs, to deliver his people; but he sends forth a Writ of Deliverance, and authoritatively commands deliverance, when it is his pleasure a person or a people shall be delivered.

Secondly observe, The Lord can deliver as often as we need deliverance: In six troubles, yea, in seven.

This should bear up our hearts in the returns, the multiplied returns of trouble. Though (as rheumatick old age is described, Eccles. 12. 2.) The clouds return after rain. That is, though one evil follows upon, or treads on the heels of another, though as soon as one black cloud is dissolved, and we begin to say (as in nature) this was a rainy day, but sure the next will be fair, yet the next proves more overcast and lowring then that; even in such a case, know, God hath a wind in his fist, which he can let out to scatter those clouds, before they dissolve; or if they dissolve, he hath a Sun at command, to dry up the fallen rain. The Lord hath a succession of mercies for our succession of sorrows. Say not then, we have got off this trouble, but what if another come? If another come, you have the same God, and he can give you another deliverance. Have we not been delivered in six troubles, yea in seven? Our straights have not been single; we may say (as she in Genesis, at the birth of her son) Behold a Troop. Not once only, but many a time, may our Israel now say, If it had not been the Lord, who was on our side, when men rose up against us, they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us.

The Lord spake once to his people, as if he were weary of delivering, or would not deliver (Judges 10. 10.) There we read the people of Israel in a great straight, crying to the Lord for deliverance, but he answers, ver. 11. Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians, and from the Amorites, and from the children of Ammon, and from the Philistines? The Zidonians also, and the Amalekites, and the Moabites did oppress you, and ye cried unto me, and I delivered you out of their hand. Here are seven troubles in which they found deliverance. But, as if six or seven deliverances (which we have expounded for boundless deliverances) were now the utmost bound of deliverance, he resolves, ver. 13. I will deliver you no more. And at v. 14. he turns them off to their Idols for help: Go (saith he) and cry unto the gods, which you have chosen, and let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation: But what was the reason of this refusal? The reason was this, not because God was weary of delivering that people, but because that people were weary of their God. Ye have forsaken me, and chosen other gods, ver. 13. If we chuse our selves another god, then we chuse our selves another deliverer; so long as we look upon God, as our God, so long we may look upon God as our deliverer. God would never have turned them off for deliverance to any thing below (what was in their conceit) a God.

How sad will it be, now that we are in great troubles, and crying daily, Lord deliver us out of these straights, for thou art he, whose name is, The Deliverer in six troubles, yea in seven. How sad (I say) will it be, if we have put God to read the Chronicle, and repeat the History of his deliverances given us, as he did to Israel, and say, I delivered you in 88. from the Spaniard; I delivered you in 1605. from the Gunpowder-Treason, &c. I will deliver you no more. Will not such speakings from Providence, be a plain conviction, that we have forsaken the Lord, and chosen other Gods? God hath sometime (what a miracle of mercy!) chosen those who forsook him, but he never (so stedfast is he in faithfulness) forsook any, who chose him to be their God. If he keep not such, from, yet he will certainly preserve all in such trouble, as it follows.

Yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

Non dicit à sex, sed in sex; non quod ab illis nō possit, sed quod cū acciderint, ab illis liberet, ut in illis non succumbat.

He saith not, He shall deliver thee from six troubles, and from seven; as if troubles should only threaten, but never come upon us; or as if all our deliverances should be preventions; but, he shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven, there shall no evil touch thee.

[Evil] signifies sometimes the evil of sin, and sometimes the evil of punishment. We may here take it either way. The Lord will so keep up thy spirit, and direct thy way in trouble, that thou shalt not defile thy self with the evil of sin; thy troubles shall purge, not pollute thee. And he will so keep thee, that thou shalt not be annoyed by any evil of punishment. If fatherly displeasure should appear against thee, wrath shall not. Love shall be mixed with thy correction; with thy wormwood and gall (as the Church speaks in the Lamentations) thou shalt have a temperament of honey and of sweetness; though troubles press thee, yet evil shall not touch thee.

Ita explic ut nullum malum attingat, etiā si tentari & conflictari sinat ad t pus, nocum tum tame non cap Coc. in

Not touch thee.] This notes exact deliverance; we think our selves well many times, if we can come off from dangers with a scratcht face, with a wound, or with the loss of a limb; but to come off without the loss of a hair, or which is less, without a touch, speaks a compleat deliverance. It astonisht Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 3. 27. to see the three Children come out of the fiery furnace, without a hair of their heads singed, without any change of their coats, or the smell of the fire. So much this imports, thou shalt pass the pikes, through six, yea seven, a whole army of troubles, and no evil shall touch thee. When the woman told the tempting Serpent, God hath said, ye shall not eat of the fruit of the Tree in the midst of the Garden, nor touch it, Gen. 3. 3. She implied a charge of total abstinence. And when the Lord saith, No evil shall touch thee, it implies a promise of total deliverance. In the first and second Chapters of his Book (and it is the same Original word) Satan begs leave of God, that he might touch Job, and touch all that he had. Now here Eliphaz seems to touch that string, No evil shall touch thee; as if he had said, God will not let his servants be overwhelmed (as thou art) with evils; no evil shall so much as touch them. And the truth is, though Satan obtain leave of God, to afflict the body of Job with pains, and he made it all over as one wound, yet no evil touched him, in the sence here intended: Though Job was all over evil sores, yet there was not so much as the least scar of an evil upon him: Troubles toucht him, but evils did not. And troubles may touch the servants of God, but evil shall not.

Hence observe, God saves and delivers his people from all evil, even while they are in the midst of trouble.

He delivers as well in trouble, as from trouble; while trouble is continued, good may be enjoyed. While his are in the water, and in the fire, God is with them, and his presence is more then deliverance (Isa. 43. 2.) If God be with us, though all evils are upon us, yet no evil touches us. The presence of the chief good, is banishment to every evil. As a wicked man may be loaded with good things, and yet none of them touch him; that is, do him any good: So a godly man may be loaded with evils, and yet none of them touch him, that is, do him any hurt. And thus we may understand that of the Apostle (1 Cor. 10. 14.) God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able, but will with the temptation also, make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it. Temptation you shall have; but with the temptation, even while the temptation is upon you, or while you are in the temptation, the Lord will make a way for you to escape the evil of that temptation. Thus with or in trouble, we have deliverance. To be kept from the evil of trouble, is a deliverance from trouble, while we are in trouble.

Thus far of the general Promise.

Now Eliphaz goes on to particulars, in ver. 20, &c. As if he had said, lest thou shouldst think, I deal only in general Notions, that I may more easily elude and deceive thee; therefore I will now give instance in the point, and name what troubles I mean: I will descend with thee to particulars, and reckon up the greatest outward evils, the most pinching straights that befal the sons of men, or the children of God; and out of all these, I affirm the Lord will deliver thee.

Verse 20. In famine he shall redeem thee from death, and in war from the power of the sword.

Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the Tongue, &c. Famine leads the Van of this great Army of evils here mustered up.

He shall redeem.] But what is it to redeem from Famine? To redeem, properly is, to take a man out of the power of another, by price, or by greater power. Redemption is an act of special favour, and it notes a special distinction by favour. When God threatned Pharaoh and his people with swarms of Flies, and promised, that his own people should be free; I will sever in that day the Land of Goshen, in which my people dwell, that no swarms of flies shall be there, ver. 22. This act of divine discrimination is called redemption, in the next verse. And I will put a division (Heb. a redemption) between my people and thy people; that is, those Armies of Flies, which invade thy people, shall not meddle with my people. To see one perish with, and our selves saved from the sword, is redemption in war. To see others hunger-starved, and our selves still fed, is redemption from famine, though our selves were never in the hands, or between the teeth of famine. A people divided from the troubles of others, are redeemed from those troubles. Such a redemption our Saviour speaks of, Mat. 24. 40, 41. Two shall be in the field, the one shall be taken, and the other left; two women shall be grinding in the Mill, the one taken, the other left.

In Famine.] Famine is the want of Bread, and Bread is the stay and staffe of life (Lev. 26. 26. Isa. 3. 1. Psalm 105. 16.) when this stay is gone, our lives fall quickly, or slip away. When this staff is broken, the thred of life breaks too. Man goes by the Bread in his belly, more then by the staff in his hand; except Bread hold us by the arm, and stay us up, down we fall. Famine is so like, or so near, or so certain a harbinger of death, that the Text puts them together. In Famine he shall redeem thee from death. Famine is numbred among the sore judgments of God, if it be not the sorest judgment, Ezek. 6. 11. Jer. 24. 10. And therefore redemption from it, is one of his choicest outward mercies. We may collect how sore a judgment Famine is, by the effects of it.

First, It causeth faintness and madness, Gen. 47. 13.

Secondly, Hunger burneth, Deut. 32. 24. That word is not used in the Hebrew except here. Famine kindles a fire in the bowels: When the natural heat hath no fewel put to it, to feed upon, it feeds upon Nature. Suitable to this, is the description of lamenting Jeremy in the famine of Jerusalem, Their faces are blacker then a coal, Lam. 4. 8. & chap. 5. 10. Our skin was black like an Oven, because of the terrible famine. Both the Coal and the Oven contract their blackness from burning heat.

Thirdly, It causeth pining and languishment, Lam. 4. 9.

Fourthly, Shame and howling, Joel 1. 11.

Fifthly, Rage and cursing, Isa. 8. 21.

Lastly, It breaks all the bonds of Nature, and eats up all Relations: Read that dreadful threatning, Deut. 28. 53, 54. and that dreadful example, Lam. 4. 10. Tender Mothers eating their Children. Famine eats up our bowels of compassion, and then it eats our bowels by relation: And, which comes yet nearer, Famine is such a devourer, that it causeth man to devour himself. The Prophet describes man in a fit of Famine, snatching on the right hand, and yet hungry; eating on the left, and yet unsatisfied; when he cannot fill his belly abroad, he comes home to himself, and makes bold with his own flesh for food; Every man eating the flesh of his own arm, Isa. 9. 20.

We read of many great Famines in Scripture, and withall of Gods care to redeem his people from them. Abraham, Gen. 12. who (at the call of God) denied himself, and came out of his own, into a strange Land, was presently entertained with Famine. One would have thought, God should have made him good cheer, and have spred a plentiful Table for him, causing his cup to overflow, while he was in a strange Land, and a meer stranger there; yet he met with a Famine, but the Lord redeemed him from that Famine, by directing him into Egypt, that famous storehouse for his people. Jacob and his Sons were redeemed from Famine in the same Egypt, afterward their house of bondage.

It is a precious comfort to have bread in such a promise as this, when there is none upon the Board. God takes care for the bodies of his people, as well as for their souls; he is the Father of both, and the provider for both. And while we remember what sore afflictions have been upon many Nations and People by Famine; while we remember Samaria's Famine, 2 Kings 6. Jerusalem's Famine, Lam. 4. And that storied by Josephus, in the Roman siege of that City; while we remember the late Famines in Germany, and the present one in many parts of Ireland; while we consider that the Sword threatens this Nation with Famine; surely we should labour to get under such a promise as this is, that we may plead with God in the midst of all scarcity and wants; Lord, thou hast promised to redeem Thine in Famine from death: There is no dearth in Heaven: And whatsoever dearth is on Earth, the plenty that is in Heaven, can supply it. How sad would it be, if your poor children should come about you, crying for Bread, and you have none to give them? How much sadder would it be, if your poor children should be made your bread, and ground to pieces between your teeth, as in the Famine of Jerusalem? In such a time, to look up to God in the strength of this promise, will be a feast to us, though we should perish in the Famine.

But how doth God redeem from famine?

First, The Lord can make the barrel of meal, and the oyl that is in the cruze, though but little, yet to hold out and last, while the time of famine lasts; such a miracle redeemed the poor widow from death, in that great famine, 1 King. 17.

Secondly, He can redeem by lengthning one meal, to many dayes. Elijah went forty dayes in the strength of one dinner. Man liveth not by Bread without God, but man may live by God without Bread.

Thirdly, Not only are the stores of the creatures his, and the fruitfulness of the Earth at his command, but if he please he can open the windows of Heaven; he can bring Bread out of the clouds; he can make the winds his Caterers to bring in Quails and abundance of provision for his people. Thus also he can redeem his from death, in the time of famine.

Or, fourthly, He can do it in a way of ordinary providence, by making the Land yield it's natural increase, and by giving strength to the Earth, to bring forth plentifully, for the use of man.

Fifthly, While the common judgement lasts, he can make some special provision for his, and make a redemption on

on of division, as he did in another case for his people, Exod. 8. 22.

And lastly, We may improve this promise, not only for redemption from death in famine, but for plenty of consolation, though we should die in famine. When the bread is quite taken away from your Table, your hearts may feed upon such a word as this, as upon marrow and fatness. Christ can feast your souls, when your bodies are ready to starve, he can fill your spirits with joy and sweetness, when there is nothing but leanness in your cheeks: Thus the Prophet Habakkuk triumphs in God (Habak. 3. 17.) Though the Fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the Vines, the labour of the Olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: Yet I will rejoyce in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. He was feasting upon God, while he imagines the World starving; he sees all things in God, though the World should afford him nothing. That soul is well fed and taught, which can be rejoycing, while it's own body is starving.

And in war from the power of the sword.

War is the second evil. Famine and war go often together, yea they two seldom go without a third; the Pestilence, 2 Sam. 24. Jer. 18. 22. And though in the order of the words, famine be set before war, yet usually war is the fore-runner of famine. The sword cuts off provision, and when it self hath devoured much flesh, it leaves no bread for those who survive. It is observable, that the original word for war here used, comes from a root signifying to eat or to devour, and so by a Metaphor it signifies to fight, or to strike with the sword. And the reason, why the same word, which signifies war, signifies to eat, is, because the Sword is such an Eater or rather a Devourer, and it eats two wayes.

First, The sword eats up the bodies of men, drinks up their blood, dispeoples a Land. And then,

Secondly, It eats up and consumes the fruits of the Earth; and hence War is the mother of Famine. Therefore we find, that when the great peace, and so the plenty of the Church of Christ is propheſied of, and described, Isa. 2. 4. and in Micah, it is thus expressed, They shall beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks. As if he should say, while the sword is abroad in the field, the plow-shares will do little there; for the most part Justice is silent in the time of War (the sound of the trumpet and drum, is too lowd for the Law) and when the Law stands still, the plough stands still; therefore when the sword is in motion, both are at a stand. Hence the promise, that swords shall be beaten into plow-shares, and spears into pruning-hooks; that is, with peace, you shall have Bread and Wine, which note the abundance of all other things. The ancients emblem'd peace by Ears of Corn, and Concord by (a Cornu-copia) a horn of plenty; riches are the fruit of peace: And safety is the priviledge of the Saints in times of War; In War they shall be delivered from the power of the Sword.

Inter arma silent leges.

The Hebrew is, They shall be delivered from, or out of the hand of the Sword: Sometimes in Scripture we read of the face of the Sword, which notes the Sword coming and approaching to a people: And sometimes we read of the mouth of the Sword, which notes the Sword come, devouring and eating up a people: And here we have the hand of the Sword; they shall be delivered out of the hand of the Sword; which notes (as we translate) the power of the Sword: Or, that form of speaking may be understood by an Hypallage, From the hand of the Sword, that is, from the Sword in the hand, which phrase imports present danger; when the Sword is unsheathed and drawn out, when it is in the hand ready to strike, then the enemy is ready to charge, and then the Lord delivers: He shall deliver from the Sword in the hand, or out of the hand of the Sword. So Psalm 127. 4. Children of the youth, are as Arrows in the hand of the mighty, that is, as Arrows ready to be shot. And Psal. 149. 6. Let the high praises of God be in their mouths, and a two-edged Sword in their hands; noting actual revenges taken on the enemies of God, and actual praises given to the name of God, at the same time.

Gladius manu apprehensus & elevatus, symbolum est extremi discriminis & præsentis hostis: Quasi diceret etiā in ipsa pugna vel inter tot manus gladios agitantes & contra te vibrantes salvaberis.

So then, the meaning of these words, He shall deliver thee from the power of the Sword; or out of the hand of the Sword, is this; suppose thou art in such a condition that the Swords are drawn about thy ears, and thou art in the midst of a thousand deaths and dangers, in the very heat of a battel, yet, then the Lord God can and will deliver thee.

And this likewise is a comfortable promise, for us to lay hold on, in these times. It is a time of War to us all, and there are many of our friends and brethren (as it were) in the very hand of the sword: Desires are often sent to the Congregation, by one for a husband, by another for a brother, by a third for a servant, by many for their friends, gone forth to meet the power of the Sword. Here is a promise, to comfort and to support such; the Lord in time of War, can deliver out of the very hand of the Sword, or, when Swords are in hand; when thousands of Swords are drawn together, preparing for, or smiting in the day of battel, know, then God is a deliverer. In the most present dangers, God shews the most present help. (Psal. 23. 5.) Thou shalt spread my Table, and cause my cup to overflow, before the face of my enemy; even then when my enemy is nearest and looketh on. As when the Sword is in the hand of the Angel, so when it is in the hand of man; A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee (Psalm 91. 7.) Not nigh thee? what? when they die on this side and on that side, on every hand of a man, doth it not come nigh him? Yes, nigh him, but not so nigh, as to hurt him: The power of God can bring us near to danger, and yet keep us far from harm: As good may be locally near us, and yet virtually far from us, so may evil; the multitude throng'd Christ in the Gospel, and yet but one toucht him, so, as to receive good; so Christ can keep us in a throng of dangers, that, not one shall touch us, to our hurt.

Yet, we are not to take this or the like holy writs of protection, as if God would deliver all his people, from famine and from the Sword; we know many precious servants of his have fallen by these common calamities; the Lord knows how to distinguish his, when Sword and famine do not. Neither doth this word fail, though they do: If the servants of Christ are not delivered from these troubles, they are delivered by them; and while they are overcome by one trouble, they conquer all.

Vers. 21. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue, neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.

This verse contains a second pair of evils: First, The scourge of the tongue. Secondly, Destruction.

Two things are here to be enquired into, about the former.

First, What is meant by the scourge of the Tongue?

Secondly, What it is to be hid from it?

The scourge of the Tongue.] Mr. Broughton reads it thus, Thou shalt be delivered (or thou shalt be hid) when the Tongue whippeth. And another to the same sence, At what time the Tongue shall be scourging of men, thou shalt be secured from it. And that word (Leshon) the Tongue, in Piel, signifies to detract, to traduce or slander; the same word is used both for the instrument, the Tongue, and one of the worst acts of the Tongue, calumniation; or we may render it according to the exact letter of the Hebrew elegancy; to Betongue a Man: We use such a kind of speaking in our Language, as, to strike a man with a cudgel or a Cane-staff, is to cudgel or cane a man; and if a man be shot with a Pistol, we say he was Pistol'd; so a man smitten with anothers Tongue, is said in the Hebrew, to be Betongu'd, or such an one hath betongu'd him.

We leave the Verb, and translate by the Noun; From the scourge of the Tongue. In construction (Beth) In, is often rendred by (Min) From, as Grammarians know. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God in all thy heart, or from thy whole heart, or from the heart-root: So here, Thou shalt be hid in the scourge; that is, Thou shalt be hid from the scourge; when the Tongue is lashing and whipping, thou shalt be hid from the lash and scourge of Tongues.

But what may we understand by this scourge of the Tongue?

First, Some take it for publick accusations before a Judge or Magistrate. Many scourge their brethren at the Tribunal of Princes, Revel. 12. That accuser of the brethren, that traducer, the Devil, is conceived to make those accusations by his agents, in those times, before the Heathen Emperors, against the Christians; the Christians in that age, were extreamly scourged by malignant and malevolent Tongues, Tongues set on fire of Hell, as the Apostle James speaks, Chap. 3. 6. And so the scourge of the Tongue may be that punishment, which they by false accusations obtained against the innocent; their Tongues got judgment against them sometimes to be scourged or whipt; therefore also, that very work of the Tongue, is well called scourging. Our Lord Jesus was crucified upon the Tongues of the Jews, before he was crucified upon the cross by the Romans. The Jews cried out first, crucifie him, crucifie him, here was the cross of the Tongue. The conspirators against Jeremiah, advise thus (Chap. 18. 18.) Let us smite him with the Tongue; that is, let us accuse him to the King, that he may be smitten by a publick sentence. In this sence a man is imprisoned by the Tongue, banished by the Tongue, hang'd and burn'd by the Tongue, that is, the Tongue doth all these vertually (or vitiously rather) by false accusations, causing these things to be done actually and formally.

Flagellum linguæ est pœna in judicio constituta, & postulata civi à calumniatoribus.

Secondly, Others interpret the scourge of the Tongue, to be those terrible and dreadful reports which amaze, lash and afflict the spirit about the approach of dangers. As, when a report is rung in the ear, that an invading enemy, spoilers and plunderers, arm'd with power and malice, are at hand to take away Estates, Liberties and Lives: How many have been beaten about the Ears, and scourg'd with such Alarums? (Jer. 50. 43.) it is said, The King of Babylon hath heard the report of them: what report was it? and of whom? A spy rides in, and kills the King with his Tongue, strikes him through with his Tongue, before he was toucht with the sword of the Medes and Persians: How? He brought him a sad report, that the Enemy was upon his march, then it follows, The King of Babylon hath heard the report of them, and his hands waxed feeble, anguish took hold of him, and pangs as of a Woman in travel. We find the like expression, Isa. 28. 18, 19. They who had slighted the judgments of God, and said, when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it should not come near them; even these (saith God) shall be vext, when they do but hear of a scourge coming near: I will send a report, and it shall pass over morning by morning, and it shall travel by day and by night; and what shall be the effect of it? It shall be a vexation (saith the Lord) only to understand the report. You shall not only be vexed when the enemy is come, and thrusts a sword into your bowels, and fire into your houses, but you shall be vext at the noise of his coming; it shall be a vexation to you, to hear the report. It is a great mercy to be delivered and hid from this scourge of the Tongue, and this is promised him who fears God, (Psal. 112. 7.) No evil tydings shall make him afraid. A heart which hath trembled at the voice of God instructing him, shall not tremble at the voice of men reporting evil to him. Many a man is more afraid then hurt, and more perplexed with the hearing of evil tydings, then others are with seeing or feeling the evil. The Lord threatens Ely, to do such a thing in Israel, and against his house, that, both the ears of him that hears shall tingle 1 Sam. 3. 11. But,

Quidam, cū vagabitur lingua, ut sit יהלך pro יהלך Druſ. Merc.

Thirdly, Some translate thus, He shall be hid when the Tongue wandreth or walketh about; for the same word which signifies a scourge, by the alteration of a point in the Hebrew, signifies to run to and fro. It is the word used in the first Chapter, where Satan reports himself, A goer to and fro about the Earth. There is an expression (Psalm 73. 9.) sutable to this sence, though the Original word be not the same; They set their mouth against the Heavens, and their tongue walketh thorow the Earth. The tongues of many take long journies, while themselves sit still: Kings are said to have long hands, but many of their subjects have long tongues, and strike their brethren with them many hundreds of miles off; the tongue travels from Town to Town, from City to City, and scourgeth one here, and there another. And, while these men send their tongues about a wandring, to wound here and there, this and that mans credit, He is a happy man that can be hid from them.

Sunt qui per linguam hic intelligunt nationes q. d. quū grassabuntur longè latèq; gentes & populi omnisque depopulabuntur, &c. Druſ.

Fourthly, Some of the Hebrew Doctors, retaining the fore-going sence of the Verb, say, that by tongue, is meant Nations and people: When the tongue, that is when a Nation shall go about, or march from place to place to destroy and over-run a Land; then, at such a time, thou shalt be hid: It is frequent in Scripture to put tongues for Nations, or Tongues and Nations for the same, Rev. 7. 9. Chap. 17. 15. And there is a comfortable truth in the matter of this interpretation; that when all Tongues or Nations shall be gathered to destroy us, yet we shall be hid: As if it should be said (like that, Psal 83. 6.) Though the Tabernacles of Edom and the Ishmaelites, Moab and the Hagarens, Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, the Philistines, with the inhabitants of Tyre, be confederate against thee: or, to take modern names and Nations, though Irish and Spanish, French and Danes, &c. should at any time, wander from their own Lands to invade thee; yet thou shalt be hid when these tongues rove and wander spoil and pillage. The matter, I say, of this interpretation is a truth, and a very comfortable one, but I would not charge it upon this Text.

Fifthly, And most generally, and I conceive most truly, by the scourge of the tongue, is meant all, and all manner of calumnies and slanders, cursings or evil speakings, false witnesses and accusations; and from these (the promise is) thou shalt be hid. It is said, Prov. 14. 3. That, In the mouth of the foolish is the rod of pride; not, that a foolish man will scourge pride, he loves it too well; but, because the pride of a fool sets his tongue a scourging the wisest and the best: (a) Evil words are the same to the credit of a man, that a scourge is to his back. When slanderers speak openly, then their tongue is compared to a sword, or an arrow by day; when secretly, then to a trap, or an arrow by night, to a Serpent which comes behind, Gen. 49. and as here, to (b) a scourge which is prepared for the back, and is called in our Language back-biting, or we may call it back-beating. The scourge of the tongue, is all that ill which the tongue can speak: And the (c) Latin word for a word, agrees well to this sence; being derived (as Criticks observe) from a word which signifies a stripe; or the word which signifies a stripe from that which signifies a word: And we find, that they who defame or over-severely reprove others, are called (barely) (d) strikers. And this (as some of the Ancients note) according to Scripture Language, in those two Apostolical directions (1 Tim. 3. 3. and Tit. 1. 7.) where the Apostle gives the rule concerning a Bishop, that he must be no striker; this may be understood of striking, not with the hand (the Apostle could hardly think that quarrelsom spirits and sons of violence should be so much as admitted to a probation about that office) but striking with the tongue, by an undue, an over-hasty, or an angry reproof and censure. The great instrument of a Bishop or a Minister, is his tongue: but he must use his tongue, rather to heal then to wound; or if at any time, he useth it to wound, it should be in tendency unto, or in a preparation for healing: Therefore, Let not a Bishop be a striker, a striker with his tongue in passion, much less in spleen or for self-ends.

(c) Verbera à verbis, aut verba à verberibus dicta sunt: quod aures vox verberet. Nonius.

(d) Qui detractoriis verbis, famam alterius verberant, percussores appellantur etiam suppresso nomine linguæ. Pined. 1. Sermone inutili conscientiam percutit infirmorum, nec contumelioſus & garrulus, perdat eum quem potuit modestia & lenitate corrigere, Hier. in Titus 1. 7.

Thus we see what we are to understand by the stroke or scourge of the tongue. But what is it to be hid from that scourge? A word of that, Thou shalt be hid.

Not as (a) One, Thy actions shall be hid, which might be as matter for slander to work upon; nor as (b) Another, though such actions appear, yet slanderers shall want proof, or sufficient witness shall not appear against thee. But,

(a) Latebūt detractorem tua facta, de quibus possit detrahendi materiam sumere. Aquin.

First, We may take it thus; Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue, that is, the tenor of thy actions shall be so fair, and thy life so blameless, that malice it self shall not find, where to fasten an accusation.

(b) Deficient detractorē firma probationes & sufficientia indicia. Cajet.

Or secondly, When other men are slandered and reproached, thou shalt be free.

Or thirdly, Thou shalt be hid, that is, though occasion should be given to malice (and that our noblest and holiest actions use most to give) yet malicious men shall not be able to come at thee, thy person shall be secured in a chamber of secrecy, and covered with a mantle of providential darkness, while the light of thy good works dazles and troubles the eye of the World.

But

But rather fourthly, Thou shalt be hid, that is, Thou shalt be patroniz'd and defended, thou shalt be set right, and vindicated from all calumnies and false aspersions. The Lord will so take care of thy credit and reputation, that though many go about to blemish it with lies and slanders, yet thy honour shall be saved, or the wounds of it healed; by causing thy righteousness to break forth as the light, and thy just dealing as the noon day. Some charitable medicinable tongue shall lick thee whole, after all the stripes of those scourges or envenom'd scorpion-tongues: Thus, thou shalt be healed if smitten, or else thou shalt not be smitten, (Psal. 31. 20.) Thou shalt keep them secretly in thy pavilion, from the strife of tongues. The words of the Psalmist are an allusion to Kings, who being resolved to protect their Favourites, against all the clamours and accusations of men, take them, as it were, into their own Pavillion, into their Bed-chamber and bosom, where none may touch them. God also hath a pavillion, a secret hiding place for his Favourites, where he preserves their credit and reputation untoucht, against all the blots and causeless blemishes of malignant spirits. Thus they are hid from the strife of tongues. Hence his Saints and people are called, His stored, or his hidden ones, Psal. 83. 3.

Ad similitudinem regiæ defensionis loquitur, qua se illi qui regibus chari sunt cerâ, in ipsis aulæ penetralibus & in ipso regum conspectu versâtes, defenduntur & securi vivunt. Musc. in Psal.

Observe, First, The Tongue is a scourge.

The Tongue is a terrible Engine: The Scripture gives us variety of comparisons to set forth the evil of an ill tongue. It is here called a scourge of many lashes or knotted cords, or rather stinging Scorpions; scoffing is one, slander a second, false accusations a third. The former strictly taken, is a lie told any neighbour, and the latter is a lie told the Magistrate. The tongue (Psal. 52. 2.) is called a sharp rasor. Psal. 57. 4. it is compared to Spears, and Arrows, and a sharp Sword; and if at any time with much using, this sword be blunted in the edge or point, the Scripture speaks of whetting the tongue, Psal. 64. 3. It is as the sharp Arrows of the mighty man, and coals of Juniper, Psal. 120. 4. They bend their tongues like a bow, Jer. 9. 3. Their tongue is as an Arrow shot out, vers. 8. In a word, It is a fire and a world of mischief, James 3. 6. (Jer. 18. 18.) we read of smiting with the tongue, and of devouring words, Psalm 52. 4. As there are devouring opinions, opinions which not only hurt the judgments of men, but devour their consciences, and eat up truth (as it were) at a bit; so there are devouring words, words that eat up a mans reputation, and devour his good name as Bread. Slanderous mouthes love the whitest Bread, the finest of the Wheat; a mans credit which hath not a bran in it, how sweet a morsel is it to such mouthes? Though, the truth is, every name, by how much more pure and spotless it is, by so much more deadly will it be in the stomachs of these devourers. A good name swallowed by an ill man, will (as Jonas did the Whale) make him (one time or other) stomach-sick, if not conscience-sick, and he shall be forced to vomit it out safe again.

It is a sad thing when (thus) the people of God are wounded and scourged by the tongues of wicked men; but I will tell you of a sadder scourging, that is, when the people and servants of God scourge one another with their tongues: I beseech you leave this work to wicked men, take not the scourge of the tongue out of their hands; let us, not only not slander, but, not speak hardly one of another. The ancient Christians in the Primitive times, were deeply wounded by the scourge of the tongue, what strange things did ungodly men feign and then fasten on them? They reported them as black as Hell, as if their holy meetings were not to worship God, but to defile themselves with incest and uncleanness; but among Christians themselves, we read not of this scourge, at that time. No, Christians loved one another to the amazement of Heathens: They were so far from this scourging or wounding of one another, that they were ready to be scourged, to be wounded, to be burned, to die one for another. This caused their Pagan persecutors to cry out, Behold how the Christians love one another! We are scourged by wicked ones, as They, O that we could love one another as They. Sons of Belial have revived the ancient reproaches and accusations against the brethren; O, that we could revive the ancient imbraces and most endeared affections of the brethren.

Observe, Secondly, It is a great mercy to be delivered from the Scourge of the Tongue.

The Apostle speaks of it, as a wonderful mercy, that he was delivered out of the Mouth of the Lyon (2 Tim. 4. 17.) Surely it is no ordinary mercy (though lying be very ordinary) to be delivered out of the Mouth of a Lyar. This is joyned in one promise, with deliverance from the most deadly instruments of War, Isa. 54. 17. No weapon formed against thee shall prosper, that is, no weapon of War, neither Sword nor Spear shall hurt thee. Then follows, And every tongue that shall rise up against thee in judgment, thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord. The tongue of a Ziba or of a Tertullus will devour and destroy, as bad as the Sword of a Cæsar or a Pompey. The holy story tells us, what woful work the tongue had made upon Joseph and Mephibosheth, if the good providence of God had not spoken a good word for them.

Lastly, Let me add one seasonable word of admonition, to these tongue-scourgers; as the word is, They that smite with the sword, shall perish with the sword; so, they that smite with the tongue, shall perish with the tongue. The tongues of the Saints are in some sence, sharper and sorer scourges, then the tongues of wicked men. The word of God in their mouths, is a Two-edged Sword, yea sharper then any Two-edged Sword. A Prophet or a Minister of Christ, can strike as hard with his tongue, as (and infinitely harder, then) any prophane wretch, or railing Rabshakeh in the World. Truth will set home, will wound deeper, then slander can. I (saith the Lord, Hos. 6. 5.) have hewed them by my Prophets, and slain them by the words of my mouth. In Revel. 11. it is prophesied, That fire shall go out of the mouthes of the two Witnesses, and devour their enemies, v. 5. That is, the word of their mouths, shall be as a fire to scorch and consume the gain-saying World; and with this instrument their tongue (for that only is sutable for the work of Witnesses) they are said to have tormented those that dwell upon the Earth, vers. 10. Some indeed are Sermon-proof and Word-proof; they at present do even laugh at all our spiritual Artillery; let whole volleyes of threats be discharg'd upon them, let them be hackt and hewed all day long with the Sword of the Word, they feel it not, it may be they jeer at it, at least they regard it not. As they, Jerem. 18. 18. conspiring against the Prophet, Come let us devise devices, &c. let us smite him with the Tongue. And least any should say, if we smite him with the Tongue, he will smite us again, For these Prophets are notable at their weapons; to secure themselves they resolve thus, Let us not give heed to any of his words. As if they had said, we know he will speak big words, and threaten us terribly, with Sword, and Pestilence, and Famine, and Hell, &c. But let's arm our selves against him, and make no more of all, then of a Squib or a pot-Gun, then of a stab with a wooden Dagger, or a charge with a Bull-rush; Let us not give heed to any of his words. But let these know, though now they are hardned against the spiritual scourge and sword, in the mouth of Christs Ministers; yet at the last, Christ himself will smite them with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked, Isa. 11. 4. He once made a scourge of cords, and whipt the buyers and sellers out of the Temple; he will at last make a Scourge of words, which shall whip all impenitents and unbelievers out of his presence into Hell, where they shall gnash their teeth, and gnaw Those tongues, which have scourg'd his faithful servants with many stripes, only for doing or speaking his, their Masters will.

Neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction, when it cometh.

The word Destruction signifies a confluence or meeting together of all kinds of evil; when evils break in together, as thieves and robbers into a house to spoil and take away all, Isa. 60. 18. Jer. 48. 3.

When such destruction comes, thou shalt have this priviledge, Not to be afraid of it. Not afraid, the word signifies any kind of fear, holy fearing as well as natural; here it is used for excessive distracting fear: It is not meant, that a man shall be secure or senseless, when destruction cometh, So to be fearless, is worse then to be reasonless. But this is the meaning, Thou shalt not be afraid; that is, thou shalt not be dismayed with fear, thou shalt not be amazed or astonished with fear, thou shalt not be at thy wits end, much less at thy Faiths end, when destruction cometh. Fear is good in its kind, yea it is an excellent grace; some fear in time of destruction is the daughter of faith, (Heb. 11. 7.) By Faith Noah being warned of God, of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an Ark to the saving of his house; He fears destruction savingly, whose fear moves him to prepare due means of safety. Such preparatory fears are holy fears, and well become the Saints, when destruction cometh. (Exod. 9. 20.) He that heard of the destruction coming, and feared the Word of the Lord, made his Servants and Cattle flee into the houses. God would not have his people, when they hear destruction is coming, stand at the door in a daring manner to meet it, and lay themselves open to it; no, he would have them flee into the house, and enter into the Chamber, and shut the door about them, hiding themselves, as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be over-past, Isa. 26. 20.

The fear which God promiseth his people protection from, is unbelieving fear, or fear which is the daughter of despair: Such as that, Isa. 7. 2. where, when a report came of destruction coming, it is said, That the heart of the King, and the heart of his people, was moved as the Trees of the Wood are moved with the wind. They were so afraid, so unsetled and disorder'd within, that they knew not how to settle and order their affairs without. Such a fear the Prophet Jeremy threatens upon Pashur, Jerem. 20. 3. The Lord hath not called thy name Pashur, but Magor-missabib; for thus saith the Lord, Behold I will make thee a terror to thy self, and to all thy friends: Fear round about, and fear within; this fear God promiseth to deliver his people from, in times of danger.

Observe hence, The power and presence of God is able to uphold his people in the face of dangers, and in the presence of destruction.

They shall not be afraid of destruction, when it cometh: Suppose God doth not keep the destruction off from them, yet he will keep sinking fears off from them. How terribly soever men look upon them, they shall not be a terror to themselves, neither will God be a terror to them. Many a Man is his own Bug-bear. And there is nothing can be so terrible to us, (except an angry God) as we may be to our selves. But he, to whom God is not a terror, and to whom himself is not a terror, will not be afraid of the King of terrors. So long as we are at peace with God and our selves, destruction cannot come so fast, as consolation will. And destruction cannot carry that away, wherein consolation lies. The best part of the Saints estate, is out of the reach of destroyers. They can destroy houses and goods, they can carry away gold and silver, but they cannot destroy faith and hope, they cannot carry away grace or holiness; they may burn your writings, and the evidences of your Lands and Tenements, but they cannot burn your evidences for Heaven, or weaken your tenure and interests in Jesus Christ. Upon the wings of this assurance the Saints are carried beyond the borders of fear when destruction comes into their borders, or death is breaking open their doors, and climbing up unto their windows. Yea this assurance, (which carries them beyond the confines of fear) sets them down in a very comfortable place, in the Land of joy, or upon the mountains of light. It is too little to say, They shall not be afraid, when destruction comes, for at destruction they shall laugh: as Eliphaz undertakes with his next breath.

VERS. 22, 23.

At destruction and famine, thou shalt laugh; neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.
For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field; and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

IN the former words, we had a promise of redemption from famine, and from fear at the coming of destruction. Here both the mercy and the promise are heightned, or the promise is made yet more merciful; At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh. It is a high priviledge to be redeem'd from famine, and not to be afraid of destruction, but to laugh at these is the highest priviledge. But is it not a sin to laugh at these? And if so, how will it be any priviledge at all? I (saith the wise man, Eccles. 2. 2.) said of laughter, it is mad; and of mirth, what doth it? And is not this mad laughter, to laugh at destruction, and to be merry in famine. The Prophet vehemently reproves joy in sad times, (Isa. 22. 12, 13.) and brands it for an iniquity, that shall not be purged from them, till they die. And can it then be commendable to rejoyce in famine, &c. Is it comely for man to be merry, when God is angry? And to be rejoycing, when the Lord is destroying? To clear this I shall open the sence of the Text, and shew, that this Laughter is neither sin nor madness, but the holiness and sobriety of the Saints.

At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh.] The word is ordinarily used for laughing; whence Isaac hath his name. The son of the promise was called Isaac, because Abraham laughed, or because he rejoyced at the promise or birth of his son; especially at the promise of His birth, who was to be the joy and desire of Nations, the Lord Jesus Christ; who, referring to this act of Abraham, tells the Jews, John 8. 56. Your Father Abraham rejoyced to see my day, he saw it and was glad. To laugh in Scripture is taken two wayes.

Sometimes in a good sence; and Sometimes in an ill sence.

In a good sence, and so, To laugh is an outward expression of sound inward joy and true comfort; To laugh is an act proper to man. There cannot be true and sollid joy (and so, not this effect of it, laughing) where there is not true sollid reason. Even passion (strictly taken) is founded in reason. In Chap. 29. v. 24. Job describing the great prosperity of his former dayes, saith, If I laughed at them, they believed it not. Job was a man of that esteem and veneration, that though he expressed in his gesture or countenance, a kind of familiarity, and how well he was pleased; yet the people did so much reverence him, and his piety and unspotted justice did so over-awe them, that they suspected still he might observe somewhat amiss in them.

Secondly, To laugh, is used for scorning and deriding. In Job 39. v. 7. Laughter is ascribed unto the wild Ass, improperly; He (sc. the wild Ass) scorns (or laughs at) the multitude of the City. And (Psal. 2. 4.) when the Princes and the people gather themselves together, to take counsel against the Lord and against his Christ; He that sitteth in Heaven shall laugh, and the Lord shall have them in derision. That is, the Lord (in a most holy manner) scorns or derides the counsels and practises of wicked men. Man is never in so sad a condition as when God laughs at him.

Again, Laughter proper to man, is either sinful and reproveable, or holy and commendable. Sinful laughter is that which arises,

First, From unbelief or weakness of faith: Such was the laughter of Sarah (Gen. 18. 12.) when the Angel brought his message that Sarah should have a son, Sarah heard it, as she was in the Tent-dore, and the Text saith Sarah laughed: The ground of her laughter was unbelief; she thought it an impossible thing, for her to have a son (as a man will laugh at a thing you tell him, when he thinks it impossible to be done.) That her laughter was from unbelief, is plain, from the Angels reproving question in the next words; Wherefore did Sarah laugh, saying, shall I of a surety bear a child, which am old? Is any thing too hard for the Lord? As if he had said, surely Sarah thinks the Lord hath out-promis'd his own power to perform.

Secondly, Sinful laughter ariseth from contempt, or slighting of counsel, and carnal security in times of danger, (2 Chron. 30. 10.) when Hezekiah sent messengers to Ephraim and Manasseh to warn them to come up to the house of the Lord to keep the Passover, it is said, That they laughed the messengers to scorn, and mocked them; they laughed, slighting and contemning this admonition, thinking themselves safe and well enough, though they came not up to that solemn Passover.

Thirdly, Sinful laughter arises from pride and self-confidence (Hab. 1. 10.) The Prophet describes the proud Chaldeans, invading Judah, thus, They shall scoff at the Kings, Kings, and Princes shall be a scorn unto them, and they shall deride every strong-hold. They shall come up with such an Army, with such an arm of flesh, as all flesh must fall down and yield unto.

Lastly, There is a sinful laughter, springing from sensuality, and excess of creature contentments. Such laughter Christ threatens, Luke 6.25. Wo to you that are full, wo to you that laugh now: That is, wo to you that laugh, because of your creature fulness.

Laughter, which is good and commendable, hath such roots, as these.

First, It springs up from faith, such was the laughter of Abraham (Gen. 17. 17.) When he heard the promise, that he should have a son, the Text saith, Abraham fell upon his face and laughed: That the laughter of Abraham was from faith, is clear from the Apostle, Rom. 4. 19. affirming, that, He not being weak in faith, considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarahs womb; he staggered not at the promise of God, through unbelief, &c. Abraham laughed out his faith, not (as Sarah) his unbelief. Therefore also Christ saith (as was toucht before) Abraham rejoyced to see my day, he saw it and was glad: In the promise of his son, he saw the Promised seed, in whom all the Nations of the earth should be blessed. This sight of the day of Christ, in that prospective of the promise, drew it in near to the old-mans heart (though it were far off) and made him glad.

Secondly, Commendable laughter comes from holy courage, and well grounded confidence; well temper'd magnanimity and Christian heroicalness of spirit, lifts us so far above dangers and fears, that we laugh at them.

And then, there is a laughter in dangers grounded upon assurance of deliverance from, or support in dangers. A man that sees a great storm coming, laughs at it, knowing where to go to shelter presently, where to get a warm house over his head. The Pilot knowing he hath a strong Ship, and good tackling, laughs at the winds. In that sence [not to fear] is used (Prov. 31.21.) where it is said of the wise woman, She is not afraid of the snow for her household; If the snow and cold weather come, she doth not fear it, she can laugh at the snow; Why? For all her household are cloathed with scarlet, or double cloth; she hath made such provision against cold weather, that she fears neither frost nor snow.

Ridebis vetos hoc munere tectus & imbres. Mart.

Now, the Text (when it is said, At famine thou shalt laugh) is not meant of laughter, springing either from unbelief, or pride, or self-confidence, or sensuality, or senslesness; as if he should not care what God did in the world, let God do what he would, he would laugh. As that proud Emperor said (not only as one before him, when I am dead, but) while I live, let Heaven and Earth be mingled together, I care not; scorning and contemning what could come. But this laughter comes from strength of faith, from holy courage, and well-grounded confidence; from an assurance of shelter, safeguard and protection from, or support in the greatest dangers, even in famine and destruction: He fixes on such a promise as this, Psal. 37. 19. They shall not be ashamed in the evil time, and in the dayes of famine, they shall be satisfied. The soul of a believer sees salvation in destruction, food in famine; he hath wine well refined to drink, marrow and fatness to feed upon, when the world knows not how to give him (or will not give him) a dry crust, or a cup of cold water. He sees a hiding place, when all others lie open to the danger; he sees a place of refuge, a covert from the rain and from the storm, when others stand naked under them. The sum of all is, A godly man sees himself so protected in dangers, so provided for against all wants; he sees in the promises such a Magazin of arms, such store of bread, that he fears no weapon form'd against him, and feeds, when no Table is spred for him; Danger secures, destruction saves, and famine fattens him, that is, in danger, destruction and famine, he knows whither to go for food, savation and safety; even unto God, who is all this to him, and will be more, if he need it. Upon these grounds it is, that the Text saith, At Famine and destruction he shall laugh. Hence observe,

A godly man, a true Believer, is not only not afraid of outward evils, when they come, but through Faith, he is above, and triumphs over them.

Not to be afraid of famine and destruction when they come, is too low for his spirit, He shall laugh when they come. Hence the Apostles exulting language, We glory in tribulation, we are exceeding joyous in all our tribulations. And to this sence we may interpret that of Peter, speaking of the sufferings of the Saints, 1 Pet. 4. 14. The Spirit of glory resteth upon them; that is, a spirit of glorying and holy rejoycing, whereby the soul is carried up (as it were) upon Eagle-wings, above and beyond reproaches. All evils lie below a Believer, when he is lifted up with this Spirit of glory. Tis spirit of glory resting upon us through him that loved us, makes us more then Conquerors over tribulation, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril or sword, Rom. 8. 35, 36. More then Conquerors! Who can express how much that is? No tongue can tell what it is to be more then a conqueror. When Christ would advance the exceeding greatness of that reward which Givers shall receive, Luke 6. 38. He saith not barely, Give, and it shall be given you in good measure; but you shall have it pressed down; and yet more, shaken together: that is not all neither; but you shall have it running over. Now a measure will run over, as long as you will pour; there is no stint, no bounds to that gift, which shall be given running over: A Vessel will run over continually, pour as long as you will: So here, you shall not only have a conquest, but more then a conquest; and what that is, is as much and more, then all our thoughts are able to comprehend. Hence also the Apostle speaking of that great enemy, the last enemy, Death (1 Cor. 15. 55.) brings in the believing soul in a kind of holy triumph, laughing at, and even jeering Death, in the sence of the Text, O Death, where is thy sting? As if a man having disarmed his enemy, should say, now Sir, where's your sword? where's your pistol? Christ hath disarmed Death, taken away its sting; now the Believer may laugh in the face of Death, O Death, thou thoughtest to make us all smart, where is thy sting? thou thoughtest thy self a conquerour, able to devour and subdue us all, but where is thy victory? Such is the Laughter here meant. And in the same sence, Leviathan the mightiest of living creatures, that Sea-monster (to whom upon the Earth there is not the like, he is made without fear, Chap. 41. 33.) is said to laugh at the shaking of the spear (Job 41. 29.) He is so armed with impenitrable scales, that, shake a spear at him, he laughs at you; it is an allusion to those, that are armed with proof, they fear neither sword nor shot: The truth is, a believer is shot-free, shake the spear at him, shake famine, shake destruction at him, threaten him with this or with that, he laughs at all, because he hath armor of proof, wherein he may safely trust; he hath a shield, a shield of faith, which will quench even the fiery darts of Satan, much more then the fiery dangers of the world.

The Histories of the Primitive Church, are full of this holy laughter, and heroical magnanimity of the Saints, grapling with the greatest evils. How did those renowned Martyrs, even baffle death, and deride their torments (from this principle of faith in Christ) conquering them, not slighting them (from a principle of self-neglect.) When Polycarpe was threatned to be torn in pieces with the teeth of wild beasts, Let them come, saith he, and grind me, I shall make very good bread; so that the very tormentors were more tormented with the holy scorn and laughter of suffering Christians, then the Christians were with the torments which they suffered. In 2 Sam. 2. 14. When Abner and Joab the two great Generals met, Abner saith unto Joab, Let the young men arise and play before us; the sport was to fight, and fighting unto death, and yet these stout Souldiers being above fear, call it playing one with another: It is the word here in the Text (let them come and laugh together before us) As if these young men were of such courage, that they could laugh at death, and go to killing one another, as if they were to go to play with one another. Surely there is little reason for such courage; killing of men is no laughing matter, no matter of sport; for as Abner said unto Joab, not long after (vers. 26.) Shall the sword devour for ever, knowest thou not, that it will be bitterness in the end? There is little cause to account the beginning of that a sport, which which will be bitterneſs in the end: But when the Saints are to joyn in the deadlieſt battel, or to meet with the deadlieſt death for Chriſt, or from the chaſtening hand of Chriſt, they have reaſon enough to account it a ſport, and to laugh at deſtruction (in this ſence cleared) becauſe they know it will be ſweetneſs and comfort in the end: Valour ſometimes laughs at danger, much more may faith. (Pſalm 68. 12, 13.) Though we have lyen among the pots, yet ſhall we be as the wings of a Dove covered with ſilver, and her feathers with yellow gold: This is the confidence of the Saints, when they lie among the pots, or among the pot-ranges (as ſome interpret it) where the ſcullions lie, and are beſooted and black'd over, at the fire of afflictions, till they look like very ſcullions, that yet they ſhall be gilded over ſoon after. Or it may be underſtood of the bounds and limits of the enemies Country: and ſo it is a deſcription of great danger; for they who lie upon the borders of an enemies Country, are in a continual fear of an aſſault; this the Greeks ſeems to favour, rendring it thus; Though we have lain between the inheritances, or the lots, &c. our own and the enemies; either way the ſence reaches this point fully; though believers lie among the pots, or neareſt dangers, yet they are aſſured that they ſhall have wings, as the wings of a Dove, which are covered with ſilver, and her feathers with yellow gold. There is gold and ſilver in the eye of faith, while there is nothing but blackneſs and death in the eye of ſenſe; yea, faith aſſures them, that they ſhall be white as ſnow in Salmon (as it follows in that Pſalm) that is, they ſhall have whiteneſs after blackneſs, or light in the midſt of darkneſs. Salmon ſignifies dark, duskiſh or obſcure; for, it was a hill full of pits, holes and gins, very dark and dangerous for paſſengers; but when the ſnow was upon it, it was white and gliſtering; now ſaith he, they ſhall be like Salmon in the ſnow, though black in themſelves, yet white, lightſom and glorious, either through pardon of ſin, or victory over their enemies, to both which, whiteneſs hath reference in Scripture.

εἰνὰι μέσον τῶν κλήρων Sept. Ainſworth.

Again, In that it is ſaid, At deſtruction and famine thou ſhalt laugh; as from that word, laughing, we ſee what ſpirits the Saints have in troubleſom times; ſo, in-as-much as he gathers together and rally's all the ſcattered troops of afflictions, to charge at once upon a believer; and yet concludes, At deſtruction and famine thou ſhalt laugh,

Non ſolũ ſingulas rerumnas ſuperabit, ſed omniũ illorum in unũ coactiũ agmen. Integrum ex omnibus exercitũ fugabit

Obſerve, That, A godly man laughs at, or is above all evils, though brought againſt him at once.

It hath been ſaid, That Hercules could not match two: here are two, Deſtruction and Famine, overmatcht by one; bring whole legions and armies of troubles to encounter a Saint, he overcomes them all: He famiſhes famine, and deſtroyes deſtruction it ſelf. The Apoſtle, Rom. 8.35. muſters up (as it were) all evils together into a body, and dares any or all to battel, with a believer; Who ſhall ſeperate us from the love of God? ſhall tribulation, or diſtreſs, or perſecution, or famine, or nakedneſs, or peril, or ſword? which of theſe ſhall undertake the challenge, or will you bring any more? then, come life, or death, Angels, or principalities, or powers, things preſent, or things to come, height or depth, or any other creature: none of theſe ſingle, nor all of theſe joyned, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God, which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. Every heightned Saint is a ſpiritual Goliah, who in the name of the living God, bids defiance to this huge hoſt, and they all run and tremble before him. Rejoyce (ſaith the Apoſtle, Jam. 1. 2.) when you fall into divers temptations: A believer hath joy, not only when he grapleth with a ſingle temptation; but let there come many, divers temptations, variety of temptations, variety for kind, and multitude for number, yet he rejoyceth in the midſt of all.

Neither ſhalt thou be afraid of the beaſts of the earth.

Having thus lifted a godly man above the afflicting reach of thoſe two great evils, famine and deſtruction, want of good things, and ſpoiling of his goods; he proceeds to inſtance another great evil, wherein a godly man is exempt from, and ſet above fear; Neither ſhalt thou be afraid of the beaſts of the Earth.

Beaſts of the Earth. The root of that word ſignifies life, and ſo any living creature, eſpecially a wild beaſt; becauſe they are ſo active and full of life, therefore they are named from life.

And theſe are called, The beaſts of the Earth;

Firſt, Becauſe beaſts are produced from the earth, and the earth received a charge to produce them, Gen. 1. 24, 25. And God ſaid, let the earth bring forth the living creature, after his kind, and God made the beaſt of the earth after his kind.

Or ſecondly, Becauſe beaſts have nothing but earth to live upon; as men whoſe portion is only in creatures, are called men of the world, or men of the earth.

The word for (earth) ſignifies the whole earth, habitable or inhabitable: And though the earth ſtand ſtill, yet this word is derived (ſay ſome) from running, either becauſe the Heavens run round about the earth, with a continual rotation or motion; or becauſe all creatures, men and beaſts, move or run upon the face of the earth. Though others deduce it from a word which ſignifies to* deſire, wiſh, or will a thing; becauſe the earth is perpetually deſirous of bringing forth fruit, for the uſe and help of man. But it is not agreed on what we are to underſtand, by the beaſts of the Earth.

Firſt, Some take the words improperly, and ſo the beaſts of the earth, are interpreted men; a company or ſociety of men, and theſe in a double ſence. For the word notes ſometimes a company of men in a good ſence, and ſometimes a company of men in an ill ſence. I ſhall give you an inſtance of both, for the clearing of this Text.

It ſignifies men, or a company of men in a good ſence, Pſal. 68. 10. where ſpeaking of that rain of liberalities, (that is, bleſſings of all ſorts) which God ſent upon his inheritance, to confirm and refreſh it, he ſaith, Thy Congregation hath dwelt therein. Thy Camp or Leagure, thy Hoſt or Troop dwelt there; (ſo 2 Sam. 23.13.) which the vulgar tranſlates, Thy beaſts; and the Greek, Thy living creatures dwelt therein: The ſame word is uſed (and ſome apprehend in alluſion to this Pſalm) Rev. 4.6. Chap. 5. 8, 9. in thoſe myſtical deſcriptions of Chriſt and his Church: in this ſence it ſuits not at all with the promiſe of the Text. Theſe beaſts are not to be feared, but honoured and loved; mans greateſt ſpiritual comforts on earth, are found in the ſociety of theſe beaſts.

Animalia tua habitabunt in eis, Vul. Sept. Syr.

But commonly this word, referred unto men, ſignifies an aſſociation of wicked men; men of the earth, worſe (many of them) then the beaſts of the earth: Theſe are ſpoken of in the ſame Pſalm ver. 30. Rebuke the company of ſpear men, (or Archers) The rout or crue of the Cane, that is, men that bear reeds, or canes, whereof ſpears and arrows were wont to be made; therefore the company of Spear-men or Archers, are called a company with reeds: the word by us rendred company, is, the beaſts of the reeds; thoſe men that are like beaſts, ſavage, cruel and bloody, theſe are as bruits and beaſts of the earth; ſo they are decipher'd in the next verſe, The multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people. And we find the word ſignifying, a company of wicked ones, and a company of Saints in the ſame verſe, Pſal. 74. 19. O deliver not the ſoul of thy turtle Dove unto the multitude of the wicked; the Hebrew is, unto the company of the beaſts; Forget not the Congregation (or the beaſts) of thy poor for ever; there the ſame word is taken (as in Pſal. 68. 10.) for a company of Saints, or the poor people of God. In the Scripture of the New Teſtament, it is frequent to ſhadow wicked men under the names of beaſts, beaſts of the earth: ſo that of Paul hath been taken (1 Cor. 15.32.) If I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus after the manner of men, with beaſtly men, cruel men, men like unto beaſts in their qualities and diſpoſitions: though others underſtand it of his being caſt unto the beaſts, to fight with them, which was a cruelty thoſe perſecuting times exerciſed againſt the Chriſtians. So (1 Tim. 4.16.) Paul ſaith, he was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion: Nero that cruel Tyrant, is ſuppoſed to be the Lion, the beaſt of the earth he aimeth at. And the Apoſtle, Titus 1. 1. gives this this character of the Cretians, they are evil beasts. If we take it here in this sence, it is a truth, and a very comfortable truth, that godly men shall be delivered from the fear of beastly and cruel men, or as the Apostle calls them, unreasonable or absurd men, who have not faith.

But rather understand here beasts of the earth properly, for those fierce and ctuel creatures hurtful to man. Once, man had power and dominion over all the creatures; the wildest beasts were tame to him in his state of innocency; till he rose up and rebelled against God, the creatures were subject unto him; but man rebelling against God, the creatures rebelled against man: hence it is, that man naturally is surprised with fear, at the approach and sight of strong and cruel beasts, and therefore it is here spoken as a special mercy and priviledge of the godly, that they shall not be afraid of the beasts of the earth.

The beasts of the earth are hurtful to us three wayes.

First, Naturally, many beasts by nature are very dreadful to man, as the Lion, the Bear, the Wolf, and such other fierce, strong and bloody beasts.

Secondly, Tame beasts, such as we daily use and subdue to our service, are often by accident hurtful to us; the Horse and the Ox, have many times been destructive to their owners.

Thirdly, (Which I conceive is the thing chiefly aimed at here) beasts hurt judicially, in a way of wrath from God: There are divers places in the Book of God, wherein God threatens to arm creatures, against those, who sin against him, and that when people should forget their duties, the beasts should forget their subjection. Deut. 32. 24. I will send the teeth of beasts upon them. And Jer. 15. 3. I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the Lord, the Sword to slay, and the Dogs to tear, and the Fowls of the Heaven, and the beasts of the Earth, to devour and destroy. You see God can have an army any where if he pleaseth, an army of Dogs to destroy, an army of Fowls of the Air, an army of the beasts of the Earth, to subdue a rebellious people. And Ezek. 14. 21. This is one of the four sore judgments that God denounceth against Jerusalem, The Sword, and the Famine, and the noysom Beasts, and the Pestilence. Thus in a judicial manner they were very terrible and dreadful, and so were numbred among the soreſt evils or judgments which God sent upon a Nation for their wickedness. To all or any of these wayes, this promise may be enlarged. Thou shalt not be afraid of the natural cruelty, the casual hurtfulness, or the judiciary rage of beasts, when sent by God with commission to punish the beastliness of men.

How this cometh to pass, that beasts of the Earth hurt not godly men, is laid down in the next verse, which I shall a while open, and then give you some notes and observations from both together.

Vers. 23. For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field, and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

This verse contains the reason, why he should not be afraid of the beasts of the field; and here is somewhat more got into the reason, then was before in the promise; the ground of the promise is higher, and carried farther then the promise it self. The promise was, to be delivered from the fear of beasts; and that thou mayest be certain of it, know God will not suffer so much as a stone to do thee hurt: Thou shalt be at league not only with the beasts of the Earth, but with the stones of the field.

בְּרִית à radice בָּרָה Elegit, quia eliguntur personæ inter quas, & res & conditiones propter quas fœdus initur. Buxt.

Thou shalt be in league.] The word is frequently used in the Old Testament, to signifie that solemn gracious covenant of reconciliation between God and man, established in the blood of Christ.

A league or covenant is a very solemn act, an act of reason, and of the highest reason, an act of judgment and deepest deliberation: therefore it may be doubted how a league can be entred with stones, which have no life, or with beasts which have no reason. We read (Gen. 39. 49.) of a league or covenant made at or upon an heap of stones, between Jacob and Laban; but this is very strange and unheard of, to make a league with a heap of stones.

For the clearing of this, we must enquire into two things;

First, What these stones are.

Secondly, What this league doth import.

First, For the stones: There are divers opinions about them, and many interpreters have exceedingly stumbled at these stones: Some change these stones into men, strong men, or the strongest of men. That of Job in the next Chapter, hath some allusion to it, vers. 12. Is my strength the strength of stones? A strong man is strong, as a stone.

The Chaldee Paraphrast understands by stones, the Law, which was written in stones. Thou shalt be in league with the stones, that is, the Law written in tables of stone shall never hurt thee. But that (as to the Text) is a meer conceit, though (in it self) a great truth, and our greatest comfort, that believers are at league with those Law stones, which left in power and hostility, would have broken all man-kind to pieces, and ground them to powder. Christ hath made peace for us with the Law; the Law had a quarrel at us, and the Law would have been upon us with an everlasting war, if Christ had not setled our peace by satisfying the Law; Stoning to death, had been the death of us all, if Christ had not made a league for us with these stones.

Thirdly, Others interpret these stones by a Metonymy of the thing contained, Thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field, with the rocks or rocky places, that is, thou shalt be at league with those creatures, or with those beasts, which lie among the stones, and have their dens about hollow rocks: and so they make the latter branch [and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee] to be exegetical, giving us the exposition of the former, or shewing, what is meant by being at league with the stones of the field; Thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field, that is, with the beasts who make their dens, and their holes, and their hiding places, among the stones of the field. This is a good sence of the words.

But leaving the former, with some other apprehensions about these stones, I shall take these stones properly, and so they will fall under four considerations, all which give light to the clearing of this Text, and the manner of our league with stones.

First, As naturally scattered upon the face of the earth, so hindring Travellers, or endangering a man in haste upon his way. One part of Arabia, was called Arabia Petræa, or the stony, because it was full of stones, and so uneasie, either for tillage or travel.

Stones are so dangerous to the foot, that the Latine word is derived from hurting the foot; hence those Scripture expressions. A stumbling stone and a rock of offence, because men are so apt to stumble at stones. And both these are applied to Christ in a figure, he is called a stumbling stone, and a rock of offence. Christ in himself is the most precious and elect foundation-stone to build on, but he is the most sore and dangerous stone to stumble on: To be in league and covenant with that living stone, is the highest mercy.

Lapis à lædendo pede nomē habet.

Secondly, These stones as they lie naturally hidden in the bowels of the earth, or under the earth, are a trouble to the Husband-man in tilling the ground, in plowing and sowing, and they often endanger the breaking of his plough, and hinder the rooting and growth of the seed sown.

Thirdly, Consider these stones as artificially laid together for the making of a wall or mownd to fence and part field from field, or both from the common fields and high-wayes.

Fourthly, Consider these stones as artificially and industriously placed for marks and boundaries, to distinguish private mens lands, or the precincts of such and such Countries, which are commonly called (a) Mark-stones, or boundary-stones; as also stones set in the roads or high-wayes, for the direction of Travellers pointing which way to go, to eminent Towns or Cities. Of such a stone we read (1 Sam. 20. 19.) when Jonathan bad David stay at the stone Ezel, that is, as we put in the Margin of our Bibles, the stone that sheweth the way, or the (b) way stone. These boundary stones, or way-stones to direct Travellers, were famous in Antiquity: insomuch that among the (c) Heathen, They were worshipped as a god, or Numen, as divers of the Christian Fathers have observed in their learned reports of Heathenish idolatry. Which also their own (d) Poets have elegantly described, both in their constitutions and uses; giving those stones a charge faithfully to testifie, (e) This is your land; and this is yours. And they break out into the commendation of the integrity of these witnesses, whom no threats could terrifie, or bribes corrupt to speak a lie, or conceal the truth.

Now consider the other term, what it is to be in league with stones, in any of, or in all these acceptations.

In general we know, that, to be league with stones, is an improper or allusive speech: Stones are not capable of the formalities of a league; when we are in league or covenant with God or man, so with stones; these two things are made out to us.

First, That God or man will do us no hurt; a covenant or league takes off the actings of hostility. Whatsoever a man is in covenant with, he fears no dammage from. Presumptuous sinners having made a covenant with Hell, and an agreement with death, build their confidence of indemnity upon the strength of it. When the over-flowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come near us, Isa. 28. 15. A man that is in league with the Devil, believes the Devil will do him no wrong.

Secondly, A League imports, that we may expect to receive good, protection, benefits and blessings either from God or man, according to the Articles of covenant agreed to, and sealed respectively. These two assurances we have by a league. And when it is said here, that a godly man is in league with the stones of the field, both these are to be understood; It is as much, as to say, The stones of the field shall not annoy him; yea, the stones of the field shall be a benefit or a friend to him. Man is said to be in league with stones, when he receives the effect of a league from stones. Taking it in this general sence, we may apply it unto those four particular sences of senseless stones before mentioned.

First, As stones are naturally scattered upon the face of the earth, the promise imports thus much: that, such stones shall not hurt or annoy him in his walks or travels. This promise we have expresly (Psal. 91. 11.) He shall give his Angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy wayes; they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. This is the league with stones. Stones shall not annoy thee in thy way, thou shalt not stumble or fall to break thy bones, or bruise thy body upon these stones. The Devil in his combate with Christ, misapplieth this promise of a league with the stones (Matth. 4. 6.) Tempting him to cast himself down from a pinacle of the Temple; for it is written, He shall give his Angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone: As if he had said, a godly man hath this assurance from his league with the stones, that he shall receive no harm from them; therefore trust God, and in confidence of this promise, Cast thy self down. So, here is the first sence, Thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field: that is, thou shalt not be hurt by those stones, as thou travellest or walkest.

Secondly, Take the stones as they lie hidden in the Earth, then to be at league with them, hath this sence; First, That in tilling the Earth, stones should not trouble or hinder that work. God shall so order it, that, though thou plowest among stones, yet thou shalt till thy ground successfully. The stony ground shall be fruitful ground. In that parable of a Vineyard (Isa. 5. 1.) God is pleased to manifest his care of making it fruitful, by this act among others, I gathered out the stones thereof; vers. 2. noting that stones are naturally great impediments to fruitfulness. We read (Matth. 13. 5.) how the seed, which fell upon the stony-ground, sprung up quickly and withered as quickly; stony ground naturally cannot feed or bring forth fruit to maturity. It is then a great priviledge, thus to be in league with the stones of the field; that, though we sow among stones, yet we shall have a plentiful Harvest. When Job described the dayes of his prosperity (Chap. 29. 6.) he saith, The Rock poured him out Rivers of Oyl: To have Oyl out of Rocks, is like having Corn out of the Stones; both noting things succeeding beyond their natural principles, and our common expectation. When the Baptist would shew how God can work beyond all the possibilities of nature or reason, he saith to the Jews, Even of these stones God can raise up children unto Abraham (Matth. 3.) There is somewhat of a miracle in it, to raise up bread to a man out of stones: that is, to make a rocky Land a fertil soil. God threatned his people, that he would make the earth to be iron under them; that is, the earth which was ordinarily fruitful, shall yield you no more fruit, then iron. And on the other side he promises, That they shall suck Honey out of the Rock, and Oyl out of the flinty Rock, Deut. 32. 13. Honey out of the Rock; that is, Honey of Bees, hiving themselves in Rocks; or (as others) Honey-fruits, as Dates, &c. which grow on Palm-trees (as Oyl on Olive-trees) in rocky places. Hereby the Lord assured his people of abundant plenty; for whereas Rocks and Stones are usually barren, he would make those places fruitful to Israel. They should have Oyl out of the Rock in Canaan, as well as water out of the Rock in the wilderness. We are surely in league with those Rocks and Stones of the fields, which send us such Presents as these, Bread and Water, Honey and Oyl.

Ainsw. on Deut.

Thirdly, Take these Stones as artificially laid together, and so, Thou shalt be in league with them, is thus to be understood; those walls and mounds of stone, shall be as the keepers and watch-men of thy field, they shall preserve thy corn and thy cattel from annoyance. To this sence some joyn the former words with these, Thou shalt not be afraid of the beasts of the Earth, for the stones of the field, which lie in the walls and fences, shall be-friend thee, and keep them out. When God would shew his intendments to destroy and lay waste his vineyard, he expresses it by pulling down the wall, as before he had expres'd his care to protect it, by building of a wall, Isa. 5. 2. I fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof; which we may understand thus, I gathered out the stones (and as it is usual) made a fence of them; and had the Vineyard brought forth fruit, it had also been in league with these stones, that is, the stones of the wall had kept out the wild beasts, or any annoyance from them; but being fruitless, the league with stones was broken: I (saith the Lord, vers. 5.) will break down the wall thereof, and it shall be troden down. So that, in this sence, to be at league with the stones of the field, is, as much as to say, that stone-wall, or the stone-fence which is made about thy field, shall stand to protect and maintain thy Land, thy fruits and cattel, stand the incursions of wild beasts from spoyling and treading down by any.

Nunquam dissolvetur materia, nõ diffiliet lapis ex sepe, nemo furabitur, nemo insiliet in agros tuos.

Fourthly, Take these Stones for Land-marks or for Way-marks, for boundary-stones, or for directory-stones; and the fence may be thus conceived, Thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field, that is, no man shall come within thy bounds, none shall remove thy Land-marks, or invade thy Estate; those Stones shall firmly distinguish thine inheritance; thou shalt have no controversie arising, which is thine, or what is thy possession. As if an argument had formally been made with these stones, to keep off all intruders upon their Masters inheritance, and accordingly the stones in pursuance of that agreement (like so many hired servants) should faithfully witness for their Master, and chide away all who would do him wrong (1 Sam. 7. 12.) Samuel set up a stone as a boundary of the conquest and victories which the Lord had given the children of Israel against the Philistims, He set up a stone, and called it Eben-Ezer, or stone of help. Adding the reason, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us; As if he had said, here is a Stone of remembrance, how God hath helped us; and that Stone seemed to speak thus much to Israel, Keep and hold what ye have gotten, let not the Philistims set a foot (unrevenged) over or beyond this stone. So then, in this sence, to be in league with the stones of the field, is a promise of keeping our inheritances free from invasion and confusion, that we shall know what is ours, and that no enemy shall take it from us.

Facere pactum cum lapidibus agri, est pacificè vivere cum proximo, item securus esse, quod nullus terminos agri sui transiliturus sit, acsi cum lapidibus terminalibus pepigisset: ipsique lapides pactum initum servarent, nec aliter acsi ratione valentes incursores, aut transgressores etiam verbo fugarent. Pined. Termini agrorum tuorum à nemine violentur; nemo transgrediatur.

It was a great sin to remove the Land-marks and Boundaries, and a great punishment was threatned against any, who should alter or remove them, Prov. 23. 11. Deut. 19. 14. Deut. 27. 17. And when the Prophet Hosea would shew, how extreamly wicked the Princes of Judah were, he saith (chap. 5. 10.) The Princes of Judah were like them that remove the bounds; as if he had said, we account those the worst of men, who remove Land-marks; how vile then are these Princes, who are as bad as they? Just as the wickedness of the people is aggravated, chap. 4. 4. This people are as they that strive with the Priest, To strive with the the Priest, is to strive with God; that's a sad strife. Strivers with the Priest, are the worst of people; how vile then are this people, who are as bad as they? But to the present point, if it be so great a sin to remove the Land-stones, it must needs be a great mercy to have those stones preserved. So then, to be in league with the stones of the field, may have this good sence also; the boundary-stones shall be preserved, none shall remove them, and they shall preserve thy estate, that none shall invade or waste it. Hence observe,

God can do us good by any thing, if he pleaseth; and nothing can do us good without God.

Though we have carefully set up bounds, though we have made strong fences, yet these will not keep out evil or annoyance, unless there be a league, a league of Gods making for us; and God can produce our comforts out of improbables, yea, impossibles to Nature: He can fetch us bread and a blessing from stones. It was a temptation upon Christ when he was hungry, to make bread of stones. If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread, Mat. 4. 2. But it is our comfort, that God can turn stones into bread, that he can make those things which are most improbable to do us good, very good unto us. It is a sin for us to turn stones into bread, or to expect stones to be turned into bread, that is, to put God upon miracles for us, when means or endeavors may help us; but God out of the superabundance of his power and goodness, alwayes can, and sometimes will work miracles: turning stones into bread for us. Then we turn stones into bread, when we live upon sin; whosoever eateth a bit of bread out of the hand of sin, turneth stones into bread. Then God turneth stones into bread for us, when out of his infinite power and goodness, he gives us supplies by unusual means, and comforts us by that, from which we can expect no more comfort, then we do bread and water out of stones.

Further, When stones seem to be most angry with a godly man, then he is in league with them. Stones (in a proper sence) flew about the ears of Steven, and killed him; yet Steven was in league with the stones, even while they took away his life: God turned these stones into bread for him, and every stone was as a glorious Diamond in his Crown of Martyrdom.

There are two Interpretations of this league with stones, (which some make great store and treasure of) different from all these; the former is grounded upon a custom in Arabia, where, or near which it is supposed Job's friends dwelt. It was (saith the learned Author) a very capital offence in that Countrey, if any man did cast or carry heaps of stones into his neighbours ground; for that action had this signification or meaning in it, the man, who afterwards ventured to plow or till that ground, should surely dy by the hands of those who cast in those Stones. So that, the sight of such stones was terrible and ominous to the owner of the Land, as speaking death and ruine to him, if he medled with it. Hence 'twas often left unus'd and untill'd. Against this barbarous custom (it being an occasion of murders and bloodshed) a very severe Law was made; That whosoever should be discovered to have cast such stones into his neighbours ground, should have judgment of death by the Magistrate. In allusion to this Law or custom, the interpretation of this promise (Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field) is made out thus. The ordinary stones of the field shall be so far from hurting, that, even those stones, which speak anger and malice shall not hurt thee. God will reconcile or subdue the rage of thine enemies, and though they have cast these stones of defiance into thy Land, yet they shall desire a league of peace with thee, or fall before thee.

The second is grounded upon a custom in war, of which we read (2 Kings 3. 25.) that when the Moabites fled before Israel, the pursuing Israelites beat down their Cities, and on every good piece of Land, cast every man his stone, and filled it, &c. Eliphaz might have an eye to this; as if he had said, thy Land shall not be buried under the heaps of stones, thrown there by a conquering hand; that is, thou shalt have a league of amity with, or victory over all that are round about thee.

That is, they shall (through the power of God) be made peaceable to thee. To be at peace with the beasts, is the same in proportion, with being in league with stones. It was mans priviledge by creation, to have power over the beasts of the field, and it is the priviledge of redemption, to be at peace with them. This is the ordinary priviledge of every Believer: But there is a more transcendent priviledge of the Church, in the most flourishing estate of it here on earth, represented under this notion, Isa. 11. 6, 7, 8, 9. The Wolf shall dwell with the Lamb, and the Leopard shall lie down with the Kid, and the Calf, and the young Lion, and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them, &c. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the Asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the Cockatrice den; they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain. This peace with beasts, is within a degree of glory with God, whether we understand it in the letter, of beasts in kind, or in the Allegory, of men symbolizing in rage and fierceness, in power and poysons, in stings and teeth, with beasts and serpents.

The Text before us, goes lower then this promise; And to be at peace with the beasts of the field, is only a gracious assurance that they shall not hurt us, or that they shall be useful to us. In the firmnss of this promise of peace with the beasts, the fearlesness of a godly man is founded; He shall not be afraid of the beasts of the earth, for the beasts of the earth shall be at peace with him. Hence observe,

The courage and fearlesness of a godly man is grounded on divine reason, not on humane presumption.

When we see a man stout in the midst of danger, fearless amongst wild beasts, we may wonder where the spring of his courage lies: This promise sheweth you the springhead, He is at peace with them. It is not conceit and fancy, or desperateness of spirit, that caused him to deride and slight danger; but he hath a solid ground; there is a peace and a league ratified in heaven, for him; even with the Stones and Beasts of the earth. As a godly man can give a reason of the hope that is in him, so he can give a reason of the courage that is in him; he knows why he is so stout and venturous.

Secondly, Observe from both, in that man is here said to be in league with the stones, and at peace with the beasts;

That, Every creature, by sin, is made dangerous and hurtful unto man.

For, in that there is a league and peace made with these, it notes, they were in a state of hostility, ready to rise up against us, and annoy us. As the creature, by reason of mans sin is subject unto vanity, so man is subject unto fear, by reason of the creature. Sin hath made the creature vanity in it self, and sin hath made the creature vexation unto us. When the beasts rebel against us, we should remember how we have rebelled against God; and, that until God renews a league, and makes peace for us, with the creatures, there is not a creature upon the earth, but may quickly be destructive to us. If God speaks the word, and gives a call or a commission to a Flie, against the strongest, the swiftest man; flight shall perish from the swift, and power from the strong, neither of them shall escape.

Thirdly, Thou shalt be in league with the stones, and with the beasts; he reckons up all those wayes by which evils may come in upon us; and assures a man, to whom God is reconciled, that these evils shall not come. Hence observe,

That, When God is once a friend to us, he can quickly make all other things friendly to us also.

Every godly man (of such Eliphaz here speaks) is at peace and league with God, therefore God makes all creatures at peace and league with him. Though usually, they who are in neareſt league and covenant with God, are most warred with, and opposed by the world; yet this stands sure, that when God is our friend, he can make our enemies our friends, or their enmity shall befriend us; Stones and savage Beasts shall be helpful to us. When God is at peace with us, he makes all things at peace with us. Daniel was at peace with God, and he was at peace among the Lions. The Apostle (Rom. 8.) gives it in general, If God be with us, who can be against us? No creature hath power in it self to maintain war and enmity against those, on whose side God appears.

appears. If God love us, All things work together for good to us. He that hath help from God, ſhall not want help from any creature; for all creatures are at the call and command of God; if he ſaith, go, they muſt go; if he ſaith, come, they muſt come; if he ſaith to a Stone, do ſuch a man good, the Stone muſt do it; if he ſaith to a Raven, go carry Elijah his dinner, the Raven will haſten; if he ſaith to a wild beaſt, ſave ſuch a man, deliver ſuch a man, ſpare ſuch a man, he muſt go of Gods errand. In our friendſhip and league with God, we have a virtual league of friendſhip with the moſt unfriendly creatures.

And if God pleaſe, he can make men, who have as little ſence as Stones, and leſs reaſon then Beaſts, to be helpful and uſeful, and peaceable to his people. There is a generation amongſt us, a ſtony generation, a hard-hearted generation of men, you may as well move a Stone, as move them with what you ſay; a beaſtly generation of men, when you deal with them, you deal with beaſts; yet the great God (if he pleaſe) can make a league for us with theſe Stones, he can make theſe beaſts of the earth, brutiſh and unreaſonable men, to be at peace with us. Further obſerve,

It is from ſpecial providence, that the Stones, and the Beaſts of the earth do not hurt or deſtroy us, but ſpecially that they help and do us good.

There is providence towards all, but a ſpecial providence to the people of God, that the creatures hurt them not. If God did not bridle the rage and reſtrain the power of Beaſts, man could not comfortably ſubſiſt with them. The reaſon is given (Deut. 7. 22.) why God deſtroyed the Canaanites by little and little, before his people; namely, Leſt the beaſts of the earth ſhould encreaſe upon them. Here was a ſpecial providence, as all leagues and peace-makings are, all the leagues and peace which believers have, are branches of that great League, of that grand Covenant, which God hath made with Chriſt on our behalf. And therefore (Hoſ. 2. 18.) his promiſe is made in ſpecial to the Church. And in that day I will make a Covenant for them, with the beaſts of the field.

Fifthly note, A godly man enjoyes common comforts for ſpecial favour.

Wicked men are ſeldom hurt by the beaſts of the field, but they are never at peace with them.

Laſtly obſerve, Peace is a great mercy.

By how much God makes more peace upon earth, by ſo much, man hath more of heaven upon earth. Man ſhould deſire peace with beaſts, much more with men, moſt of all with God.

VERS. 24, 25, 26, 27.

And thou ſhalt know that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace, and thou ſhalt viſit thy habitation, and ſhalt not ſin.
Thou ſhalt know alſo that thy ſeed ſhall be great, and thine off-ſpring as the graſs of the earth.
Thou ſhalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a ſhock of corn cometh in, in his ſeaſon.
Lo this, we have ſearched it, ſo it is, hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

AT the Nineteenth verſe of this Chapter, we had a promiſe of deliverance from evil, in ſix troubles, and in ſeven. In the Verſes following, we had a ſpecification of ſix or ſeven troubles, from which deliverance is promiſed. In theſe words, we have the reſult of all, a well-grounded ſecurity, in aſſurance of a fourfold bleſſing. Firſt, Of a quiet and happy life. Secondly, Of many proſperous children, v. 25. Thirdly, Of a long life. Fourthly, Of a ſweet and comfortable death, v. 26. Every one confirmed and ratified as a truth in it ſelf; and by way of application brought home to Job in v. 27. or the laſt verſe of the Chapter.

Verſe 24. And thou ſhalt know that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace.

Thou ſhalt know it.] Knowledge is ſometime put for preſent ſence; He that keeps the Commandments, ſhall feel (Heb. ſhall know) no evil: and ſo Job is promiſed to know, his Tabernacle ſhall be in peace, that is, he ſhall ſee and feel it to be in peace. And,

Secondly, Knowledge is put for experience; as we ſay of a rich man, he never knew poverty: And in that ſence, Chriſt is ſaid not to have known ſin, 2 Cor. 5. 21. Thus, alſo, the godly man knows his Tabernacle ſhall have peace, even by the peace which he hath had: From the former dealings of God, he gathers concluſions what God will do with him for the time to come; Thou ſhalt not find me a falſe Prophet, or that I have fed thee with wind: Thou ſhalt know from experience, that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace.

Non ego vanus augur, experieris & cognoſces reipſa. Coc.

And there is a third way by which this might be known, ſc. by debate and reaſoning; Thou ſhalt know it: if thou doſt but conſider, what the eſtate of a godly man is, and what God hath ſpoken about that eſtate, thou maiſt make out ſuch a concluſion, that certainly thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace.

There is a fourth way of knowing, and that is, upon the teſtimony or word of another; this is properly called Faith; Thou ſhalt know it, that is, by looking into the word of God, or conſidering the promiſes made to godly men, thou ſhalt aſſent to and believe this thing, that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace.

Fifthly, To know, is as much as to be aſſured or certain of a thing; and to know ſo, is oppoſed not only to ignorance and opinion, but it is oppoſed to the lower degrees of Faith: I know that my Redeemer lives, &c. (ſaith Job, chap. 19. 25.) that is, I am ſure he lives. And the Apoſtle, 2 Cor. 4. 14. Knowing that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus, ſhall raiſe us up alſo by Jeſus. Knowledge is often put for aſſurance, and it may riſe to that pitch here; Thou ſhalt be aſſured that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace.

Thy Tabernacle.] Tabernacles were of two ſorts. There were Tabernacles for civil uſes, and the Tabernacle for Church-uſes; they dwelt in Tabernacles, and God was worſhipped in a Tabernacle; and therefore (Ezek. 23. 4.) Iſrael and Judah are called Aholah and Aholibah. Iſrael, the ten Tribes, is called Aholah, that is, a Tent, or or a Tabernacle; noting, that they had been the Tent and the Tabernacle of God, wherein he was worſhipped; but Judah is called Aholibah, that is, My Tent is in the midſt of her; becauſe God at that time continued the outward Ordinances of his worſhip to Judah, though the ten Tribes had been long in captivity. That only by the way: Here by Tabernacles, we are to underſtand civil Tabernacles; for in thoſe Eaſtern Countries, their ordinary habitations and dwellings were in moveable Tents or Tabernacles, becauſe of their frequent removes. And hence afterward amongſt the Latines, the word for a Tent or Tabernacle, ſignified a houſe, or any place wherein men dwell and frequent. Further, By a Trope, a Tabernacle ſignifies all a mans eſtate, or all his goods; ſo that, when it is ſaid, Thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace, the meaning is, thy whole eſtate and family, whatever thou haſt, ſhall be in peace.

Shall be in peace.] That is, it ſhall be peaceable or in ſafety: Peace may be conſidered two wayes, either ſtrictly or largely; ſtrictly, and ſo peace is oppoſed to war; either firſt, Foreign; or ſecondly, Civil; or thirdly, Domeſtical war (as we may call it) namely, ſtrife and contention in Families. Thus, Thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace, may take in all theſe; thou ſhalt neither be invaded by Foreigners, neither ſhalt thou have any inſurrection and ſedition in thy own borders; neither ſhalt thou have unkind contentions in thy particular family, or within thy private walls.

Secondly, Take the word more largely (as it is very frequently in Scripture) and then peace ſignifies all manner of bleſſings and good things, the confluence and gathering together as it were of all comforts; and peace in this large ſence, is oppoſed to any kind of trouble or adverſity; and to ſay ſuch an one hath peace, is as much as to ſay, he proſpers. Peace and proſperity are terms of the ſame ſignification. And then the meaning is this, Thou ſhalt know that thy Tabernacle ſhall be in peace, that is, that thy whole eſtate ſhall proſper, and that thou ſhalt have good ſucceſs. Note hence,

First,

First, Peace is a choice and a special blessing.

Outward peace is the choicest of outward blessings, and inward peace is the choicest of spiritual blessings. Peace gives sweetness and beauty to all our blessings; without peace, riches are but guilded thorns; honour is but higher misery, health but stronger affliction.

So, without inward peace, Grace gives no present comfort; and therefore in the wishes of perfect spiritual mercy to the Saints, we find these two in conjunction, Grace and Peace. The highest promises made to the Church, are promises of setled peace in the Church, Isa. 32. 18. My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places; There's the top of their outward felicity: Again, in Isa. 33. 20. Look upon Zion the City of our solemnities (that is, where the worship of God was solemniz'd) thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a Tabernacle that shall not be taken down, not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken: Pure Ordinances, and a peaceable Habitation, are Jerusalems perfection on earth; yea, some look upon it as a perfection too perfect for earth, and therefore interpret the Prophesie of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Secondly, He saith not only, thou shalt have peace in thy Tabernacle; but thou shalt know it. Hence observe,

To be assured of a mercy, is better then the enjoyment of a mercy.

Doubts of losing a mercy, eat out the heart of a mercy; and a man in that case, is as much troubled with the fear of wanting, as he can be comforted with the sense of enjoying.

There are three steps of blessedness. To be delivered from evil, is but a part of blessedness, negative blessedness: to receive good, is the better part of blessedness, positive blessedness: But to be assured that we shall hold and retain all this, is the perfection of blessedness. The first part of that great blessing we receive by Christ, consists in our deliverance from evil; or in a freedom from perishing. The second consists in the conveyance of good to us, as pardon of sin, grace and glory. But the third (which is the height of all) consists in our everlasting assurance to enjoy all this. Adam had a good estate, but he was not assured of it: The blessings we have by Christ, are built upon a foundation, which can never be shaken. In this method; temporal mercies are promised in this Scripture: First, Deliverance from Sword and Famine. Secondly, Peace with the Creatures. Thirdly, An assurance that this peace shall be continued.

Lastly observe, All outward blessings are in themselves fading and perishing.

Though a man be assured that he shall enjoy outward blessings, yet he can enjoy them but in the nature and condition of outward blessings. Though he be sure to use and enjoy them, yet he looks upon them as perishing in the using. All outward things are here (as frequently in other Scriptures) implied under the notion of a Tabernacle; a Tabernacle is a moveable habitation. It is a piece of a miracle if a Tabernacle stand long: that promise (Isa. 33. 20.) imports somewhat extraordinary: A Tabernacle that should not be taken down, not one of the stakes thereof removed, nor any of the cords thereof be broken: It is as if the Holy Ghost should say, Thou shalt be a Tabernacle, priviledg'd above all Tabernacles; they are moveable, unfixed, easie to be taken down; but it shall not be so with thee. The Apostles conclusion takes in all creature-comforts; The fashion of this world passeth away, 1 Cor. 7. 31. The Scheme, the beauty of the best earthly things pass, while we enjoy them, and moulder away between our hands, while we are using them.

And thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin.

This clause of the Verse compleats mercy yet higher: It is better not to sin in our habitation, then to be assured of a habitation. To have quietness in our habitation, is very good; but to have holiness in it, is best of all. Thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin.

The word which we translate habitation, signifies not only a house, but a wife, or a housewife: Hence some render, Thou shalt visit thy beauty, or thy fair and beautiful wife, and shalt not sin: The reason is, either, because a good wife is the beauty and ornament of the house; or because the knowledge, wisdom and diligence of the wife is a means to furnish and adorn the house; or lastly, the business of a wife is so much in the house, that she shares names with the house; she is, or ought to be like a Snail, living with her house upon her back. The Apostles rule also being, I will that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house. 1 Tim. 5. 14. And exhort them to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, Tit. 2. 5. Hence also probably, the same word in the Hebrew, signifies a beautiful wife, and a beautiful house. We read it in that sence (Psal. 68. 12.) Kings of Armies did fly apace, and she that tarried at home, divided the spoyl. She that tarried at home, or the beauty of the house (sc. the wife) divided the spoil. The meaning is, such victory shall be obtained over the enemies of the Church, that the wives and weak women shall be filled with those spoils, which their triumphant husbands shall bring home to them.

But here we may rather take the word in the ordinary sence, only with this emphasis, signifying (not bare walls, or a numerous Family) but a beautiful, a well furnished, a well ordered house. And so we have the word at the third verse of this Chapter, where Eliphaz saith, I saw the wicked taking root, and presently I cursed his habitation, or, his goodly, beautiful, flourishing house: So here, Thou shalt visit thy habitation, that is, thy house in all the beauty, order, riches and furniture of it.

Thou shalt visit.] The word signifies more then to see and look upon the buildings and furniture: To visit, notes in Scripture these three or four things.

First, To overlook or take care of the house; to visit the house, is to provide for the house, Psal. 8. 4. Lord, what is man that thou visitest him! that is, that thou takest so much care of him, and hast such waking thoughts about him.

Secondly, To visit the house, notes an enquiry of what is done in the house, how things go in the family.

Thirdly, It imports a calling of all to an account and reckoning, about what is done in their discharge of family-duties.

Fourthly, To visit, is to order and direct, to command and give precepts for what shall be done. Hence frequently in the Old Testament, the Commandments of God are expressed by this word, his Precepts. So then, Thou shalt visit thy house, or, thy habitation, may take in all these; thou shalt, as a Master, view, and oversee, direct and call to account thy house and family. In this sence, the word is commonly used amongst us: That act of the Bishops calling their Dioceses to an account, and over-looking them, was called their Visitation. And over Colledges, Hospitals, and such publick Foundations, Visitors are appointed, to see and take an account, how the Rules and Statutes of those places are observed. Thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin.

But how is it said, he shall do this, and not sin? Doth not sin mingle with all we do?

The word here used, signifies, 1. Tropically, to err, fail or miscarry in the general. 2. Properly, to miss a special mark or way, to shoot awry, or wander in stead of walking; as (Judg. 20. 16.) it is said of those seven thousand Benjamites, that they could shoot at an hairs breadth, and not sin; so the word is, or not miscarry, not miss the mark. And because every transgression is a wandering out of the way of Gods Commandments, or a shooting beside the mark of his word, therefore that word in Scripture, is commonly used for sinning.

Here the word admits a twofold interpretation.

Non officietris pœna pro peccato. Fag. Non lædetis, non accipies damnum aut detrimentum, Targ. Curabit res tuas, & domum tuam,

First, For the fruit or effect of sin; thus, thou shalt order and overlook thy family, with such wisdom and discretion, that thou shalt not err, or do things beside the rule of prudence, and so bring miscarriage and troubles upon thy affairs by sin. Mr. Broughton translates to this sence, Thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not misprosper. And so Eliphaz may hint at Job's former losses, at the overthrow of his Estate and Family; as if he had said, heretofore thou didst visit thy habitation, and didst not prosper; but if thou shalt now humble thy self, thou shalt visit thy habitation, and all ſhall proſper; things ſhall go well with thee, thou ſhalt not labour in vain, or loſe thy end in the care thou takeſt about thy family.

at eas procuraas non fruſtraberis ipe tua, cedentibus tibi rebus omnibus pro voto, & ex animi ſententia. Mer. Non aberrabis, ſc. à ſcopo & fine deſiderii tui. Coc.

Secondly, The ſence may be this, thou ſhalt order and viſit thy family with ſo much juſtice, equity and holineſs, that thou ſhalt not ſin. Not that Eliphaz undertakes his abſolute freedom from ſin, but he ſhould not ſin as (he ſuppoſed he had) before, thou ſhalt not run into ſuch errors, or ſplit thy ſelf upon ſuch rocks as have wrack'd thy former greatneſs. And thus he ſecretly reproves Job's former carriage in his family, as irregular and ſinful.

There is a further expoſition, joyning both theſe together; Thou ſhalt viſit thy houſe, and ſhalt not ſin; namely, by conniving or winking at the ſins and diſorders of thy family, and yet thou ſhalt have peace; thy ſtrict and faithful carriage in overſeeing thy family, ſhall not provoke either ſervants or children to contention and complainings, to anger and paſſion; thy holy ſeverity ſhall not fill thy houſe with quarrels and troubles; but God ſhall ſo over-aw the ſpirits of thoſe under thee, that they ſhall willingly and chearfully ſubmit to thy purer diſcipline. Hence obſerve, Domeſtici correpti non ſuccenſebūt. Vatabl.

First, It is a great and a ſpecial point of godly wiſdom, well to order and viſit a Family.

Families are the principles or ſeeds of a Commonwealth. As every man is a little world, ſo every houſe is a Kingdom. A Family is a Commonwealth in a little Volume. And the Rules of it are an Epitome of all Laws, by which whole Nations are governed. The Apoſtle makes it a ſpecial Character of his Biſhop, That he muſt be one who rules his own houſe well; and ſubjoynes the reaſon, for if a man know not how to rule his own houſe, how ſhall he take care of the Church of God? 1 Tim. 3. 4, 5. And therein wraps up this truth, that he who knows how to rule his own houſe well, is in a good poſture of ſpirit for publick rule. The ſame wiſdom, and juſtice, and holineſs for kind, only more enlarged and extenſive, acts in either ſphear, and will regularly move both.

Sin ſpoiles the comforts, and cankers the bleſſings of a Family.

Sin brought into a houſe, rots the timber, and pulls down the houſe; or it undermines the foundation, and blows up the houſe. The ſin of Families, is the ruine and conſumption of Families. Hence obſerve, Thirdly, To be kept from ſin, is a better and a greater bleſſing, then all outward bleſſings.

When Eliphaz had reckoned up all the comforts which repenting Job is promiſed; Thou ſhalt be delivered in ſix troubles and in ſeven; Sword and Famine ſhall not hurt thee, peace and plenty ſhall dwell within thy walls, and lodge in every chamber: Yet (ſaith he) I will tell thee of a bleſſing beyond all theſe, thou ſhalt not ſin: It is more mercy to be delivered from one ſin, then from ſword and famine; grace is better then peace, and holineſs then abundance; riches, and honour, and health, are all obſcured in this one bleſſing, a holy, a gracious, an humble heart.

There is more evil in one ſin, then in any or all troubles; therefore there muſt needs be a greater bleſſing in being kept from ſin, than in protection from any or all troubles. Sin is the greateſt evil; therefore to be kept from ſin, is one of the greateſt goods. Chriſt took upon him all ſorts of outward evils, he became poor for our ſakes; he had not ſo much as an houſe to lie in; he came in the form of a ſervant for our ſakes, and he was a man of ſorrows; he was acquainted with grief all his life, at laſt, with death and a grave: yet, he would not admit of the leaſt ſin: he was content to bear all our ſins, but he abhorred the thought of acting one. Not to ſin, is the next priviledge to God, and the utmoſt priviledge of man. When, in a full ſence, man ſhall not ſin, man will be arrived at fulneſs of joy; and as we daily empty of ſin, ſo we proportionably, fill with joy.

Verſe 25. Thou ſhalt know alſo that thy ſeed ſhall be great, and thy off-ſpring as the graſs of the earth.

From preſent bleſſings upon the family, he deſcends to thoſe which concern poſterity; as if he had ſaid, thy comforts ſhall not be confined to thy ſelf, neither ſhall they be ſhut up within the limits of one generation: Mercies ſhall be tranſmitted to thy children, thy heirs ſhall inherit bleſſings.

Thy ſeed ſhall be great.] The word Great, ſignifies both multitude and magnitude: Thou ſhalt have a great ſeed, that is, a numerous ſeed, a multitude of children: and thou ſhalt have a great ſeed, that is, honourable and wealthy children; Job himſelf was called, chap. 1. 3. (though by another word, yet in the ſame ſence) the greateſt man in the Eaſt: This greatneſs is promiſed his children, and they ſhall receive additional further bleſſings: For the word [Rab] ſignifies greatneſs, in a continual motion to more eminent greatneſs; and therefore it is ſometime tranſlated by encreaſing: So (Iſa. 9. 6.) Where the Prophet ſets out the flouriſhing greatneſs of the Kingdom of Chriſt: Of the encreaſe of his Kingdom and Peace, there ſhall be no end; or, Of the greatneſs and greatning of his Kingdom, there ſhal be no end. So that, to ſay, thy ſeed ſhall be great, notes, not only ſome ſtanding greatneſs, but growing greatneſs: they ſhall ever be upon an encreaſe, till they come to their full in glory.

And thy off-ſpring as the graſs of the earth.

Both clauſes of the Verſe mean the ſame thing. The word which we tranſlate [off-ſpring,] ſignifies properly that which goeth forth or iſſues, becauſe children ſpring or go forth from their parents, and are therefore called their iſſue. And the word is uſed for the bud of the Olive or of the Vine; hence the Pſalmiſt puts them both into a ſimilitude. Thy children ſhall be like Olive-plants round about thy Table. They are as the Olive-bud in their birth, and as the Olive-branch in their growth.

Thy off-ſpring ſhall be [as the graſs of the earth.] To be as the graſs of the earth, is a proverbial ſpeech; and it ariſes to the ſence of thoſe proverbials ſpoken to Abraham concerning his ſeed; Thy ſeed ſhall be as the ſtars of heaven: And, thy ſeed ſhall be as the ſand upon the Sea-ſhore. The graſs of the field is as innumerable as the ſtars, or the ſands. Thy off-ſpring ſhall be as the graſs of the field. Thou ſhalt not only have a numerous, but thou ſhalt have (as it were) an innumerable off-ſpring.

Proverbiale multitudinis, talia ſunt ſicut arena maris, ut ſtellæ cœli. Druſ.

Mankind in general, is compared unto graſs, Iſa. 40. 6. All fleſh is graſs. Graſs, in regard of its ſudden withering, he is ſuddenly cut down; the goodlineſs of man is as the flower of the field. Wicked men are compared to Graſs, not only becauſe they wither, but becauſe they wither ſuddenly, or are cut off by ſome hand of Juſtice. The off-ſpring of a godly man are compared to Graſs, but in another reference. To Graſs, firſt, becauſe of their mutitude; and ſecondly, becauſe of their beauty; they ſhall flouriſh and be green as the graſs, which is very pleaſant to the beholders eye.

And in this alſo Eliphaz aimes at the death of Job's Children; Thou haſt loſt thy children, they periſhed miſerably; but if thou return, that bleſſing ſhall return, Thy ſeed ſhall be great, and thy off-ſpring ſhall be as the graſs of the earth.

Hoc dicit quia Job filios amiſerat. Merc.

The bleſſing of Children hath been ſhewed in the firſt Chapter; therefore I ſhall but name a Point or two now.

First, That, The poſterity of godly parents ſtand nearer then others, under the influence of heavenly bleſſings.

As Grace doth not run in a blood, ſo neither do bleſſings infallibly run in a blood; yet the children of thoſe who are bleſſed, are neareſt a bleſſing, and their poſſibilities for mercy, are faireſt. Many promiſes are made to them, they are heirs apparent of the Promiſes in their parents right; others to appearance, are ſtrangers to the promiſes; though we know free Grace chuſeth often out of the natural line: The mercies of God are his own, and it is his prerogative, to have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will, he hardneth.

Secondly, When he ſums up the bleſſings of a godly man, the bleſſings of his Children are caſt into the account. Hence note,

That, The bleſſings of the Children are the bleſſings of the Parents.

As the Parent is afflicted in the afflictions of his Children, ſo he is bleſſed in their bleſſings. Relations ſhare mutually both in Comforts and Croſſes. Children are their Parents multiplied; and every good of the Child is an addition to the Parents good. A flouriſhing, and a numerous Poſterity is a great outward bleſſing. Some have the choiceſt of ſpiritual bleſſings, who want this (Iſa. 56. 3.) God comforts thoſe that have no Children. Do not ſay that thou art made a dry Tree; for I will give thee in mine houſe, a place and a name better then of Sons and Daughters: As if he had ſaid, the name of Sons and of Daughters, is a very great Comfort, but it is not the greateſt Comfort, the beſt bleſſing: thou ſhalt have a name and a place, better then of Sons and Daughters.

Verſ. 26. Thou ſhalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a ſhock of corn cometh in, in his ſeaſon.

From perſonal preſent bleſſings of this life, and the bleſſings of poſterity, Eliphaz deſcends to ſhew the bleſſing of a godly man in death: A happy death is the cloſe of temporal happineſs, and the beginning of eternal. A happy death ſtands between grace and glory, like the Baptiſt between the Law and the Goſpel, and is the connexion or knitting of both: And as it was ſaid of John, That among them who are born of women, there aroſe not a greater then he; nevertheleſs, he that is leaſt in the Kingdom of Heaven, is greater then John: So we may ſay, that among all the bleſſings of this life, there is none greater then a bleſſed death; nevertheleſs that which is leaſt in eternal life, is a greater bleſſing, then a bleſſed death. It was an obſervation among the Heathen, That no man is to be accounted bleſſed, until he die. But when life is ſhut up with a bleſſing, then man is fully bleſſed; as in reaſoning, ſo in living, the concluſion lies in the premiſes. A happy death is the reſult of a holy life.

Thou ſhalt come to thy grave.] That phraſe notes two things.

Firſt, A willingneſs and a chearfulneſs to die. Thou ſhalt come, thou ſhalt not be dragged or hurried to thy grave, as it is ſaid of the fooliſh rich man, Luke 12. This night ſhall thy ſoul be taken from thee. But thou ſhalt come to thy grave, thou ſhalt die quietly and ſmilingly, as it were; thou ſhalt go to thy grave, as it were upon thine own feet, and rather walk, then be carried to thy Sepulcher.

Secondly, It notes the honour and ſolemnity of burying. Thou ſhalt come to thy grave with honour, as it is ſaid of Abijah the ſon of Jeroboam, 1 King. 14. 12, 13. When Meſſengers were ſent to the Prophet to inquire whether he ſhould recover, the Prophet tells them, The child ſhall die, and all Iſrael ſhall mourn for him, and bury him: For, he only of Jeroboam ſhall come to the grave, becauſe in him there is found ſome good thing toward the Lord God of Iſrael, in the houſe of Jeroboam. He onely ſhall come to the grave, the reſt ſhall be thruſt into the grave, or lie unburied; but he ſhall come, that is, he ſhall be buried with honour; others ſhall have reproach caſt upon them, when the earth is caſt upon them. Thou ſhalt come to thy grave

In a full age.] So we tranſlate. The word is expounded two wayes.

In a full age, that is, in an age, when thou ſhalt be full: full of eſtate, full of wealth and honour, thou ſhalt have abundance when thou dieſt. And ſo it points at Job's preſent poverty; though thou haſt nothing now, ſcarce a rag to thy back, or a ſheet to wind thee in, if thou ſhouldſt die, yet ſeek unto God, and thou ſhalt die in a full age, in a golden Age, thy wants ſhall be ſupplied, and thy loſſes repaired to the full.

But rather a full age, notes here a fulneſs of dayes, though the other (fulneſs of eſtate) be not excluded. The Prophet puts the ſame difference, between aged men, and men full of dayes, as is between children, and young men (Jer. 6. 11.) I am full of the fury of the Lord, I will pour it out upon the children abroad, and upon the aſſembly of young men together: The aged, with him that is full of days. That is, all ages ſhall feel the fury of the Lord. A full age, is an age full of dayes or compleat to the utmoſt time of life. Some of the Jewiſh Writers obſerve, that the numeral letters of this word (Chelad) make up threeſcore, which they conceive is the age here meant; but threeſcore is not a full old-age, it is rather the beginning of old-age. Therefore fulneſs of age, is by others interpreted, to be ſtrength of age; thou ſhalt die in an old-age, yet thou ſhalt have ſtrength and comfort in thy old-age; thine old-age ſhall not be a troubleſom age, thou ſhalt not be weak and crazy, diſtempered and ſick, a burden to thy ſelf or friends; thou ſhalt dye (as ſome tranſlate) in a good old-age; or as Mr. Broughton, thou ſhalt die in luſty old-age; time ſhall not wither thee, nor drink up thy blood and ſpirits, Thou ſhalt have a ſpring in thy Autumn, and a Summer in the winter of thy life. As it was with Moſes, Deut. 34. 7. who dyed when he was an hundred and twenty years old, yet ſaith the Text, His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated: This is to die in a full old-age, full of dayes, yet full of ſtrength and health. It is a great bleſſing, when a man is (in this ſence) youthful in old-age: when others ſee with four eyes, and go with three legs, he uſes neither ſtaff nor ſpectacles, but renews his ſtrength like the Eagle.

Or we may take the ſence more generally, for any one that liveth long, and liveth comfortably; as it was ſaid of Abraham, Gen. 25. 8. That he dyed in a good old-age, an old man, and full of years. He dyed in a good old-age; the young-man is councel'd, To remember his Creator in the dayes of his youth; before the evil dayes come, Eccleſ. 12. 1. What are thoſe? Thoſe evil dayes are the dayes of old-age: The words following being an Allegorical, elegant deſcription of old-age: Old-age in it ſelf is the evil day: The lives of many old-men are a continual death. They live as it were upon the rack of extream pains or ſtrong infirmities; therefore it is a ſpecial bleſſing for a man to be old, and yet to have a good old-age, that is, a florid comfortable old-age; To have many years and few infirmities is a rare thing. In ſome old-age flouriſhes, and in others old-age periſhes. Job gives us this difference in the uſe of this word, Chap. 30. 2. Yea whereto might the ſtrength of their hands profit me, in whom (Chelad) old-age was periſhed. As if he had ſaid, ſome old-men are active and ſtrong; but theſe, who were faded and flatted in all their abilities, in what ſtead could they ſtand me? They were a trouble to themſelves, and therefore could be no comfort unto others.

This full old-age is explained further, by way of ſimilitude, He ſhall die in a full age, like as a ſhock of corn cometh in, in his ſeaſon. When a young man dies, he is as green corn. The Pſalmiſt imprecates that ſome might be like the graſs or corn on the houſe top, that withereth before it is cut down; whereof the Mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth up the ſheaves, his boſom. The life of a man ſometimes is like corn growing upon the houſe-top, that withereth: Or (as it is in the Parable of the ſower, Matth. 13.) like the corn that fell on the high-way ſide, or among ſtones and thorns, which came not in, in its ſeaſon; it never ſtaid the ripening or reaping, but was eaten up, or dryed, or choaked before the harveſt. Now here, man is compared unto corn ſowed in good ground, well rooted and continuing out its ſeaſon, and is brought in ripe at harveſt. Old-age is the harveſt of nature. Some divide mans life into ſeven parts, comparing it to the ſeven Planets: Some into five, comparing it to the five acts of an interlude; but commonly the life of man is divided into four parts, and ſo it is compared to the four ſeaſons of the year. And in that diviſion old-age is the winter quarter, cold and cloudy, full of Rheums and Catarrhs of diſeaſes and diſtillations, But here, old-age is the harveſt; though thou art a very old-man, thou ſhalt not die as in winter, but thou ſhalt die, as it were in harveſt, when thou art full ripe and ready, as a ſhock of corn that is laid up in the barn: The general judgment of the world is compared to a harveſt, and death (which is a particular day of judgment) is a harveſt too.

Pſal. 129. 6, 7.

Thoſe words, He ſhall come to his grave as a ſhock of corn, are further conſiderable; the Hebrew is, He ſhall aſcend as a ſhock of corn; and that, referring to death, is ſometimes tranſlated by cutting off, or taking away, Pſal. 102. 25. Cut me not off in the midſt of my days: The letter is, Let me not aſcend in the midſt of my dayes: Whether it have any alluſion to that hope or faith of the Saints in their death, that, they do but aſcend, when they die, or to their diſ-appearing to the eye of ſenſe, when they die; becauſe things which aſcend, vaniſh out of ſight, and are not ſeen: In either ſence, when the Saints are cut down by death, they aſcend. And they are elegantly ſaid, To aſcend as a ſhock of corn; becauſe that is taken from the earth, and reared or ſtack't up; and ſo by a Metaphor it ſignifies a Tomb or a Monument erected or high-built over a dead Corps, much after the manner of a ſhock of corn: So the word is uſed, He ſhall remain in the Tomb or Heap, Job 22. 32.

So then, the ſum of this verſe, is a promiſe of comfort and honour in death: He ſhall die in a full age, when he is ready and ripe for death. Yet this is not to be taken ſtrictly, that, every godly man dies in ſuch a full old-age; in an age full of dayes, or full of comforts. Many of Gods beſt ſervants have had evil dayes in their old-age; their old-age hath had many dayes of trouble and ſickneſs, of pain and perplexity. But thus it is with many in old-age, this is ſpecially to be look'd upon as an Old-Teſtament promiſe, when the Lord dealt more with his people, in viſible external mercies. Yet in one ſence it is an univerſal truth, and ever fulfilled to his people; for whenſoever they die, they die in a good age; yea though they die in the ſpring and flower of youth, they die in a good old-age; that is, they are ripe for death, when ever they die; when ever a godly man dies, it is harveſt time with him: though in a natural capacity he be cut down, while he is green, and cropt in the bud or bloſſom; yet in his ſpiritual capacity, he never dies before he is ripe. God ripens his ſpeedily, when he intends to take them out of the world ſpeedily. He can let out ſuch warm rayes and beams of his Spirit upon them, as ſhall ſoon maturate the ſeeds of grace, into a preparedneſs for glory: whereas a wicked man living an hundred years, hath no full old-age, much leſs a good old-age; he is ripe indeed for deſtruction, but he is never ripe for death; he is as unready and unripe for death, when he is an hundred years old, as when he was but a day old. He hath not begun to live, when he dies; or he is at the end of his natural race, before he hath ſet one ſtep in his ſpiritual. Gray hairs are the ſhame, and ſhould be the ſorrow of old-age, when they are not found in the way of righteouſneſs. From the former branch of this Verſe, Obſerve, Firſt, To have a comely burial, to come to the grave with honour, is a great bleſſing.

It was threatned upon Jehoiakim, the ſon of Joſiah, as a curſe, That he ſhould have the burial of an Aſs, and be drag'd and caſt out, beyond the gates of the City, Jer. 22. 19. That man ſurely had lived like a beaſt, whom God threatned by name, that when he died, he ſhould be uſed as a beaſt. Though we know the bodies of many of the ſervants of God, have been ſcattered and may be ſcattered, upon the face of the earth, like dung; The dead bodies (as the complaint is, Pſal. 79. 2.) of thy ſervants have they given to be meat to the fowls of the heaven, the fleſh of thy Saints to the beaſts of the earth: Yet to them (even then) there is this bleſſing reſerved, beyond the bleſſing of a burial, they are ever laid up in the heart of God, he takes care of them, he imbalms them for immortality, when the remains of their mortality, are trodden under foot, or rot upon a dung-hill.

Secondly, Obſerve, A godly man is a volunteer in his death; he cometh to the grave.

A wicked man never dies willingly; Though he ſometime die by his own hand, yet he never dies with his own will. Miſerable man is ſometimes ſo over-preſt with terrors, and horrors of conſcience; ſo worn out with the trouble of living, that he haſtens his own death. Yet he Comes not to his grave willingly, but is drag'd by neceſſity. He thruſts his life out of doors with a violent hand, but it never goes out with a cheerful mind. He is often unwilling to live, but he is never willing to die. Death is welcome to him, becauſe life is a burden to him. Only they come to the grave, who by faith have ſeen Chriſt lying in the grave, and perfuming that houſe of corruption, with his own moſt precious body, which ſaw no corruption.

Thirdly, Obſerve, To live long, and to die in a full age, is a great bleſſing.

Old Eli had this curſe pronounced upon his family, 1 Sam. 2. 31. There ſhall not be an old man in thy houſe.

Gray hairs are a crown of honour, when they are found in the way of righteouſneſs. It is indeed infinitely better to be full of grace, then to be full of dayes; but to be full of dayes and full of grace too, what a venerable ſpectacle is that? To be full of years, and full of faith, full of good works, full of the fruits of righteouſneſs, which are by Chriſt; how comely and beautiful, beyond all the beauty and comlineſs of youth, is that? Such are truly ſaid to have filled their dayes. Thoſe dayes are filled indeed, which are full of goodneſs. When a wicked man dies, he ever dies empty and hungry; he dies empty of goodneſs, and he dies hungry after dayes. That place before mentioned of Abraham (Gen. 25. 8.) is moſt worthy our ſecond thoughts, He died in a good old-age, an old man, and full, ſo the Hebrew, we read, full of years. As a man, that hath eaten and drunk plentifully, is full, and deſires no more: So, he died an old man, and full, that is, he had lived as much as he deſired to live, He had his fill of living, when he died. And therefore alſo, it may be called a full age, becauſe a godly man hath his fill of living; but a wicked man (let him live never ſo long) is never full of dayes, never full of living; he is as hungry, and as thirſty (as a man may ſpeak) after more time and dayes, when he is old, as he was when he was a child, fain he would live ſtill; He muſt needs think it is good being here, who knows of no better being, or hath no hopes of a better. It is a certain truth, He that hath not a taſte of eternity, can never be ſatisfied with time. He that hath not ſome hold of everlaſting life, is never pleaſed to let go this life; therefore he is never full of this life. It is a moſt ſad thing, to ſee an old man, who hath no ſtrength of body to live, yet have a ſtrong mind to live. Abraham was old and full, he deſired not a day or an hour longer. His ſoul had never an empty corner for time, when he dyed. He had enough, of all, but (of which he could never have enough, and yet had enough, and all, as ſoon as he had any of it) eternity. In that great reſtitution promiſed, Iſa. 65. 20. this is one priviledge, There ſhall be no more there an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not fill'd his dayes. There is much controverſie about the meaning of theſe words; the digreſſion would be too long to inſiſt upon them. Only to the preſent point thus much, that there is ſuch a thing, as an Infant of dayes, and an old man that hath not fill'd his dayes.

Impii quã-vis diu vivant, tamen non impleat dies ſuos, quia ſpem in rebus temporariis collocantes perpetua vita in hoc mundo perfrui vellent.

An infant of dayes, may be taken for an old child, that is, an old man childiſh, or a man of many years, but few abilities: A man whoſe hoary head and wrinkled face ſpeak fourſcore, yet his fooliſh actions and ſimple carriage ſpeak under fourteen. An old man that hath not fill'd his dayes, is conceived to be the ſame man, in a different character. An old man fills not his dayes, Firſt, When he fulfils not the duty, nor reaches the end for which he lived to old-age. That man who hath lived long, and done little, hath left empty dayes upon the record of his life; and when you have writ down the dayes, the months, and years of his life, his ſtory's done, the reſt of the book is but a continued blank, nothing to be remembred that he hath done, or nothing worth the remembrance.

Now as an old man fills not his dayes, when he ſatisfies not the expectation of others: ſo in the ſecond place, his dayes are not fill'd, when his own expectations are not ſatisfied; that is, when he having lived to be old, hath yet young freſh deſires to live; when he finds his mind empty, though his body be ſo full of dayes, that it can hold no longer, nor no more. He that is in this ſence, an infant of dayes, and an old man not having fill'd his dayes, though he be an hundred years old, when he dies, yet he dies (as the Prophet concludes in that place) accurſed; he comes not to his grave under the bleſſing of this promiſe in the Text, in a full age.

He ſhall come to his grave like a ſhock of corn that is brought in, in his ſeaſon. Even pale death hath beauty in it, when it comes in ſeaſon. Eccleſ. 7. 17. Be not wicked over much, why ſhould'ſt thou die before thy time? No man can die before Gods time, but a man may die before his time; that is, before he is prepared by grace, and before he

he is ripened in the course of nature. These two wayes a man dies before his time: First, When he dies without any strength of grace: Secondly, When he dies in the strength of nature. In this sence the Prophet describes the hand of God upon him, Psal. 102. 23. He weakened my strength in the way; he shortned my dayes: and therefore prayes in vers. 24. I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my dayes: That is, in the strength or best of my time, according to the line and measure of nature. A godly man prayes that he may not die out of season; but a wicked man never dies in season: That threatning is ever fulfilled upon him, in one sence, if not in both (Psal. 55. 23.) The blood-thirsty and deceitful man shall not live out half his dayes. A wicked man never lives out half his dayes, for, either he is cut off before he hath lived half the course of nature, or he is cut off before he hath lived a quarter of the course of his desires; either he lives not half so long as he might, or not a tenth, not a hundreth part so long as he would; and therefore let him die when he will, his death is full of terror, trouble and confusion, because he dies out of season. He never kept time or season with God, and surely God will not keep or regard his time or season.

Vers. 27. Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

As Eliphaz began his dispute with an elegant preface, so he ends it with a Rhetorical conclusion; as if he had said, Job I have spoken many things unto thee, hear now the sum and upshot of all, Lo this, we have searched it; so it is; hear it, and know it for thy good:

Two things he concludes with; First, With an assertion of the truth of what he had spoken, So it is. Secondly, With a motion for his assent to what was spoken, Hear it.

Or the words may fall under a three-fold consideration.

As the { 1. Conclusion / 2. Confirmation / 3. Application } of his speech.

And this application is strengthened by a three-fold Motive.

By a Motive, first, from experience, Lo this, we have searched it, we have found the thing to be true.

Secondly, By a Motive from the truth of the thing in it self, so it is: we have searched it, we have experience of it, so it is, the thing is certain. And then,

Thirdly, From the fruit and benefit of it, if he submit unto and obey the truth delivered, know it for thy good, thou shalt reap the profit of it. These are three Motives, by which he strengthens his exhortation, in applying the truth he had beaten out, in his former discourse.

We have searched it.] As if Eliphaz had said, we have not taken these things upon trust, or by an implicite faith; we have not received them by tradition from our Fathers, but we have searched, and tryed, and found out, that thus the matter stands in Gods dispensations, both to a wicked man, and to a godly man, in all the particulars run thorough in this Chapter. Or we have searched, that is, we have learned these truths by experience; that, God punisheth not the innocent; that, man cannot compare in justice with God; that, hypocrites shall not prosper long; and that, mans afflictions are the fruit of his transgressions. The word signifies a very diligent and exact scrutiny (Deut. 13. 14.) Thou shalt enquire, and make search, and ask diligently. It is to search as Judges search and enquire about any crime, or question in Law determinable by their sentence; and as we search to find the meaning of a riddle. (Judg. 14. 14.) The word is also applied to the searchings and enquiries of a Spie (Judg. 18. 2.) sent to bring intelligence; a Spie is an exact inquisitor, into all affairs, given him in charge for discovery. So here, we have searched out, we have spied out and tryed this thing to the utmost, we have as it were, read over all the records of divine Truths, we have examined all experiences and examples, and this is the result, the sum of all, Lo thus it is.

A question arises here, how Eliphaz can say, we have searched it, when as Chap. 4. he saith, A thing was secretly brought to me? It seems these were matters attained and beaten out by study, not sent in by divine revelation; and so are rather the opinions of men, then the oracles of God. Men inspired by the Holy Ghost, speak another language; as, Thus saith the Lord, or this we have received, not this we have searched. Scripture is given by inspiration from God, not by the disquisitions of men.

Ex quo intelligimus hanc Eliphæ dissertionem non oraculi fuisse, sed studii, nec ad Dei revelantis responsa, sed ad humani ingenii inventa pertinere. Janson in loc.

Some have hence concluded this speech of Eliphaz Apocryphal, as being rather matter of humane invention, then divine inspiration: Or the work of mans wit, rather then of Gods Spirit.

But I answer, First, The Apostle Paul hath sufficiently attested the Divine Authority of this Discourse, by alledging a proof out of it, 1 Cor. 3. 19.

Secondly, That which was secretly brought to Eliphaz, was that one special Oracle, Chap. 4. 17. Shall mortal man be more just then God? shall a man be more pure then his Maker? The other part of his discourse, to which these words (Lo this we have searched) refer, were grounded upon the experiences which himself and his friends had observed in, and about the providence of God, in all his dealings both with the godly and the wicked, all agreeable, to that grand principle received by immediate revelation. And therefore as he told Job before, that the general position was brought him in a vision; so all ages, and the records kept of them (in all which he had made a diligent enquiry) came up fully to the proof of it; as if he had said, The Lord told me so, and all he hath done in the World proclaims that it is so. His Word is enough to assert his own justice, but his Works witness with it, Lo, This we have searched, so it is.

We have searched. He speaks in the plural number; he begun his speech in Chap. 4. and he concludes it here in the plural number. Yet, we are not to think, that this was a discourse pen'd by them all together, or debated first in private conference, and agreed on, that thus Eliphaz should speak, because he saith, we have searched it. But the meaning is only this, I suppose I have spoken the sence of my two friends, who stand by, and I believe they are ready to subscribe to, or vote every word I have uttered, therefore behold we have searched, and thus it is.

Hear thou it.] To advise thee, was our part; to hear and hearken is thy part; therefore hear it.

But had he not heard them all this while? why doth Eliphaz now bid him hear it?

It is true, he had heard; but, there is more required then the hearing of the ear, when such a Sermon as this is preached; To hear, is more then the work of the ear. It is,

First, To believe and give credit to what is heard. (Joh. 9. 27.) I told you before, and you would not hear (saith the blind man) wherefore would you hear it again? That is, I have told you already, but you would not believe, nor give credit to what I spake.

Secondly, To hear, is to hearken, that is, to yield and consent to what is spoken. (Gen. 3. 17.) Forasmuch, as thou hast hearkned to the counsel of thy wife: Barely to hear a temptation to sin, is no act of sin; as barely to hear an exhortation to good, is no act of grace. Therefore because thou hast hearkned, is, because thou hast yielded and consented to that which she hath spoken.

Thirdly, To hear, is to obey. Isa. 55. 3. Hear and your soul shall live. It is not every hearing of the ear, that bringeth life to the soul; obedient hearing is enlivening hearing.

So here, we have searched it, so it is, hear it, that is, believe what we have spoken, submit unto, and consent to what we have spoken, obey and practise what we have spoken.

To hear, is both an act of sense, and an act of reason; an act of nature, and an act of grace. To hear one requesting and praying is to grant: and to hear one counselling and commanding, is to obey. When God hears man, he grants; and when man hears God, or hears men speaking in the name of God, he yields and obeyes.

It follows, And know thou it for thy good. The Hebrew is, know it for thy self. Now, because that which a man knows for himself, is for his profit; therefore we translate know it for thy good; that is, know it as that, whereby thy self mayst receive good. The meaning of, know it for thy self; is not this, know and keep it to thy self, let none partake with thee of it; it is against the use of knowledge, that a man should so know for himself, though a mans self hath or may have good by all he knows. So, we must understand that of Solomon, Prov. 9. 12. If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thy self; that is, thou shalt be advantag'd by thy wisdom: Wisdom brings in a fair revenew: though many know much and seem very wise, who know nothing for themselves, and are not wise at all for their own good.

There are three sorts of knowing men.

First, Some know only to know. They know, but they propose no end to themselves, beyond knowledge: They know not for the good of others, no nor for their own good. As it is with riches and honour, so with knowledge: covetous men gather riches that they may be rich, they propose not any other end of having riches, but only to be rich. An ambitious man, desires honour that he may be honourable; he proposeth to himself no other end of his desiring honour, but to be honourable, So, many are covetous and ambitious of knowledge; they read from Book to Book, and from Point to Point, from Science to Science, and what do they with all this knowledge? onely this, that they may know; to know thus, is not to know for good; To know, only to know, is no better then not to know.

Secondly, Others know, that they may be known to know: this is their end, that other men may know that they are knowing men, that they are great Schollars, great read-men, men of great abilities and boundless studies. Even as some desire riches, that they may be accounted rich; and honour, that they may be fam'd for honourable. To know only that we may be known, is worse then not to know.

But thirdly, That which is the right way of knowing, is to know that others may know; or, to know that our selves may practise. These are the true ends of knowing, to communicate knowledge, and to obey knowledge. The great end of knowing, should be our own profiting in holiness and obedience. And so here, Know it for thy good, is, know it so, as to make an advantage of thy knowledge. To know for our good, is the only good knowledge.

Hence Observe, First, Truth deserves our most diligent search.

We have searched it (saith Eliphaz) The promise of finding truth, is only to such as search for truth (Prov. 2. 4.) Thou shalt find wisdom, &c. If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures. There are two places, two veins especially, where truth is to be found; There is the book of Gods word, and the book of Gods works; the book of Scripture, and the book of Providence: In these two books, we are to search, in them, to study out truth, for our own practice, and for advice to others.

Observe Secondly, That which we offer to others for truth, we ought diligently to make tryal of our selves; or, we should make truth our own, before we distribute it to others.

We have searched the thing out (saith Eliphaz) we know the truth to be thus, we are masters of what we teach. They who hear aright, search (as the Bereans) those things which are taught them; and they who instruct aright, ought to search the things which they teach: If there must be after-searchings of those things we hear, certainly there must be fore-searchings of the things we teach. Truth (ordinarily) is not worth the having, unless it be come in by our own searching. They who receive that for truth which they never searcht, will not hold any truth when themselves are searcht. Truths meerly borrowed and taken upon trust, are no stock, no abiding treasure of knowledge; and yet most can only say of all the truth they have, as he of his ax-head, (2 King. 6. 5.) Alas master, for it was borrowed; they snatch up one truth from this hand, and another from that; they take it upon the credit of this, and that learned man; very few are able to say (as Eliphaz here) Lo this, we have searched it: The more pains we take to find truth, the more pleasure we take in it: That is sweetest to us, which we sweat most for, in Praying and Studying: Morsels of Truth dipt in that sawce, fatten and strengthen the soul most.

Observe Thirdly, What a man knoweth by search and disquisition, he is confident of.

We have searched it; and what follows? so it is; he speaks with authority, not timerously, as if he doubted, whether it were so or no; but so it is, we will bide by it, we have it upon enquiry and diligent search.

Observe Fourthly, The truths we know our selves, we should communicate unto others.

Here it is, we have searched it, but we will not put the light we have found, under a bushel; we shall not hide the talent we have, in a napkin: Here it is, make what use of it thou canst, know it for thy good.

Observe Fifthly, Truth may challenge credit, and command the ear.

Hear thou it. Truth needs not stand begging audience, or creep upon the ground with flattering insinuations, or humble submissions to gain acceptance. Truth is a great Prince, and may speak in the language of Princes; We will, We require: It commands rather then entreats, or all its entreaties command, every word a law or a charge; Hear thou it.

Observe Sixthly, That, it is needful to make special application of general doctrinal truths.

Eliphaz had delivered a doctrinal truth, and here he makes application; and though he failed much, in the application of it to Job, yet, there were general truths very appliable, in the things he delivered. Therefore he stayes not in generals, nor leaves his doctrine hovering in the Air, but brings it home to the heart, and layes it close to the conscience; hear it, and know it thou for thy good. And not only are National and speculative truths to be brought home and applied, but even common experimental truths; such were these discussed, and handled by Eliphaz.

Observe Seventhly, A man may know much, and yet get no good by it.

Know this for thy good. The Devil is a great Schollar, he knows much, but he knows nothing for his benefit, but all for his hurt. Many a man knows almost all that is knowable; but he knows nothing which is (to him) profitable: Nothing gains by his knowledge but only his pride; he is puffed up with Knowledge, not built up; and that knowledge which puffs up, will at last puff down, or cast us down.

Observe Eighthly, A godly man may make a profitable use of any truth.

You see what truths Eliphaz spake; many of them were ordinary common Doctrines, and many of them sore threatnings and judgments upon wicked men; yet know thou this for thy good. There is no vein of Doctrine in the book of God, but a man may make use, yea treasure of it. All truth is so symbolical to the regenerate part, that it cannot but more sublimate and spiritualize a spiritual heart, though it self be a truth about things earthly and temporal.

Observe Lastly, All truths, especially truths contained in the promises, are the portion of a godly man.

Know thou it for thy good, saith he; as if he should say, If thou art a godly man, then all the good things I have here spoken of, belonging to godly men, belong to thee, they are thy portion also. While a believer reads the book of God, he sees great riches, many precious things in the promises; and whatsoever good he finds there, there is nothing of it too good for him; he may know it all for his own good; those sweet delicious promises of the pardon of sin, of the love of God, of the freeness of grace, of the glory to come, the promises of Christ, and of all that is Christs, all these things are his; when he reads them, he may set his mark upon them, and know them for his good, know them as his own proper goods. Unbelievers are strangers to the promises, and the promises are as strange to them; they know not the promises, and the promises will not know them; they know not a letter of Scripture for their good. The very promises are threatnings to them, and the very blessings of the book of God, are their curse. As the clouds pass over this and that piece of ground, and then dissolve upon a third, by the directing and all-disposing providence of God: So the promises (which are full of blessings, full of comforts, as the clouds are of showers) pass over a wicked mans head, and let not down one drop of mercy or comfort upon him, but leave him like the dry hearth, or barren wilderness, which seeth not when good cometh, Jerem. 17.6. But then the cloud moves a little farther, and meets with the family or person of a godly man, there it dissolves and poureth out a plentiful rain (both of temporal and spiritual blessings) to refresh and confirm that inheritance of the Lord, Psalm 68. 9.

And so much for this fifth Chapter, wherein, with the fourth, we have handled the first part of the dispute, undertaken against Job, by Eliphaz, the first of his three friends; the whole discourse consisting of divers Arguments, to convince and humble him under the hand of God: of divers counsels and motives to perswade and direct him to seek unto God, and submit to his correcting hand: All he was to speak, being let in, by a loving Preface; and all he spake, being ratified, with an assuring conclusion, that, all he had spoken was for his good, if he would hear, believe and obey. In the next Chapters, we shall hear Job making his defence, scattering the charge thus brought against him, stiffly maintaining, and importunately renewing his first complaint.

CHAP. VI. Vers. 1, 2, 3.

But Job answered, and said,

O that my grief were throughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the ballances together!

For now it would be heavier then the sand of the Sea: therefore my words are swallowed up.

THis sixth Chapter begins Job's replication, which is continued to the end of the seventh. He replies exactly to the several parts of the charge, given by Eliphaz; who, in the two fore-going Chapters, undertook both to reprove the impatience of Job, and to advise him a more holy and better temper'd carriage, towards God, under his afflictions. In this reply, Job shapes and forms up answers unto both: I shall endeavour to give you a brief of the whole, and then to particulars.

First, Job enters with a refutation of those reproofs of impatience, which Eliphaz had heap't upon him; and with that subjoyns a refusal of the counsels (in his sence) which he had given him. In this work, seven verses of the Chapter are spent.

Secondly, We have a renovation or a re-inforcement of his grief and desire to die, from the eighth, to the end of the thirteenth verse, O that I might have my request, that God would cut me off, &c. As if he had said, I am so far, from being satisfied, with what thou hast spoken against me, or from recanting and recalling, what I have spoken, in those my breathings after death, that I will be bold to make the same suit to God again; O that I might have my request, and that God would cut me off, &c.

Thirdly, He proceeds to a charge of rash censure, of uncharitable, yea of deceitful dealing upon his friends, from the thirteenth, unto the twenty fourth verse. To him that is afflicted (saith he) pity should be shewed from his friend; my brethren have dealt deceitfully, as a brook, &c.

Fourthly, He yet submits himself to their judgment and direction, if they would speak reason to him at last, and come home to his case indeed: or, if they could fully and candidly discover to him any error, he was willing to be rectified; this he professes (and it is a most ingenuous profession) in vers. 24, & 25. Teach me (saith he) and I will hold my tongue, and cause me to understand wherein I have erred, &c. As if he had said, all that you have spoken hitherto, doth not reach my condition, ye have quite mistook my case; yet, you shall see, I do not stand out against you, because I will stand out; it is not my will that opposes what you have spoken, but my understanding; therefore, if you can shew me better reason, I lay down the bucklers, and yield my self a Prisoner to your selves, and unto truth. I delight not to lengthen out contentions, nor am I resolved to have the last word, Teach me, and I will hold my tongue.

Fifthly, He adds an expostulation, mixed with an aggravation. An expostulation about, and an aggravation of their high jealousie, and low opinion of him, in vers. 26, 27. Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind? As if he had said, Do you think, that you have had to deal with a man, that only makes a noise, or speaks a great many words, which have more sound then sence? Do ye think I am out of my wits, and in stead of arguing with you, do only rave like a mad man at you? Ye have had not vain, windy words from me, but words full of weight and matter, words of truth and soberness, wherefore then do you speak thus? Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate? Do ye think I speak like one, who knows not what he speaks? Or that, I have at once lost my hope, and my understanding.

Sixthly, He gives them advice and admonition to take better heed to what they should after say, if they intended to say any more, or to continue their counsel and discourse with him; in the three last verses of this sixth Chapter. Now therefore be content, look upon me, for it is evident to you, if I lie: return I pray you, &c.

In the seventh (which concludes his speech) he offers three things, especially to be observed.

First, A renewing of many Arguments and considerations, by which he confirms the equity of his request, to have his life cut off; upon which sad subject he insists, from the beginning of the Chapter, to the end of verse 17. Is there not an appointed time to man upon the earth? Are not his dayes, like the dayes of an Hireling? &c.

Secondly, After all his high strains of contest with man, we have an abasement of himself, as unworthy, that God should take notice of him, either by mercies or judgments, in vers. 18, 19. What is man that thou shouldst magnifie him, and that thou shouldst visit him every morning? &c. A godly man will stand (when he sees cause) upon his terms with men, but he ever falls low before, and hath not a word to reply against God. He is sometime angry, when men villifie him; but he ever admires, why God should magnifie him. What is man? &c.

Thirdly, He concludes his speech with an humble acknowledgment of his own sinfulness, and with an earnest request for the pardon of his sin. Lord (saith he) I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? vers. 20, &c. After all this heat and passion, after all these complainings, Job's heart lay level before the Lord; yea he abases himself to exalt and give glory to God, with humble confession, and an earnest supplication for the pardon of his sin. Thus we have the general parts and substance of his answer to that charge of Eliphaz, in the two former Chapters.

But Job answered, and said.

In these words, and the three following verses, Job gives us the refutation or rejection of that reproof, given him by Eliphaz; and he refutes it by shewing the reason why Eliphaz (as he supposed) was so sharp and bitter bitter in reprooving him: And further, he shews cause why he rejects his Councel or Consolation: The reason upon which he puts off those reproofs, is this, because Eliphaz had not duly considered his sorrows, or was not so sensible of them, as a man should be, that undertakes a friend in his condition. The sum of this Argument, against what Eliphaz had spoken, may be thus formed.

He cannot duly reprove or convince another of impatience in complaining, who hath not fully weighed those calamities, which are the cause and ground of those complaints.

But Eliphaz, thou hast not fully weighed and considered my case and condition, my troubles and calamities, which are the ground and cause of my complaints.

Therefore thou canst not duly reprove or convince me of impatience.

The Assumption or second Proposition of this Argument is couched in vers. 2. O that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and that my calamity were laid in the ballances together! As if he had said, I had never received such harsh censures, such a judgment or reproof, if thou hadst duly weighed my sorrows: if thou hadst faithfully studied my case, thou thou hadst never rebuked me thus.

The weight of his calamity, himself expresseth two wayes.

First, Comparatively, at vers. 3. by putting it into the ballance with the sand of the Sea; For now (saith he) it would be heavier then the sand of the Sea.

Secondly, He sets forth the greatness of his calamity, Demonstratively, by declaring in what manner he had been afflicted: My affliction is not an ordinary affliction, I am wounded with the arrows of the Almighty, and those poysoned arrows, and those arrows drinking up my spirits. I have not only some single great affliction, or many small ones upon me; but, I have terror, and terrors; yea, I have an army of terrors, yea an army of terrors alwayes incamping about me, and charging me continually: why Eliphaz, thou didst never clearly consider these things, much lesse hast thou had a sympathy or fellow-feeling of them. Thou hast not been afflicted in my afflictions: Thou hast not sorrowed my sorrows, nor wept my tears; Therefore it is that thou hast so sharply reproved me, and put so much gall and worm-wood into thy discourse.

So then, the sum of this first part may be thus given, taking it out of those high and hyperbolical strains, in which his passion was carried; as if Job had thus answered Eliphaz, It is an easie matter to slight that which a man doth not know, and to think others complain too much, when we our selves feel nothing; but is it any wonder to hear a man groan, that hath a burden upon his back, as heavy as the sand of the Sea? Is it any wonder to hear a man cry out, whose flesh is filled with poysoned arrows, shot from a bow, bent and drawn by the arm of omnipotency? Is it any wonder, if that man fear, who is incompast about with terrors? Is it any wonder, if that man be troubled, who hath the terrors of the Almighty incamping about him? Why Eliphaz, thou wouldst not think, that an Ox or an Ass were reprovable, if the one should low, when he hath no grass, and the other bray when he hath no fodder; if it be so, that the very irrational creaturts do according to reason, when they complain upon their wants, doest thou think me desperate or irrational in complaining of mine? Alas all my fodder and my grass, all my comforts and refreshings are taken from me. Doest thou not see, how upon a due consideration of my estate, all thy reproofs may be wiped off from me, or retorted upon thy self? what great matter is it, if thou dost not complain, who sittest at ease, and knowest no sorrow? Thou art in green pastures or full barns, thou hast grass and fodder in abundance, and therefore hast no cause of complaint. Thus in the general.

But Job answered, and said.] To answer, is here taken properly; he answers to a charge, reproof, or argument. At Chap. 3. vers. 1. when Job began to speak, it is said, Job answered, and said. In Scripture language answering is often put for speaking, though none have spoken a word or made any proposal before. But here answering is taken in a strict sence, as it notes a reply to somewhat before spoken; Job answered, and said.

Note this from it, It is the duty of a man to answer when he is questioned or charged.

It is the Apostles rule (1 Pet. 3. 15.) Be ready alwayes to give an answer to every man, that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you. As a man in duty ought to give a reason of the hope that is in him; so in duty he ought to give a reason of the sorrows, that are in him, and of the complaints that proceed from him: We must answer for our passions, as well as for our speeches; we must answer for our sorrows, and for our joyes, and for our fears, as well as for our hope, or for our faith. These must all be answered for; and when any shall charge us about any of these, we must be ready to give a reason of them (as the Apostle advises there, in the case of our hope) with meekness and fear.

It is our duty to answer thus, both in reference to our selves and others.

First, It is our duty in reference to our selves, that we may vindicate that which should be more precious to us then the Gold of Ophir, our own credit or sincerity; No man ought to despise his own integrity or reputation, so, as not to stand up for it. Therefore Job grows resolute in that point, professing that he would hold his integrity, till he died; he would never let that go, but answer stiffly for it: It is justice to dis-asperse our selves, and give witness to our own wronged innocency. A man is more bound in duty to stand up for himself, then for any other, by how much he is nearer to himself, then to others.

Secondly, It is our duty to answer in respect of others; (and that Job might have an eye unto) namely to satisfie those, who are scandalized, by what we have either done or spoken: Suppose it be not a scandal given, suppose it be only a scandal taken, as this of Job was: Job did nothing purposely to scandalize them, nor any thing, which upon a due consideration, was a scandal; but his friends had taken scandal at what he spake, his impatient complainings: therefore he was bound in duty to satisfie them, and to shew further grounds wherefore he so complained. Silence when we are charged, either makes a full conviction, or strengthens suspition: And in this case, if Job had held his peace, he had either yielded the cause, and confessed himself guilty, or at least his friends should have had cause to grow higher in their jealousies of his sincerity. To right our selves is not a point of indifferency, but of duty. Self-love is the rule of our love to others. He who neglects his own wronged honour, will not be very careful (which yet he ought) of his neighbours.

Si accusatus non respondeat, aut criminis convictus aut certè suspectas videatur. Pined.

O that my grief were thoughly weighed.

Grief may be considered two wayes, either Passively or Actively. Grief taken Passively is the thing which we suffer, or which is grievous to us; affliction it self is called Grief. Take Grief Actively, and then it is the sorrow we express, under the pressures of grievous afflictions. The word in the Hebrew is translated sometimes anger, sometimes indignation, sometimes wrath. It is the same which Eliphaz useth, Chap. 5. v. 5. where he saith, Wrath killeth the foolish man. Eliphaz began his speech with that word, hinting at Job, as if his wrath and impatience towards God had discovered him for a fool, or a wicked one: Now Job returning answer, begins with the first word of Eliphaz his speech; as if he had said, You told me that wrath kills the foolish man; but O that my anger, or the wrath which you conceive to be in me, that grief which I have expressed, were fully weighed, you would quickly see, that it is not the anger or wrath of a fool, you would find reason for my passion; and that, not the want of wisdom, but the plenty or weight of my grief hath wrought out these complaints. Therefore my desire is, O that my Grief, O that my sorrows poured forth in my former lamentation were throughly weighed; you have but guessed at them yet, you have not weighed them (which you ought) as you would weigh gold to a grain, or to the turning of a scale; or if so, your beam is not a true one, nor your ballance the ballance of the Sanctuary; you have weighed me, but by a common beam, or (I fear) by false ballances, and a bag of deceitful weights.

כַּעַשׂ Ira, indignatio, hoc loco, ira est querimonia valdè iracuoda vel molestia, quam ex morbi & ulceris gravitate concipiebat. Merc. Notat dolorem quem quis capit, ex re adversa & difficili. Cocc.

O that my Grief.] The Vulgar Latin translates, O that my sins, namely for which I am thus afflicted, were throughly weighed; as if the meaning of Job were to lighten his sin, and to aggravate his sufferings: But doubtless, that was none of Job's mind or meaning; neither will the original bear ſuch a tranſlation. When our ſins are put into the ballance with our ſufferings, all our ſufferings, the heavieſt we can feel or go under in this life, are but as a feather to a talent of lead. As all the afflictions of this life are light, in compariſon of that exceeding weight of glory, prepared for us in the next life: So all the ſufferings of this life are light, in compariſon of the exceeding weight of one ſin committed by us. Therefore Job makes ſuch compariſon here, as if he had been afflicted more then he deſerved. That of Ezra concerning the Church of the Jews, (Chap. 9. 13.) Thou our God haſt puniſhed us leſs then our iniquities deſerve, is true of every puniſhment; put any puniſhment of this world, Spiritual or Temporal, in one ſcale, and the leaſt ſin, in another, that lighteſt ſin outweighs our heavieſt puniſhments. Only in Hell ſins and ſufferings ſhall be of equal poyſe. God will then pour and meaſure our puniſhments, which ſhall come up to the proportion and dimenſion of our ſins; and what the creature cannot bear at once in weight, ſhall be weighed to him in eternity. But to paſs that rendring, as unſafe.

Vtinā peccata mea. Vulg.

O that my grief [were throughly Weighed.] Our Engliſh word, Scale, which is the inſtrument, by which we Weigh, is well conceived to come from the Hebrew word here uſed (Shakal) ſignifying to Weigh any thing; but eſpecially to Weigh Coyn or Money, to Weigh Gold and Silver; as Gen. 23. 16. Abraham upon the purchaſe of that field, which he bought of the Children of Heth, for a burying place, Weighed to Ephron the Silver which he had named. It was the cuſtom of thoſe times, inſtead of telling, to Weigh their Money, and that was the moſt exact and ready way of payment: And from that word (Shakal) ſignifying to Weigh Money, comes the Hebrew word for one ſpecial ſort of Money, the Shekel; becauſe they Weighed by the ſhekel, that being as their Standard or a ſpecial Coyn, of ſuch a known Weight and value, that all other Coyn was Weighed and valued by it. So in the Latine, and likewiſe in our Engliſh, we call one ſpecial ſum of Money A pound, which is a Weight, and by which Money is commonly accounted and paid. And hence by a Metaphor, this word ſignifies to judge or to conſider of a thing exactly and fully; becauſe of all matters that men Weigh, they will Weigh Gold and Silver moſt exactly; if a man Weigh Gold, he Weigheth it to a grain; if Gold want but the turning of the ſcale more then due Weight or allowance, it will not paſs, Iſa. 33. 18. Where is the Scribe, where is the Receiver; the Hebrew is, Where is the Weigher; that is, either the Spiritual Weigher, he that uſes to be exact in Weighing every tittle of the Law: Or, the Civil Weigher, becauſe they uſed to Weigh all the Money they received. So then, O that my grief were throughly Weighed; is as if he had ſaid, O that my grief were Weighed, as Gold and Silver is Weighed, Weighed exactly, to the leaſt, to the utmoſt, that you might fully know what it is.

Siclus moneta certi ponderis & omnium ponderũ regula.

Ubi legis verba ponderans. Sanc. Queſtor præfectus ærario militari. Jun.

The word ſingle by it ſelf, notes an exact examination by Weighing; but when (as here) the word is doubled, or (by an Hebraiſm) repeated, O that my grief in weighing were Weighed, it heightens and increaſes the ſence exceedingly: Hence we tranſlate, O that my grief were throughly Weighed; Weighed ſo as that there might be a clear diſcovery, how much my ſorrows Weigh. The doubling of a word, to this ſence, is very frequent in Scripture, I ſhall not need to inſtance: Take only that (Gen. 2. 17.) Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou ſhalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eateſt thereof, in dying thou ſhalt die, (that is) thou ſhalt ſurely die; So here, O that in weighing it were Weighed, that is, O that it were throughly and exactly Weighed.

Lay all together and it imports thus much; as if Job had ſaid, I would not have my ſorrows Weighed at a vulgar beam, or in ordinary ballances, I would not have the ſound or letter only of what I have ſpoken conſidered; but I deſire that you would take my complaints together, the words and the matter, and that you would Weigh all impartially, that you may come to a full underſtanding, what my condition is; and then ſurely you would give up a better judgement, and make a fairer interpretation of my words, then as yet you have put forth: Thus he ſpeaks alſo Chap. 31. 6. Let me be Weighed in an even ballance, that God may know my integrity. Uneven ballances will not make a perfect diſcovery: That which is falſe, cannot give a true report: Things and perſons act as they are; therefore Job deſireth to be Weighed in an even ballance, ſuch a beam will ſpeak the truth of my eſtate, both to God and man: God needs no means to make him know, he knows all immediately, and he Weighs by his eye, not one thing by another, but all things in themſelves: Job ſpeaks of God after the manner of men.

And my Calamity laid in the Ballances together.

My grief and my Calamity. Grief cauſed by my Calamity, and Calamity the cauſe of that grief.

My Calamity. The word ſignifies any troubleſom evil, ſad event or accident, vulgarly called a miſ-fortune; O that this ſad eſtate and condition wherein I am, were put into the Ballance.

The original for Ballances, is very obſervable: As there is much elegancy in the word by which the action, ſo, in this, by which the inſtrument of Weighing is expreſſed. It is found only in the Plural or Dual number, as many of that nature are: The ſame word in Hebrew, ſignifies alſo the Ears, which are the organ of hearing: and the reaſon of it is thus given, becauſe as the Tongue of the Ballance ſtands like a judge between the two ſcales, inclining to neither, till the weight be laid in: ſo ſhall the Ear of a Judge by Office, or of any man by Deputation, called to hear and determine of things in difference, ſtand indifferent to both parties, till he hear the matter debated, and the reaſons brought forth on either ſide. The Moraliſts embleme this, by the place of that Sign in the Zodiack, which they call the Virgin, ſtanding (according to the doctrine of Aſtronomers) between the Lion and the Ballances: The Lion bids Virgin Juſtice, be ſtout and fearleſs; the Ballances adviſe her to weigh the matter on both ſides, with moderation, and be cautious, neither inclining one-way nor other, but as the merit of the cauſe, fully heard, ſhall ſway her judgment.

Job deſires, that his Calamity might be laid thus in the Ballances before his ſentence: Laid, the word is, O that my Calamity might aſcend in the Ballances; and that manner of ſpeaking is uſed, either becauſe in weighing, the lighter ſcale of the Ballances doth aſcend, or becauſe when things are weighed, the Ballances aſcend or are lifted up. A man takes up the Ballances in his hand to weigh; ſo it is, as if he had ſaid, O that theſe, might be poiſed together and lifted up, to ſee which way the Scales will turn.

Together. There is ſome difference in opinion about the word Together, whether he meaneth thus; O that my grief and Calamity were Weighed; you conſider things to halves, and leave out thoſe points which are moſt weighty and material; you ſhould take in all together: Or whether his deſire be, that his grief and Calamity, both together, might be put into one Ballance, and the Sand of the Sea into another; and ſo an experiment be made, whether his grief and Calamity, or the Sand of the Sea were heavier. Or thirdly, Whether thus, that his grief ſhould be put into one Ballance, and his Calamity into another, and then trial be made which of theſe two were heavier, his grief and ſorrow, or his calamity and trouble. A learned Interpreter conceives, that Job wiſhes his Grief and Calamity might both together be put into one Ballance, and all the Sand of the Sea (if it were poſſible) in the other, ſuppoſing that his Grief and Calamity would out-weigh that vaſte ponderous aggrevated body. His opinion is chiefly ſtrengthned by ſome difficulties in the Grammatical conſtruction, unleſs this be admitted; and yet if it be, a greater difficulty is ſhewed by a ſecond, and therefore I rather take it thus; O that my Grief and Calamity were laid in the Ballances together; that is, O that my Grief were put, one into one Ballance, and my Calamity into another; or, O that my Grief might be weighed with my Calamity, and it would appear (notwithſtanding your judgment of me) that yet, there is nothing ſo much weight in my Grief, as there is in my Calamity; that is, I have not yet grieved or complained up to the height or weight of thoſe Calamities which are upon me: ſo that if my ſorrow were laid in one Ballance, and my affliction in another, my affliction would out-weigh my ſorrow, and it would appear, that I have complained, not only, not without a cauſe, but not ſo much as I had cauſe.

And

And to prove that his calamity was heavier then his grief, he adds in the next words; It (namely his calamity thus weighed) would be heavier then the sand of the sea: as if he had said, it is possible that in trying all heavy things, somewhat might be found heavier then my grief or my complaint hath been; but I am sure nothing can be found of equal weight with my calamity; for my calamity (which is the immediate antecedent) would be heavier then the sand of the Sea, then which nothing can be found more heavy.

That of David, Psal. 62. 9. is parallel to this expression in Job; Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie; to be laid in the balances, they are altogether lighter then vanity. The meaning is, that if men of all degrees, high and low, were put in one Scale, and vanity in another, vanity it self would be weightier then the graveſt and moſt weighty men. Hence ſome read, They together are lighter then vanity. Others to this ſence, men and vanity being weighed together, vanity will not be ſo light, as vain men. As David, to ſhew mans lightneſs, makes him lighter then the lighteſt thing, vanity. So Job, to ſhew the heavineſs of his calamity, makes it heavier then the heavieſt thing. Hence obſerve,

First, That, It is a duty to weigh the ſaddeſt eſtate, and afflicted condition of our Brethren thoroughly.

But (you will ſay) what is it to weigh them throughly? I anſwer, It is not only to weigh the matter of an affliction, to ſee what it is which a man ſuffers; but to weigh an affliction in every circumſtance and aggravation of it; The circumſtance of an affliction is often more conſiderable then the matter of the affliction. If a man would confeſs his ſins, and confeſs them throughly, he is to confeſs, not only the matter of them; as ſins are the tranſgreſſions of the Law, and and errors againſt the Rule; but he muſt eye the manner, in which ſin hath been committed, the circumſtances with which it is cloathed, theſe render his ſin out of meaſure, and out of weight ſinful. Likewiſe, would a man conſider the mercies and favours received from God, would he know them throughly, and ſee how much they weigh; let him look, not only what, but how, and when, and where, and by whom he hath received them. There may be (and often is) a great wickedneſs in a little evil committed, and a great mercy in a little good received. As relations, ſo circumſtances have the leaſt entity, but they have the greateſt efficacy. Now, as there is often more in the circumſtances, then in the matter of a ſin, or of a mercy; ſo, there is often more in the circumſtance, then there is in the matter of an affliction; therefore he that would throughly weigh the afflictions of another, muſt conſider all thoſe accidents, as well as the ſubſtance of it: As namely, the time when ſent, the time how long endured, whether a ſingle affliction, or in conjuncture with other afflictions, the ſtrength of the Patient, and the dependencies that are upon him.

Secondly, He that would weigh an affliction throughly, muſt put himſelf in the caſe of the afflicted, and (as it were) make anothers grief his own: He muſt act the paſſions of his brother, and a while perſonate the poor, the ſick, the afflicted man: He muſt get a taſte of the wormwood and of the gall upon which his Brother feedeth: In a word, he muſt lay ſuch a condition to heart. The Prophet Malachy threatens a curſe upon thoſe, who laid not the word and works of God to heart (chap. 2. 2.) I will curſe your bleſſings (ſaith the Lord) becauſe you do not lay it to heart; that is, ye do not conſider, what I ſay or do, throughly: God curſed them throughly, becauſe they would not throughly conſider his Laws and Judgments: So then, to weigh the affliction of another throughly, is to put our ſouls, as it were, in their ſouls ſtead. Hence, that we may be aſſured, Chriſt hath throughly weighed all our afflictions, he is ſaid to be afflicted in all our afflictions. He doth not only intuitively conſider or contemplate them, but he is (though above enduring) as actually enduring them, He is afflicted in all our afflictions, that is, he conſiders our afflictions as his own, and is affected with them, as if himſelf were pained with all our pains; and therefore it is ſaid, that himſelf took our infirmities, and bear our ſickneſſes, Mat. 8. 17. The meaning, is, he weighed the grief of his people fully. In theſe two points, this holy art of weighing grief, conſiſts; conſideration of circumſtances, and ſympathy of the ſmart. Meer ſpeculation moves little. We have no feeling of anothers ſuffering, till we have a fellow-feeling. The bare Theory of affliction affects no more, then the bare Theory of fire heats.

Secondly, When Job ſaith, O that my grief were throughly weighed; we may obſerve,

That, It is an addition to a mans affliction, when others are not ſenſible of his affliction.

For it is, as if Job had ſaid, This makes me cry out ſo much of the weight of my ſorrows, becauſe my friends weigh them ſo little. The Church (Lam. 1. 12.) complains thus, Is it nothing to you all ye that paſs by? behold and ſee if there be any ſorrow like unto my ſorrow. Is it nothing to you? as if the Church had ſaid, My affliction is ſomething to me, and this afflicts me above all my affliction, that paſſengers and beholders ſlight my calamities, and think my affliction no affliction, that is, not ſo great, as indeed it is: Or, it is nothing to them (they are not toucht with it) how great ſoever they ſee it is to me: That which wounds and breaks my heart, doth not prick their little fingers. And becauſe man is ſo ready to afflict his brother with this negative affliction, a not being ſenſible of his afflictions, therefore the Apoſtle aſſures us (Heb. 4. 15.) That we have not an High Prieſt that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are. This is ſpoken to comfort the Saints in their extreameſt ſufferings: What though men will not take notice and be ſenſible of your condition? what though men will not weigh your grief? Yet Chriſt will: Our high Prieſt is none of your ſenſleſs Prieſts, who care not what weather the people endure, ſo they be warm and at eaſe.

Thirdly obſerve, We can never rightly judge, till we throughly weigh the condition of an afflicted brother.

For Job conceived that Eliphaz proceeded to judgment, before he had been in conſideration. This is the reaſon why thou haſt judged me uncharitably, becauſe thou haſt not weighed me ſeriouſly. To ſhew, that conſideration muſt go before judgment, God himſelf is expreſt to us in Scripture, conſidering the ſtate of things, before himſelf judges. So, Gen. 11. in the caſe of the builders of Babel, and Gen. 18. in the caſe of the men of Sodom, it is ſaid, that the Lord came down to ſee whether they had done altogether according to that cry which was come up unto him; Not, as if the Lord moves from one place to another, from heaven to earth; for he filleth all places: not that the Lord needs come down to receive information, or to examine his own intelligences, to ſee whether things are, as they are reported; but it is only an alluſion to the manner of men; or to ſhew, that he doth not cenſure or judge any man, or men, or Nations, till he hath taken a full cognizance of their condition. Now, if God who is infinite in knowledge and wiſdom, repreſents himſelf coming down, and by degrees deliberating about, and weighing the eſtates of men, before he cenſures them; what need then have blindfold men, ignoant men, men, who at beſt, have much darkneſs mixed with their light; what need (I ſay) have they to examine, weigh and try every mans eſtate, before they ſentence or determine it?

Fourthly obſerve, A man, who hath not been, or is not afflicted himſelf, can hardly apprehend what another endures, who is under affliction.

As there are comforts, eſpecially ſpiritual comforts, which no man knows or can know, but by the enjoying of them: The white ſtone (promiſed Rev. 2. 17.) hath a new name written in it, which no man knows, ſaving he that receiveth it. A man that is a ſtranger to Chriſt and his wayes, is not able to make any judgment what the comforts and refreſhings of a Chriſtian are. He admires to hear men ſpeak of ſpiritual comforts and conſolations, he knows not the meaning of thoſe things. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned, 1 Cor. 2. 14. It is ſo (proportionably) in all ſorrows and afflictions, eſpecially in ſpiritual ſorrows and afflictions, which lie off from ſenſe; yea, which lie quite beyond the reach and borders of reaſon: ſpiritual ſorrows, the hidings of Gods face, the withdrawing of aſſiſtance, few pity in others, becauſe few have had experience of theſe things, in themſelves. They think men are mad, when they complain of ſuch afflictions; when they cry out of their ſins, of the want of the favour of God, and the ſhining of his love, of deadneſs and coldneſs in duty, of unbelief and hardneſs of heart, &c. And therefore our Lord Jeſus, to aſſure our hearts, that he hath a full ſenſe of all our ſorrows, taſted himſelf of our ſorrows. There is not any ſorrow that can be upon any ſoul, or any affliction that can be upon the body, but our Lord Jeſus hath had (ſome way or other) an experience of it: This makes him (to our apprehenſions) moſt fit to judge and compaſſionate the diſtreſſes of his people. As all the ſins of his people were laid upon him, ſo all their ſorrows were laid upon him too; therefore the Prophet Iſaiah deſcribeth him thus, Chap. 53. 3. A man of ſorrows, and acquainted with grief; grief and he were no ſtrangers; while he was here upon the earth, grief was his Acquaintance and Familiar (as it were) that went up and down with him, all the while he travelled here below. Therefore ſeeing it is ſo, the whole Church and every particular Believer, have ſtrong conſolation in their ſorrows, that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt doth throughly weigh their condition, and knoweth fully what it is; We have not (as was toucht before) an High Prieſt which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; Why, what aſſurance have we of this? It follows, He was tempted in all things like unto us, yet without ſin, Chriſt had temptations unto ſin, yet without ſin; therefore he knows how to ſuccour us, when we are tempted unto ſin: Chriſt was tempted by manifold ſorrows, therefore he knows how to ſuccour us, when we are under manifold temptations: If we had a Mediator in Heaven that had not been tempted on earth, we might doubt whether he would be toucht with the feeling of our infirmities. whether ſinning infirmities, or ſorrowing infirmities. And were it not, that ſome of the Saints have been tempted and tried, they, who are under trials and temptations, would find none on earth to ſuccour them. As God doth comfort ſome in all their tribulations, that they may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, with the ſame comforts wherewith they themſelves are comforted of God, 2 Cor, 1. 4. So he afflicts them, that they might pity and help others, as being under the ſame troubles, with which themſelves have been afflicted. A man that hath only travelled in Geographical Books and Maps, is not able to give you ſuch lively deſcriptions of, or directions about foreign Countreyes, as he hath travelled to, and been upon the places; ſo, they who have read and ſtudied much about afflictions, can never give ſuch enlivening, ſtrengthening, heartning counſel, as they who have been afflicted, and have dwelt ſometime upon the Land of ſorrows. To paſs on,

For now it would be heavier then the ſand of the Sea.

That is, it would be moſt heavy. Who can tell how heavy that is, which is heavier then the heavieſt?

If my calamity (ſaith Job) were weighed, it would have been found heavier then the ſand of the ſea, that account would be given of it; though you (my friend Eliphaz) ſeem to account it as light as a feather.

The ſand of the Sea is applied three wayes in Scripture.

Firſt, To ſet forth an exceeding great number (Gen. 22. 17.) I will multiply thy ſeed as the Stars of the Heaven, and as the ſand which is upon the Sea-ſhore: That is, I will exceedingly multiply thy ſeed, thy Children ſhall be not only numerous, but numberleſs; though a Book of Numbers be written concerning Abraham's poſterity, yet their total number is not written. So (Pſal. 78. 27.) He rained fleſh upon them as duſt, and feathered fowls like as the Sand of the Sea, that is, he rained abundance of feathered Fowls.

Secondly, The Sand of the Sea is uſed to expreſs the largeneſs, the mighty extent or capacity of a thing; the ſand of the Sea is of a vaſter extent then the Sea it ſelf, as being the outward line or bound of it; therefore (Jer. 33. 22.) it is ſpoken of, as a thing impoſſible, for the ſand of the Sea to be meaſured; As the hoſt of heaven (ſc. the Stars) cannot be numbred, neither the ſand of the Sea meaſured, ſo will I multiply the ſeed of my ſervant David. Meaſure is taken both of the content and extent of things: The ſand of the Sea is immeaſurable both wayes; it cannot (as we ſpeak of humane impoſſibles) be meaſured by the Pole, or by the Veſſel. And in 1 Kings 4. 29. it is ſaid, God gave Solomon wiſdom and underſtanding exceeding much, and largeneſs of heart as the ſand of the Sea, that is, as the ſand encompaſſes and takes the Sea in its arms; ſo Solomon had a heart comprehending all the depths and oceans of knowledge; he had the compaſs of all learning in his underſtanding. Hence, when a man attempts a thing impoſſible, we ſay to him proverbially, Thou meaſureſt the ſand.

Thirdly, The ſand of the Sea is applied in Scripture, to note the exceeding weight and heavineſs of a thing: That inſtance is pregnant for it (Prov. 23. 7.) A ſtone is heavy, and the ſand is weighty, but a fools wrath is heavier then both; when Solomon would ſhew us how intolerably burdenſom the manners of a wicked man are, he compares them to a ſtone, and to the ſand: The wrath of a wicked man is very weighty, but (by the way) the wrath of God is incomparably more weighty. Wrath proceeding from extream folly, is weighty; but wrath proceeding from infinite wiſdom, is infinitely weighty. The wrath of a fool upon his brother, is heavier then a ſtone, or then the ſand; how heavy then will the wrath of the moſt wiſe God be upon that fool?

It is further conſiderable, that, he ſaith not barely, heavier then the ſand (any ſand is very heavy, but) heavier then the ſand of the ſea. Rivers have ſand, and dry pits have ſand, but ſea-ſand is the vaſteſt and the heavieſt ſand.

Again, He ſpeaks not in the ſingular number, Heavier then the ſand of the ſea; but (the Hebrew is plural) heavier then the ſand of the Seas: as if Job had ſaid, if thou ſhouldeſt ſhovel up all the ſand that is upon the ſhores of all the Seas, together on a heap, it would not be ſo heavy as my calamity: In ſuch Hyperbolies or high ſtrains of eloquence, Job rhetoricates about his ſad condition, as if he reſolved to put more weight into his expreſſions, as he found more weight put into his afflictions.

Hence obſerve, Afflictions are heavy burdens.

The judgments of God upon wicked men, are frequently in Scripture called burdens; and they are heavy burdens, Iſa. 15. 1. We read of the burden of Moab; that is, the judgment and calamity that ſhould fall upon Moab. &, Iſ. 17. 1. The burden of Damaſcus. &, Iſa. 19. 1. The burden of Egypt. & Iſa. 21. 1. The burden of the Deſart of the Sea. And afterwards, The burden of the valley of Viſion, that is, of Jeruſalem. &, (2 Kings 9. 25.) When Jehu had killed Jehoram, he ſaid to Bidkar his Captain, Take him up, and caſt him in the portion of the field of Naboth the Jezreelite; for remember, how that when I and thou rode together after Ahab his Father, the Lord laid this burden upon him, that is, that he ſhould be ſlain, and thrown out in this manner. As afflictions upon wicked men are burdens, ſo, afflictions upon the godly are burdens too; they are alſo heavy burdens (Their ſins are burdens upon them; My ſins (ſaith David) are gone over my head, they are a burden too heavy for me to bear, Pſal. 28. 4. Their ſins are burdens, and their ſorrows are burdens. Sin doth not only burden man, but it burdens God: I am preſſed under your ſins, as a cart is preſſed that is full of ſheaves, ſaith God; Amos 2. 13. As man, by ſin burdens God, ſo God, by affliction burdens man. But of all afflictions, inward afflictions are the greateſt burdens: As the ſpirit of a man is ſtronger than his fleſh, ſo the afflictions which are upon his ſpirit, are weightier then thoſe that are upon his fleſh: The Spirit hath wonderful ſtrength; all ſpirits are ſtrong; Angels are mighty in ſtrength: One good Angel is an over-match for all men. And the Devils (who are Spirits) are called not only Principalities, but Powers; becauſe of their ſtrength. Proportionably, the ſpirit of a man hath a mighty ſtrength it; and ſo the afflictions, which are upon the ſpirit, may have a greater weight in them. The affliction which Job complains of, as heavier then the ſand, was not ſo much the calamity that preſſed his fleſh, or the pain that tormented his body (as is plain in the next verſe) but it was the calamity of his ſpirit, the affliction lying there; A man can ſuſtain his infirmity, but a wounded ſpirit (that is, when a man hath got a blow, a wound, an affliction upon his ſpirit) who can bear? Prov. 18. 14. As if Solomon had ſaid, I challenge all the world to find me out a man, that can bear a burdened, wounded ſpirit; unleſs Chriſt put under his hand, no ſtrength of mans ſpirit can bear bear the burden of a wounded ſpirit: A ſpirit hath no weight at all, only fleſhly and material ſubſtances are ponderous; but a wounded ſpirit is heavier then wounded fleſh. The ſpirit is ſtrong enough to bear the burdened fleſh, but nothing in fleſh can bear a burdened ſpirit.

In the cloſe of the verſe, we have the effect of this heavy weight of affliction, both ſpiritual and corporal.

Therefore (ſaith he) my words are ſwallowed up. That is, I want words to expreſs my grief. (a) All Language is too narrow for the vaſtneſs of my ſorrows.

Some read it (b) Therefore my words are bitter; or, therefore my words are ſteeped in bitterneſs; as if he had ſaid, I my ſelf feed upon bitter things, I feed upon Gall and Wormwood, therefore no wonder if my words taſte of them.

The Vulgar goes farther from the Letter of the Text, rendring (c) Therefore my words are full of ſorrow; as if he had ſaid, the ſorrows which are in my mind, flow out upon my Tongue.

The Septuagint yet further off (d). Therefore it ſeems my words are evil, or ill taken. My grief renders my words more liable to exception or miſ-interpretation.

Mr. Broughton tranſlates, Therefore my words come ſhort; there is a weight upon me heavier then the ſand of the ſea; Therefore my words come ſhort, or my expreſſions come not up to my intention. We tranſlate near that ſence, and anſwerably to the Original, My words are ſwallowed up.

The Hebrew word ſignifies to lick up, or to ſwallow down, and by a Metaphor to deſtroy or conſume; in the Propheſie of Obadiah, v. 16. the word is uſed to that purpoſe, They ſhall drink, and they ſhall ſwallow down: And, Prov. 20. 25. It is a ſnare to the man, who devoureth that which is holy, or who ſwalloweth down that which is holy; ſo here, Therefore my words are ſwallowed up; that is, when I would ſpeak, my words are, as it were, half-eaten before ſpoken; or my words are ſnatcht down in the ſpeaking, by the ſharp teeth and devouring ſtomach of my grief and ſorrows.

Others from the Letter read, Therefore my words are corrupted, wearied, loſt, blotted, blubbered, ſo cut off, that I cannot ſpeak diſtinctly, alluding unto thoſe that ſtammer. A ſtammerer is in ſuch haſte to ſpeak, that he eats his words, and (as we uſe to ſay proverbially in our Language) he clips the Kings Engliſh, he ſwalloweth up half his mind, when he would bring it out in words; ſuch is the meaning of Job, My words are ſwallowed up, I cannot ſpeak all; my grief takes me off, and cuts me ſhort. And ſo he ſeems to excuſe himſelf.

Firſt, In caſe he had ſpoken abruptly and brokenly, my pain hath been ſo great, that I can hardly ſpeak, therefore take no advantage of the abrupt language and broken ſentences, which have fallen from me; for the truth is, my grief hath ſwallowed up my words. I have rather ſighed, then declared my mind; real ſorrow, as well as poetical paſſionate imitation of ſorrow, makes many an (Apoſtopeſis, or) ſudden ſtop and breach, when the tongue is upon its ſwifteſt ſpeed, and quickeſt motion.

And ſecondly, He ſeems to excuſe himſelf for the matter of his ſpeech; I have not yet ſpoken all my mind, I have not yet given you my full ſence, about my condition; for through grief, I was forced to ſwallow up my words, and to ſuppreſs what I had further to ſay. Therefore ſuppoſe my ſpeech hath been imperfect, yet be not ſcandalized at it; for if you will have patience to ſtay, I ſhall anon bring up the words again which my ſorrows have ſnatcht from me, and ſwallowed down. Stay a while, and you ſhall hear more, you ſhall hear all; I will ſpeak more largely and more diſtinctly then I have done. One of the Rabbins takes the word actively, and refers the act of ſwallowing to Job's Friends: as if he had ſaid, Ye, my friends, have ſwallowed down my words; ye have not leiſurely fed upon and digeſted them, but ſwallowed them in ſuch haſte, that ye have not taſted them. As a man that ſwallows down a morſel greedily, without chewing, never taſtes either the ſweetneſs or the bitterneſs of it. It is a uſual Metaphor to expreſs hearing by eating; and we have it (as many interpret) at the ſixth verſe of this Chapter, Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt? It is a truth, that when words are thus ſwallowed or gobled down, we take not out the ſtrength or intent of them. But I ſtay not upon this expoſition, becauſe it ſtrains too hard upon the Grammatical conſtruction, and other circumſtances of the Text.

Obſerve out of the former meaning,

Firſt, Great grief interrupteth ſpeech; and makes broken Language.

Therefore my ſpeech or my words are ſwallowed up. As ſometimes our words devour, ſo ſometimes our words are devoured; ſome men ſpeak ſwallowing words, and others ſwallow their words (Pſal. 57. 4.) Thou loveſt all devouring words; or thou loveſt all ſwallowing words, O thou deceitful tongue! There are ſwallowing words, as well as ſwallowed words. Malice makes a man ſwallow the integrity of another with his words; and grief will make a man ſwallow down his own words, ſo that he cannot ſpeak to maintain his own integrity.

Secondly obſerve, That, Some afflictions exceed all complaints, and are too big for expreſſion.

That Note reaches Mr. Broughton's ſence, my words come ſhort of what my condition is; there is no language large enough, no Oratory eloquent enough to deſcribe or make known my ſorrows.

Laſtly obſerve, Not to be able to expreſs our grief, is an encreaſe of our grief.

Therefore my words are ſwallowed up. This is an addition to my ſorrows, that I cannot make known my ſorrows. It is a great part of my trouble, that I can tell you but a part of my trouble. Let a man be hindered from expreſſing his grief, either through want of power, or through the reſtraint of power; both wayes grief encreaſes. Some, who have been dying upon cruel Racks, or under bloody tortures, have yet eſteemed this beyond all their tortures, that they might not freely ſpeak out their minds and ſorrows: to have their mouths ſtopt, was worſe to them, then to have their breath ſtopt. It is a pain to be kept from ſpeaking. To command a man to ſwallow or eat down his words, is next to the command of eating and ſwallowing down his own fleſh. The cruelty of a diſeaſe may gagg a man, as well as the cruelty of a Tyrant; ſuch is my grief, that my words are ſwallowed up.

Apud Sophoclem Electra fœlicem vocat Niobem, cui lugere filiorum interitum permiſſum eſt, cum id ſibi matris crudelitas negaverit.

VERS. 4, 5, 6, 7.

For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poyſon whereof drinketh up my ſpirit; the terrors of God do ſet themſelves in array againſt me.
Doth the wild Aſs bray when he hath graſs? or loweth the Ox over his fodder?
Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt? or is there any taſte in the white of an egg?
The things that my ſoul refuſed to touch, are as my ſorrowful meat?

JOB continueth his Reply and his Complaint. He had expreſt the greatneſs of his calamity, by comparing it with the ſand of the ſea for weightineſs; now he proceeds in the ſame ſad aggravation, by comparing it to an arrow for ſharpneſs, and to an army for terribleneſs: For the arrows of the Almighty are within me; the terrors of the Lord ſet themſelves in array againſt me.

We are in this verſe to open a quiver full of poyſoned arrows, and to marſhal an Army full of divine terrors; The arrows of the Almighty, &c.

An arrow is a deadly engine, ſo called in the Hebrew, from its effect, cutting or wounding. Being taken properly, it is an inſtrument ſhot out of a Bow, of wood or iron, either for ſport or fight: But here figuratively. And arrows in Scripture, are taken in a figure divers wayes.

Firſt, For the Word of God, Pſal. 45. 5. Thine arrows are ſharp in the heart of the Kings enemies, whereby the people fall under thee: That is, thy words are ſharp and piercing, whereby thou convinceſt and beateſt down ſin and ſinners, either converting or deſtroying them. The Rider on the white Horſe, going out conquering, and to conquer, (who

(who is conceived to be Truth, or the Word of God triumphing) is described, with a Bow in his hand, Rev. 2. 6.

Secondly, Arrows are put for the bitter and reproachful words of men, Psal. 64. 3, 4. & Psal. 120. 4. They bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words.

Thirdly, For any evil or mischievous purpose, which a man intends or aims to the hurt of his brother, Psal. 58. 7. When he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows, let them be as cut in pieces. Bending of the bow, notes the preparing and setting of mischief: The arrow shot out of this bent bow, is the mischief acted and finished (Psal. 2.) The wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string; that is, they prepare mischiefs against their neighbour.

Fourthly, For any kind of affliction, judgment or punishment, Zech. 9. 14. And the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning. Particularly,

1. For Famine, Ezek. 5. 16. When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine.

2. For Pestilence, Psal. 91. 5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that fleeth by day. What the terror and the arrow are, is explained in the next verse; which is not an addition of other evils, from which safety is promised, but an explication of the same. The pestilence that walks in darkness, and the destruction (being the same pestilence) wasting at noon-day. The meaning of all is, Thou shalt be kept or antidoted against the Plague both night and day.

3. Those Thunder-bolts and hailstones, which God sends out of the Magazine of heaven, and discharges in his wrath against wicked men, are called the arrows of his indignation, 2 Sam. 22. 15. Psal. 144. 6. & Hab. 3. 11. compared with Josh. 10. 11.

Further, The arrows of God signifie inward afflictions, troubles of the mind and spirit; God often shoots an arrow, which pierces into the very soul. It was said of Joseph, The Iron entred into his soul. And it is (in this sence) very usual for the arrows of God to enter into the souls of his people (Psal. 38. 1, 2.) O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath, &c. For thine arrows stick fast in me: Where stuck they? He means it not of his body haply; the skin of that was not razed. There is an arrow, which touches not the sides, but sticks fast in the soul of a Child of God.

Understand it here of the arrows of affliction; and those either external, outward calamities, fastning in the flesh of Job; or internal, galling him to the soul and spirit. Therefore he saith, The Arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poyson whereof drinketh up my spirit.

He vel latèri lethalis arundo.

These Arrows are described in the Text two wayes.

1. From the Efficient cause. The Arrows of the Almighty.
2. From the Effect. They drink up my spirit.

They are the arrows of the Almighty, Shaddai. Of which word we have spoken in the former Chapter, ver. 17. at large, it being one of the names of God, noting out his power and omnipotency; there he calls them the chastnings of (Shaddai) the Almighty; and here, The Arrows of (Shaddai) the Almighty.

First, Because they are sent out from him. His arm bends and draws the Bow. And,

Secondly, Because of the mighty force and strength, in which they are sent home to the mark. The strength in which these arrows come, and the depth of the wound which they make, speak an Almighty arm to draw the Bow. None but an almighty arm can shoot an arrow thus deep, up to the feathers in the soul and spirit. It is not in the power of all the tyrants in the world to strike or shoot thus deep. The soul of a Saint hath such armour upon it, as no bodily weapon can enter. And therefore the Martyrs, when all was wound in their flesh, spoke and triumphed, because their spirits were whole and untoucht. Only a Spirit can shoot Arrowes in our spirits.

Pottæ deos arcu, jaculis, sagittisque armant, intelligentes quas inferunt mortalibus clades quæ ferium eminus quod proprium Dei viderur Bold.

We find it frequent among Heathen Poets and others, to describe their gods armed with bows and arrows. And in that they shadowed their power to wound the minds of men, and to wound them suddenly and secretly. The Scripture describes the true God thus, furnished with his quiver of arrows, and his bow (Psal. 7, 13.) He ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors. God hath an arrow for the wounding of his enemies, and an arrow for the wounding of his friends. He hath arrows for both, and both are wounded, with poysoned fiery arows; yet, with a vast difference: these are wounded and poysoned that they may be healed, and they are wounded and poysoned that they may be destroyed.

Arrows are { 1. Swift, 2. Secret, 3. Sharp, 4. Killing } Instruments.

I will make mine arrows drunk with blood (Deut. 32. 42.) They are instruments drawing blood, and drinking blood, even unto drunkenness; afflictions are like arrows in all these properties:

First, Afflictions often come very speedily, with a glance, as an arrow, quick as a thought.

Secondly, Afflictions come suddenly, unexpectedly; an arrow is upon a man afore he is aware, so are afflictions. Though Job saith, the thing he feared came upon him, he looked for this arrow before it came; yet usually afflictions are unlooked for guests, they thrust in upon us, when we dream not of them.

Thirdly, They come with little noise; an arrow is felt, before, or as soon as, it is heard; an arrow flies silently and secretly, stealing upon, and wounding a man, unobserved, and unseen.

Lastly, All afflictions are sharp, and in their own nature killing and deadly. That any have good from them, is from the grace of God, not from their nature.

The poyson whereof drinketh up my spirit.

There's the effect of his afflictions. Some read it, The fury or anger whereof drinketh up my spirit. It may be called the fury and anger of an arrow, because the arrow is often sent in fury and in anger. We read also of the fire of an arrow, or of a fierie arrow (Psal. 76. 4.) There breakest thou the arrows of the bow. Arrows even firing themselves by the swiftness of their motion.

The word of the Text is derived from a root, signifying to wax very hot, and in the Nown, heat. Hence by a Metaphor it signifies anger, because angry men wax hot; Anger is breathed fire (Isa. 42. 12.) Therefore he hath poured upon them the fury of his anger, and the strength of battel, and it hath set him on fire round about. Fire and fury are near in name and in nature. When fury burns within, fire quickly burns without; and so by a Metonymie the same word signifies poison; the reason is, because poisons heat and enflame; poisons enflame the flesh, and (as it were) set the body on fire, or; because an angry man (like an angry Serpent) seems to breath out fire, or spit poison. Paul, before his conversion, breathed threatnings, fire and sword, against the Church, Acts 9. 1. And therefore, either way, the word is well rendred, The anger whereof, or, the poyson whereof drinketh up my spirit. And in the Greek, the same word signifies anger and poison; because of that inflammation which is about the heart of a man throughly angry.

Venenatis gravida sagittis pharetra Hor. Qui mortiferis sævo gemine nent ut vaginera cassa. Omnia vipereo spicula felle linunt. Ovid. l. 1. de Pont. 6.

In these words, Job seems to allude to the custom of cruel savage men, who, when they pursued their enemies with deadly hatred, and would wound them to death, used to dip the head of their arrows, the top of their spears, or the point of their swords, or whatsoever weapon they fought with, in poison, that so every wound might be a death; the poison of such an arrow, spear or sword, drinks up the spirit, and corrupts the blood presently. Some poison strikes the heart, almost as soon as the weapon strikes the arm. Job compares the arrows which God shot into him, not to ordinary arrows, which kill only by piercing, but, to poisoned arrows, which kill by infecting; as if God had set himself to the utmost, to pour out the fiercenes of his indignation upon him; not only shooting an arrow, but an arrow dipt in poison, such an arrow, as the most barbarous and cruel men shoot at their most professed and mortal enemies.

Mos erat Persarum ut ponerent venenum in sagittis suis. R. Solom. רוחו

Drinketh up my spirit.] Poison gets quickly to the spirit, and there drinks; poison is subtle and spiritful, and therefore (if I may so speak) incorporates with that which is most subtle in man, his spirit. Flat, pal'd, grosse, or dreggish liquor will not quench the fiery thirst of poison; it drinks drinks nothing but pure spirits; yet some read, It drinketh up my blood; but this amounts to the same sence, for the spirit of a living creature is in the blood: the spirits swim in the blood.

There are different opinions about this spirit, or what we are to understand by it.

First, Some take spirit here, for the breath, or for the act of breathing; as if he had said, I have received so many wounds by these poisoned arrows, that I begin to faint, and cannot draw my breath; these arrows sup up my spirit, and by wounding, stop my breath.

Secondly, Others understand it more generally, taking spirit for his strength and vigor; spirits are so strong, that they are put for strength. The Egyptians are men, and not God, and their horses flesh, and not spirit (Isa. 31. 3.) that is, they are not strength, but weakness. So here, It drinketh up my spirit, that is, the strength that is in me, all the powers and abilities of body and soul, are wasted and consumed; these calamities spend upon my spirit, where the stock of my strength is laid up, or which is the lock wherein my strength lies.

A third apprehends, that by spirit, he means his judgment, reason and understanding; as if he had said, shower, and arrows and troubles come so thick upon me, that, they even darken my mind, and drink up the strength of my understanding; hence I may seem to speak distractedly, unadvisedly, weakly: I have not that spirit to quicken, that strength of reason to judge, which formerly I had; the pains of my body disable and distemper my mind; and therefore if I have spoken any thing below what I ought, it is, because I am cast below what I was.

The terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.

Arrows and terrors are the same thing, in a different cloathing of words; or the arrow is the affliction it self, and the terrour is the effect or consequent of it. The word here used for Terrour, notes the most terrible terrour or affrightment. Terrour is the extream of fear, or fear confused into amazement and astonishment: Death is therefore called the King of terrors, because there are so many powerful terrors in death, Psal. 55. 4. That vexation which Saul felt, when God sent out an evil spirit with commission to vex him, is expresst by this word, 1 Sam. 16. 14. An evil spirit from the Lord, troubled, or terrified him: Such terrors, for the matter, such for the manner and present workings of them, seized upon upright-hearted Job, and false-hearted Saul. A believer, a child of God, an heir of heaven, may feel himself haunted and pierced with hellish terrors.

These are called the Terrors of God, either, first, By a common Hebraism; because great and strange terrors. In that Language, God is often put as an Epithete, to shew exceeding greatness, himself being the greatest. So chap. 1. 16. Fire of God, &c. Secondly, Terrors of God, because he sent and commanded that army of terrors. When Jacob journeyed with his little Army, Gen. 35. 5. It is said, The terror of God was upon the Cities round about, and they pursued them not; that is, the Lord sent an army of terrors to oppose the Cities, lest they should arm against Jacob. The terror of man is very terrible, and therefore the Apostle arms the Saints against it, 1 Pet. 3. 14. Be not afraid of their terror. The terror of God is infinitely greater; and therefore upon the Apostle argues, 2 Cor. 5. 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perswade men.

Those terrors of God may be taken two wayes; either actively or passively; actively, for that work of God, in terrifying and troubling. Thy terrors, that is the terrors which thou didst afflict me with; or passively, for those afflictions which oppress the mind; when God leads that army against us, sets it in array to charge, and commands it to encamp about us; in either sence we may take this of Job, as also that of Heman, Psal. 88. 15. While I suffer thy terrors, I am distracted.

Further, There is a twofold terror; First, caused by outward imminent danger. Secondly, caused by inward guilt. Or, Terror comming from the wrath of man, and terror coming from the wrath of God. Thus it was threatned, Lev. 26. 16. I also will do even this unto you, I will appoint over you terrors, Deut. 32. 25. The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy both the young man and the virgin, that is, fear shall kill those who escape the sword. A people cannot stand before an Army of men, who are once surprized with an army of terrors. Hence, Josh. 2. 9. Your terror is fallen upon us, saith Rahab, to assure the spies, that the Canaanites could not stand before the people of Israel.

Again, The terrors of God afflict the soul, First, When sin is set openly (to the eye of Conscience) in array against us. An Army of sins are an Army of terrors. The Church is called, Terrible as an army with Banners, Cant. 6. 10. when she is strengthened and armed for the exercise of all that power which Christ hath given her; and when our sins stand before us, are in all that strength which the Law hath given them, they also are terrible as an army with banners.

Secondly, When God hides his face from us, an army of terrors quickly faces us; though an army of sins come out in array against us, yet if God appear to us, in the fulness and freeness of his Grace; if Christ our Captain will but lead us on against this army, we shall quickly overcome them, or they will flie before us: But an army of sins is exceeding terrible, when Christ appears not in the field for us, or when God hides his face from us, and leaves us in the dark. It is usual in Scripture, to set forth terrors, as the effect of that darkness, and the hidings of the face of God. Naturally, terror accompanies darkness; children are afraid in the dark, and not only children, but men. Histories tell us of great Emperors, who durst not be in the dark for fear. And as natural terrors meet us in natural darkness, so spiritual terrors, in spiritual darkness: When the light of Gods countenance is clouded, and (as it were) benights the soul, then terror takes hold upon us. Under either of these notions we may understand the terrors of this Text; The terrors of God do set themselves in array against me. It was true in respect of outward troubles, they were very terrible; but especially in regard of inward troubles; when God sets his sins in array before him, or hid his face, and obstructed the course of his wonted communion.

Set themselves in array against me.

The Original imports, a very exact, curious, artificial ordination and disposal of things; as if the Lord had even studied to be exact and exquisite in afflicting Job, he puts his sorrows into a method, and his troubles into order. The Providence of God observes a rule, and is harmonious in those things which appear to us a chaos, a heap of confusion.

The word is applied, First, To the ordering of speech or disputations: There is a kind of embattelling in disputation, when it is regular and artificial (Job 32. 14.) Now he hath not directed his speech against me (saith Elihu) concerning Job; As if he said, Job hath not marshalled his Arguments against me, but all the charge hath been upon you.

Secondly, I find the word used in reference unto prayer: Prayer ought to be full of holy order and composedness (Psal. 5. 3.) In the morning will I direct my prayer to thee, and look up. In the morning will I put my prayer in array, I will posture my prayer in a gracious order, my heart in order, and my words in order; every petition shall (as it were) keep rank and file, when I am seeking unto God: Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter any thing before God, is the counsel of the holy Ghost by Solomon, Eccles. 5. 2.

But properly, the word is applied to the marshalling and embattelling of an Army (Jer. 50. 9.) Lo, I will raise, and cause to come up against Babylon, an assembly of great Nations from the North-Country, and they shall set themselves in array against her, &c.

So then, whereas Job saith, The terrors of God are set in array against me, he would intimate, that God afflicted him, both orderly and resolvedly. It was not some confused terror, or sudden surprizal; but the Lord God, like some great Commander or General, mustered and marshalled his Army, and led it up exactly form'd to a pitcht battel against him.

Observe from hence, First, Afflictions come sometimes by multitudes.

You

Bellum atq; virum.

You shall have a whole Army of them together: Sometime we see a duel or single combate, one man match with one trouble; here a man and an affliction, there a man and an affliction; but another time we may see, a man and an Army (as he spake in the story, when one made good a pass against a whole host of the enemy) in the spiritual War, one soul grapples with a multitude of troubles and conflicts with a thousand temptations: As there are legions of evil spirits, so legions of spiritual evils assaulting at once.

Observe Secondly, God sometimes appears as an enemy to his own servants.

The terrors of God, and the arrows of God (saith Job) God shoots the arrows, and sets the terrors in array; Job expected favour and succor from God, but he finds terrors and arrows: Those wounds make our hearts bleed most, which we apprehend given us from his anger, whom we have chosen as our only friend. The Church had that apprehension of God (Lam. 3. 3.) Surely against me is he turned, he turneth his hand against me all the day. The Church speaks as if God were quite changed, as if he having been her friend, were now turned enemy. So Job, I that was wont to have showers of sweet mercies, shot and darted into my soul, now feel deadly arrows there, shot from the same hand; my spirit was wont to drink in the pleasant influences of Heaven; but now poyson drinks up my spirits. I was wont to walk safe, under the guard of divine favours, but now divine terrors assault me on every side.

Observe Thirdly, When God appeareth an enemy, man is not able to hold out any longer.

See, how Job (poor soul) cries out as soon as he found, that these were Gods arrows, and Gods terrors. Job was a man at arms, a man of valour, and of an undaunted courage; a man that had been in many skirmishes with Satan, and had often, through the power of God, foiled him, and come off with victory, Caldeans and Sabeans, were (indeed) too hard for his servants, and conquer'd his cattel, yet the spirit of Job beat those bands of robbers, and triumphed over them; but he was never in battel with God before, and perceiving now God himself to appear as an enemy in the field, he cries out, O the terrors of God, O the arrows of the Almighty. When God is angry, no man can abide it; (2 Cor. 5. 11.) Knowing the terror of the Lord, we perswade men: We (saith the Apostle) who have felt by experience, or by faith have understood the terror of the Lord: we knowing it experimentally, or knowing it believingly; we being fully perswaded, that the terror of the Lord is most terrible, perswade men; O take heed you put not your selves under the terror of the Lord, or provoke the terror of the Lord against your selves. Those terrors of the Lord which come from pure wrath, are altogether intollerable: And those which come from love, and are set in array by the infinite wisdom, and gracious providence of God, ordering all things for good (to his) in the issue, even those are very dreadful; no man, not the holiest of men (and they are the strongest in this war) are able to stand before them; Psal. 38. 2. Thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore, there is no soundness in my flesh by reason of thine anger: that is, I am as a man, who hath not a whole piece of skin all his body over, all is a wound; or I am as one, whose flesh is all rotten by reason of his wounds. As Ely speaks to his sons, 1 Sam. 2. 25. If one man sin against another, the Judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall intreat for him? So, we may say on the other side, if man contend with man, some one may help him, he may have a Second to relieve him; but if once a man be contending with God, who will be his Second? who will undertake for him? who can come in, to the rescue, when God is fighting and contending with us? We wrastle not against flesh and blood (saith the Apostle, Ephes. 6. 12. when he would shew, what a terrible thing it is to wrastle with the Devil) but against principalities and powers, against spiritual wickednesses in high places. Flesh and blood is no match for a Spirit, though a created Spirit, though an unclean Spirit, a Devil; how then shall flesh and blood be able to wrastle with the creating Spirit; with him, who is a most holy Spirit; with God, who is The Principality, The Power, The High, The Strong, The Almighty, Shaddai. In other battels it is man with man, or at worst, man with Devils; but here it is man with God, weakness and frailty, contending with Omnipotency: and therefore when once God appears against the soul, the soul can hold out no longer; His anger, who is the Spirit, quickly drinks up our spirits.

Observe Fourthly, Inward wounds and terrors are most terrible.

Do not think that the soars upon Job's body, fetcht all these complaints from him. He shews you now, what it was that made him complain indeed; The arrows of the Almighty are within me, the terrors of God set themselves in array against me. As the joyes and exultations of the spirit do infinitely exceed all the pleasures which come in from the senses, all bodily pleasures: so the troubles and afflictions, which are upon the spirit, infinitely exceed all the troubles and afflictions which fall upon the body. As God hath such comforts, such joyes to bestow upon his people, as the world can neither give nor take away; so likewise, he hath terrors and troubles, which all the world is not able to remove or mitigate: There are no medicines in the whole circuit of nature, that can heal a wounded spirit; All your friends, all your relations, all your riches, yea all your natural wisdom, will be but as the white of an egg to your taste, in the day when God smites the heart with these terrors.

Tanto pœna intolerabilior, quanto spiritus corpore subtilior.

These arrows and terrors, are often preparatory to conversion; when some men are over-come to receive Christ, an Army of terrors is sent out, to take them captive, and bring them in. There are many (I grant) whom God wounds with love, he shoots an arrow of favour into their hearts, and overcomes them with Troops of mercies. Again, an Army of terrors is sent out to try the holy courage of those, who are converted, as well as to conquer the unholy enmity of persons unconverted. That was Job's case here, and these second Armies may be as terrible to the soul as the first, and often are more terrible. And (we have such cases) a man that was converted without an Army of terrors, may have an an Army of terrors sent against him after conversion. The dispensations and methods of God are various, though both his rule and end be ever the same: But whether this Army of terror comes before conversion, or after conversion; whensoever it comes, it must needs distress the soul exceedingly. A broken spirit is very comfortable, but a wounded spirit is very dreadful; Of a wounded spirit we may say, as I remember the Moralist speaks, concerning those barbarous naked fights, among the Romans, when men fought naked with men, or naked with beasts; surely (saith he) all the former fights and battels, were sports and mercy to these: So all other troubles, all other terrors, are pleasures and recreations to these: When you come to this bout, when God sends these arrows, and arrayeth such an Army of terrors against you, Fire and Sword, Stone and Gout, are, yea Hell it self, (to present apprehension) is a pleasure: Many under those assaults, have thought they should gain by the exchange, and have wished to be in Hell, so they might be out of those terrors.

Quicquid ante pugnatum est, mi serecordia fuit. Sen.

Few believe this, but they who have had experience of it. As the joyes of the spirit, so the terrors of the spirit, are secrets unto most: As the Prophet speaks concerning those carnal ones in his time. If one propheste unto them of wine and strong drink, he shall even be the Prophet of this people. To propheste, or to speak unto some of riches, and of honour, and of pleasure, they find some taste in these things, this is wine and strong drink unto them. There is some relish in these things, they understand what you mean; but if you speak unto them of joy in the Holy Ghost, of peace of Conscience, of the refreshings which are had in communion with Christ; they understand not the language, they know not what is meant. So, on the other side, if you would be a Prophet, or speak, or preach to some of Fire and Sword, of spoiling and plundering their Estates, preach to them of Plague and Pestilence, preach to them of the Gout, and of the Stone, of burning Fevers, and languishing Consumptions, they understand these and are afraid, they even tremble to hear you speak of these things: but preach to them of the arrows of the Almighty, shot into the spirit, and of the terrors of God set in array against them; preach to them of trouble of Conscience, and the hiding of Gods face; they smile at these things, they wonder what you would have, they know no such matters. Spiritual good or evil, is seldom known till felt, yea neither of them is known (to purpose) till it is felt: Spiritual troubles are as little known, till felt, as spiritual joyes are: The natural man perceives none of the things of God, he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned: And there is as much spiritualness evidenced in discerning spiritual sorrows and afflictions (our own or others) as there is in discerning our own or others spiritual joyes and consolations.

I shall add a word here to those, who live securely, in, or dally with their sins: Surely, if Job here in the Text; if David often in the Psalmes, and Heman (Psal. 88. 15.) cryeth out, While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted; If these cryed out thus of the terrors and arrows of God, then (I say) Sinners and secure ones, what will you do, when God bends his bow, opens his quiver, and shoots his arrows at your naked breasts? What will you do, when God shall bring up Armies of terrors to charge upon you, when you hear a Job thus crying out of terrors? How sad will it be with you, who shall be a terror to your selves, as Pashur was threatned, Jer. 20. 4. and God a terror to you likewise? What will you do, when there is fear round about, and fear within? The sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites; who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who amongst us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? Isa. 33. 14. If they who have a shield of faith to keep off these arrows, and a rock of salvation, Jesus Christ, to hide themselves in, when these Armies come to battel against them, are thus afraid; what will become of you, that are unarmed? of you, naked ones? of you, who have no shield, no shelter, no faith, no Christ?

Major Misnabæi.

One thing more. Forasmuch, as there are such arrows and terrors sent by God, even against his own, for their trial; take heed of making arrows against your selves; take heed you be not found to raise and prepare an Army of terrors, against your own souls. All the while men sin, knowingly and presumptuously, they shoot arrows against God, and God may take those arrows and shoot them back into their breasts; he can make their sins recoyl upon themselves, and pierce their own hearts with the works of their own hands. Men muster (as it were) whole Armies of terrors, and levy a bloody war against themselves by wilful sinnings. That Text, Psal. 50. 21. telleth us, that God will bring the sins of wicked men, as an Army against them; I will reprove thee, and set thy sins in order before thine eyes; It is the same Hebrew word, we have in the Text, I will set thy sins in array before thine eyes; as if he should say, thou thoughtest all thy sins were scattered and dispersed, that, there was not a sin to be found, that they should never be rallied, and brought together; but I assure thee, I will make an Army of those sins, a compleat Army of them, I will set them in rank and file before thine eyes, and see how thou canst behold, much less contend with such an host as they. Take heed therefore you do not levy war against your own souls; that's the worst of all civil or intestine wars. If an Army of divine terrors be so fearful, what will an Army of black hellish sins be? When God shall bring whole Regiments of sins against you, here a Regiment of oaths, there a Regiment of lies, there a third of false dealings, here a Troop of filthy actions, and there a Legion of unclean, or prophane thoughts, all at once fighting against thy life, and everlasting peace?

Lastly, You that have never felt these arrows, nor seen any of these Armies, and yet God hath been pleased to discover to you his love in his Christ, see what cause you have to bless God: Or if you have at any time felt them, and are now again at peace; and if those terrors are removed, and the poyson of those arrows sucked out, and the heads of the arrows drawn out; bless God. Do you not hear how Job complains of arrows and of terrors? The arrows of the Almighty are within me, poyson whereof drinketh up my spirit; the terrors of God, do set themselves in array against me.

Vers. 5. Doth the wild Ass bray when he hath grass? Or loweth the Ox over his fodder? &c.

The three verses following contain similitudes, taken from nature, by which Job tells on the story of his sorrows, and justifies his complaint. The sence in general is this, as if he had said, I do not cry out without cause; I should be more unreasonable then bruit beasts in so doing, The wild Ass doth not bray, when he hath grass, &c. Or thus, We blame not beasts, if they complain, when they have cause: take away grass from the Ass, and fodder from the Ox; Pinch them with hunger, and they will tell you of it in their language, they will low and bray, till you understand they want meat: Therefore surely you have no reason thus to find fault with me, or to charge me so heavily, because I have complained, when my grass and fodder, my comforts and my necessaries are taken from me: Nor is it any wonder, if you complain not, who have contentments to the full, and know not (by experience) what sorrow meaneth.

Doth the wild Ass bray, when he hath grass?

The Hebrew word for a wild Ass, comes from a root, signifying, To bring forth: and the reason is given, because wild beasts usually are more fruitful, and bring forth more plentifully then the tame. The word also notes wild in general; and is applied to wild and savage men, who delight in wild beasts, or wild places, Forests and Wildernesses. So (Gen. 16. 12.) God speaks of Ishmael, whom Hagar bear unto Abraham, that he, should be A wild man, that is, wild among men; or as a wild Ass among men, strong and active, delighting in Fields and Forests.

Doth the wild Ass (saith Job) bray, when he hath grass? When the Ass hath meat, he is quiet; you hear not of him: but if he wants grass, he brayes, and makes a dismal noise, (Jer. 14. 6.) The wild Asses did stand in the high places, they snuffed up the wind like Dragons, their eyes did fail, because there was no grass; speaking of a time of drought and famine; the wild Ass is very impatient, both of hunger and of thirst. And therefore the Rivers are (by name) assigned to them for drink, Psal. 104. 10, 11. He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills: they give drink to every beast of the field; the wild Asses quench their thirst. Hence wild Asses are observed by natural Historians to delight in, and frequent Rivers and Springs.

To which that prophane fiction of the Roman Historian (in abuse of the Jews) hath relation; who speaking of the travels of the Israelites, through the wilderness, tells us (to obscure the miracle, which God wrought for them) that they being ready to die with thirst, at last espied a company of wild Asses upon a rock: which advantage Moses took, and presently followed them, knowing that they would lead him to the waters, if any were to be had in those parts. In pursuance of which Lie, Plutarch affirms, that the Jews worshiped an Ass, as a Deity, which they had in special honour and veneration, for that famous deliverance. Upon this stock of Lies, the Heathen grafted that usual scorn against the Christians, That they worshipped the head of an Ass; as that great Assertor of the Christians honour against Heathenish cavils and hellish imputations, hath observed.

Cornelius Tacitus, l. 21.

Plutarch, l. 14. Convivaliũ Quæstionũ. quæst. 5.

Tertul. adverſ. Gentes, cap. 16.

But, that is a harmless and a witty observation (how solid I leave the Reader to judge) which hath been hinted from this natural thirstiness of the wild Ass: namely, that the Lord gave Samson water out of the jaw-bone of an Ass, Judg. 15. 19. thereby advancing the miracle, that a dead bone of that thirsty creature should be made a spring of water to revive him, who was ready to dye with thirst.

The intendment of this digression, is only to clear up the Text, by shewing that the wild Ass is most fitly instanced in, to shew the great cause which Job had to cry out as he did, of his afflictions; forasmuch as the wild Ass (who is so greedy of grass and thirsty after the waters) will not bray for either, till he is afflicted with the want.

Or loweth the Ox over his fodder?

This carries the same meaning with the former instance; that being in wild creatures, and this in tame: as if Job had said, look amongst all sort of cattel, wild or tame, you shall find they are content, when they have food convenient for them. And hereupon grounds his argument, that if brutes brutes led only by ſenſe and appetite, complain not without reaſon, then ſurely he at leaſt a reaſonable creature, had reaſon to complain, or elſe he had not complained.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Brute beaſts complain not without cauſe.

They complain not till want provokes them. Surely, men are more then bruti∫h, who complain when they have no want: But moſt of all, They, who are not content with abundance. Some are diſcontent, not only, though they have daily bread, and (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks) Food and raiment (wherewith all ſhould be content) but though they have ſtore of bread and cloathing laid up for many years. Shall not the Ox or Aſs condemn theſe, who bray and low not when they have graſs and fodder plenty, when they ſtand continually at rack and manger? By whom ſhall theſe men be accuſed think you? We ſhall not need to ſend for the Angels out of Heaven, to witneſs againſt them; no, we may call the wild beaſts and bid them be witneſs: we may empannel a Jury of Aſſes and Oxen to paſs a verdict upon ſuch men. As God upbraids his people in caſe of their ingratitude for mercies, The Ox knoweth his owner, and the Aſs his Maſters crib; and (*Jer.*8.7.) in caſe of their neglect of judgments, The Stork in the Heavens knoweth her appointed times, and the Crane, and the Turtle, and the Swallow, obſerve the time of their coming, but my people doth not know the judgment of the Lord. As if the Lord had ſaid, whither ſhall I go to fetch witneſs againſt this people? ſhall I go up to Heaven for Angels? or call in men out of other Nations? No, I need go but to the Air for birds, for the Turtle the Crane, and the Swallow; any thing in nature will ſerve to condemn them, who act againſt, or below the dictates of Nature. Men are worſe then beaſts, when they do worſe. Their preheminence of conſtitution is loſt in the baſeneſs of their actions; and they put themſelves by ſo much inferior to beaſts, by how much they were placed above them. The Pſalmiſt charges it ſadly upon himſelf, that he walked in the ſphear of a beaſt, So fooliſh was I and ignorant, I was as a beaſt before thee (Pſal. 73. 22.) How ſadly then ſhall they be charged, who walk in a ſphear below beaſts, who are more fooliſh and ignorant, then a beaſt? Take heed of complayning without cauſe; if beaſts are ſatisfied with what is agreeable to nature, man ſhould be ſo, much more; When Nature hath not enough, Grace hath all. Grace will not bray or low, when there is no graſs, no fodder: ſurely then they have a ſcarcity of grace in their hearts, who bray and low over their graſs and fodder. Spiritual accommodations will make a good heart forget temporal incommodities; and it is reaſon they ſhould. God promiſeth (Iſa. 30. 20.) Though I give you the bread of adverſity and the water of affliction, yet thy Teachers ſhall no more be removed into a corner, but thine eyes ſhall ſee thy Teachers. As if had ſaid, though your bodies are courſely fed, yet your ſouls ſhall be feaſted; Good chear ſhall daily be ſerved into them, both at your eyes and ears, Thine eyes ſhall ſee thy Teachers and thou ſhalt hear a voice behind thee. Thy ſight and thy hearing ſhall be refreſhed with heavenly Meſſengers, and good news from Heaven. Now beſides this promiſe expreſt, there is a duty implyed in the Text, namely, that becauſe their ſpirits were ſo well fed, therefore they muſt not complain, though their fleſh come ſhort in feeding; The bread of affliction ſhould be pleaſant to us, while we eat Goſpel-dainties. In theſe times God gives more plenty of ſpiritual food then formerly, yet many complain, becauſe their natural bread is ſhortned; remember beaſts complain not, when they have what is ſutable to nature; then let not Chriſtians complain, when they have what is ſutable to grace, though nature have but ſpare diet, and ſhort commons.

Verſ. 6. Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt.

He proceeds to another ſimilitude. It is, as if Job had ſaid, Nature will complain, when it wants meat; yea oftentimes Nature will complain, when it wants pleaſant meat. Nature is not pleaſed, if it want a grain of ſalt; if it have not ſauce, it is not ſatisfied. Therefore, ſurely I am to be born with, and not to be charged thus deeply, who complain, when you offer me that which is unſavoury, when you give me meat without ſalt, without ſauce, without any thing to render it either pleaſing to my palat, or eaſie to my diſgeſtion: Unleſs I were ſenceleſs like a ſtock or a ſtone, how ſhould I not diſ-reliſh and diſguſt ſapleſs, ſaltleſs, how much more, bitter things?

Can that which is unſavoury. The word, which we render unſavoury, is the ſame uſed, Chap. 1. verſ. 22. which we there opened at large; Job did not charge God with folly or fooliſhly, or he ſpake not unſavourily of God.

There is a Three-fold application of that word in Scripture.

First, To unpleaſant meats.

Secondly, To untempered morter.

Thirdly, To indiſcreet ſpeeches, which want the ſeaſoning either of wit, wiſdom, or of truth, Lam. 2. 14. Thy Prophets have ſeen vain and fooliſh things for thee; Lying viſions without truth, vain words without wiſdom. So here, Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt?

Seaſoning makes unſavoury things ſweet; As ſalt gives a reliſh to meat, ſo wiſdom and wit to words. And therefore the Latines expreſs wiſe, witty ſpeeches, pleaſant diſcourſe, a good grace in ſpeaking, and ſalt, by the ſame word.

Eſt quod debito condimento & temperamento caret, ſive in defectu, ſive in exceſſu.

Sales, pro facetiis, quod ſint quaſi condimentum ſermonis, Literæ Sparſæ ſale humanitatis. Cicer. ad Attic.

There is another Interpretation of that word, which we render without: for ſome underſtand it, not as a Prepoſition, governing the word Salt, but as a compound word, noting the oldneſs or ſtaleneſs of meat, wherein the very Salt it ſelf is putrified; and ſo whereas we ſay, Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt? They tranſlate thus, Can that which is unſavoury th,ough the corruption of ſalt be eaten? Or, can that meat be eaten, which having been ſalted, is now putrified? Salt which keeps meat from corruption, may in time be overcome with the corruption of the meat. And a learned Interpreter gives the reaſon why he rather chuſeth this Interpretation of the word, becauſe (ſaith he) it carries a ſtronger Emphaſis with it; Job ſpeaks as of a thing, (in a manner) unpoſſible to be done; now, it is very poſſible to eat unſavoury meat without ſalt? A good appetite will down with unpleaſant food, and hunger will diſpence much with Cookery. But when ſeaſon'd or ſalted meat corrupts and putrifies, whoſe ſtomack doth not loath and abhor it? Therefore it is a fuller and a more flat denial to ſay, Can that which is unſavoury through the corruption of ſalt be eaten? then to ſay, Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt?

Or is there any taſte in the white of an Egg?

These words are much obſcured, by moſt Tranſlators, and have found almoſt as many expoſitions, as Expoſitors. Some tranſlate thus, Is there any taſte in that, which being taken, brings death? So the Vulgar; doubtleſs a man hath but little pleaſure to taſte that, which taſted, will be his death: So the words are an aggravation of the unſavourineſs of thoſe things, which were offered him by his friends; to touch or take them, was to take poiſon, or to drink in a deadly cup.

To clear up this Expoſition, they make the Hebrew word (Challamuth) which we tranſlate, Egg, a compound from Muth, ſignifying to die, whence Maveth, death, and Chala, ſignifying froth or foam, or from Chali, ſignifying infirmity; as if the word having theſe parts put together, had this ſence, The froth and foam of death; Or, The infirmity of death: That is deadly froth or deadly infirmity, as if he had ſaid, is there any pleaſing taſte, in the ſpittle of dying men, who, we know often foam and froath at their mouths, when they lie drawing on.

Others thus, Is there any taſte in the ſpittle of a healthy man. The word (Rir) which we tranſlate white, ſignifies ſpittle or froth. As when David acted the mad-man before the King of Gath, it is ſaid, that he let his ſpittle fall down upon his beard, 1 Sam. 21. 13. And the word which we tranſlate, Egg, ſignifies Health, and the Verb, to be healthy, Chap. 39. 4. of this book, Their young ones are in good liking. So Iſa. 38. verſ. 16. But I leave this, as a very diſeaſed and ſickly interpretation.

I ſhall therefore paſs from theſe, to our own rendering,

Is there any taste in the white of an Egg? The word signifies strictly, but the yolk of the Egg, so Mr. Broughton, Is there any taste in the white of the yolk? And in the root, to wax fat or strong; and it is therefore taken for the yolk of the Egg, because that is the fatter, grosser, and more condense part of the Egg. As the white being the thinner, and much like spettle, is therefore expresst by a word, which also signifies spettle.

The white of an Egg, is an emblem of things without taste or savour. And so the sum of all is, that Job in this place by a Proverbial speech (for so I take this to be) intends only thus much, that he had very insipid tasteless things presented to him; such as he found no relish at all in, such as no way raised his appetite or quicken'd his stomach to receive them; all were unseasoned and flat. In the next word he goes yet higher, even to the highest Antipathy against them.

Vers. 7. The things which my soul refused to touch, are as my sorrowful meat.

Animus, το ὀρεκτικον, partem, scilicet animæ, qua concupiscimus, notat hoc loco.

Here is the Application and Explication of both the former similitudes, The things which my soul refused; that is, the things which I exceedingly refused or abominated: (The soul is here taken for the Appetite) as to desire with the soul, notes a strong intention of desire (Isa. 26. 9.) With my soul have I desired thee in the night, yea with my spirit within me will I seek thee early. That is, I have most vehemently desired, and in my most retired thoughts sought the Lord; When the soul is expressed to do that, which nothing can do but the soul, it imports the highest actings of the soul in doing it. To desire with the soul, implies the sweetest delight; and so to refuse with the soul, implies the bitterest aversation, a refusal to the uttermost. The word, refuse, is proper to the nauseating of the stomach, at the sight of any filthy thing (Isa. 30. 22.) Thou shalt defile the covering of the graven images, &c. Thou shalt cast them away as a menstruous cloth, thou shalt say unto them, get ye hence. So here, the things which my soul refuseth, as a man refuses a filthy clout, or, as he should refuse that which is more loathsom then any filthy clout, an Image, or an Idol.

These things (saith he) are now my sorrowful meat, or, the meat of my sorrow. The terms of this latter clause are at farthest distance from, and opposition with that which went before. Not to touch a thing, notes the greatest aversation from it; and to have a thing given us as meat, notes our greatest communion with it. That which a man will not touch with his finger, how far is he from chewing it between his teeth, or letting it down into his stomach, and digesting it into himself? So that Job's meaning seems to be this, that, what he desired to be the greatest stranger from, was now offered to his nearest familiarity and acquaintance: He was now (as it were) to eat, what before he would not touch. This we call sorrowful meat. Psal. 127. 2. We read of the bread of sorrow, that is, bread gotten with sorrow, bread eaten with sorrow, or, course bread; as bread of pleasure (Dan. 10. 3.) is fine bread: here sorrowful meat is either unpleasant meat, or any meat eaten in that time of his sorrow.

That relative (the Things) is not in the Hebrew, and so we may render word for word thus, My soul refuseth to touch them as my sorrowful meat: Or as another, My mind refuses to touch them; these are plainly the very sickness of my meat. As if he had said, I am so far from being refreshed with these things, that (the truth is) they make my very meat, and so my whole life unpleasant to me.

Mr. Broughton varies the latter clause, Those things which I have loathed to touch, are now the very sickness of my flesh. The word (Lechem) which we translate meat, or prepared flesh, signifies also living flesh, in the Syriack and Arabick Languages, as the learned Grammarians observe: Besides, we render the word (Lechem) flesh, Zeph. 1. 17. Their blood shall be poured out as dust, and their flesh as dung. Hence he translates, These things are to me as the sickness of my flesh; that is, the things which my soul refused to touch, are now brought very near, and laid close upon me, as sickness or sores cleave unto, and are in the flesh, or they trouble me as much as the sickness of my flesh.

The right application of these words, is as difficult as the translation of them; there are divers wayes to make out the sence; I shall reduce them unto two: Either, First, That all these unsavoury, tasteless, sorrowful meats which Job speaks of, are but the shadows of his afflictions and troubles, received from the hand of God. Or, Secondly, That they are shadows of the councels and reproofs, which he had received from the mouth of his friends.

First, Some refer and apply all to the troubles which were upon Job: and so these words are a fuller justification of himself, that he had great cause to complain, because his grass and fodder, that is, comforts sutable to mans nature (as they to a beasts) were taken from him, and he was now fed and dieted with unsavoury meat, meat without salt, the white of an egg, distastful, grievous afflictions, very gall and wormwood; The things which heretofore my soul refused to touch, are as my meat; I am put (as it were) to feed upon that, which I would not willingly come near: poverty and soars, sorrows and worms are my companions, and my cates.

Nauseabam ego quondã ad cujusmodi ærumnas movebant mihi stomachũ squalor paupertas, vilior cibus ulcera, sanies, vermes nunc vero his ipsis ab unde pascor. Pined.

From that sence Note, What at one time we loath, at another time may be our diet.

We have a saying, What is one mans meat, is another mans poyson; but it may fall out to the same man, that what he disgusted and avoided as poison, he shall be constrained to receive for his meat and portion, Lam. 4. 5. They that did feed delicately, are desolate in the streets; they that were brought up in scarlet, embrace dunghils? When those gallants were in scarlet, how did their souls loath to touch a dunghil? they loathed to touch it with their feet, but now they must hug it in their armes, and lay it in their bosoms; they embrace dunghils. How many have been brought from faring deliciously, from wearing purple and fine linnen every day, to scraps and rags, to hunger and nakedness every day. The Lord threatens the nice delicate dames of Jerusalem with such things, as their proud spirits and haughty souls refused to touch, Isa. 3. 24. It shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell, there shall be a stink; and instead of a girdle, a rent; and instead of well set hair, baldness; and instead of a stomacher, a girding with sackcloath; and burning instead of beauty. Take heed of coyness and curiosity: many a dainty tooth hath been taught by hunger, to knaw bones, and wait for a crust of bread.

Secondly Observe, That which makes afflictions most grievous to us, is the unsutableness of our spirits to afflictions: Delight and content, consist in sutableness of the object to our affections and desires.

God offers spiritual food to the natural man, but his soul refuses to touch it: he loaths Angels food, and is weary of the Manna of the Word; the precious Gospel, the bread of life, is an affliction to him, because his heart is unsutable to it; how will such be afflicted at the last, when they find, That, as their sorrowful meat for ever, which their souls will for ever refuse to touch. They, who loath Christ and his wayes, shall find nothing in the end to feed upon, but what is most contrary to their appetite, even fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; these shall be the portion of their cups, and the meat in their dish for ever. How sorrowful will that meal be?

But we may rather apply all to the words of Eliphaz, in the two former Chapters: and Job's ready submission in the first and second Chapters, to the afflicting hand of God, argues for him, that afflictions, how grievous soever, were not the things which his soul refused to touch. And the apprehension of a learned Interpreter satisfies me in it; This sence (saith he) is too low for a man afflicted with troubles far above these, which concern'd his outward man. The Septuagint are expresly for this opinion, who translate those words, Is there any taste in the white of an Egg? thus, Is there any taste in vain words? they are so far off the judgment that these unsavoury things, the things which Job's soul refused to touch, and the white of the Egg, in the Text, are all meant of vain words, that they put it into the very Text. It is a usual boldness with them, and a very unwarrantable one, to vary so from the words of the Original, and make their gloss the Text; but it shews us, how strongly they were engaged to that sence: Most of the Greek Writers concur with them in it, viz. that Job aims at the counsels and speeches of Eliphaz, which wanted the

the ſeaſoning of wiſdom and prudence, yea of truth and ſoundneſs, as applyed to the ſpirit of ſo ſick a man, as Job was.

And beſides, many Modern writers are clear in the ſame apprehenſion, giving the ſum of all plainly, to this effect, as the mind of Job in thoſe fore-going paſſages; I would not have complained of the things which ye have ſpoken, if they had been meat for me, but I aſſure you, your counſels are not nouriſhing: I can find no food, much leſs any ſweetneſs or fatneſs in them; your counſels want the due ſeaſoning of wiſdom, and the right temperament of holy zeal: They are either unſavoury, or taſteleſs, ſapleſs ſtuff; ſuch, as I am ſo far from being refreſhed with, that indeed they are a burden to me; and the remedy you preſcribe me, is worſe then my diſeaſe. How can you expect, that I ſhould ſubmit or ſubſcribe to what you have ſpoken, or that I ſhould reſt and acquieſs in your reproofs or advice, ſeeing I aſſure you, they are not for me, they hit my ſtate or ſpirit no more, then unſavoury meat doth my pallate; or that which I abhor to touch, can pleaſe my taſte. And therefore, with my ſoul, I refuſe and reject what you have ſpoken; and you have not only not ſatisfied me all this while, but you have vext or tyred me, and in ſtead of mitigating my ſorrows, have added to them.

Abſit ut vir ſanctus, aliquando amicorum ſuorũ dicta deſpexerit, qui & humilis ſervus fuerit. Greg.

But an objection ariſes againſt this; and one of the Ancients is very angry with thoſe, who make this application to the counſels of Eliphaz, as if Job had rejected them as unfit food, and unſavoury meat. Let no man (ſaith he) think that this holy man deſpiſed the counſel of his friend, who himſelf was humble, as a ſervant.

To which I anſwer, That the counſels of Eliphaz, are to be conſidered, either in the doctrine, or in the uſe. His counſels, in the doctrine of them, were good and ſavoury, he ſpake wholſom food; but as to Job's caſe, he was quite miſtaken in their uſe, and ſo in ſtead of eaſing, troubled him. A Phyſician may give his ſick Patient, that which is good in it ſelf, very cordial and ſoveraign, and yet it may kill him in ſtead of curing him, if it be not proper for his body, and his diſeaſe. Thus it is alſo in giving counſel: what we ſpeak, muſt be fitted to the perſon, and to the ſeaſon; there are many good counſels, of which we may ſay, as Huſhai did of Achitophels ill ones, 2 Sam. 17. 7. They are not good at this time. That which is good counſel to a man at one time, may be, or might have been, ill, to the ſame man at another. I have many things to ſay, ſaith Chriſt, but ye cannot bear them now, Joh. 16. 12. And that which one man can bear, another cannot at the ſame time. And therefore the Apoſtle was made all things to all men, 1 Cor. 9. 2. And accounted himſelf debtor, both to the wiſe, and to the fooliſh, to the learned and unlearned, to the weak, and to the ſtrong; that is, he looked upon it as his duty, to ſpeak truths, ſuiting the ſtate of every degree and ſort of men; which is the meaning of his rule to all the diſpenſers of holy myſteries, that they divide the word aright: The rightneſs reſpects, not only, or not ſo much the ſubject or word divided, as the object, or perſons to whom the diviſion is to be made, in giving every one his portion, or food convenient for him. One man may ſurfet with that which another digeſts kindly; what fattens a ſecond, may ſicken or ſtarve a third. This plainly is the meaning of Job; what Eliphaz had ſaid was not ſavoury food for him, nor dreſt for one in his condition: His ſoul did even refuſe to touch, what he ſpake, becauſe his ſoul was not of that temper, for which Eliphaz had fitted his ſpeech; he was a Phyſician of no value to him, becauſe he brought a wrong potion, and miſtook his caſe; his was good ſearching Phyſick for the foul ſtomach, and groſs ſpirit of a hypocrite: but it is enough to kill the heart of an upright-heart, when God ſeems angry with him, and appears againſt him, when he is ſmitten without, and ſmitten within, by ſore afflictions of mind and body; then for his comforters to ſmite him with their tongues, to lay at him with hard words, and wound him with their unreaſonable jealouſies, then for his councellours and helpers to be angry with, and oppoſite againſt him too.

Obſerve hence, That, not only words untrue, but words miſapplied, are unſavoury, and may be dangerous.

They are no food, and they may be poyſon: Prudence in applying, is the ſalt and ſeaſoning of what is ſpoken. As a word ſpoken in the right ſeaſon is precious, and upon the wheele, ſo is a word right placed: When that faithful Prophet (Ezek. 13.) reproves the falſe prophets, he ſaith, They daubed with untempered morter, ver. 10. It is the word of the Text: and why was theirs untempered morter? even, becauſe they applied the word of God wrong. They made ſad the hearts of thoſe, whom God would have refreſhed; and they cheared the ſpirits of thoſe, whom God would have ſadned; they ſlay the ſouls that ſhould not die, and ſave the ſouls alive that ſhould not live. This was untempered morter: The Apoſtle adviſes all, Col 4. 6. Let your ſpeech be alwayes with grace, ſeaſoned with ſalt. And ſpeech muſt be ſeaſoned, not only with the ſalt of truth, but with the ſalt of wiſdom and diſcretion: and therefore the Apoſtle adds, that ye may know how to anſwer every one; that is, that you may give every man an anſwer, fitting his caſe, and the preſent conſtitution of his ſpirit. Of ſome have compaſſion (ſaith the Apoſtle Jude ver. 22.) making a difference, and others ſave with fear. This ſhews the holy skill of managing the word of God, when we make a difference of our patients, by different medicines, and not ſerve all out of the ſame box. Hence our Lord calleth thoſe great Teachers of the Goſpel, and Diſpenſers of his Oracles, Light and Salt; Ye are the Light of the world, and ye are the Salt of the earth; becauſe they were to ſpeak ſavoury things to every perſon, to every palate, as well as to enlighten them with knowledge, and prevent or cure the corruption of their manners, and keep their lives ſweet. As there is an unſavourineſs in perſons, when they are miſ-imployed; ſo there is an unſavourineſs in ſpeeches, when they are miſ-applied. The Hiſtory of the Church, ſpeaks of one Eccebolius, who changed religion ſo oft, and was ſo unſetled, that at laſt he caſt himſelf down at the Congregation door, and ſaid, Trample upon me, for I am unſavoury ſalt. And that word (though in it ſelf a truth) which is unſeaſonably delivered, or unduly plac'd, may be caſt at the doors of the Congregation, to be trampled on, for (in this ſence) it is unſavoury ſalt: Such corrupt the word, and theirs is but corrupt communication, ſuch as cannot miniſter grace unto the hearers, and often grieves the Holy Spirit of God. Theſe work-men, for their ill diviſion of the word of God, have reaſon enough to be aſhamed; and the Lord may juſtly reprove them, as he did Job's friends, Chap. 42. 7. Ye have not ſpoken of me (nor of my wayes) the thing that is right.

Conculcate me ſalem inſpidum. Niceph.

VERS. 8, 9, 10.

O that I might have my requeſt! and that God would grant me the thing that I long for!
Even that it would pleaſe God to deſtroy me, that he would let looſe his hand and cut me off.
Then ſhould I yet have comfort, yea, I would harden my ſelf in ſorrow; let him not ſpare, for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.

IN the former part of this Chapter, we have had Job defending his former complaint of life, and his deſire of death. In this Context, from the 8. verſ. unto the end of the 12. he reneweth and re-inforceth that deſire. He not only maintains and juſtifies what he had done, but doth it again; begging for death as heartily and importunately, as he did in Chap. 3. O that I might have my requeſt! and that God would grant me the thing that I long for.

The requeſt it ſelf, is laid down in verſ. 8, 9. and the reaſons ſtrengthning it, in verſ. 10, 11, & 12. So theſe 5. verſes are reduceable to theſe two heads.

Firſt, The renewing of his deſire to die.

Secondly, An inlargement of reaſons confirming that deſire.

O that I might have my requeſt!

It is ſuch a vehement deſire, and ſo expreſt, as David's was, 2 Sam. 23. 15. And David longed, and ſaid, O that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlem, which is by the gate. David did not more long to taſte a cup of that water, then Job did to taſte the cup of death.

The ſum and ſcope of Job's thoughts in this paſſage, may be conceived thus. He would aſſure his friends, that his faith was firm, and his comforts flowing from it, very ſweet; that, it was not impatience under the troubles of this this life, but aſſurance of the comforts of the next; which cauſed him ſo often to call for death. That, theſe comforts cauſed his heart to triumph and glory in the very approaches of the moſt painful death, and made him deſpiſe, and lightly to eſteem all the hopes of life. That, he was gone further then the motives which Eliphaz uſed, from the hopes of a reſtitution to temporal happineſs: he now was pitcht upon, and lodg'd in the thoughts of eternal happineſs. That, he call'd for death, not, as that, with which he had made any Covenant, or was come to any agreement with; but only, as that, which would bring him to his deſired home, The one Thing he deſired. That his comforts had not their foundation in a grave: where all things are forgotten, but in the Covenant of God, who remembers mercy for ever; and therefore it ſhould not trouble him, to die, before he was reſtored to health, riches and honour (which his friends propoſed to him) as a great argument of comfort and of patience. For in death he ſhould have riches and glory; and hence it was, that he had rather endure the extreameſt pains of death, then ſtay to receive any outward comforts in this life. His deſires to be diſſolved, were not ſo much, from the ſence of his preſent pain (for he would harden himſelf to endure, yet more) as from the apprehenſion of future joy; this, was not a phanſie or a dream, but he had good proof, and real evidence of it in the whole courſe of his life, which had been as a continued acting of the word of God, and ſo a fitting him for neareſt communion with God. This in general.

The letter of the Hebrew runneth thus, Who would give me, that my requeſt, or that my petition might come? He had ſent up a requeſt, a prayer, a prayer for death, and he thought his prayer too long gone, upon that meſſage; Prayer was not quick enough in its return from Heaven, every hour was a year till he heard of it; therefore (ſaith he) O that ſome body would give me, that my requeſt might come back again unto me: The word whereby he expreſſes his requeſt, notes a very ſtrong deſire, a ſtrong cry, a ſtrong prayer; implying, that Job had ſent up mighty requeſts, or ſtrong cries about it. As it is ſaid of our Lord Chriſt, Heb. 5. That in the dayes of his fleſh, he ſent up ſtrong cries unto God, who was able to deliver him; Chriſt ſent up ſtrong cries to be delivered from death, and Job ſent up ſtrong cries for death. A word of the ſame root, ſignifies the grave; the grave is a craving, a begging thing; the grave is never ſatisfied, as it is in the Proverbs; The grave ſaith not, it is enough: And the grave is therefore expreſt by a word that ſignifies to deſire, or requeſt, or to ask a thing importunately; becauſe the grave, hath a mouth, as it were, continually open to ask, and beg, and cry out for more morſels, it conſumeth all, and is never full; ſuch a deſire Job put forth for death.

And that God would grant me the thing that I long for.

It is a repetition of the ſame deſire, in other words. What it is to long, hath been opened in Chap. 3. verſ. 21. Who long for death: Here Job reneweth the ſame ſuit again, O that I might have the thing that I long for, or the thing which I expect with great expectation and vehemency of affection! I ſhall not ſtay upon it: But only give you the general ſence a little varied.

In this paſſage, Job ſhews himſelf aſſured, that his comforts ſhould not end, though his life ended, before he was reſtored to earthly comforts. And he thus ſeems to anſwer Eliphaz, who had made large promiſes of outward felicity. I am not ſtayed at all in my deſire to die, becauſe I may poſſibly live in greater worldly honour and fulneſs, then ever I enjoyed: All that is in the creature, is below my longing, I have not a ſweet tooth after worldly dainties: I ſhall not envy any, who out-live me to enjoy them; let them divide my portion, whatſoever it may be, among them alſo: The thing which I long for, is death (not for it ſelf) but as that, which will bring me to the laſt of my ill dayes, and the firſt of my beſt. Job's thoughts were in a higher form then his friends: They thought a golden offer of riches, would have made him agogg to live. But Job's heart lived above theſe, even upon the riches of eternal life: To enjoy which, he even longs for temporal deſtruction, and cutting off.

Job expectationem proximam facit mortē tanquam eā, quæ patiendi ultimam & quietis ac fœlicitatis primam repræſentet lineam.

I have ſpoken at large in Chap. 3. concerning the lawfulneſs of ſuch a requeſt, and how far Job might be approved in it; therefore I need not diſcuſs it here.

Only Obſerve in general, That, A praying ſoul, is an expecting ſoul.

Job had prayed, and prayed earneſtly, and though it was but a prayer to die, yet he lived in the expectation of an anſwer. When prayer is ſent up unto God, then the ſoul looks for its return. Prayer is as ſeed ſown: After this ſpiritual husbandry, the ſoul waits for the precious fruits of Heaven. Pſal. 62. 1. My ſoul waiteth upon God; and (Pſal. 85. 8.) I will hearken what the Lord God will ſay; Job had ſent up his requeſt, and now he was hearkning for an anſwer, O that I might have the thing I look for! Habbakkuk in the ſecond of that Prophecy, verſ. 1. having prayed about the great concernments of thoſe times, reſolves, I will ſtand upon my watch, and ſet me upon the Tower, and will watch to ſee, what he will ſay unto me. They who ſend Embaſſadors to forraign Princes, wait for a return. Thus it is with the ſoul, having put up its requeſt and ſent au Embaſſie to God.

Obſerve Secondly, Anſwer of our prayer is the grant of God.

Nothing ſtands between us and our deſires, but his will. If he ſign our Petition, no creature can hinder us of our expectation.

Obſerve Thirdly, God often keeps the Petitions of his ſervants, by him unanſwered.

Obſerve Fourthly, The return of prayer is the ſouls ſolace and ſatisfaction.

As cold water to a thirſty ſoul, ſo is good news from that far countrey, Prov. 25. 25. O that my requeſt might come, and O that I might have the thing that I long for!

Would you know what his requeſt was? He explains that in verſ. 9. And a man would wonder, that one ſhould be ſo very earneſt to have ſuch a requeſt. Many have prayed to God to ſave and deliver them, but how unnatural doth this prayer ſeem, to be cut off and deſtroyed? Yet the thing which Job doth more then pray for, long for, is this, That it would pleaſe God to deſtroy him, and that he would let looſe his hand and cut him off.

That it would pleaſe God to deſtroy me.

Some read, that he who hath begun, would make an end in deſtroying of me; For the word ſignifies both to be willing to do a thing, and likewiſe to begin to do a thing; therefore they make out the ſence thus, That he who hath begun thus to deſtroy me, to tear and conſume me, would finiſh his work, and make an end of me; As if Job had ſaid, I am already near unto deſtruction, a borderer upon the grave. God hath begun to deſtroy me, I would have him to go on and perfect that work. As in works of mercy, Deut. 32. 4. He is the Rock, and his work is perfect. When he begins to deliver, he will make an end. So likewiſe when he begins to deſtroy, he can make an end too; Job deſires, that his afflictions might be perfected, to the deſtruction of his dying body, and that mercy might begin in the triumph of his ſoul.

But rather, take it in the other ſence, as we render it, To be willing to do a thing; Even that it would pleaſe God, or, even that God would be willing to deſtroy me: As if he had ſaid, I find as it were a kind of unwillingneſs in God, to make an end of me, his bowels ſeem to yern over me, he ſeems yet to be upon the diſpute, whether to cut me quite off, or no: now I even deſire that God would lay aſide that his tenderneſs and compaſſion, that he would determine and reſolve to deſtroy me, that he would acquieſce, and fully reſt ſatisfied in that reſolution.

The word here uſed, to deſtroy, notes to beat a thing to powder, or to beat a thing to pieces, Pſal. 143. 3. He hath ſmitten my life down to the ground, that is, he hath beaten me as it were to dirt. So Job here, I would have the Lord even beat me to duſt or dirt. The word is uſed for contrition of ſpirit, Iſa. 57. 15. I dwell with him that is of an humble heart, and of a contrite ſpirit; that is, with him, that hath a ſpirit beaten to powder, or all to pieces, as any hard thing is with a hammer or peſtle; A hard heart is a heart all in a lump, condenſate, and cloſed together; but an humble, a repenting heart, is a heart beaten ſmall and ground to powder; Thus Job deſires here, O that it would pleaſe God to beat my life down to duſt, and break me all to ſhatters!

shatters! that he would crush me (as Eliphaz spake in Chap. 4. vers. 19.) as a Moth.

Observe then in how sad a contrition, Job was, who not only makes, but renews, such a request, as this. Some upon a sudden pang, wish to die, and hastily call for death; yet are willing it should take it's own time, and come leisurely: and as soon as death appears, they are crying as hard for life. It is rare for any mans second thoughts, to keep up, to such desires. Job spake once, and he speaks it over again; O that I might die! yea, he wooes destruction, and is an importunate suiter for the grave. How sad is a mans outward condition, when he hath only this complaint left, that he cannot die? when a man hath no help, but in destruction, or healing, but in a deeper wound? Job in this appears like a man (that is to be pressed to death) lying under a heavy weight, yet the weight not heavy enough to crush him to death, he cryes out, more weight, more weight. It will be a kindness to crush out my breath and bowels; the greatest favour I expect in this world, is, but to have more weight laid upon them, that I may die. Some of the Martyrs, when the fire was scant, have cried out, more fire. The cruellest flame was their friend, and the more the fire raged, the more merciful it was to them. The Book of our Martyrs reports of reverend Latimer, that when he was giving witness to the truth, and glorifying the Name of Christ in the fire; he cried out, Oh, I cannot burn! the fire came not fast enough upon him. Such, this expression of Job seems to be, Oh, I cannot die, I cannot die, I cannot be destroyed, I cannot perish yet; O that the hand of God would lay more weight upon me, that I might die! He seems to ask such a curtesie, as that Amalekite said, King Saul craved of him, 2 Sam. 1. 9. Stand I pray thee upon me, and slay me: for anguish is come upon me, because my life is yet whole in me. This is the favour, the only favour, that remains for me. I am capable of no worldly comfort, but a quicker dispatch out of the world.

And that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off.

Here is the same Petition, though other language, That he would let loose his hand. That's an elegant expression; the word signifies to loose the bond, that a man may have use of his hands or feet: As prisoners are loosed, Psal. 146. 7. The Lord looseth the prisoners: So that, it is, as if Job had said, Lord, thou hast been smiting and wounding me, but I see thou hast not given thy hand the full scope, thy hand is as it were bound or tied behind thee: As you know, a man that hath great advantage of another, or is much his overmatch, will say to him, I will fight with thee with my hand tied behind me. The truth is, God is able to contend with all the creatures, with his hand bound behind him, with his hands fast bound, that is without putting forth the least part (to speak on) of his power; he can overcome with speaking: Job observing here that God contended with him (as it were) with his hands bound or tied up, desires now, that, God would give himself full scope, and put out his strength, and not strike, as if his hand were a prisoner. And he may have a respect in speaking thus to the restraint or binding up of Satans power; In this work Satan was Gods hand; God put power into the hand of Satan, All that he hath, is in thy power, or in thy hand, Chap. 1. 12. First, God loosned Satans hand, to take away his estate. Next, he let loose his hand a little further, to the afflicting of his body; but saith God, spare his life; there he bound up his hand again. Now Job alluding (probably) to that restraint; Lord (saith he) loosen thy hand a third time, do not only loosen it, to take away my estate, to take away my health and strength; but O that thou wouldst loosen it, to take my life too! enlarge I pray thee, Satans Commission, who is thy hand, let it quite loose, that he may make an end of me, and cut me off.

Transfatio ab his qui manū vinctam habent.

Non se gerat erga me, instat hominis colligatam habentis manum.

The word here used to cut-off, comes up to heighten Job's sence still, signifying to cut off, with an unsatiable appetite of revenge; as if he should say, cut me off, spare me not, spare not my blood; do it, as they who are most greedy of blood, and thirst most vehemently for revenge. Let Satan that blood-sucker, come with as great revenge (thy hand being loosened from restraining his) as ever the greatest Tyrant hastned with, to suck the blood of innocents; Let him greedily cut me off, even as it were to have some great gain, or get some rich booty by my blood; What profit is there in my blood? (saith David, Psal. 30. 9.) Let him make what profit he can of my blood, saith Job. The word signifies to covet or desire gain; and it notes the worst kind of covetousness, covetousness of filthy lucre, or covetousness of bloody lucre. Hence Job saith, Let God cut me off, as if he were to have profit, or raise himself a revenew out of my blood; or let Satan come upon me, and take his peny-worths out of my blood; let him murder me, as if he were to find all manner of treasure in my bowels, and could thence fill and adorn all his chambers of darkness with spoyl. We may Note from hence, Avidè me absumat, quasi ex med morte ingens lucrū reportaturus Pined.

First, That, God dispenceth and acteth his power as he pleaseth.

He looseth his hand gradually, as to him seemeth good. First, To the estate, then to the body, and when he will, he can reach the life.

Secondly Observe, If God put out his power, no creature can stand before it.

If God do but let loose his hand, man is cut off presently; it is but as a little twig, or as grass before the sithe, or before a sword, there is no more in it. As when God openeth the hand of his mercy, he satisfieth the desire of every living thing, Psal. 145. 2. So when God looseth the hand of his judgments, he takes away the life and comforts of every living thing. God hath a hand full of blessings and mercies; if he please but to open that hand, all things are filled with comfort: God hath another hand full of judgments and afflictions; if he open or loosen that, all creatures fall before him, like a withered leaf. The reason why the enemies of God live and are mighty, is, because God doth not fully loosen his hand against them: if he would but unprison his power, and let out his hand, he can with ease destroy, and cut them off in a moment. Therefore the Prophet prayes but for this one thing, Psal. 74. 11. That God would pluck his hand out of his bosom; Why with-draweſt thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom: Lord (saith he) this is the reason, why enemies yet prevail, thy hand is tied up; that is, thine own act hath tied up thy hand, thy will stayes thy power, or thy power is hid in thy will. Gods power kept in by his will, is his hand in his bosom. Among men, a hand in the bosom, is the emblem of sloth, Prov. 19. 24. Man hides his hand in his bosom, because he will not be at the pains to work: God is said to hide his hand in his bosom, when it is not his will and pleasure to work; therefore he saith, Lord, if thou wouldst but let loose, and put out thy hand, all mine enemies shall be consumed. And that's the reason, why there are such various dispensations of providence in these times; when the enemy prevails, God with-draweth his hand, he keepeth his hand in his bosom. And when at any time, his servants have victory, it is, because his hand hath liberty. If God holds his hand, men stretch forth theirs in vain.

Thirdly Observe, Assurance of a better life will carry the soul with joy through the sorrows and bitterest pains of death.

It was not any Stoical apathy, or ignorant regardlesness of life, which raised the heart of Job to these desires. He did not invite his end, like a Roman, or a Philosopher, or by the height and gallantry of natural courage, set the world at nought, and bid defiance to destruction: But he had laid up a good foundation against this day; upon this he builds his confidence. He knew, as Paul, that he had Christ, while he lived, and should have gain, when he dyed. The joy which was set before him, made him over-look the cross, which was before him. So much of his request, now he tells us the consequence, or effect, it would have upon him, in case it were granted.

Vers. 10. Then should I yet have comfort, yea, I would harden my self in sorrow; Let him not spare, for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.

Then should I yet have comfort.] If I had but this suit granted, I were refreshed, notwithstanding all my sorrows, the very hope of death would revive me. Nothing doth so much refresh the soul, as the hearing of a prayer, and the grant grant of a desire; When desire cometh, it is as a tree of life, (saith Solomon) therefore Job might well say, when my longing comes, I shall have comfort; and lest any should think, that as David would not drink the water, he so longed for, when it was brought unto him; so, when the cup of death should be brought to Job, he might put it off somewhat upon those terms, which David did, and say, I will not drink it, for it is my blood, my death; therefore he adds, Yea, I would harden my self in sorrow.

As if he had said, though some call hastily for death, and repent with as much haste, when death comes, yet not I, I would harden my self, &c.

The Hebrew (to harden) hath a threefold signification among the Jewish Writers, though it be used but this once only in all the Scripture. And hence there is a threefold interpretation of these words, I would harden my self in sorrow. It signifies,

1. To pray or to beseech.
2. To heat or to warm; yea, to scorch and to burn.
3. To harden or to strengthen; strengthning is hardning in a Metaphor.

According to the first sense, the Text is rendred thus, Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would pray in my sorrow, that is, I would pray yet more for an encrease of my sorrow, that I might be cut off: If I had any hope, that my request should be granted, this hope would quicken my desire, and I would pray yet more, that I might obtain it.

Secondly, As the word signifies to warm or to heat, the sence is given thus, Then should I have comfort, yea, I would warm my self in my sorrow. And so it refers to those refreshings, which his languishing soul, his soul chilled, as it were, with sickness and sorrows should receive, upon the news of approaching death. This news (saith he) would be as warm cloaths to me, it would fetch me again, out of my fainting, to hear of dying. But, besides a warming or a refreshing heat, the word also notes scorching, burning heat: Mr. Broughton takes that signification of the word; I shall touch that, and his sence upon it, by and by.

Hac spe certissima moriendi incalescerem, reficillarer.

We translate according to the third usage of the word. I would harden my self; and so the construction is very fair, I should yet have comfort; yea, I should harden my self in sorrow, that is, I would now set my self to endure the greatest sorrows and afflictions which would come upon me, for the destroying and cutting off the thred of my life. And so, he seems in these words, to prevent an objection before hinted; Why Job, dost thou desire to be cut off, and to be destroyed? thou hast more pain upon thee already then thou art able to bear; thou criest out of what thou hast; thou must think, when death comes, thy wound will be deeper, and thy pain sharper: Job seems to answer, I have considered that before, I know there will be a hard brunt at parting; I prepare for it, and I am thus resolved, I would harden my self in sorrow; that is, I would set my self to bear the pangs and agonies of death, if I had but this hope, that my misery were near expiring. The Apostle useth that phrase (2 Tim. 2. 3.) in his advices to young Timothy, Thou as a good Souldier of Jesus Christ, endure hardness, or bear evil. As if he had said, thou dost not know, what hardship thou shalt be put unto in thy Ministry; I, who am a Veterane, an old beaten (though never conquered) souldier, in this warfare of Christ, have been put to much hardship in my time; and from my own experience I advise thee, to enure thy self to hardship, to lie hard, to fare hard, to work hard, to hear hard words, and receive hard usage. A tender spirit, and a delicate body, which must have warm, and soft, and fine, and sweet continually, is unfit for the warfare of the Gospel. Such a sence is here, I know I must endure more then now I do, but I would harden my self against that time, and resolve to endure it; let come what could come, I am resolved, and have forethought the worst.

Further, For the clearing of these words, it is considerable, that some learned Interpreters put the two middle expressions into a Parenthesis, and read the whole thus; I should have comfort, (though I should scorch with pain, and though God should not spare me) for I have not concealed the words of the holy One. One thus; This yet is my comfort, even while I scorch with pain, and God doth not spare me, that I have not concealed the words of the holy one. Mr. Broughton (as I touched before) comes near this sence and translation. So I should yet find comfort, though I parch in pain, when he would not spare; for I kept not close the words of the most Holy. That is, when the long expected hour of my death shall come, though God, to take away my life, should heat the furnace of my affliction seven times hotter then hitherto, so that I must parch in pain, yet, I should have comfort. Or, take it in Mr. Broughton's own gloss, In all these pangs, if God would make an end of me, it should be my comfort, and I would take courage in my sickness, to bear it, by my joy, that I should die, because I professed the Religion of God. So that the strength of Job, to bear the hand of God, was from the conscience of his former integrity, in doing the will, and maintaining the truth of God.

Junius.

Let him not spare.

Job having taken up this hope, that he should have comfort; and this resolution, that he would harden himself in sorrow, speaks now as if he were at a point; let God do what he pleaseth, let him not spare; as if he had said, what course soever the Lord shall see good to take for the cutting me off, I am content he should go on with it, Let him not spare. The word signifies, to indulge or shew mercy to him, whom, by all right, a man might justly destroy, (Ezek. 5. 11.) Because thou hast done thus and thus, saith God, therefore will I also diminish thee, neither shall mine eye spare, neither will I have any pity: Job seems to invite, what God threatens others; Let him not spare, let him not have any pity, let him take his full swinge in destroying of me.

In this sence it is said, Rom. 8. 32. That God spared not his own son; that is, he abated not any thing which Justice could inflict; Christ therefore saves to the uttermost, because he suffered to the uttermost. He was not spared one blow, one drop, one sigh, one sorrow, one shame, one circumstance of all, or any one of these, which Justice could demand, as a satisfaction for mans sin. Yea, though (in a sence) he cried to his Father, that he might be spared, yet he was not.

There is a threefold mercy in God. There is a preventing mercy, mercy that steps between us and trouble; and there is a delivering mercy, mercy that takes us out of the hand of trouble: There is a third kind of mercy, coming in the middle of these two, and that is called sparing mercy; and that is twofold: First, Sparing for the time, when God delayes and stayes long ere he strike. Secondly, Sparing for the degree; when the Lord moderates and mitigates, abates and qualifies our sufferings, not letting them fall so heavy upon us as they might: This sparing mercy stands (I say) in the middle of the two former; it is not so much as preventing mercy, stopping trouble that it come not; neither is it so much as delivering mercy, removing it, when it is come. Now, Job did not only, not ask delivering mercy, that he asked not sparing mercy; let him not spare me in the time, let him not delay or lose time, let him come as soon as he will; and let him not spare me in the degree and measure; let him strike me as hard, and lay his hand as heavily upon me as he will. David (Psal. 39. 13.) makes this his request; O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more; That is, abate and mitigate my sufferings, that I die not; but Job desireth not to be spared at all. He rather saith, take away all my strength, that I may go hence, and be seen no more. Hence observe,

That, The hope troubles will end, comforteth, yea, hardneth in bearing present troubles.

Then will I comfort my self, then will I harden my self, let him not spare, if I may have my request, and die. The sharpest sting of trouble is, that it is endless: and that it is next to that, when we cannot look to the end of it, nor see any issue or way out of it. That which discourages the damned in bearing their sorrows, and softens both their flesh and spirit, to receive home to the head every arrow of wrath, and dart of vengeance, is, they see no end, and are assured there will be none. They know, they cannot be cut off, and therefore they cannot harden themselves to sorrow; no, that very consideration, makes their hearts, which have been hardnend to commit sin, tender to receive punishment, and exactly sensible of their pains; could they see, that at last they should be cut off, even they, would be hardened to bear the torments of hell; in the mean time, though that time should be very long, yea, as long as time can be, only not endless. The pain it self doth not afflict so much, as the thought that they shall be afflicted for ever. As the assurance that the glory of heaven shall never end, infinitely sweetens it; so the assurance that the pains of Hell shall never end, infinitely sharpens them: And not to see the ending of worldly troubles near, puts us further off from comfort, then the bearing of those troubles; therefore, saith Job, if I might be assured, that God would cut me off, I would harden my self in sorrow, and let not God spare; I would not desire him to hold his hand, to mitigate or abate my pains *. Yea, I would account every blow an embrace, and every wound a reward.

* Et hæc mihi merces esset ejus seu pro ea, quod non occultavi unquam, sed diligentissimè observavi & quam commendatissima habui verba Domini, Opin. no nullorum Hebræorum apud Merc.

For not concealing the words of the holy One.

In these words, Job gives the reason, or an account of his renewed prayer and request to die. As the desire of Job was strong and passionate, so likewise it was well-grounded. He had a very high reason, an excellent ground, upon which he bottom'd this request to die: His reason was spiritual, and therefore strong. He begs to be delivered from the troubles of his life, though by a painful death, because he was clear in himself, that he had led a blameless life. That which set him above the pains of bodily death, was the tranquility of his spirit in this testimony of his conscience. I have not concealed the words of the holy One. As if he had said, You may wonder why I should be so forward and ready to die, why I seem so greedy after the grave, why I am such an importunate suiter for my dissolution; the account I give you, is this, I have the testimony of a good conscience within me, notwithstanding all the troubles which are upon me, notwithstanding all your harsh, unfriendly accusations, jealousies and suspitions of me, yet my own breast is my friend, my heart speaks me fair, and gives me good words, even these; it tells me that I have not concealed the words of the holy One, that I have not smothered any light he hath sent me; that I have not refused any counsel he hath given me; that I have not wilfully departed from any rule he hath prescribed me; that I have been faithful to God, to his Cause, and to his Truth; that I have declared his will, and spoken his mind to others; that I have not hidden any thing that he hath given me in charge to declare, or committed to my trust; the word of God hath appeared in my life, and therefore I am not afraid; yea, I have boldness to die, and to appear before God.

Mirum est ut mihi non parcat, quæ illius verba non celarim, neq; dissimulaverim. Aben Ez.

I have not concealed.] The word signifieth to hide a thing, so as it be neither heard or seen.

But may we not conceal the words of the most High? It is said of Mary, that she hid the words of Christ in her heart; and of David, that he hid the Commandments of God in his heart, Psal. 119. 11. Did not the wise Merchant hide the treasure, namely, Gospel-truth (Mat. 13. 44.) as soon as he had found it? It should seem all these concealed the word of God; how then is it that Job improves this, as a special point of comfort, that he had not concealed the words of the holy One?

There is a double hiding or concealment of the truth. There is first, a hiding from danger. Secondly, a hiding from use. There is a hiding to keep a thing safe, that others shall not take it from us; and there is a hiding to keep a thing close, that others may not take the benefit of it, with us. When it is said that Mary and David, and the wise Merchant hid the word of God, it was, lest they themselves should lose it, lest any should deprive them of it, they hid it from danger; they laid it up as a treasure in their hearts; but they did not hide it from the knowledge, or use of others: and that is it which Job affirms of himself; I have not concealed the words of the holy One.

And there are four wayes by which the word of God is sinfully hid or concealed, from all which Job seems to acquit himself.

The first is, When we conceal the word of God by our own silence; when we know the word and truth of God, and yet we draw a vail over them, by not revealing them: The Apostle Paul (Acts 20. 27.) acquits himself in this, to the Church of Ephesus, I have not shunned to declare unto you the whole counsel of God; and, v. 20. You know how I have kept back nothing that was profitable unto you. Silence to what is spoken, is consent; and silence when we should speak, is concealment.

There is a second way of concealing the word of God, and that is by silencing others. Some conceal the words of the holy One themselves, and they cannot endure that others should publish them. The chief Priests and Rulers, (Acts 4. 18.) charged Peter and John, that they should not speak at all, nor teach any more in the name of Jesus. They would stop the Apostles mouths from speaking the words of the holy One. These keep the truth lock'd up (as Christ chargeth the Lawyers, (Luke 11. 52.) by taking away the key of knowledge.

Thirdly, There is a concealing of the word of God, under false glosses and misinterpretations, or a hiding of it under errors and misconstructions. This is a very dangerous way of concealing the words of the holy One. The Pharisees made the Law of God of none effect by their expositions, as well as by their traditions; by the sence they made of it, as well as by the additions they made unto it.

Fourthly, The word of the holy One may be concealed in our practice and conversations. The Apostle exhorts (Phil. 2. 16.) To hold forth the word of life in a pure conversation. The lives of Christians should publish the word of life. The best way of preaching the word, is by the practice of the word. The wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness, that is, who by their unrighteous practices, and ungodly conversations, imprison, fetter, restrain and keep in the word. Mans holy life is the loudest proclamation of the word of God; and a sinful life is the concealment of it.

Job here acquits himself from all these concealments; I have not concealed the words of the holy One, either by my own silence, or by imposing silence upon others; I have not concealed the word of the holy One, by my own corrupt glosses or interpretations, nor by a corrupt practice or conversation; I have desired and endeavoured, that the whole word of God might be visible in my actions, and audible in my speeches, that I might walk cloathed, as it were, with the holy counsels and commandments of my God.

There is a reading of the words, different from this. Whereas we say, I have not concealed the words of the holy One, that gives it thus, I would not conceal the words of the holy One; and so the word of the holy One, is taken, not for the truths of God in general, but for that special word of decree or sentence which God should pass out against him; As if he had said, Let not God spare me, let him write as bitter a sentence against me, as he pleaseth, for my part, I would not conceal the word of the most high, but I would publish his judgment and sentence against me; yea, I would praise him and extol him for it. The Vulgar Latine to this sence, I would not contradict the word of the holy One; Let him not spare me, for as for my part, whatsoever God shall determine and resolve, whatsoever word God shall speak concerning me, I will never withstand or open my mouth against it. This is a truth, and carries in it a high frame of holiness; when we can bring our hearts to this, that let God write as bitter things against us as he pleaseth, we will never contradict his word or decree, but our minds and spirits shall submit wholly and fully to his dispositions of us, and dispensations towards us. It is as clear an evidence of Grace to be passive under, as to be active in the word of God; not to contradict his writ, for our sufferings, as not to conceal what he speaks for our practice. But I rather stick to the former interpretation, Job giving this as a reason of his great confidence in pursuing his petition for death, because he had been so sincere, holding forth the word of God both in doctrine and in life. And so we may observe from it, Malo potentialiter exponi omnia, utinam inquit, non parceret: Neque enim occultarem dicta sancti sed ejus in me sententiã prædicarem & laudarẽ. Merc.

First, That, The testimony of a good conscience is the best ground of our willingness to die.

That man speaks enough for his willingness to die, who hath hath lived ſpeaking and doing the will of God; and he is in a very miſerable caſe, who hath no other reaſon why he deſireth death, but only becauſe he is in miſery. This was one, but not the only reaſon, why Job deſired death; he had a reaſon tranſcending this, I have not concealed the words of the holy One, and I know if I have not concealed the word of God, God will not conceal his mercy and loving kindneſs from me. David bottoms his hopes of comfort in ſad times upon this, Pſal. 40. 9, 10. I have preached righteouſneſs in the great Congregation, I have not refrained my lips, O Lord thou knoweſt (he was not actively or politickly ſilent) I have not hid thy righteouſnes within my heart, (it lay there, but it was not impoiſoned or ſtifled there) I have declared thy faithfulneſs and thy ſalvation; I have not concealed thy loving kindneſs and thy truth from the great Congregation. Upon this, he falls a praying with a mighty ſpirit of believing, ver. 11 With-hold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O Lord; let thy loving kindneſs and thy truth continually preſerve me: for innumerable evils have compaſſed me about.

The remembrance of our active faithfulneſs to the truth of God, will bear up our hearts for hoping in the mercy of God. He that in David's and in Job's ſence can ſay, I have not concealed the words of the moſt High, may triumph over innumerable evils, and ſhall be more then a conqueror over the laſt and worſt of temporal evils, Death: God cannot long conceal his love from them, who have not concealed his Truth.

Secondly obſerve poſitively, That, The counſels of God, his truths, muſt be revealed.

God hath ſecrets which belong not to us, but then he puts them not forth in a word, nor writes them in his book; he keeps his ſecrets cloſe in the cabinet of his decrees and counſels; but, what he reveals either in his word, or by his works, man ought to reveal too. It is as dangerous, if not more, to conceal what God hath made known, as to be inquiſitive to know, what God hath concealed. Yea, it is as dangerous to hide the word of God, as it is to hide our own ſins. And we equally give glory to God, by the profeſſion of the one, as by the confeſſion of the other. Paul with much earneſtneſs profeſſes his integrity about this, as was even now toucht, Acts 20.

Fourthly obſerve, That, The ſtudy of a godly man is to make the word of God viſible.

I have not concealed, that is, I have made plain, I have revealed, or I have publiſhed the words of the holy One; Much of Job's mind is concealed under that word, I have not concealed. For in this negative there is an affirmative; as if he had ſaid, this hath been my labour and my buſineſs, my work in the world, to make known ſo much of the will of God as I know. This was the work of Chriſt here below; Father, I have glorified thee upon earth, I have finiſhed the work which thou gaveſt me to do, John 17, 4. What this work was, he ſhews, ver. 6. I have manifeſted thy name unto the men which thou gaveſt me out of the world.

Laſtly obſerve, That, It is a dangerous thing for any man to conceal the word of God, either in his opinion, or in his practice.

For it is, as if Job had ſaid, if I had ever concealed the words of God, I had been but in an ill caſe, at this time: God might now juſtly reveal his wrath againſt me, if I had concealed his word from others; or, God might juſtly hide his mercies from me, if I had hid his word from men. Smothered truths will one time or other ſet the Conſcience in a flame; and that which Jeremiah ſpake once, concerning his reſolution to conceal the word of God, and the effect of it, will be a truth upon every one, who ſhall ſet himſelf under a reſolution to do, what he under a temptation did, Jer. 20. 9. Then I ſaid, I will not make mention of him, nor ſpeak any more in his name: What follows? Then his word was in my breaſt, as a burning fire ſhut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing. If a gracious heart hath taken up ſuch a ſudden reſolution to conceal the word of God, he quickly repents of it, or ſmarts under it: He finds that word as a burning fire in his bones, he is not able to bear it; I was weary with forbearing (ſaith the Prophet) Nothing in the world will burden the conſcience ſo much as concealed truth. And they who have taken a meditated reſolution that they will not reveal the word of God, may be ſure, that word will one time or other, reveal it ſelf to them, in the light and heat of a burning fire, feeding upon their conſciences.

I have not concealed the words. Whoſe words? The words of the holy One. Who is that? The holy One is a Periphraſis for God. When you hear that Title, The holy One, you may know who is meant. This is a title too big for any but a God: All holineſs is in God, and God is ſo holy, that properly he only is holy; hence the Scripture ſets God forth under this, as a peculiar attribute, The holy One: The Prophets often uſe this addition or ſtile, The holy one of Iſrael.

The holy One, is One ſeparate or ſet apart from all filthineſs and uncleanneſs. No evil dwells with God, none comes near him; therefore he is The holy One. He is ſo ſeparated from evil, that he cannot behold evil, or look on iniquity, (Hab. 1. 13.) except with a vindictive eye. Sin never got a good look from God, or ever ſhall.

Further, God is called The holy One, in three reſpects. First, Becauſe he is all holy in himſelf. Secondly, Becauſe we receive all holineſs from him. Thirdly, Becauſe we are to ſerve him in holineſs and righteouſneſs all our dayes. A holy God muſt have a holy ſervice. God is the holy One.

Deus vocatur Sanctus Iſrael, vel Sanctus ſimpliciter, vel quod ſanctè à nobis colendus eſt, vel quod ipſe ſolus verè ſanctus eſt.

First, In his Nature; his eſſence is purity. Or, he is eſſential purity.

Secondly, He is holy in his Word: Thoſe are frequent adjuncts of the Word of God, holy, pure and clean.

Thirdly, He is holy in his Works: there is not the leaſt imaginable ſtain or defilement upon any thing he hath done.

Theſe three put together, lift up the glory of God in this Title, The holy One. He that is holy throughout in his Nature, holy in his Word, holy in his Works, is the holy One; yea, he is, as Moſes ſtileth him in his triumphant Song, Exod. 15. Glorious in holineſs, a glorious holy One.

Or again, We may conſider God, The holy One;

First, Radically and fundamentally, becauſe the Divine Nature is the root and original, the ſpring of all holineſs and purity. All holineſs is in God, and there is no holineſs to be had, but in God alone.

Secondly, God is The holy One, by way of example and pattern, or in regard of the rule and meaſure of holineſs, (1 Pet. 1. 16.) Be ye holy, as I am holy; the holineſs of God, it is the exemplar and pattern of all the holineſs that is in the creature.

Thirdly, God is The holy One, by way of motive: He is, as the rule of holineſs, ſo, likewiſe the reaſon of our holineſs; therefore another Scripture ſaith, Be ye holy, for I am holy; I am The holy One, and that is the reaſon, why you muſt be holy too.

Fourthly, God is The holy One effectively, becauſe he works, conveyes and propagates all holineſs to, and in the creature. Nothing can frame a heart to holineſs, but the finger of God. Man can no more make himſelf, or another holy, then he can redeem another or himſelf.

Fifthly, He is called The holy One by way of eminency or ſuper-excellency; becauſe his holineſs is infinitely beyond all the holineſs of men and Angels. Angels are holy, and God is pleaſed to ſay of men, that they are holy; but nor man nor Angel can be called The holy One. His ſuper-eminency in holineſs ſhines forth in ſuch beams and rayes as theſe.

First, Holineſs in God is not a quality, but his eſſence. Holineſs in Angels is a quality; the eſſence of many Angels continues, though their holineſs be loſt and vaniſhed; the lapſed Angels, who are now Devils, keep their nature, but their holineſs is gone; therefore holineſs was but a quality, or accidental to them: So, in the Saints, holineſs is an infuſion, a quality, a grace; moſt men never had any holineſs, and the man would remain though his holineſs ſhould be loſt. But in God, his eſſence and his holineſs are the ſame. The holineſs of God is the holy God, as the wiſdom of God is the wiſe God; and the power of God, is the powerful God. The Attributes of God, for our learning, are diſtinguiſhed from his Nature, but in him they are the ſame.

Secondly, God is The holy One eminently, above men and Angels, becauſe he is abſolutely perfect in holineſs. Abſolutely perfect; Firſt, Becauſe he is holy, extenſively (if we may ſo ſpeak of God) in all parts, he is holy throughout, and then he is holy intenſively; as he is holy in all parts, ſo he is altogether holy in every part. Holy men have holineſs in every part, yet they are holy but in part; and though Angels be holy in every part extenſively, and have alſo a perfection of holineſs, yet they have not an abſolute perfection of holineſs; therefore Angels themſelves are chargeable with folly, compared with God, chap. 4. 18. God is ſo light, that in him there is no darkneſs at all; he is ſo holy, that in him there is no unholineſs at all. But men, the beſt of men, all the Saints upon earth, have darkneſs with their light, and unholineſs mixed with their holineſs.

Therefore in the third place, the eminency of God in holineſs, appeareth in this, that, God is ever equally holy, ever in the ſame degree and frame of holineſs; Angels are ſo too, becauſe they are confirmed; and though at the preſent, the Saints are not, yet, when Chriſt ſhall ſet them up in that glorious eſtate, they ſhall keep the ſame frame for ever. But the Saints upon earth are unequally holy, ; for firſt, they are growing, their eſtate here is an encreaſing eſtate; they are more holy one year then another; as they grow more in knowledge, ſo in every grace: And then, in regard of the exerciſe, they are more holy at one time then at another. Which of the Saints hath not found, or doth not find much variety in his ſpirit? Now a heart enlarged in prayer, and anon ſtraightned, now a heart believing, and anon doubting; now humble, anon lifted up with pride, &c.

But as the holy One is perfectly and abſolutely holy, ſo, he is ever equally in the ſame degree and tenor of holineſs, not the leaſt variety or ſhadow of turning in him. Put all theſe together, and the title is clear, how God by an excellency, is called, The holy One. As he is ſo ſtrong, that all the power of the creature, compared with his, is weakneſs; and ſo wiſe, that all the wiſdom of the creature, compared with his, is folly; ſo he is ſo holy, that, compared with him, all holineſs is unholy, and he alone, The holy One. Hence obſerve,

First, That, The holineſs of man conſiſts in his conformity unto God.

Sanctitas dicitur per quam mens ſeipſam & ſuos actus applicat Deo.

Holineſs is our likeneſs to God, or the application of our minds and actions to God, as the Schools define it. God, the holy One, is (if we may ſo ſpeak) the ſtandard, the pattern, and the object of all holineſs. There is a twofold conformity to God in holineſs.

First, A conformity to the Nature of God.

Secondly, A conformity to the will of God, or to that which God wills. Theſe make up the total holineſs of the Creature.

First, Holineſs is our conformity to the Nature of God. And therefore Believers are ſaid to be partakers of the divine Nature (2 Pet. 1. 4.) This participation is our analogical reſemblance unto the Divine Nature; First, In his Attributes. Secondly, In his Affections. In his Attributes, when we are patient, merciful, juſt, faithful, true, loving, as God is. Theſe are the Image of God in us, and by theſe God becomes (as it were) viſible in man. As thoſe inviſible things of God, even his eternal power and God-head are ſeen in the things which are created; ſo, thoſe other inviſible things of God, even his eternal holineſs and purity, are ſeen in thoſe who are ſanctified. And in the ſame ſence that God ſpeaks of Magiſtrates, in regard of his power depoſited in their hands, I have ſaid ye are gods; we alſo may ſay of all the faithful, in regard of his holineſs infuſed into their hearts, ye are gods; and as to live or do ſinfully, is (as the Apoſtle phraſeth it) to walk (καὶ ἄνθρωπον) as men; ſo to live and do holily, is, in our ſphear to walk (κατὰ Θεὸν) as God. And as this holineſs ariſes from a reſemblance of God in his Attributes, ſo in Affections; when we love what God loves, when we hate what God hates; when what pleaſes God, pleaſeth us alſo; when what provokes his Spirit, provokes ours. This is holineſs.

Secondly, Holineſs is our conformity to the will of God. That is, to whatſoever God wills us either to do, or not to do. The will of God is the rule of holineſs, as his nature is the patern of it. His internal will, called by the School-men, The will of his good pleaſure, is the firſtly-firſt rule (as they ſpeak) his external will, or his will expreſſed and ſignified by his word, is the ſecondly-firſt rule of holineſs. Every action of man is holy or unholy, according to his conformity with, or variation from this will. There is no more holineſs in any work, then there is of the will of God in any work. To do holily, and to do the will of God, are the ſame. David, a holy man, is deſcribed by both theſe, Acts 13. 22. I have found David the ſon of Jeſſe, a man after mine own heart; there's conformity to the nature of God; which ſhall fulfil all my will; there's conformity to the will of God; the reſult of both is holineſs.

Sicut impuritas naſcitur ex contactu inferiorum, ut cum faties aut veſtis luto aſpergitur, vel cum anima, per affectus inferioribus inordinatè inhæret; ita puritas oritur ex contactu ſuperiorum, cùm affectus ad ſublimiora & nobiliora aſſurgit, & iis adhæret. Leſſ. De Perf. Div. l. 8. c. 1. Summa puritas conſiſtit in adhæſione cum Deo; nam Deus eſt ratio objectiva & menſura ſanctitatis. Leſſ. ubi ante.

Unholineſs and impurity ariſe from our conformity or adheſion to thoſe things, which are unclean and unholy: In externals and corporals, if a mans hand or his garment touch an unclean thing, he hath the mark or impreſſion of of that uncleanneſs upon his hand or upon his garment; and this likeneſs to an unclean thing, makes his hand or garment unclean: So for inward uncleanneſs or defilement, when the ſoul inordinately cleaves, and the mind drenches it ſelf in filthy things, or drinks in filthy objects: when our thoughts are ſteeped in puddle-waters, this defiles the mind, and makes our thoughts unclean; Our thoughts are ſuch, as the things they are familiar with: If they converſe with filthy and unclean things, with worldly and baſe things, the image and impreſſion of ſuch things is ſealed upon our thoughts, and the ſpring of them, our ſpirits. On the other ſide, by our converſing and reverend familiarity with Chriſt in holy Ordinances, we receive ſtamps and impreſſions of holineſs from him. When our hearts and affections are raiſed up and pitcht upon God, this makes them holy.

God is the Objective cauſe of holineſs; looking upon him, we become holy (2 Cor. 3. 18.) We (ſaith the Apoſtle) all with open face, beholding as in a glaſs, the glory of the Lord (that is, we looking upon that glory, holineſs and excellency which is in the Lord) are changed into the ſame image; that is, we are made conformable unto him: we receive (as it were) the engravings of holineſs upon our ſouls, by beholding the Holy One. The eye of faith (as well, yea more, then the eye of ſence) affects the heart. Laban's ſheep conceived according to the colour of the rods which lay before them in the water-troughs. Viſion aſſimilates both in Nature and in Grace, yea, and in Glory too. In heaven we ſhall be perfectly holy, becauſe we ſhall perfectly (in Chriſt, who is the expreſs image of his perſon) ſee God, and ſo be like him; that's the Apoſtles argument, 1 John 3. 1. We ſhall be like him, for we ſhall ſee him as he is. And proportionably here, ſuch as our viſions of God are, ſuch is our likeneſs unto God.

Secondly obſerve, They who want holineſs, muſt go to God for it; for he is the holy One.

Are any of your hearts unholy? whither will you go? To what Coaſt will you trade for holineſs? Or, where ſhall you find the merchadize of it? Go whither you will, go to what holy Ordinance, to what holy Duty, to what holy Miniſter you will, your veſſels will return unfraight and empty of holineſs, if you trade not to the holy God. We muſt deal with Ordinances, and by Ordinances; but, if we only have to do with them, neglecting to meet with God, we ſhall make nothing of them; we ſhall not traffique in them, to any ſpiritual enriching or advantage. Ordinances have a relative holineſs, or a holineſs paſſing through them; but they have no inherent holineſs, or holineſs paſſed by them; They are Conduit-pipes, not Springs, or the Well-head. Therefore, as when you would have mercy you go to the merciful God; as, when you would have pardon of ſin, you go to the ſin-pardoning God; as, when you would have wiſdom and light to direct your way, you go to the wiſe God, and the Father of lights: So, when you would have holineſs, and be made pure, whither will ye go, but to the pure and holy God? Be diligent in holy duties and holy ordinances, but ſtay not in them, paſs through them, and never reſt till you come to God in Chriſt, who is the Holy One; and he only can, and he hath ſaid he will make you holy.

Thirdly obſerve, All ſin and unholineſs are contrary to the very Name and Nature of God.

As Contrary

Contrary to the name of God, He is called holy; and contrary to the nature of God, He is the holy One. And in this, we ſee the reaſon, why God hates ſin with a perfect hatred; man hates that, which is contrary to his nature, and contrary to his name. And in this alſo we ſee the reaſon, why God is ſuch a ſevere avenger of ſin, He is the holy One: Can he (think you) take part with, or ſpare that which is contrary to himſelf? Sin, as much as in it lieth, puts God out of the world, therefore ſin is called God-murther, as being that, which would murther God: Sin would not allow him a being in the world, who gave the world its being. Sin (in the nature of it) is, The unholy thing, and God is, The holy One; theſe two muſt contend for ever: ſo far as things or perſons are unholy, they directly ſtrike at the being of God; Sin would put down all rule and all dominion but its own. Obſerve, Deicidium.

Fourthly, They who deſpiſe holineſs, deſpiſe God himſelf.

They who deſpiſe holineſs, deſpiſe the very glory of God; God is glorious in holyneſs, and this is his glorious Name, THE HOLY ONE. Some of the prophane, wretched Jews, derided and blaſphemed God, under this title; the Prophet had long threatned judgment, and had told them, that the holy God would be avenged on them for their filthineſs and profaneneſs, for their hypocriſie and idolatry. But when theſe wretches ſaw God delaying to come out, and bring forth the treaſures of his wrath againſt them, they fall a jearing, and they jear at God, under this title (Iſa. 5.19.) Let him make ſpeed, and haſten his work, that we may ſee it; as if he had ſaid, God is too ſlow, let him make more haſt, and let the counſel of the holy One of Iſrael draw nigh, and come that we may know it; him, that you have ſo often told us of, The holy One, let him make haſt and bring on his work. Without queſtion God came ſpeedily upon thoſe, and he will come ſpeedily upon all thoſe unclean ſpirits and tongues who blaſpheme that holy Name, The holy One. Hence we learn, Laſtly, Why none can ſee God, why none have any fitneſs for communion with God, but holy Ones, holy perſons.

The reaſon is, becauſe God is the holy One. That great Law is gone out from the mouth of God, Levit. 10. 3. I will be ſanctified in thoſe that come near me; why ſanctified? Becauſe God is the holy One; unleſs we ſanctifie God, we cannot draw nigh to God. As holineſs is a ſeparation from evil, ſo it is an approximation to the chiefeſt good. But ſome may demand, how can man ſanctifie God? God ſanctifies us, but can we ſanctifie him? We cannot ſanctifie God, as he ſanctifies us. We do not ſanctifie God by adding or communicating any holineſs unto him; but we ſanctifie God by acknowledging his holineſs, or by acknowledging that he is, The holy One; drawing nigh unto God with a holy heart, with holy affections, is the ſanctifying of God. For this is the language of ſuch preparation, I have a holy God to go unto, therefore I muſt have a holy heart to come unto him with; this is ſanctifying God: And that's the reaſon why none can ſee God, but they that are holy, Heb. 12. 14. Without holineſs, no man ſhall ſee the Lord; becauſe God himſelf is holy, therefore they cannot ſee God, who are unholy. There muſt be an inward holineſs, holineſs in the Organ, to take in the holineſs of the object; God firſt works holineſs in us, and then we behold him, the holy God: And that was the reaſon, why the Prophet (Iſaiah Chap. 6. When the voice proclaimed that thrice holy Name of God, Holy, Holy, Holy) cried out, I am undone, becauſe I am a man of unclean lips; I have an unclean heart, and how ſhall I ſtand before this holy, holy, holy God; this made his ſpirit recoyl, though he was a holy Prophet: If the remainders of unholineſs in him, made his ſpirit faint, when there was an appearance of the holy God: How will they that are nothing but corruption, or a lump of uncleanneſs, lying ſtill in the dregs of nature, be able to ſtand before God, The holy One, that holy, holy, holy One?

This is the ſum of the firſt reaſon, upon which Job grounds his requeſt to die, it was not the miſery he ſuffered, but the integrity in which he had lived. He had not concealed the words of the holy One, therefore as his affliction made his life troubleſom to him, ſo the goodneſs of his cauſe and conſcience, made death welcome to him.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14.

What is my ſtrength, that I ſhould hope? and what is mine end, that I ſhould prolong my life?
Is my ſtrength of ſtones? Or is my fleſh of braſs?
Is not my help in me? And is wiſdom driven quite from me?
To him that is afflicted, pity ſhould be ſhewed from his friend; but he forſaketh the fear of the Almighty.

JOB (as hath been ſhewed) in this context from verſ. 8. renews his former requeſt and deſire of death, confirming it by divers arguments: Some of which were opened in verſ. 10, eſpecially, that, from the clearneſs and integrity of his own conſcience, in that, he had not concealed the word of the holy One: He hath dealt faithfully in the cauſe of God, and therefore he was not afraid to appear before God. And his deſire did not hang about his lips, as if it would return and deny it ſelf: Therefore in verſ. 11. he puts forth two reaſons further, why he moves or re-enforces his motion to die. The firſt is grounded upon the ſmall hope he had to live long, if he ſhould deſire it, What is my ſtrength, that I ſhould hope? The ſecond is grounded upon the ſtrong hope, yea, aſſurance which he had, that it ſhould be well with him in death, or that death could be no dammage to him. And what is my end, that I ſhould prolong my life? Put theſe two together: And then conſider, is it any wonder, that a man in much miſery deſires to dye ſpeedily, when he hath no hope, no ground of hope, that he can live long, and when he hath no fear, no ground, no nor ſhadow of fear, that it ſhall be ill with him when he dies? This I conceive is the ſum and ſtrength of his reaſoning, contained in verſ. 11.

I ſhall now open the words diſtinctly.

What is my ſtrength, that I ſhould hope?

Some render it, What is my ſtrength, that I ſhould bear? I ſhould be able to ſuſtain this weighty burthen, this mighty load of affliction, preſſing my wounded ſoul, and wearied body? Thus it refers to his preſent ſufferings, to the enduring and ſtanding under, which he found his own ſtrength altogether inſufficient. And ſo the [כֹּחַ] in the Text, What is [my] ſtrength, ſeems to be oppoſed to ſome other ſtrength? As if Job had ſaid, Eliphaz you adviſed me (in the former Chapter, verſ. 8.) to ſeek unto GOD, and to commit my cauſe unto him, to ſeek help at his hands. Why, do you think I have not done that all this while? Do you believe that I have ſtood out theſe aſſaults in My own ſtrength? What is My ſtrength, that I ſhould bear? That I ſhould bear this burthen ſo long, as I have born it? Surely I have been held up by the power of God and prayer all this while; GOD hath put his everlaſting arms under me, otherwiſe I had fallen before this day, had I not prayed in aid from Heaven, I had not lived thus long upon the earth; for what is my ſtrength compared to theſe burthens which are upon me.

His ſuſtinendis impar ſum; hæc mea vita miſeriis obnoxia ſuſtentatur non meis viribus, ſed divina gratia, fide, dilectione in filium Dei. Pined.

This is a good ſence; for, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (Gal. 2. 10.) The life which I now live, I live by the faith of the Son of God. So Job ſeems to ſay, the life which I have lived, ever ſince the afflictions have encompaſs'd me, I have lived by the power of God, and the ſtrength of faith in him, What is my ſtrength, that I ſhould bear; We have this treaſure (ſaith the Apoſtle, 2 Cor. 4. 7.) in earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power, may be from God, and not from us; as he ſpeaks there, reſpecting the burthen of the Miniſtry: So we may, in reſpect of any burthen of trouble, or weight of affliction, We have theſe afflictions laid upon our earthen veſſels (and one would wonder, that an earthen veſſel ſhould not crack and ſhatter to pieces under them) but it is, that the excellency of the power might be from God, and not from us; when we are weak, then are we ſtrong, ſtrong in God, and in the power of his might. God loves to ſhew the world, what his ſtrength can do in a weak creature, as well, as what his grace and mercy can do for a ſinful creature.

This (I ſay) is a good ſence, but the word rather ſignifies to hope; and yet theſe two are not at any great odds: for for hope is the strength, the bearing strength of the soul: What is my strength, that I should hope? That I should wait and tarry, that I should expect and stay for such and such changes, as thou hast promised? Psal. 130. 5. we have these words put together, I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait; and in his word do I hope. The soul which is in a hoping condition, is also in a waiting condition; waiting and hoping ever attend the same thing. No man will wait at all for that of which he hath no hope, and he who hath hope, will wait alwayes. He gives not over waiting, till he gives over hoping. The object of hope is some future good, but the act of hoping is a present good, and that is present pay to bear our charges in waiting. So then, the word implies both a patient waiting, and a hopeful trusting. So Christ expounds it, Matth. 12. 21. rendring that of the Prophet, Isa. 42. 4. The Isles shall wait for his Law, thus, In his Name shall the Gentiles trust. Noah (after the strength of the deluge was spent) opened the window of the Ark, and sent forth the Dove, and she returned; then saith the Text, He waited seven dayes, and again he waited, yet other seven dayes, hoping at last the flood would be dryed up, and the waters return into their ancient channels. Now (saith Job) what is my strength, that I should hope or expect deliverance, and therefore, why should I wait for it. The waters of my afflictions are so deep, and swoln so high, that I have no hope to see dry ground again.

And in this passage he seems to answer, what Eliphaz spake in Chap. 5. vers. 16, & 25. (for doubtless Job applies himself exactly to what Eliphaz had spoken, and the truest interpretation of his answer will be in finding out, and suiting the references to what the other propounded) Eliphaz in Chap. 5. vers. 16. (where he makes a report of the wonderful works of God.) had said, So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth; and at vers. 25. he tells Job that a godly man (notwithstanding all his afflictions) may know that his tabernacle shall be in peace, and that his seed shall be very great. Job in answer to those words, replies; What is my strength, that I should hope. As if he had said, Eliphaz you speak of great hopes, that the poor may have; and you speak of a peaceable Tabernacle, of a flourishing off-spring: Alas, my condition is such, I am so worn out with pain, with sicknesses, with diseases, with distempers, with griefs, that I have no hope left, in regard of my strength in me, ever to enjoy such promises. What is my strength that I should hope? What is my strength that I should expect to live to see such good dayes, as you speak of; that my Tabernacle should be in peace, that I should have plenty, that I should have a numerous Issue? Alas, my strength is gone; what is my strength that I should look after these things. Not that Job measured all his hope by his own strength; but here he expresses the grief and pain, which was in his sensitive part, or upon his outward man, thereby to answer the sowre reproofs and sweet promises of Eliphaz: For we find Job himself in Chap. 13. vers. 13. resolving thus; Though he kill me, yet will I trust (or hope) in him; he would trust or hope in God, though he died; therefore he did hope while he lived. And it is the property of that grace (and where it is in strength, it shews as much) to hope against hope: Rom. 4. 18. Who against hope believed in hope; when there was no strength in Abraham, no possibility in nature, yet against hope, he believed in hope: So at this time there was such a grace in Job, he had a hope, by which he could hope against hope; but when he looked into his own stock of strength, What is my strength, that I should hope? I know the strength of God, is a rock sure enough for my hope to anchor in: Abraham said in effect, what is my strength, that I should hope to have a child? for he looked upon himself as a dead man, but, saith he, there is power in God; he knew his own weakness, but he considered it not, waxing strong in faith, and giving glory to God. So here, while Job saith, What is my strength that I should hope? my strength is dryed up and withered, and so is my hope in my own strength: The strength of God is vigorous and green, and in him my hope is also green and vigorous: Though all the earth about us be like a dry heath, and barren wilderness; yet our hope buds and blossoms like a plant, while it is rooted by the springs of heavenly promises.

And what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?

The letter of the Hebrew is, That I should prolong, or lengthen out my soul, that my soul should inhabit longer in the tabernacle of my body: The word prolong, is indifferently joyned to life, or dayes, Deut. 5. 16. Honour thy father and thy mother, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee, that, thy dayes may be prolonged, &c. Ezek. 12. 22. Son of man, what is that proverb that you have in the Land of Israel, saying, The dayes are prolonged, and every vision faileth? To prolong dayes, and prolong life, are the same. Yet here the word (Nepheſh) soul, which we translate, life, may be taken for desire, which is a vehement act of the soul. The soul expresses it self so much in desires, that the same word may express both. And so we may render Job's sence, thus, What is my end, that I should lengthen out, or extend, my desires any further after the things of this world: or that I should defer, and put off my desires after the things of the world to come: Is there any thing in this life worth my studying for it, or any thing so worthless in the next, that I should not wish presently to enjoy it? In this sence the word (Nepheſh) is often used, as Gen. 23. 8. Abraham speaks to the children of Heth; If it be your soul or your desire, we translate, if it be your mind, that I should bury my dead. So Prov. 23. 2. If thou be a man given to thy appetite, or whose desires are thy Lord and Master, as the elegancy of that place bears. And again, Psal. 27. 12. Psal. 41. 2. Eccl. 6. 9. The word is applied, to signifie the will or desire. So here,

What is mine end, that I should prolong my life, or my desire of life?

His [End] may be considered two wayes.

First, His End, may be taken for the latter part of his life, which Eliphaz promised would be very comfortable. Thou shalt come to thy grave in a good old age, as a stock of corn cometh into the store: As if Job should say, you are promising me good dayes, and a happy old age; but, what is mine end? what's the latter part of a mans life, that he should desire to prolong his dayes, to take it out? Why should I desire to prolong my life, I am now well stricken in years, and as for the end, the latter part of a mans life, it is nothing (for the most part) but trouble and sorrow? As old Barzillai (2 Sam. 19. 35.) when David offered him the pleasures of the Court, answers, I am thus old, and can I taste my meat, and taste my drink, and hear musick? What is the Fag-end of mans life, that one should hunger after it? The sweetest comforts of this life are in the fore-part of life, in the spring of youth, in the strength and flower of age; as for the the winter of life, what is that but wet and cold, but clouds and darkness? What is my end, (of old age) that I should desire my life to be prolonged or eeked out to that.

But rather, we may take this End, First, for the end of his troubles; as if he had said, What end so gainful or comfortable can I have of these evils, that should recompence my pains in bearing them, till I receive it? No worldly comforts can answer my sorrows; and therefore why should I desire to prolong my life for them.

Secondly, Take End, for the very last term of life, not that latter part or condition of a mans life, troublesom old age, as before; or a renewed estate as here. But take End, for the ending, the termination, the period of life; What is my End, that I should so prolong my life? and so End is as much as death, What is my death, that I should so desire to live? I know no evil in death, that should make me afraid of the end of my life; I know no such trouble in dying, that I should be desirous to spin out this troublesom life longer; surely the trouble and pain of death is not so much as the present trouble and pain of my life; and as for any other trouble, I fear none: then what is my end, that I should prolong my life, that I should not desire death, or that you should be so angry with me for desiring it? Hence Observe,

First, There is no strength in man, that may give him assured hope of long life.

What is my strength, that I should hope? No, though man be in the flourish of his age, the greenness of his years: yet what is youth, or strength, or beauty? what all those fair leaves and fruits which hang upon, and adorn this goodly tree, that he should hope to stand long? Man in his best estate, is altogether vanity, Psal. 39. 5. He that hopes to live upon any of these things, hopes in a vain thing, and trusts, but in a shadow. Our hopes to live this natural life as well as the spiritual, and eternal, must be in the living God. The Image of death sits upon the best of our strength and beauty; while we grow, we decline, and we flourish, we wither. The lengthning of our dayes, is the shortning of them, and all the time we live, is but a passage unto (and should be but a preparation for) death. We are most miserable, if in this life only we have hope; and we are most foolish, if our hopes of this life, be in our own strength.

And because there is no strength in nature, which may give us hope to live long; it is our greatest wisdom, to consider what provision we have in grace, to maintain our hopes, that we shall live for ever. They are in an ill case, who when they cannot hope to live long, care not to settle their hopes of living eternally. It is a most sad spectacle, to see a languishing body, and a languishing hope meet in one man. Some have a Kalender in their bones, shewing them, they have but few dayes here, and many distempers upon the whole body, crying in their ears with a loud voice, What is your strength, that you should hope to live? who yet prepare not at all to dye. They are both unready and unwilling to be dissolved, when they see no hope to keep up their Tabernacle from dissolution.

Secondly, (Taking the word in the last sence, which I conceive rather to be the mind of the Holy Ghost in this place) Observe,

> That, there is no evil in the death of a godly man, which should make him unwilling to dye, or which should make him linger after this life.

What is the end of a godly man, that he should prolong his life? All the bitterness of death is removed, or sweetned by Christ. Death the King of terrors, is made a servant, to let us in, to our comforts, by the power of Christ, that Prince of life, who hath aboliſhed death, and brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel. A believer buries all his fears of death in the grave of Christ. He looks upon death as the funeral of his sorrows, and the resurrection of his joyes. When the Psalmist had described the troubles and stormy conflicts of a godly man, together with the flourishing outward pomp of the wicked, he concludes with this advice, Marke the righteous man (observe him well, take special notice of him) the latter end of that man is peace; if his end be peace, there is nothing in his end, which can make him affraid of it, or put it off. All desire peace, they especially, who are wearied out with war. The life of the holiest man is a warfare, and his end is peace. Then what is his end, that he should prolong his life?

Patem te poscimus omnes.

When a worldly man looks upon his end, he saith, O what is my end, that I should desire to dye? His end is such, as makes him justly affraid to die. There is nothing in the end of a wicked man, but matter to feed the fear of death, and the desire of prolonging life, as long as he can. This is the reason, why, when God calls him to die, he is deaf at the call; yea, that call is death to him, before he dies. Lot had a mind to prolong his time in Sodom, it was a goodly City, and he was not well assured, whether to go, or how he should be lodged next night. This caused him to linger so long, till the Angels came and thrust him out: Natural men have all their portion and estates in the Sodom of this world. And if they hear a message of departing or going out, they linger and make excuses, they run behind the door, or hang about the posts, till God thrusts them out of the world, and pulls them from their pleasures by head and shoulders, as we say. They would never leave the world, if they might enjoy it, because they have nothing to enjoy beyond it.

A worldling groans, because he must be uncloathed of his house of earth; and the Saints groan earnestly, that they may be cloathed upon with their house from Heaven: Who would not be willing to exchange a suit of flesh, a suit of sack-cloath and sorrow, for a suit of glory, for a cloathing of immortality, and garments of everlasting praise.

Vers. 12. Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass?

These words may refer to the former part of vers. 11. What is my strength, that I should hope? What is it? Let us seriously examine and consider what my strength is, Is my strength the strength of stones, or is my flesh of brass? Am I made of such hard mettle, think you, that I am able to endure any thing? Only a body of brass, and sinews of iron, are strong enough to endure this trial. Stones and brass are hard bodies, and heavy bodies, they can bear blows and knocks without breaking; they yield not easily to the hammer; it is hard to make an impression upon them, with many, and those violent stroaks. To say a man is strong, as stones, or that he hath a body of brass, is to give him strength, which is not mans, and to set him two degrees below himself. Beasts are stronger, and can endure more hardship then man. Trees are stronger, and can endure more than beasts. Stones are yet stronger, and can endure more then trees. Therefore, while he asks, whether his strength be not only, like that of beasts, who have no reason; or like that of trees, which have no sence; but like that of stones and brass, which have no vegetation or growth, he puts it to the utmost: As if he had said, If a man had as much strength as a beast, or a tree, he must needs fall at these stroaks and troubles; but it seems, ye put me lower then beasts, or sensless trees, and that I can stand it out against all storms and batteries, like a stony rock, or a brazen wall. I confess, though the Ox loweth, when he wants fodder; and the wild Ass brayeth, when he hath no grass; yet the stone complains not, when ye give it no food; nor doth brass cry out when ye melt it in a furnace: unless you can find, that I am in nature like stones or brass, you have no reason to find fault with me. Allow me to be either man or beast, and you must allow me to be sensible of my sorrows, and destroyable by them. Only stones can be thus trampled on, and brass thus hammer'd without pain and dying.

Deficio, Saxeus aut Calybeus non sum. Lapides corpora sunt non solum gravia, sed robusta & dura, quæ non facilè cedunt aliis corporibus, unde robur lapidum pro duritia.

As when man (in his spiritual capacity) is said in Scripture to have a heart of stone, an iron sinew, a brow of brass. It notes him resolved, against all threats, and strong, against all oppositions of the word, to commit the evil of sin. So in this natural capacity, to say his strength is the strength of stones, notes him a man able to bear all the evils of trouble, and to stand against all the storms of tribulation.

Such kind of speaking is frequent among the ancient Writers, who, when they would express a man of undaunted courage, a man whose strength would not easily be broken, or his spirit be taken down: a man insuperable, whom no difficulties could overcome. Of such an one they say, he hath, an heart of brass, and a back of steel, he is a man made up of stones, born of a rock; he is a man of Adamant, he hath treble brass about his breast; as he was described, who first ventured in his ship to Sea. The common use of the word hath made it proverbial in all languages: for a man of more strength then is commonly found in man, or for a Master of dangers and extremities.

Job's question denies, Is my strength the strength of stones? Or is my flesh of brass? No, it is not: As if he had said, I am made of flesh and blood as well as others, I must shortly yield to these stroaks, I am not able to hold out and contend everlastingly with afflictions, I cannot stand against these assaults and batteries for ever; I am made of the same mould whereof your selves are, I am sensible how it is with me, I feel what I endure, and I cannot long endure what I feel, my strength is not the strength of stones. Note hence,

> First, Mans natural constitution makes him sensible of affliction, and subduable by it.

Mans body is no impregnable castle. We are not made of stones and brass, but of flesh and blood; I will not contend for ever (saith God, Isa. 57. 16.) neither will I be alwayes wrath. For the spirit should fail before me, &c. The Spirit of a man (that is his courage and resolution) is far stronger then his flesh, (namely his natural temper and constitution) and yet that cannot hold out for ever. The Spirit will come down whether we will or no, if God contend long with us: how then must the flesh wither like a leaf before him? And therefore, the bodies, the flesh and blood of the damned, who are to bear the wrath and contendings of God for ever; their flesh and blood (I say) are (in a sence) made spiritual, that is, they have more strength strength given them, then flesh and blood yield naturally, otherwise it were impossible for them to hold out for ever under the wrath of God, and the torment of their accursed condition. Their strength is made the strength of stones, and their flesh as brass, they are made immalliable: their sense of pain shall be admirably quickned, and yet they shall continue, as if they had no sence at all: they shall be for ever wounded, and never die of their wounds. As it is in reference to that everlasting misery, so in proportion to those temporal miseries, there is no strength of man, no flesh and blood, able to endure and hold out, if God lets out his hand to afflict, and put not under his hand to support.

Vers. 13. Is not my help in me? And is wisdom driven quite from me?

Locus difficilis si quis alius in hoc libro, & quem ego adhuc non intelligo. Drus.

This and the verse following, are of a very difficult construction and understanding, which caused a learned Interpreter to say, If there be any hard Text in the whole book, this is one; and after all his thoughts about it, he concludes with this ingenious acknowledgment, I do not yet understand the meaning of it.

First, As we read it, the Text seems to carry an harsh connexion with the words fore-going. There Job queries, Is my strength the strength of stones? And yet immediately to say, Is not my help in me? sounds incongruous. For if he had help in him, he had strength in him, and such as might well be called, the strength of stones, extraordinary strength. So then, Job having said with his last breath, that he had no such strength; how is it, that here he should say, and more strongly affirm, that he had such strength, so much this question implies; Is not my help in me? As if he had said, do not I know which way to help my self? How to extricate my self out of this condition?

Besides, how is this a truth? For there is no man that hath his help in himself, not help enough in himself for any natural work, much less for any spiritual work, and most of all less for the holy carriage of their heart under affliction, or to deliver himself from it. Man hath no help in himself. The voice of the Church is, Our help standeth in the Name of the Lord; and the voice of David was, The Lord is my helper; how then doth Job say, Is not my help in me? Mans ruine is of himself, but how unlike is this to the voice of truth, to say, My help is in my self? We can undo our selves fast enough, but we cannot repair and make our selves up again.

Nor can any creature be our help, no Man, no Angel can be our help. God reproveth the Jews, Isa. 31. For going down to Egypt for help, though they were a strong people: Certainly it is as bad, for a man, to make himself his help, as to make another man his help. How then shall we give a wholsom understanding of these words, Is not my help in me? And is wisdom driven quite from me?

Nonne auxilium meum in me? sc. fuit. Vatab. Nonne quoad potui me juvi, minimè fui pusillanimus, me quoad fieri potest & erigo & sustento.

For the clearing of it. Consider the divers readings. Some thus, Was not my help in me? And so they make the meaning to be this; Did not I help my self, as much as I could? Was I faint-hearted and cowardly? Did I sink as a man of a poor spirit under the burden? Did not I put my self forth to the uttermost that I could, to stand under these troubles and afflictions? There is much in that, for some men do not help themselves as they might, but their own spirits sink, and their hearts fail; yea, their hearts fail before their strength fails. Job disclaims this, I did not so, I helpt my self while I was able, I put out the utmost of my power, to bear and set a good face on't, as long as ever I could, Was not my help in me?

Nonne in ipso confidebam, sed adjutorium a me recessit, negavit me misericordia & visitatio Domini despexit.

The Septuagint, with the Greeks in general, refer these words to God, making Job speak thus, Did not I trust in him? But my help is departed from me, and the mercy of the Most High hath with-drawn it self from me. As if he had said, I never put my trust in my self, nor did I promise my self great matters, as from my self; for, alas! What is my strength? I am acquainted well enough with mine own frailty, but that which I only trusted to, hath left me; I trusted unto God, and unto his help, now he seems to forsake and withdraw his assistance from me. But I leave this with the Authors, it hath little authority with me, or sutableness to the course and tenour of Job's spirit under these afflictions.

The Vulgar translates the whole verse negatively, and so it makes a plain and good sence. Whereas we read it interrogatively, Is not my help in me? &c. He reads it thus, Behold, my help is not in me, and my friends who should help me, are departed from me; That which we translate wisdom, Is wisdom departed from me? He translates friends, my friends, who should be my helpers, are departed from me. And so the meaning of all is, as if Job had said, I cannot help my self, and they who should, have deserted me. And so connects or joyns it with that, which went before; What is my strength, that I should hope? my strength is not the strength of stones; there is no help in me, and they who should help me, are departed from me; I was once an eye to the blind, and a foot to the lame (Chap. 29 15.) When a man hath no help in himself, he may have it in another; If a man want an eye, he may have an eye of his neighbour; and if he want a hand, his friend may be a hand to him; but (saith Job) they that should be eyes and hands, helpers unto me, are gone and departed from me.

Ecce non est auxilium mihi in me & necessarii quoque mei recesserunt à me. Vulg.

There is yet another rendring, which makes a very clear sence; What though I have not help in me, is wisdom driven quite from me? Though I have no strength, and so no help in my self, wisdom is not therefore driven quite from me. As if he had said, Will you conclude that I am a wicked man, an hypocrite and a fool, because I am not able to help and deliver my self out of these troubles?

An non auxilium meum in me quo me tueri possim ac defendere, innuit innocentiam suam ac vitæ integritatem, quâ nunquam destitutus fuit, aut rectam rationem & sapientiam quâ postea Tubal Appellat. Drus. An judicio & ratione destituor ut dignoscere nequeam recta ab insulsis qualia sunt verba vestra, non sine mentis inopia?

Fifthly, Consider the words as we translate them, with which most of the Rabbins and Jewish Writers concur, only they usually express the Text affirmatively, we interrogatively, yet both equivalent, and meet in the same meaning. Our Question, Is not my help in me? is to be resolved into this affirmation, My help is in me; and the latter branch, Is wisdom departed from me? into this negation, Wisdom is not departed from me: Job's sence may be taken thus; Have not I that in me, which is, and will be a help unto me, notwithstanding all the objections and assaults which you make against me? Have not I that in me, which may furnish me with wisdom to answer all the exceptions which you have taken at my complaints? Mr. Broughtons translation favours this sence very much, Have not I my defence? and is judgment driven away from me? Though I thus complain, and desire death, yea renew my desire; Have not I my defence? Have I nothing to say, why I made this request? Have I no Argument to help my self, and bear up my spirit under the weight of these calamities? Is wisdom quite departed from me? Do you take me for a man deserted of God, deserted of his spirit, and deserted of my own wisdom and understanding too; because I am deserted of the world, and destitute of outward comforts? And so the help which Job knew he had in store, was the innocency and integrity of his heart, Is not my help in me? I have no help, no strength, no comfort in my flesh? what is my flesh? My flesh is not of brass, but have I no help in me neither? my outward man is destroyed, my house of clay is almost battered down, tottering, falling it is; but have I nothing within to help at a dead lift? have I no grace, no hope, no testimony of a good conscience, no witness in my self? Do you think me clean disrobed and stript, and emptied of all wisdom and comfort? Hath the Devil, think you, robbed me of my grace? Have the Sabeans plunder'd and spoyled me of my understanding? Is not my help within me, notwithstanding all the troubles that are upon me? Thus the interpretation is fair and clear, that when all his outward comforts were gone, when the strength of his flesh could hold no longer; yet then he had help within him; and his spirit could bear, though his flesh could not. Grace can hold out beyond Nature; and when bodily strength can do no more, wisdom comes in with her Auxiliaries.

Is not my help in me? and is wisdom departed from me?

The word [Wisdom] in the Hebrew, is of various significations, as was touched, Chap. 5. 12. Here one renders it, The Law is not departed from me. As if his meaning were, I never forsook the Law of God. Another thus, Was my duty driven from me? As if his meaning were, I ever kept close to the rule of my place and calling. A third, Is my substance driven from me? So a fourth, Is my ability of subsisting gone from me? As if he had said, Cannot I live, because I have not the world to live upon? To which ſence thoſe words of Chriſt are appliable, Luke 12. 15. The life of man conſiſts not in the abundance of the things which he poſſeſſeth: All which Interpretations meet to make up a compleat Apology of Job's piety, conſtancy, patience, and flouriſhing reſolutions in his dying, withering condition. The Sabeans drove away his cattel, but they could not drive away his underſtanding; they offer'd violence to his ſubſtance, but his reaſon and his graces were untoucht. Hence Obſerve,

First, Then when all outward helps depart from a godly man, he hath ſomewhat abiding in him, to help and ſtay up his heart.

As when the outward glory and ſtrength of the Church is utterly decayed, Yet (the Prophet tells, Iſa. 6. 13.) in it ſhall be a Tenth, as a Teyle-tree, and as an Oak whoſe ſubſtance is in them, when they caſt their leaves, ſo the Holy Ghoſt ſhall be the ſtrength thereof. Thus alſo, when the outward glory and ſtrength of any true member of the Church, is utterly decayed; even then, he ſhall be as an Oak, his ſubſtance ſhall be in him, the ſeed of holineſs ſhall be his ſubſtance. Is not my help in me? I know my eſtate is gone, my beauty is gone, my ſtrength is gone, the ſtrength (I mean) of my fleſh, yet I have inviſible ſupports, ſomewhat unſeen to truſt unto. It is the comfort of believers, that they have an eſtate, riches and poſſeſſions, lying as far beyond the reach of mens power, as their eye; and as far beyond the reach of Satans malice, as either. When they feel nothing but pain in the fleſh, when nothing but weakneſs inhabits the houſe of clay, the outward man; then the inward man is renewed with ſweet refreſhings, and ſtrong conſolations day by day. The ſpirit of a man (of a godly man) will bear his infirmities, when his body cannot. The ſtrength of nature is not the ſtrength of ſtones, nor is it the fleſh of braſs; but the ſtrength of grace is ſtronger then the ſtrength of ſtones, and the ſpirit is more durable then braſs: Grace wears not out by uſing, nor doth it ſpend by imploying: Afflictions are but the higher ſervices and employments of Grace. A ſtock of grace is an inexhauſtible treaſure, and a good heart aſſures us better then the bars of a Caſtle. Faith and a good conſcience, are (under Chriſt) our beſt helps in trouble; they are friends that will never forſake us: They are to us as their Author, who hath promiſed that he will not. Grace is our participation with the Divine Nature, and grace participates with the Divine Nature in this, it is an unchangeable good, an everlaſting comfort.

And yet we muſt take this warily, grace and holineſs, faith and a good conſcience, are not to be truſted upon, no more then riches or any outward means. We may make an idol of our faith, and a vain thing of a good conſcience. The meaning then is, faith and a good conſcience are our beſt helps and friends, becauſe faith carries us unto Chriſt who is our beſt help. Faith pitches upon Chriſt, and a good conſcience feaſts us in the favour of God. Faith alone is no help, but faith is our help, becauſe it is not alone: Grace left alone, would be our ſtrength, but little more then nature is; and our ſpirit little more then the fleſh: And therefore our comforts are not to be reſolved in this; That we have grace in our hearts: but into this, That we and our graces are in the hands of Chriſt. Faith can live no where but upon Chriſt; that which faith reſpects as our help, is Chriſt, in whom we believe, not the act of believing. We are helped by the grace within us, but the grace within us, is not our help. Obſerve, Secondly, A godly man in the darkeſt affliction or night of ſorrow, finds a light of holy wiſdom to anſwer all the objections of his enemies, and the ſuſpitions of his friends.

Is wiſdom departed quite from me? Do you think I have nothing to ſay? nothing to reply by way of apology for what I have done or ſpoken?

Though Job had many afflictions upon him, and friends againſt him, yet ſee how he recollects himſelf, Is not my help in me? He makes out the goodneſs of his cauſe in the midſt of a thouſand evils, and can plead his own integrity in the throng of many jealouſies and contradictions. Is not my help in me? Do you think you have ſo daunted me, that I am not able to make out my own eſtate? or that I know not what I am? The truth is, ſometimes God leaves his ſervants in ſo much darkneſs, for their trial and exerciſe, that they cannot ſee their own eſtates, but cry out, they are loſt and undone; many a good ſoul cannot reflect upon his graces, or get his heart into any communion with Chriſt in promiſes. This is walking in darkneſs, and ſeeing no light. As our ſins are ſometimes ſecret to us, ſo alſo our graces may. But let a man be encompaſſed with never ſo many afflictions, yet if his ſpirit be free, he is able to judge of his own intereſts, through all the black clouds which hang over him, through all the diſtractions and confuſions that are about him. The eye of faith is uſually quick in a dark night. And while trouble is near at hand, beholds Chriſt near at hand. He can never be without help, who carries his help about him, or within him. Nor can he utterly want counſel to direct him, whoſe heart is a Counſel Table, where Chriſt (the wiſdom of God) is ever Preſident in the Chair. My worldly comforts are quite driven from me, but wiſdom is not: I am afflicted, and therefore ſhould not be thus ſuſpected, but pitied.

Verſ. 14. To him that is afflicted, pity ſhould be ſhewed from his friend; but he hath forſaken the fear of the Almighty.

This verſe begins the third Section of the Chapter, wherein Job draws up a ſtrong charge againſt his friends, for their uncharitableneſs. See the progreſs and links of this Diſcourſe.

First, He refuted and anſwered their objections againſt him, from the firſt to the eighth verſe.

Secondly, He renewed his complaint, which was the ground of all their objections, from the eighth verſe unto the end of the thirteenth.

Here at the fourteenth verſe he begins a charge againſt his friends of unkindneſs, indiſcretion, yea of cruelty in managing this diſpute againſt him. He giveth it firſt in general, or by way of preface; To him that is afflicted, pity ſhould be ſhewed from his friend. But he hath forſaken the fear of the Almighty: As if he had ſaid, You ſhould have dealt otherwiſe with me then you have, in this caſe; though (bleſſed be God) I find help within me, God hath given me the light of his Spirit, and wiſdom to diſcern my own condition, yet it is no thank to you: I have found no help in my friends, you have dealt unfriendly with me: you ſhould have pitied me, but you have oppoſed me, and ſo forſaken that duty which the fear of the Almighty teaches. He proceeds to illuſtrate this more particularly, by way of ſimiltude, comparing his friends to a brook, whoſe waters fail when we are a thirſt, or when there is moſt need of water.

To him that is afflicted.] The word ſignifies, Him that is melted: And the reaſon is, becauſe affliction diſſolves the ſpirit of a man, and (as it were) melts his heart, therefore it is called the fire of affliction: To be diſſolved or melted, and to be afflicted, are the ſame. And that effect is aſcribed to fear, and trouble of ſpirit, ariſing from affliction, Pſal. 22. 15. My heart (ſaith David, a type of Chriſt) in the midſt of my belly, is like melting wax: By reaſon of the heat and greatneſs of his trouble, and the anguiſh of his ſpirit, he was as mettle melted in a furnace. At the defeat of the Iſraelites before Ai, it is ſaid, the hearts of the people melted, and became as water, Joſh. 7. 5. And in Pſal. 6. verſ. 6. David cryes up the exuberance of his ſorrows, by this word, I melted or watered my couch with tears. Thus the Prophet threatning a day of great fear againſt Jeruſalem, tells them, They ſhall be, as when a ſtandard-bearer fainteth, Iſa. 10. 18. When the battel waxes hot, and a vanquiſht army is running and crying for quarter, the ſtandard-bearer is in greateſt danger, all make up to him, and then he fainteth, or melteth away with fear. * Tributes and taxes are expreſt in the Hebrew by a word coming from this root, becauſe if heavily impoſed, they melt away the eſtates of a people. † It is a witty obſervation, that whereas ſome of the Papiſts conceive their word [Maſs] was derived from this Hebrew word [Maſſas] which ſignifieth to melt; one of ours anſwers, let it be ſo: It ſuites this ſence of the word exactly, and the effect of that abominable Idolatry; for the Maſs hath diſſolved and melted away truth and piety out of the Popiſh territories.

To him that is afflicted [pity should be shewed.] That word Pity in the Hebrew, signifies a sacred sweet affection of mercy, benignity, goodness and piety: And by contraries (in which sence words are often used in that language) it notes, First, Reproach, Prov. 14. 34. Sin is (Chesed) a reproach to any people: Secondly, Impiety and cruelty, harshness and severity: Thirdly, It signifies any abominable wickedness (Levit. 20. 17.) where Moses speaking of incest, incest between brother and sister, calls that abomination by this word (Chesed) A wicked thing. That may have a good name, the nature whereof is so ill, that it is not to be named.

Further, the word, as we translate, imports more then a bare act of pity or commiseration; as suppose a man see his brother in misery, compassionates him, but relieves him not; this is no pity. Such the Apostle James describes, in Chap. 2. vers. 15. If a brother or a sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and you say unto them, Be filled, be warmed, be clothed: Poor creatures, ye are hungry, ye are naked, I pity you, I am sory to see you thus; be filled, be cloathed, I wish it were otherwise with you; and yet in the mean time, he gives them nothing wherewith either to cloath or feed them. Is this fulfilling the law of love? Is this charity? Nothing less. The pity here spoken of, is not a verbal pity; our saying to a brother in trouble, be comforted, or, I would course were taken for you, I wish you well with all my heart, ; and so we bestow a mouthful of good words, but not so much as a morsel of bread, or a cup of cold water. Good words alone are cheap charity to a mans expence, and they are so cheap in Gods esteem, that they will not be found of any value at all in the day of reckoning: good words, not realized, if they be found any where, will be found in the treasury of wrath. This is not the pity which (Job teacheth us) should be shewed to him that is afflicted. The Apostles question shakes such out of all claim to this Grace, 1 John 3. 17. Whosoever (saith he) hath this worlds goods, and seeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how doth the love of God dwell in him? Though a mans mouth be open with good words, yet if he shut his bowels from good deeds, there's no love to God or man hous'd in that mans heart. It is no pity (to speak of) only to speak pity; and therefore the Apostle adds, ver. 18. My little children, let us not love in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth; that's the true meaning of this word, To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed; but you (my friends) have not given me so much as the sound of pity; you have not bemoaned me, much less have you relieved me, which is the substance of pity, real pity: you have not loved me in tongue, giving me good words, much less in deed and in truth. Deed-pity is both the duty and the disposition of a godly man; therefore this word (Chesed) in the concrete, is often used in Scripture, to signifie a godly man; he is one that hath obtained much grace and pity from the Lord, and he is kind, gracious and pitiful unto men. The holy Proverb assures us, That a good man is merciful, pitiful to his beast, but much more to a man; and most of all to a godly man who is his brother in the neerest bond. And it is considerable how this word was used by way of distinction among the Jews, who cast their whole people or nation into three ranks, (and it is grounded upon Rom. 5. 6, 7. Where the Apostle alludes to those three sorts.) First, There were (Reshagnim) ungodly men, the prophane rabble. Secondly, There were (Tsadikim) righteous men. And thirdly, There were (Chasidim) good men, or pitiful men. Scarcely (saith the Apostle) will one die for a righteous man, for a man fair and just in his dealings? peradventure (for one of the Chasidim) for a good man some one may chance to die: He that had been pitiful, might (haply) find pity; and having done so much good in his life, all would desire he should live still. But herein God commended his love to us, that while we were yet sinners (Reshagnim) in the worst rank of men, Christ died for us. No man had either love or pity enough to die for them who had so much impiety. The farthest that the natural line of mans pity can reach, is to do good to those who do him good, or are good.

Pity, notes out such a sort of men, and such a sort of actions as are fullest of love, of bowels of brotherly kindness and compassion; hence the Stork, which by divers of the Ancients was put for the Emblem of love and benignity, is expresst in the Hebrew by this word, Lev. 11. 19. The Stork is very tender toward her young ones, and her young ones are as tender of her when she is old, as Naturalists have observed. So then, this word imports the height of all offices and affections of love from man to man, especially from Christian to Christian, in times of trouble, and cases of extremity. This pity you should have shewed me, saith Job.

But he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty.] That is, he forsakes all godliness, goodness and religion; fear takes in all that's good; and so it is conceived, that Job retorts the words of Eliphaz in the fourth Chapter, Is this thy fear? or, where is thy fear, thy religion? Now Job saith, Is this your fear? You have forsaken the fear of the Almighty. Is this your Religion, to deal so harshly with a distressed friend, or to give him such cold comfort? Surely you have forsaken that fear of the Almighty, which you have charged me with. Have not I reason to ask, Is this thy fear? or to conclude, You have forsaken the fear of the Almighty.

These words are diversly rendred. Some thus, He that takes away pity from his friend, hath forsaken the fear of the Almighty. And that's a truth, and a good sence; though not so clear to the letter of the Text.

Qui tollit ab amico suo misericordiam, timorem Domini derelinquit. Vulg.

Mr. Broughton joynes this with the former verse, By him whose mercy is molten toward his friend, and who leaveth the fear of the Almighty. So referring this (melting) to mercy, and not to the man, joyning it to the former thus, Have not I my defence, and is judgment driven away from me, by him whose mercy is molten away toward his neighbour, and who leaveth the fear of the Almighty? As if Job had said, Eliphaz, dost thou think thou hast driven away all wisdom from me by thy dispute? dost thou think that I have lost my reason, as thou hast lost thy pity? Thou thinkest wisdom and understanding have forsaken me; but it appears by thy dealings, that thou hast forsaken the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdom.

An dissoluto à sodali suo convitium, & quod timorem omnipotentis deseruerit? An hoc amicitiæ jus? &c. ut nunc ego à vobis audio. Merc.

Thirdly, It is rendred in the contrary sence. The word (Chesed) being taken for reproach and harsh dealing, and so the meaning is made out with a kind of admiration, thus; Should reproaches be cast upon a man that is afflicted, from his friend? should he be told that he hath forsaken the fear of the Almighty, and that wisdom is driven from him? Do you think I am not able to discover your dealings? should you go about to reproach me in this condition? should you tell me thus harshly, that I am departed from the fear of God? Is this think you, a fair carriage towards me, when you saw me melted and afflicted, you should have given me sweet and comfortable words, not reproachful words.

Job (according to this sence) found his friends dealing with him as the Jews with Christ, to whom being athirst, they gave vinegar to drink; or, as David in the type speaks, They gave me gall for my meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink: here seems to be a like meaning; you have given me reproaches in stead of comforts, slandered me in stead of refreshing me; and is this the course you should take? As Absolom said to Hushai, 2 Sam. 16. 17. Is this thy kindness to thy friend? when he seemed to fall away from David unto him. So Job might speak to Eliphaz, Is this thy kindness to thy friend, to load him with reproaches, when you see him overladen with afflictions?

Qui tabescit ab amico suo probro, etiam timorem omnipotentis relinquet? Fœlices sortes videntur sapere, miseri desipere.

A fourth thus, Shall he that consumes by reproaches of his friend, forsake the fear of the Almighty? The meaning whereof is this, Do you think that all men, whose riches and comforts are lost, have lost their reason and judgment? And do you think that they who are reproach'd by men, do not fear God? The world commonly judges none wise but those that are rich; and that they fear God most, who rejoyce most. But my practice and example (I doubt not) shall confute that opinion, and give all the world to know, that a man consumed and spent by the reproaches of men, and the stroaks of God, may yet fear God, and keep up his stock to the full in holiness and wisdom.

Fifthly, This melting is referred, not to the pity of his friends, but to Job melting or consuming, by that which they called pity; thus, Contabescens charitas, non tam dicitur ergà quem socii charitas contabescit, quam qui per socii charitatem præpositam (scilicet) & sine scientia exercitam contabescit. Cocc.

Shall he be charged to have forsaken the fear of the Almighty, who consumes by the charity of his friends? that is, who is more afflicted by the counsels which his friends

(in

(in love) give him, then by all his other afflictions. As the mercies of the wicked are alwayes cruel (Prov. 12. 10.) ſo ſometimes the mercies of the godly are; eſpecially when they give prepoſterous and indiſcreet counſel; and this interpretation ſuits well with the title which Job gave his friends, Miſerable comforters are ye all, Chap. 16. 2. That is, you have done your good will to comfort me, but God hath not ſhewed you the way, nor given you the tongue of the learned, that ye might know how to miniſter a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary; and ſo notwithſtanding all your good intentions, ye have added to my miſeries.

Hunc diſſolutũ (præ doloribus) ab amico ejus (exhibenda) miſericordia (derelinquit) & (eundem diſſolutum) timor Saddai derelinquit.

A ſixth thus, That pity which friends ſhould ſhew this man melted with afflictions, hath forſaken him; but hath the fear of the Almighty forſaken him alſo?

Horum duorum verſiculorum terminos ita digerimus, ut in poſteri, vox diſſolutus ſit maſculini generis, & accuſativi caſus, regaturque à verbo derelinquit: cujus duo nominativi ſint, miſericordia & timor Saddai, illa vero diſſolutus ſit Job loquens de ſeipſo in tertia perſona, Apparet ex hac explicatione ל cum nominativo, ut in ולשרים Iſa. 31. 1. & Ezra 1. 5. Coc.

The meaning whereof may be made out to this effect, as if Job had ſaid thus, You plainly ſee, that there is no help in me, for my pains and unceſſant troubles have quite bereaved me of all that ſtrength, upon which I ſhould naturally ſubſiſt; and as for you (my friends) that pity and compaſſion which you ſhould afford a man thus melted with ſorrows, is quite fled and gone from your hearts and lips. But what then? Is the fear of God departed alſo from this ſorrowful ſoul? It is confeſs'd, ſtrength is gone from my body, and I ſee pity towards me is gone from your ſouls. O how miſerable then were I, if I ſhould go from my God, and forſake his fear! You ſhall ſee, that though the pity of men hath forſaken me, a melted man, yet (as you object) the fear of God hath not.

Vau apud Hebræos variè ſumitur, & interdum pro alioqui.

A ſeventh reading, varying from ours only in a word, gives the ſence very fair and eaſie. To him that is afflicted, or melted, pity ſhould be ſhewed by his friend, otherwiſe he forſakes the fear of the Almighty. Whereas we ſay, [but he forſaketh] this tranſlation ſaith, [Otherwiſe he forſaketh] the fear of the Almighty; that is, if a man do not ſhew pity to his friend in affliction, that man ſheweth that he hath forſaken the fear of the Almighty. Thus, as I hinted at the entrance of this paſſage, Interpreters are much divided about the Grammatical conſtruction of theſe words; there is a truth in every ſence given, and their variety may teach us to adore the fulneſs of the holy language, which leads our thoughts ſo many wayes, as alſo to be humbled for our own blindneſs of mind, and narrowneſs of heart, to ſee or comprehend the mind of God fairly written to us.

But I take the laſt to be the cleareſt meaning of Job in this paſſage, and that, to which moſt of the former are reducible, and therefore ſtaying upon this ſence, I ſhall give two or three Obſervations from it.

Firſt, It is the common duty of friends, and the ſpecial duty of godly friends, to pity and help one another in affliction.

I ſay, to pity and help (for that's the compaſs of the word) we have not done our duty in pitying the diſtreſſed, unleſs we come to real aſſiſting them. We ſatisfie not our obligation to the bond and law of love by giving comfortable words. As that faith, which is alone without works, doth not juſtifie us; ſo that pity which is alone without works, doth not juſtifie our faith; ſuch empty pity will go for little better then cruelty, and not to help, will be interpreted oppreſſion. Word-pity is but the leaf of love, Deed-pity is the fruit of it. As we ſhould labour to be filled with all the fruits of righteouſneſs, which are by Chriſt; ſo with all the fruits of love, of compaſſion, and of tenderneſs, for theſe alſo are by Jeſus Chriſt, unto the glory and praiſe of God, Phil. 1. 11. Obſerve,

Secondly, That, the fear of God is ever joyned with love to our brethren.

True religion (that we mean by fear) hath a double bond in it, a bond of obedience to God, and a bond of love to men. The Apoſtle puts ſo much of religion in the latter, that in one place he makes it all religion, the very definition of religion, Jam. 1. 17. Pure religion and undefiled before God (what is it?) It is this, to viſit the fatherleſs and the widow in their affliction. This is religion and pure religion, that is, this is a great branch of religion, and a ſpecial fruit, which ſprings from that goodly tree, Religion. To viſit the fatherleſs, is more then to look upon them, and to ask them how they do: To viſit them is to help them: It is like that viſit (in its proportion) which Chriſt made into the diſtreſſed world. He viſited and redeemed his people, or he viſited his people to redeem them. And the fatherleſs, to whoſe viſit religion leads us, are not only poor children, or Orphans, whoſe parents are lately dead, and they not able to ſhift for themſelves; but the fatherleſs are all the afflicted, who want our help, or patronage. Every helpleſs and comfortleſs ſoul is as an Orphan without parents, as a widow without an husband, To relieve ſuch is pure religion. In the 1 Joh. 4. 20. the Apoſtle makes that an everlaſting conviction againſt any man, that he loves not God, if he loves not his brother; If a man ſay he loveth God, and hateth his brother, (there is no medium in this point, between hating and not loving, or between hating and not helping, if it be in our power) he is a lyar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath ſeen, how can he love God whom he hath not ſeen? Job puts it ſo here, you ſhould ſhew pity to your friend in affliction, but you forſake the fear of the Almighty; and where the fear of God is not, the love of God is not. Love to God is viſible in love to man. And in affliction the love of man to man is made moſt viſible. A true friend can hardly be diſcovered in proſperity, and a falſe friend can hardly be hid in adverſity. Obſerve, Laſtly, It is not enough, not to be cruel to, or to grieve the afflicted.

We muſt ſhew them favour, and do them good. The light of nature condemns the oppreſſor, and the light of Religion condemns them who ſhew no pity.

VERS. 15, — 22.

My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the ſtream of brooks that paſs away;
Which are blackiſh by reaſon of the Ice, and wherein the Snow is hid.
What time they wax warm, they vaniſh: when it is hot, they are conſumed out of their place.
The paths of their way are turned aſide; they go to nothing, and periſh.
The Troops of Tema looked, the Companies of Sheba waited for them.
They were confounded, becauſe they had hoped; they came thither and were aſhamed.
For nowye are nothing; ye ſee my caſting down, and are afraid.

JOB having in the former verſe begun to charge his friends with unkindneſs, proceeds in this context to illuſtrate his charge by a ſimilitude, to make their unkindneſs yet more notorious and viſible, he ſets it out by things which are viſible: that ſo their own eyes or experiences might convince them, as well as his diſcourſe. The whole ſimilitude is extended from verſ. 15, to 21. The ſum of all is this, That Job had found his friends like thoſe brooks which hold leaſt water when there is moſt need, and greateſt enquiry for water; they gave him no comfort when he was nothing (to the eye) but ſorrow. He was parcht and ſcorcht in thoſe hot regions and fiery climates of affliction; and they gave him not to his (taſte) ſo much as a drop of water to cool his tongue, to eaſe his complaints. That in general.

For the better underſtanding of this elegant ſimilitude, we may obſerve the parts of it.

We have here { 1. The Protaſis or propoſal; 2. The Exegeſis or explication; 3. The Apodoſis or application } of this ſimilitude.

Or more plainly, we have four things conſiderable in it.

1. The

1. 2. 3. 4. } The similitude is { Proposed. Explained. Confirmed. Applied.

It is, First, Proposed, vers. 15. My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, &c.

Secondly, Explained, vers. 16,17,18. Which are blackish by reason of Ice, and wherein the Snow is hid; what time they wax warm, they vanish, &c.

Thirdly, Confirmed, vers. 19,20. The Troops of Tema looked, the Companies of Sheba waited for them, they were confounded, because they had hope, &c.

Fourthly, Applied to them, vers. 21. For now ye are nothing; ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

So much for the parts, now to the opening of the words

Vers. 15. My brethren have dealt deceitfully, as a brook, &c.

My brethren.] The words signifie, first, a brother of the same bowels (so brother is taken in the strictest sence) a natural brother.

Secondly, A brother of the same blood, any kinsman.

Thirdly, It signifies any one that is knit to us in affection, or like us in manners and disposition.

Fourthly, It notes all those, who are bounded with us in the same Nation, or associated in the same profession, though scattered all the world over. As in Scripture that relative word Father is taken, not only for a natural father, but for any leader, guide, or director of others in Spiritual or Civil respects; so they who are near one to another in Civil or Spiritual respects, are called brethren, though they be never so far distant in blood or place.

And it is observable, that this word likewise is attributed to things inanimate, or without life, when they have a similitude or likeness one to another. So Exod. 25.20. The Faces of the Cherubims shall look one to another. The Hebrew is, Each man to his brother. And Exod. 26. 3, 5. The Curtains of the Tabernacle, the loops, and (vers. 17.) the Tenons, are all called woman and sister, because they were all to be of the same materials and dimensions.

אח Frater cognationem habet cum אחד unus, vel יחד pariter, quoniã similes sunt, vel in uno conveniunt; fratres dicuntur. אחי שנם יחד

Some Criticks observe, that the Hebrew word for a Brother, is of near brother-hood or alliance, with two other words, whereof the first signifies One, and the other Alike, or Together, to shew that brethren ought to be as One, and Alike, or Together: which latter is by an elegant Paranomasia, joyned with it, Psal. 133. 1. Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, or as we put in the margin, To dwell even together.

So then, the very word, whereby brethren are expressed, notes, that there ought to be a Nearness, a Similitude, a Oneness (if I may so speak) between them in their affections and actions. Yet (saith Job) these men, whose relation thus obliges them, have laid themselves out to my greatest disadvantage.

My brethren [have dealt deceitfully with me.] The word imports, dealing perfidiously, or treacherously in any kind, Isa. 21.3. The Treacherous dealer dealeth treacherously. And it is applied to that treachery or perfidiousness, which is the highest in civil relations, the treachery of the wife to the husband, Jer. 3. 20. Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so you have departed from me; Idolatry is the violation of our faith to Christ, and therefore often called adultery.

Fortè quod vestimentũ sit primæ hominis contra Deũ perfidiæ tegumentũ & testimonium, cum antea homo nudus fuerit, Ruæus.

This word (to note that by the way) as it signifies to deal perfidiously, in the Verb, and perfidiousness and treachery, in the Nown; so also a garment, or vesture, made up of any kind of matter or stuff. And the reason is thus given by a learned Hebrician, Because a garment is both the cover and the witness of mans first perfidiousness and treachery against God. Our first parents in innocency had no garment, but innocency: they were without cloathing, and wanted no cloathing; they were naked, and did not perceive their nakedness; but as soon as they departed from God treacherously, their sin told them, that is, made them feel, that they were naked; therefore they put themselves on aprons of leaves, but God clothed them with skins, and that clothing he vested in a word of that Language, which should ever mind man of the reason, why cloaths were first put upon him, namely, his perfidious and treacherous dealing with God. That (take it in passage) which now so many make a matter of their pride, is a witness of their shame, their shameful rebellion, and falling away from God.

Put these together, My brethren have dealt deceitfully with me. Job meaneth it of his three visiting friends, these (if not brethren of his blood, yet) were of great familiarity and correspondence with him; therefore he at once titles and reproves them thus, My brethren have dealt deceitfully with me. Hence Observe,

First, That, there is no obligation so near, but an evil heart will break thorough it.

My brethren have dealt deceitfully. Though I suppose Job here charged his brethren too deeply, if so deep as their hearts: who, notwithstanding they failed in the business they came about, yet I believe, had no intention to wrong or to deceive him: yet many have been intentionally deceived by brethren; and it is a truth in position, That brethren will deceive.

Secondly, Whereas he puts such an Emphasis upon it, My brethren have dealt deceitfully with me. As if he had said, you are not enemies, you are not strangers that speak these things, but my brethren. Note from it,

That, as it is ill for any to deal deceitfully, so worst of all for brethren.

It is a trouble to be deceived by any, and a sin for any to deceive, but it is worse to be deceived by those we trust. And when a brother deceives, the sin of the deceit is doubled, whether he be a brother in the flesh, or a brother in friendship, or a brother in the profession of the faith. Deceit from a brother is exceeding bad in all, but worst of all in the last. Deceit from a brother in the faith, is more then double unfaithfulness. David complains (Psalm 55. 12.) of the wrong he had received from such a brother, It was not an enemy that reproached me, for then I could have born it (the reproach had not been half so heavy or grievous unto me, if an enemy had reproached me; the wound had not been half so wounding, if an enemy had smitten me) But it was thou, a man, mine equal, my guide, and my acquaintance, we took sweet counsel together, and we walked to the House of God in company; to be reproached and wronged by thee, this is the thing that lies heavy upon my spirit. God himself complains most, when they deal perfidiously with him, who are near him, his own people; he cannot expect any other of Heathens and Strangers; but when his children deal deceitfully with him, he complains of this, as much with admiration as with anger. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me, Isa. 1. 2. He calls Heaven and earth to bear witness of this unfaithfulness. Men are wicked beyond all reason (not that there is reason in any wickedness, but so we speak of all excesses) men (I say) are wicked beyond all reason, when God appeals against them, to things without all sence. David satisfied himself in the evil measure he received from a stranger, because he had received evil from a son. As greater benefits and favours swallow up the thought of lesser; so do greater afflictions, and unkindnesses. A man hath no leasure to think of his discurtesie, who gives him ill language, when another assaults him to cut his throat. When Shimei railed on David, (2 Sam. 16. 10, 11.) Abishai heats his spirit to revenge; What, saith David, my son which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life, how much more now may this Benjamite do it? This stranger, one of another Tribe and Family: As if he had said, I have no reason to be much troubled, to hear a stranger speak hard words against me, when my son is up in arms against me: to hear the one curse me, when the other would kill me. Moses uses this argument to umpire between the two Hebrews, Sirs, ye are brethren, why do you wrong one to another? Acts 7. 26. It will be a mighty aggravation of sin, when God shall say, My children have dealt deceitfully with me: Or man, my bowels, my brethren have dealt deceitfully with me.

My brethren have dealt deceitfully, [as a brook.] Here is the shadow of their deceit, Job explains himself by a similitude, They have dealt deceitfully. But how? I will tell you how, They have dealt deceitfully, as a brook, and as the stream of a brook they pass away. I can go to the streams, and to the brooks, and shew my friends the face of their hearts to me (I am sure of their dealings with me) in those waters.

They

They are as a brook.] The word signifies both a Brook and a Valley; because brooks usually run in valleys, therefore one word expresseth both. The same word signifies also to inherit, and an inheritance: Hence some joyn all the three sences together in this one word, A brook, a valley, and an inheritance; because valleyes inherit the brooks which descend to them from the mountains; valleyes are the heirs or inheritresses of the streams which issue from the hills, Psal. 104. 10. The Holy Ghost describes a spring or a brook, thus, He sendeth springs into the valleyes, which run among the hills; hills are the original of rivers, and they run among the hills; hills send them down as a portion to the valleyes.

But the Brook here spoken of, is not such a brook as hath a spring in a hill, mountain or rock, but a brook or torrent caused by rain, or melted snow; the Text clears that meaning: My friends have dealt deceitfully, as a brook; a brook springing from a hill will not deceive, such a brook being fed with continual supplies of water, will give us drink continually; but a brook falling from a hill, fails quickly: such a brook the next words expres more clearly, And as the stream of brooks they pass away.

As a stream of brooks.] That is, as those torrents and overflowings of brooks; a brook hath a constant channel, and it hath an accidental channel: We see many streams running into a brook in a time of rain, and that brook swoln above its banks, sending out many streams: So that to say they are like the stream of brooks, is to say they are like brooks when they stream forth, or to those streams of brooks which, by waters from the clouds, are suddenly increast: These streams of brooks usually called Land-floods, have their spring or fountain in the clouds; which sometimes distil in soft, soaking, deawy showers, and often pour out in strong, violent stormy rains, whence these streams (which in the Hebrew are denominated from their impetuous violent strength) run violently, and spend their strength as quickly. That which is violent cannot be permanent, much less perpetual. We have the word, Psalm 126. 4. where the Church prays, Turn again our captivity, O LORD, as the streams in the South; which some render, As the mighty waters in the South. Why would they have their captivity turned like those mighty floods in the South? The reason is this, because the South is a dry country, where there are few springs, scarce a Fountain to be found in a whole desart. What then are the waters they have in the South, in those parched Countries? They are these mighty strong torrents, which are caused by the showers of Heaven: So the meaning of that prayer in the Psalm, is, that God would suddenly turn their captivity. Rivers come suddenly in the South: where no spring appears, nor any sign of a river, yet in an hour the water is up, and the streams overflow. As when Eliah sent his servant toward the Sea (in the time of Ahab) he went and looked, and said, There is nothing; that is, no shew of rain, not the least cloud to be seen, yet presently the heavens grew black, and there was a great rain, 1 King. 18. 44. Thus let your captivity be turned, thus speedily and suddenly, though there be no appearance of salvation, no more then there is of a fountain in the sandy desart, or of rain in the clearest heavens, yet bring salvation for us. We use to say of things beyond our supply, Have we a spring of them Or can we fetch them out of the clouds? So though no ground appears whence such rivers should flow, yet let our salvation be as rivers in the South, as rivers fetched out of the clouds, and dropt in an instant immediately from the heavens. Job compares his brethren and friends to those streams of brooks, they came suddenly, but they are quickly down again. The comparison in the Psalm is made only with respect to the sudden appearance of those rivers, but Job applieth it to the sudden passing away of those rivers; as the stream of brooks they pass away. Their coming so suddenly is a great refreshing, but their sudden departure is as great a disappointment.

The word notes two things; First, motion: and secondly consumption. In both sences violent torrents pass away. First, they pass away with a strong motion; and then they pass away with a sudden consumption, they run so fast, that they run themselves off their legs, they come to nothing; their motion spends them, whereas the motion of a river doth not. So the word is used, Psal. 37. 36. He passed away, and lo, he was not; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. Those things that pass away, are many times said to lose their being and their use; He passed away, and lo, he was not. So Job meaneth here, these streams pass away, and lo, they are not.

Having thus proposed this similitude, that his friends dealt deceitfully as a brook, and shewed what kind of brook he meant, those violent torrents which pass away; now he gives a further description of those brooks.

Vers. 16. Which are blackish by reason of the Ice, and wherein the Snow is hid.

Qui timet pruinam irruet super eum nix. Vulg.

The vulgar Latine puts a strange sence upon this passage, rendring it thus, He who fears the frost, shall be overwhelmed by snow. Which seems to be a proverbial speech, to set forth those, who shifting from one danger or extream, run into another more dangerous, like that of the Prophet Amos, Chap. 5. 19. As if a man did flie from a Lion, and a Bear met him, or went into his house, and leaned his hand on a wall, and a Serpent bit him. But as their translation is a corruption of the Text, so their ordinary gloss corrupts their translation. * I feared smallest sins, but now I am punished after the rate of great sins, Whereas indeed Job was ready to acknowledge that the least sin he ever committed, deserved a greater punishment then the greatest pain he felt; and yet never lookt upon any of his pains, as the punishment of his sins. But to pass that:

Elegans dictum in socios Jobi, sed minus concordat cum hebraica veritate. Drus.

* Timebam peccata minima, nunc punior quasi pro magnis sceleribus. Gloss.

Take the mind of Job, as pursuing his similitude in more words to this effect; These mighty streams are but for a while, they pass away: or if at any time they continue, it is not from any quality or fitness they have in themselves to continue; but as their coming is extrinsecal (not out of the ground, but from the air) so is their continuance; I grant, these great land-floods sometimes stay with us a while, not because they have any ordinary natural supply or stay, they are only blackish by reason of the Ice: after a great rain in Winter, a great frost comes, and then your water courses, or brooks, swelling above their channels, are surprized by cold, and cannot get away; the cold condenseth the waters, and freezeth them up, and the snow is kept close from melting: then these torrents, or streams, seem to be lasting fountains, and treasures of water.

Or take it thus, He compares those friends, who administer no comfort in trouble, to brooks, which in time of rain, when we have no need, overflow with water; but in cold Winter-weather, are lockt up with frosts, or in hot Summer-weather, are exhaled and dried up by the Sun. As it follows:

Vers. 17. What time they war warm, they vanish; when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.

These streams you might think living, lasting streams, or standing, fixed waters, when you saw them frozen into great mountains of Ice and Snow compact together: but stay a while, and you shall see what becomes of them; at the next thaw they are consumed out of their place: Such friends have I, and such is the friendship of man-kind, unless God renew the heart, or restrain it from its natural baseness.

זרב Diffluere, diffundi. Buxt. Dissipari. Vulg.

The word which we translate, to war warm, is used but this once in Scripture: it signifies also, scattered, or dissipated. And the reason is, because heat or warmth, dissipates and separates those things which were united or congealed. The Sun warms the streams, and then the waters, which stood on a heap, scatter and disperse. The sum of all is: These streams in winter have nothing to stay their consuming, but their hardening; and as soon as heat comes, they dissolve, and are gone, in Summer these brooks are dry. This is yet further illustrated.

Vers. 18. The paths of their way are turned aside, they go to nothing and perish.

What he had said before in those words, They vanish and are consumed out of their place, he saith again in these, The paths of their way are turned aside, they go to nothing and perish. That is, these streams are as if they had never been, you cannot find them in their former channels; these waters are quite spent, the Sun at a few draughts empties these vessels, and draws them dry; so that there is not a drop left, either for man or beast.

Inclinavit, percelluit.

The word which we render, Turned aside, signifies to gather up or contract into a narrow compass, as when a man of of courage gathers or shrinks up himself; or, as we say, buckles to a business, that he may put out the uttermost of his strength; so Judg. 16. 29. When Samson came to the pillars on which the house stood, the text saith, He turned himself with all his might. It is the word of the Text) as if Samson would collect all the power he had into one place, to pull the pillars out of theirs. He that would do a great service, will have all his outward strength about him, or near at hand. And at such a time a man will have all his inward strength close together, and therefore puts his body into less room, if he can, that all his members may act as one. We shrink up our bodies also in sudden fear. The word is so used, Ruth 3. 8. When Boaz, that good man, awakening, found Ruth at his feet, and perceived there was a woman on the floor, he gathered or shrunk up himself, as a man that is afraid in his bed, will gather up his limbs nearer together, and lies in less room. In such a manner the heat gathers or shrinks up the waters.

Thus the paths of these waters (saith Job) are shrunk up or gathered together, as it were, into one channel, or they creep under the banks, to shelter themselves from that great drinker, and river-drinker the Sun; but all their subterfuges are in vain; the Sun dries up all, nothing remains; so it follows in the next words.

They go to nothing and perish.] It is the word used, Gen. 1. 2. The earth was without form and void. There was a nothingness upon that confused heap before a second creation stampt a form upon it: that which is useless, is but as good as nothing. The Jews express an Idol by this word, 1 Sam. 12. 21. Which suits excellently with that of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 8. An Idol is nothing in the world. So these streams, these rivers which seemed such goodly pleasant streams, such as might have relieved the thirsty traveller at all seasons, come to them in summer, they are gone to nothing, they are like that rude mass when the world lay undigested into parts, void and without form.

Before I come to the general Observations from the whole similitude, observe, from this description of passing streams,

That, Things or persons cannot hold long, which are not supplied from an inward principle.

Metaphora in signis & Hieroglyphicum clarissimè exprimens, vanitatem magnæ speciei, pietatis & charitatis quæ non ex vera fide provenit. Coc.

Job describes streams, having no spring to maintain them, the rain filled them, the cold froze them, and the warmth of the Sun emptied them. As it is in things, so in persons, no man can hold out either in gracious and spiritual, or just and honourable civil acts, unless he have a principle within, answerable to what he undertakes (Job 27. 10.) Will the hypocrite always call upon God? Not always; why? because he hath not a spirit (or spring) of prayer: Therefore hypocrites are well compared to such brooks, as Job here describes. A failing brook is a clear embleme of a false heart, both to God and man.

And that is the reason why regeneration is set forth by the gift of a new principle, of a new heart, or of a new nature. It is to no purpose to work a man by some extrinsecal motive, by hopes, or by fears, by threats, or by promises, by rewards or punishments, to do, or forbear good or evil: unless he have a new heart, all vanishes and comes to nothing. A regenerate person hath a new heart, a new spirit, is a new creature, a new man; all which notes a lasting principle, an everlasting frame of holiness in the main; though it may sometime decline and need repairs. It is far better to be a rivulet, a little spring, then to be a great torrent; it is better to have a little spring of grace, then a great loud stream of profession. It is reported by Geographers, in their descriptions of America, that in Peru, there is a River called the Diurnal River, or the day-river, because it falls with a mighty current in the day, but in the night is dry. This may seem to be a fabulous report, but the reason given (which is direct to the point in hand) makes it not only probable, but very plain; for they tell us, that this River is not fed by a fountain or spring, but is caused meerly by the melting of the snow, which lies on the mountains thereabouts; in the day-time, when the Sun is up and warm, the Snow melts; but when night comes and the Sun goes down, the Snow freezes, and so the channel dries. Thus it is with those who have not an inward principle of holiness, they may have a great flood of profession, when the Snow melts down into their bosoms, by the shine of outward prosperity; but when night and and cold, when troubles and dangers come, their waters freeze up, or pass away, and go to nothing. So much of the causes, why these streams, these water-brooks vanish, they have no spring to maintain and feed them: Rain and frost, and snow (uncertain all) are all they have to trust to.

Job having thus explained his similitude, and shewed what he means by brooks, and what kind of brooks he means; he now confirms all by an experiment. You shall see it thus, these brooks will yield nothing at a time of need, many have dried them; who are they? The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them.

The troops of Tema.] That is, the travellers who came in great companies from Tema, and passed through those desart Countries, where they had observed in the winter, streams and floods of water frozen, and full of snow; now in their summer travels, being parcht with heat, and distressed for want of water, they expected relief from those brooks which they had markt out for themselves, and of which they had said, These will be watering places for us, and refreshings in extreamest heat. We read often in the Old Testament of such travellers, Gen. 37. 25. Behold a company of Ishmaelites, came from Gilead, with their Camels, bearing spicery and balm, and myrrhe, going down into Egypt. Such are now called a Caravan. The letter of the Hebrew is, The paths of Tema; the path or road in which they travelled, is put for the travellers. So, Isa. 21. 13. O ye travelling companies of Dedanim! the Hebrew is, O ye paths of Dedanim! that is, O ye who travel in the paths of Dedanim! Thus here; The wayes of Tema, or the troops of Tema; and the companies of Sheba, waited and looked in these places for water, and (as it followeth) they found none.

Hos torrentes tentes designaverunt, sive pro statione ad refocillationem. Coc. Itinera, sc. homines iter facientes.

The troops of Tema looked.] Why did they look? why did they wait for those streams? They had seen plenty of water there, and therefore being thirsty, they looked and waited for water. Hence note,

First, That, The sense of want carries us out to look for a remedie.

The troops of Tema looked; After what? after the streams of brooks; why? because they were parched with thirst. They that are thirsty, will be looking for a stream, for a river; they that are hungry, will be enquiring after bread. As it is in natural, so in spiritual things; when once the soul is parched and thirsty, Oh how it longs for the rivers of mercy, for the streams of consolation! it looks and waits for them too. As the heart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God, Psal. 42. 1, 2. That's the reason why Job instances in Tema and Sheba, because they were often distressed in their travel for want of water.

These troops of Tema looked, and as they looked, they searched for waters; they waited, because it was probable that they should find water where they had observed water. As (Mat. 21. 19.) Christ himself when he was an hungry, saw a fig-tree afar off (saith the Text) having leaves upon it: A fig-tree having leaves, in probability hath fruit also; because the fig-tree (as Naturalists observe) puts forth her fruit as soon as her leaf; therefore when Christ saw leaves upon the fig-tree, it was an argument that there was fruit too. And whereas Mark saith, For the time of figs was not yet; he means the time of in-gathering figs; so that, the tree having leaves, shewed it might have fruit growing, and the time of gathering figs not being past, both these were ground enough for the Lord Christ to go and seek fruit upon it; for in this he acted according to the rule of humane reason, not of Divine omniscience. Many object against seeking God, and humbling themselves before him: It is a thing doubtful, whether ever they shall speed, whether ever they shall find or no; they know not whether God will be merciful unto them or no; he will be merciful to some (they know) but whether they be the men, is very doubtful. I may answer such from the point, A probability of speeding, is ground enough for seeking. If Christ sought for fruit when he saw leaves, because it was a thing thing probable to find it; and if these of Tema and Sheba would seek for water, because they had observed water in those places; surely then, there is ground enough of seeking unto God for mercy, though we suppose there is but a probability of having mercy. The Prophet perswades that afflicted people to fast and humble themselves, upon this ground; who knoweth if he will return and repent? (Joel 2.) that is, it is very probable he will return and repent. Heathen Nineveh is carried by the same argument, Jonah. 3. 9. Who can tell if God will return? &c. No man is sure he will not, and though we are not sure he will, yet let us venture. A peradventure from God, is better then a promise, or an assurance from the creature: And if probability be ground enough, what ground is there in assurance and certainty? and that is the ground we have of seeking God; if we seek to him, and wait upon him in faith, we shall be sure to find, Psal. 9. 18. The expectation of the poor shall not perish. The companies of Tema found no water, but God is a living fountain, whose waters fail not; his banks are alike filled, summer and winter; Christ is not a water-brook, but a spring of waters: We shall never miss water of life, if we seek to, and wait upon him for it; and if we believe on him, out of our bellies shall flow rivers of living waters, John 7. 38.

We have seen the endeavour of these troops of Tema: Now see how they speed.

Verse 20. They were confounded, because they had hoped; they came thither and were ashamed.

The sum is, they hoped to have found water there, and it grieved and repented them, that ever they had hope to find water there, because there was none to be found.

They were confounded.] The word signifies indifferently to be ashamed or to be confounded, and to be confounded in regard of events or actions. The word is very near in sound to our English Abashed: It notes also a waxing pale and wan, when the colour failes and withers, comes and goes. If a man be failed much in what he much hoped, his countenance failes too, his visage changes, as his thoughts change, and he waxeth pale. Therefore we translate it well, confounded. And it is expressed by confounding, for two reasons.

First, Because the complexion is confounded at such a time, shame and blushing make a kind of confusion upon nature.

Secondly, The spirits are confounded, the heart is troubled; Disappointment of our hope perplex a man both within and without. He is disordered quite through. And because long delayes cause shame, therefore by a Metonymie of the cause for the effect, this word signifies to delay time (Exod. 32. 1.) And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down, &c. that is, when the people saw, that Moses made them ashamed by his long delay, they gathered themselves together, &c. They waited for Moses forty dayes, and now Moses had stayed so long, that they were ashamed of his stay; that is, they expected, but he came not as they expected; this troubled them. We read the word in the same sence (Judg. 5. 28.) The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots? Why is his chariot ashamed? that is, why doth his chariot stay so long, as to make us ashamed of our stay? We have long looked what Trophies Sisera would bring home, why doth his chariot by delayes make us ashamed? Thus in the Text, these travellers are said to be confounded, because they had great hope to find water, but were disappointed; They were confounded because they had hoped; the latter clause carries the same sence, They came thither and were ashamed.

Ainsw. on Exod.

Yet there is a special elegancy in the word, ashamed; which signifies to dig, to dig that we may hide a thing; as it is said of the evil servant, who received but one talent that he went and digged, and hid his Lords money, Mat. 25. 18. And so by a Metaphor this word is translated to signifie being ashamed, because a man that is ashamed, would hide his head in a hole (as we say) if he could, he would run his head into the ground, and rather be at the pains in digging of a hole in the earth, to hide himself, then to endure the shame of shewing himself. No man loves that should appear, or to appear in that, which is his shame.

These two things, to be ashamed and confounded are often owned by the Saints in their repentance. It is best not to do any thing whereof to be ashamed; but when we have done evil it is good to be ashamed; To hide our sins for shame, and not to be ashamed of them when they are not hid, are equal aggravations of sin. Hence when the holy Ghost would set forth men impudent or shameless in sinning, who sinned and cared not who saw them, he saith (Jer. 2. 34.) Also upon thy skirts is found the blood of innocents, I have not found it by secret search; so we translate it, the Hebrew is, I have not found it by digging; as if he had said, some men are so ashamed of their sins, that when God comes to find them out, he must dig for them, because they have digged into the earth, as it were, to hide their sins; but others are so impudent in sinning, that God needs not dig to find out their sins; they are so shameless, that they let their sins lie above ground; or as the Prophet speaks (Isa. 3. 9.) They declare their sins like Sodom, that is, openly. Truth and holiness never seek corners, and sometimes sin and wickedness do not. And as the doing of evil forbidden, causeth or should cause shame; so doth the not receiving of good expected; hence when the Lord would assure his people that they should undoubtedly receive all the good he had promised, and which they on that ground could expect, he concludes with them thus, And my people shall never be ashamed. Why? The reason is plain in the Text; Ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied, Joel 2. 26. Which is directly opposite to this in Job. The Temanites were ashamed, because being thirsty, they were not satisfied. And because Jesus Christ shall so abundantly satisfie all the hunger and thirst, and supply all the wants and weaknesses of every believing soul, therefore it is expresst under this word and notion, Whosoever believeth on him, shall not be ashamed, Rom. 9. 33.

Foderunt puteos, sc. ad aquam inveniendam.

Such a meaning the word bears in this text [They were ashamed.] That is, when they saw there was no water to be had, they would have hid themselves in the earth, or digged holes to hide themselves in for grief and shame.

And some render this word here (though to another sence) They digged; that is, when they saw that there was no water in the streams, then they fell a digging, to see if they could find any springs. That's a good sence. But rather take digging as before; to shew what shame would have us do, when we have done amiss, or when we miss what we would find, then we seek covert and hide our selves. Hence these two are often joyned in Scripture, Shame and hiding, with the disappointment of hope. Read a Text of near compliance with this in the letter (Jer. 14 3.) Their Nobles have sent their little ones to the waters, they came to the pits, and found no water (it was in a time of drought) they returned with their vessels empty: What followeth? They were ashamed and confounded, and covered their heads. Again, v. 4. Because the ground is chapt, for there was no rain in the earth; the plough-men were ashamed, they covered their heads. And, Joel 10. 11. The corn is wasted, the new wine is dried up: What followeth? Be ashamed, O ye husbandmen; howl, O ye Vine-dressers, because the harvest of the field is perished. So that in the common language and current of the Scripture, shame is an effect of disappointment, and hiding the face, or covering the head an effect of both. Hence observe,

First, That, Deceived hopes trouble us as much if not more then present wants.

A present want is a present smart; but deceived hopes are a perpetual smart; and that's the reason why the burden of sorrow is so heavy, and the drought of the damned (who as Dives in the Parable, shall never have a drop of water) so intollerable. They (to allude to the Text) hoped to come to the overflowing streams of their former earthly delights: But alas, the paths of the way of those brooks are turned aside for ever, they are gone to nothing and perished. All the while they travel (and that will be an eternity) through that howling Wilderness and fierie Desart shall not meet with one Rivolet, nor taste one drop of comfort to cool their parched tongues, or refresh their enflamed bowels. Hopes delayed, trouble; but hopes deceived, confound.

Secondly,

Secondly, Observe from this passage, That, Deceived hopes fill with shame. Deceived hopes make a man hide his head.

Shame arises two wayes, either from doing a thing against common principles; or from losing a thing against common expectation. The Lord threatens the Idolatrous Israelites, That they shall be ashamed of the Oaks which they have desired, and confounded for the Gardens which they had chosen, Isa. 1. 29. Why ashamed of Oaks and Gardens? because in gardens and under shady oaks they set up and worshipped Idols, in which they trusted for deliverance and protection; therefore when destruction should overtake them, they must needs be ashamed of oaks and gardens, because their hopes were so foully deceived by them. In the same sence the Lord foretels them by the same Prophet, that they shall be ashamed of Ethiopia their expectation, and of Egypt, their glory, chap. 20. 5. because they had hoped for so much help from confederacies with these Nations, who in the issue would delude their hopes, and give them no help at all. Thus also he speaks historically, chap. 30. 5. They were all ashamed of a people that could not profit them, nor be a help. All they who hope in any thing, save the Lord, shall as (these troops of Tema) be ashamed, because they have hoped, for they shall be deceived of their hopes.

And this is the reason, why hypocrites, at the last day, when Christ comes to judge them, shall be filled with shame. The reason (I say) is, because they have been so full of deluding hopes. It appears they had great hopes, because they speak great words, and make great boasts. They presume if any are to be saved, they are the men; they shew fair for heaven, Mat. 7. 22. Many shall say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not propheſied in thy name, and in thy name cast out Devils? &c. They shall say, Lord, we have done thus and thus; what doth this repetition of their great works intimate, but the greatness of their hopes? Now when Christ shall say, I know you not, how will shame cover their faces for ever? and how will they cover their faces for shame, wishing they might never be either seen or known. When Jacob had served a full apprentiship in order to his marriage with beautiful Rachel, and at last, through the guile of Laban, was put off with blear-eyed Leah; the holy Ghost expresseth him in a kind of passionate amazement, And it came to pass, that in the morning, behold it was Leah; and he said unto Laban, what is this thou hast done unto me? As if Jacob had been in such a distraction, that he could not tell how to express himself: and therefore saith, What is this thou hast done unto me? I know not by what name to call such a usage or disappointment as this. Oh, in what a case will they be at the last day, who have served out (as it were) an apprentiship in hopes of Rachel, the beauty of heaven and salvation; and yet when they awake at the resurrection, Behold it will be (infinitely worse than Leah) Hell and Damnation; how will shame and confusion of face take hold of such for ever?

So much for the letter of this similitude; the failing of those streams, exemplified in the sad experiences of the troops of Tema, and the companies of Sheba, as often deceived and ashamed as they came to them for water.

Now follows the application of the similitude, as if Job had said, I have spoken in the clouds, and told you stories of foreign concernment. I tell you, my friends, I must even apply all this to you, and leave it at your doors. As Nathan, when he had told David the parable of the poor man, and his little Ewe-lamb, which his rich neighbour took away to dress for the way-faring man that was come unto him; he (I say) brings it home to David in the close, saying, Thou art the man. So after Job had told a story in the general, or in a third person, about deceitful brooks, and travellers deceived by them, now he applies it to his friends, Ye, my friends, are the men I mean by these brooks; ye are they, I have all this while delineated and set forth by these unfaithful and unconstant streams of water.

Verse 21. For now ye are nothing, ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

For now ye are nothing.] What! nothing? Ye are nothing at all unto me. Ye are no more to me in any way of refreshing, then those streams of the brook, which I even now described, were to the troops of Tema, for now ye are nothing. As out of nothing comes nothing, so that is as nothing unto us, out of which nothing comes. Ex nihilo nihil fit. Et quo nihil fit nihil est.

If we render it word for word according to the Hebrew, it is, Ye were not; you are unto me as if you had never been, or ye have deceived me in what I took you to be; I hoped for floods of comfort, for rivers of joy, and streams of consolation from you, but now I cannot find a drop, Ye are not unto me. That man is indeed, who doth that, for which he is, or that which is expected.

The Chaldee translates Ye have been as if ye were not. And there is a difference in the Hebrew word; for some read it with the Pronoun Them, most with the Adverb Not; but though the translation differ, yet it comes to the same sence; Ye are them, that is, like to them, like to those streams, or, Ye are not; that is, ye are nothing to me; as those streams were nothing, or were not to the Travellers. The phrase, Ye are not, imports the deceivableness of those men; Job thought they would be something to him; yea, they thought they would be very much to him, even as much as waterbrooks to a thirsty man; but they proved nothing at all to him: For as the word [Yea] in Scripture notes assurance, constancy, fidelity and faithfulness; so the word [Not or Nay] both in the Hebrew and in Greek signifies unconstancy and unsetledness, especially when these two are joyned together: And so it hath a clear sence with that (2 Cor. 1. 20.) where the Apostle speaking of Christ and of his faithfulness, saith, The Son of God was not yea and nay, but in him was yea, that is, he was not various, inconstant and uncertain, but he was the very same; look what you have found Christ at one time, you shall find him a second and third time, yea, the same for ever: He will not start from you an inch; so ver. 17. of the same Chapter, When I was minded to come, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose after the flesh, that with me there should be yea, yea, and nay, nay? that is, that with me there should be I and No, something and nothing. It is of a near importance with the words of Job, Ye are no to me; ye promised to be I to me, to be yea, yea, but now it comes to the trial, ye are No, No to me, that is, ye are nothing to me; ye are no such thing as I expected you would be.

For ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

Ye see my casting down.] That is, my affliction; To be cast down, and to be afflicted, are the same. The word signifies dejection & consternation of spirit, to be heart-falter'd the falling of a mans mind, as well as of his estate, Deut. 1. 21. Fear not, neither be discouraged, let not your spirit or courage fall, Job's casting down was in his body and goods, his spirit and courage stood upright upon their feet: Ye (saith Job) see my outward casting down, the casting down of my estate abroad, ye see how all is broken and lost; and now what is the help ye give me? Do ye stand to me, or lift me up now I am thus cast down? Do ye supply me with comfort, and prop me up with counsel? No, ye are afraid your selves: ye are so far from removing my trouble, that you your selves are troubled.

Ye are afraid.] Their fear may be referred to his person, or to his condition; ye are afraid to come nigh me, ye are afraid I will infect you; or ye are afraid some such evil will fall upon your selves; I had thought ye had come as friends, to deliver me from my fears, and now ye are fallen into fears your selves: Thus, Ye are not, ye are no such thing as ye promised me; ye promised to comfort, at least to pity me, but ye do not: So the Septuagint, Ye visit me, but ye are not moved with any compassion towards me. I had been as well without your company; or, if no such men had been in the world.

Vos me visitis nulla misericordia moti. Sept.

Observe first from these words, For now ye are nothing.

He that is not what he ought to be, or what he promised to be, is nothing.

To be useless is (in a sence) to be essenceless. To be useless in the world, is to be as out of the world: A man who lives only to eat, and drink, and sleep, may be said not to live at all. What we say in our English Proverb, is true, both in persons and of actions, As good never a whit as never the be; as good not to be, as do no good. The Apostle Jude speaking of unprofitable persons (ver. 12.) calls them trees without fruit; and what then? Twice dead, plucked up by the roots; as if the Apostle had said, I look upon fruitless per-ſons, as dead perſons, yea, as doubly dead, that is, dead ſure enough. As a man can be born but once, in one kind (Nicodemus argued from a truth, though not to a truth, becauſe he could not diſtinguiſh natural from ſpiritual, John 3. 4.) ſo a man can die but once in one kind. Theſe men of whom the Apoſtle ſpeaks, were alive naturally, though dead ſpiritually; how then is it ſaid, that they were twice dead? They were judged twice dead, either, becauſe a ſpiritual death is ſo great a death, that it may well go for two; yea, one ſpiritual death is worſe then a thouſand natural deaths;

Or ſecondly, they are ſaid to be twice dead, becauſe they were dead both in regard of the truth of grace, and in regard of any outward actings of grace; for ſome hypocrites who are indeed dead in ſin, yet act grace in many outward fruits, as if they were alive: but of theſe perſons it is ſaid, their fruit withereth, and they are without fruit; they were not ſo much as externally active, they had no life of union with Chriſt, and they did no good with the life of their profeſſion in Chriſt, and therefore are juſtly ſaid to be twice dead. They who have leaves, and look freſh and lively, as if they had more then one life in them, yet, if uſeleſs, are called liveleſs, and they who do nothing in the world, are to be reckoned no-bodies in the world. In the Parable of the Prodigal, the concluſion is, This my ſon was dead, and is alive; why dead? becauſe he was unanſwerable to thoſe purpoſes, to thoſe ends for which he received life. He was a prodigal, and had deſerted his fathers ſervice, therefore his father looked upon him, as if (all that while) he had not been at all. That's the deſcription of the dead, as Jacob ſaid of Joſeph (when he concluded him torn by a wild beaſt) Joſeph is not; and Rachel would not be comforted for her children, becauſe they were not; ſo ſaith the father of the prodigal, This my ſon was dead, or, he was not; he was no help nor comfort to me. We no longer deſerve the name or reputation of any thing, than we do thoſe things for which we are. If we leave our duty (upon the matter) we loſe our nature, and are as if we had no being, while we reach not (at leaſt, while we reach not after) the end of our being. A heathen concludes of ſuch a man, He hath only been, he hath not lived. But we may from the warrant of Job's Rhetorick, go a degree further, and deny that he hath been; for he is as if he had never been, a meer nothing.

Fuit, non vixit.

From thoſe words, Ye ſee my caſting down, and are afraid; Note,

That, Some man is able to bear more then another is able to behold.

The ſight of fearful things cauſeth fear. Further obſerve,

A fearful man will never be a helpful man.

Courage in a day of trouble, either of our own or others, is a great cure of trouble, yea a victory over it. There is one fear very good when we ſee the caſting down of our friends, To be afraid of provoking God to caſt us down (Deut. 17. 13. they ſhall hear and fear, and do no more preſumptuouſly. What ſhall they hear? They ſhall hear how God hath caſt men down, or caſt down a Nation by his judgments, they ſhall hear of this and fear. How ſhall they fear? They ſhall fear to do preſumptuouſly, fear to provoke that God, who can thus caſt down men and kingdoms. It is good to be thus afraid. But there is a ſinful fear, when fear diſorders or unfits us to put our hands to the help of thoſe who are caſt down, and to adminiſter comfort to thoſe who are in ſorrow; ſuch was the caſting down and the fear here meant: They were ſo afraid, that they could not lend Job a hand, or give him adviſed counſel to ſupport his ſpirit.

I ſhall add one Obſervation from the general ſcope of the ſimilitude.

That, An unfaithful friend fails us moſt, when we have moſt need of him.

That's the ſum of all. In Winter, when there is water in every ditch, thoſe brooks abound with water; but in Summer, eſpecially in a dry Summer, when the rain of the Land is duſt (as Moſes ſpeaks) theſe brooks are duſt too, they vaniſh and are conſumed out of their place, they afford no refreſhing at all. When the man that went down from Jeruſalem to Jericho, and fell among Thieves, (Luke 10. 30.) lay in the way ſtript and wounded, even half dead, A certain Prieſt came that way (ſaith the Text) and when he ſaw him, he paſſed by on the other ſide; and likewiſe a Levite, when he was at that place, came and looked on him, and paſſed by on the other ſide; but the Samaritan went to him (not from him) and had compaſſion on him. Job ſpeaks very near this language, but fully this ſence, of his friends. They, like the uncharitable Prieſt and Levite, paſſed by him, as the ſtreams of brooks they paſs away; whereas they ſhould have been like the good Samaritan, a fountain, a river of ſetled, ſpringing comfort to him.

This is the great difference between the love of God, and that of moſt men; God is the beſt friend to us at all times, (he is beſt to us in the beſt times; if we had not him to our friend, it would be very ill with us when we have moſt friends.) But God is beſt of all to us in the worſt times, a beſt friend to us, when we have no friends; he is our ſpring when the rain falls; but he is our ſureſt, ſweeteſt ſpring, when there is neither rain nor dew upon the face of the earth. Therefore he is compared (as Jer. 2.) ſo in other places, unto a living fountain, where you may be ſure to find water in the hotteſt ſeaſon. This infinitely commends the love of God beyond that of men, who at the beſt, are but broken ciſterns, which leak out the comforts they are truſted with, and for the moſt part, are but like Job's brooks, that turn aſide, and paſs away when we have moſt need of them.

It is obſerved of the Samaritans in Joſephus, that whenever the Jews affairs proſpered, they would be their friends, and profeſs much kindneſs; but if the Jews were in trouble, and wanted their aſſiſtance, then they got them far enough off, they would not have to do with them, or own them. The rich hath many friends (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 14. 20.) but the poor is hated even of his own neighbour. Worldly friendſhip ends with riches, and he that wants money, ſeldom abounds with friends.

Ubi deficit pecunia, labaſcit & amicitia.

But conſider how far this is from the very nature of a brother, and from the Law of friendſhip. Solomon (Prov. 17. 17.) deſcribes a true friend, to be one who loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adverſity. As if he had ſaid, This is the reaſon God hath raiſed up relations, and made men near one to another, becauſe himſelf orders there ſhall be times of adverſity, when they ſhall have need of one another. Some render the place, A brother is born in adverſity; as if the meaning were, that, when a man is in trouble, God raiſes up a brother to help him; or, as the Septuagint hath it, A brother is born for this end and purpoſe, to help in adverſity. Therefore a brother loſes the very end and purpoſe why he was born, if he refuſe to help thoſe who are in adverſity. Ruth was a true pattern of a faithful friend and brother, though a daughter; I went out full (ſaith the Mother-in-law) but the Lord hath brought me home empty; but though ſhe was emptied of the world, yet Ruths heart was full of love to her; I will not leave thee, God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if ought but death part thee and me. So ſaith faithfulneſs in friends, eſpecially in Chriſtian friends. It is one of the greateſt duties and commendations of Chriſtian profeſſion, to ſtick to, and ſtand by one another, be it foul weather, or be it fair, blow the winds high or low, let it be ſtormy or calm, ever to be the ſame. The Heathens wondred in the primitive times at the great love of the Chriſtians one to another. Let us take heed we do not put heathens, natural, carnal men to wonder, Oh how little do Chriſtians love one another! Let us not give them occaſion to ſay, Oh how the Chriſtians hate one another! How like are they at beſt, to ſtreams of brooks, who fail when their friends and brethren need the benefit of their aſſiſtance?

Let me only give you this caution, God ſuffereth men to be thus unfaithful unto men, yea ſometimes a Chriſtian brother to fail a Chriſtian brother (which is their ſin, and ought to be their ſorrow;) I ſay, God leaves them to this evil of their own hearts, that we may have a greater good out of it, then the higheſt actings of their love and faithfulneſs could eſtate us in: Namely, that we may learn to truſt upon God alone, and may better know what creatures are. Truſt not in a brother (Jer. 9. 4.) ſo as to let out your hearts upon him, think not you are ſafe in the love of a brother, no, not of a godly brother: The Apoſtle (1 Tim. 6. 17.) to draw off rich men from truſting in their riches, riches, useth this argument, Charge them that are rich, that they trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God. Why should they not trust in riches? He giveth the reason in the Epithite, uncertain; they are uncertain riches, therefore trust them not. So we may say of men, Trust not in men, no, not absolutely in godly men; for the best of men are uncertain, possibly they may be as these streams of brooks, whose waters failed, Psal. 146. 3. Put not your trust in Princes, nor in the Son of man, in whom there is no help. Why not? For his breath goeth forth (that's one reason, he must die, he must return to the earth,) therefore trust him not. But besides that, we may say, Trust not in Princes, &c. while their breath tarrieth in them, for it is possible their help and faithfulness may go forth, though their breath doth not. Therefore trust only in the living God, he will never leave us, though men do; God only is unchangeable, he only hath preserved this honour without touch or stain, Never to forsake those who trusted in him, how forlorn and forsaken soever their condition was.

VERS. 22, 23, 24, 25.

Did I say, Bring unto me? Or give a reward for me of your substance?
Or deliver me from the enemies hand, or redeem me from the hand of the mighty?
Teach me, and I will hold my tongue: and cause me to understand wherein I have erred.
How forcible are right words? But what doth your arguing reprove?

JOB having shadowed out his friends unfaithfulness by an elegant similitude in the context fore-going; now aggravates their unfaithfulness to him in his wants, by his own modesty, in seeking to them for supplies. Did I say, Bring unto me? or give a reward for me of your substance? As if he had said, I have not been burthensom or troublesom to you, I have not called for your contributions and benevolences, or sought to have my estate made up out of your purses? Why do ye charge me with impatience at my loss, as if that were it which pinches and presses me? did I ever charge you for my reparation or redemption? That (indeed) might have been, either burdensom or dangerous to you. All that I expected from you, was your comfort, and your counsel; these would not have put you to much expence; or if you could not have reacht so far as to comfort me, yet you might have forborn to contribute so largely to my sorrows, by overtaxing me with impatience, and charging me with hypocrisie.

Did I say.] I was not clamorous or importunate, no, I did not so much as open my mouth to move you in that point; I have been so far from begging, that ye have not heard me, saying, Bring to me.

Bring unto me?] The word is, Give unto me, Hos. 4, 18. Their Princes love, Give ye, or Bring ye, so saith Job, I did not say, Bring ye, or give ye, my spirit was not set upon money, or the repair of my losses out of your estates; I did not either write or send for your charity; you were not invited to visit me, that you might contribute to my necessity.

The word here used for a reward, properly taken, signifies that which is given to a Judge, to corrupt or turn him aside in judgment. One of the Rabbins gives this reason, why it notes a Bribing reward, because it is compounded of a word signifying One; and a bribe makes the giver and the receiver, the Judge and party One, or of one mind; a Judge should ever stand indifferent between both parties, till the cause be heard, but a bribe makes him One of them.

Yet ordinarily, this word is put for any gift, or help, subsidy or supply of anothers wants.

Of your substance.] The word implies, the native, natural strength, which supplies the wants, or supports the weaknesses of the body; as also the sttength of the earth, by which it puts forth fruit, Levit. 26. 20. And because riches are a mans civil strength, therefore the same word expresses both.

Vers. 23. Or did I say, Deliver me from the enemies hand?

The enemies.] Or the hand of those that have brought me into straights: for the original imports, the shutting of man up in a narrow compass, so that he knows not how to get out; he that is in the hand of an enemy, is in a straight hand. Ahab commands, (1 King. 22. 29.) Go carry Micaiah back, and feed him with the bread of affliction, or with the bread of straights, such bread as an enemy provides. The Greek word used by the Apostle, 1 Cor. 4. 8. reaches this fully, We are troubled but not distressed, or straightned. Now saith Job, did I say, deliver me out of the hand or power of mine enemies, who have brought me into these straights? alluding, as is conceived, to those Chaldeans and Sabeans, who had spoiled his estate, and slain his servants. στενοχωρέομαι.

Or redeem me out of the hand of the mighty.

Redeem me.] That is my goods which they have carried away captive. To redeem, signifies the fetching back of a thing by price or force. Christ is a Redeemer in both sences, he redeemed or fetcht back captivated man, by compact and by price, in respect of God his Father. We are bought with a price, 1 Cor. 6. 20. that is, bought with a full price. Christ did not compound with the justice of his Father, but satisfied it, to redeem us; And he redeemed us by force, out of the hands of Satan, Spoyling Principalities and Powers, and making a shew of them openly, Col. 2. 15. As in Triumphs, the Romans used to do with their spoiled, captivated enemies. Job had not begg'd redemption of his friends, from the power of his enemies either way: Did I desire you, by compact, and by price, to ransom me? Or did I desire you to levy an Army, with power and force, to recover my estate out of the hands of those mighty oppressors.

The word [Mighty.] signifies also terrible; the hand of the terrible one: It is often applied to God, when he shews himself in terror to wicked men, Psal. 89. 7. God is greatly to be feared, Isa. 2. 19. He shakes terribly the earth. But most commonly, to cruel, powerful men, who make no other use of their strength, but to be a terror to innocents. The Apostle, Phil. 1. 28. explains this word, while he saith, and in nothing be ye terrified by your adversaries; that word in the Greek, answers this in the Hebrew, your adversaries are terrible men, men who think to beat down all with their great looks, but be not ye terrified by these terrible ones. So here, Did I call unto you, to redeem me out of the hand of the mighty, the terrible? out of the hand of those cruel plunderers, the Sabeans and Chaldeans. עֹרֵץ Terribilis, sua potentiâ formidabilis

Further, Some understand by the hand of the mighty, not the persons afflicting him, but the affliction it self, which was upon him: Trouble is sometime compared to a mighty enemy, Prov. 6. 11. So shall thy poverty come, as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man. Want strips us: but is it self, not only cloathed, but arm'd; Evils have so much life and strength in them, that they are compared to the strongest, who live, armed men. Hence Observe, De manu Tribulationis. Vatab. Puto eum Allegoricè tam graves & vehementes calamitates intelligere. Merc.

First, It is an aggravation of unkindness, to those, who are in want, not to be kind to them, when they are modest in asking a supply of their wants.

Love ought to prevent asking, and should be moved to give most to them (who being in need) complain least.

Again, He speaks this to wipe off that aspersion, as if the loss of his estate were the thing which grieved and pinched him so sore. Did I say unto you, bring me a reward, &c.

It is an argument that a man over-loves that which he hath lost, when he is over-importunate to have his losses repaired.

If you had seen me call out unto you for an estate, then you had reason to think that the loss of my estate, was the loss of my patience.

Thirdly, Observe the temper of a gracious heart under losses and afflictions.

A gracious heart under losses: is not forward to complain to creatures, or to ask help of men.

Did I say, bring unto me, or give me a reward of your substance? He complains to God, and sheweth him his trouble, he opens his wants to God, and asketh supplies of him; but he is very modeſt and ſlow in complaining to, or in ſuing for help at the hand of creatures.

It is not unlawful for thoſe, that are in want, to make their loſſes and wants known to men; it is a duty, rather ſo to do: only it muſt be done with caution, leaſt, when we ask of creatures too importunately, we give an argumen againſt our ſelves, that we are too much in love with creatures.

As it is reproved in thoſe Rulers before ſpoken of, Hoſ. 4. 18. that they did love, give ye; it is a crime in the rich, to love, give ye; and certainly it is a ſin, at leaſt an infirmity in thoſe that are poor and in want, to love, give ye, or to ſay as Job here had not, bring to me. Solomon ſpeaks of the daughters of the horſe-leach, that they are alwayes crying give, give, noting their inſatiable thirſt after blood. Some poor are alwayes crying give, give, which notes a very inordinate deſire after riches. Job is very careful to take off the ſuſpition of ſuch a blemiſh from himſelf, I did not ſay, bring ye, or give ye me of your ſubſtance.

It is the duty of thoſe that are full, to give to their empty brethren, it is their ſin if they give not; and it is their ſhame, if they are not moſt free in giving to thoſe, who are moſt modeſt in asking; but when God hath emptied us, we ſhould not be eager in filling our ſelves. When God takes creatures from us, we ſhould take heed of purſuing them: we ſhould not do any thing, which may argue our hearts glued to them, when the Lord hath looſen'd them out of our hands. It is an honour to a poor Chriſtian, when in his greateſt ſtraights he can approve himſelf to God and men, and can ſay as the Apoſtle (Acts 20. 33.) I have coveted no mans ſilver, or gold, or apparel. It is as ſinful to covet in our wants, as it is in our abundance. And it is as bad (if not worſe) to be greedy of the creature, when we are empty, as when we are full. A poor man oppreſſing the poor, Prov. 28. 3. and coveting from the rich, are ſights of equal abomination.

Verſ. 24. Teach me, and I will hold my tongue: and cauſe me to underſtand wherein I have erred, &c.

This and the next verſe, contain the fourth branch of Job's reply; and the general ſence of them, is a ſubmiſſion of himſelf to his friends, if yet they ſhould ſpeak reaſon, or diſcover his error. Teach me and I will hold my peace; as if he had ſaid, Though I have to the beſt of my underſtanding, thus far acquitted my ſelf, and cleared mine own innocency; though I have, as I think, with truth and juſtice, laid this charge of uncharitableneſs and unfriendly dealing with me upon you; yet you ſhall ſee I am ready to hear you, I am teachable: if you can yet teach me, I will keep ſilence, and if you cauſe me to underſtand wherein I have erred, I ſhall do ſo no more.

Teach me.] The Original word notes in ſtrict ſence, to caſt a thing forth, to throw a thing as a dart or ſtone is thrown, either downward or upward, or in a direct motion forward. Hence by a Metaphor, it ſignifies rain, becauſe rain is (as it were) darted forth from the clouds, and caſt down upon the earth: And from hence (yet one remove further) the Metaphor is carried to ſignifie teaching; hence the holy Prophet is commanded to drop his word, Ezek. 20. 46. & 21. 2. Son of man, ſet thy face toward the South, and drop thy word towards the South. Son of man, ſet thy face toward Jeruſalem, and drop thy word toward the holy places: And the reaſon is this, becauſe Doctrines, Truths, and wholſom inſtructions, are inſtilled and caſt down among the people, or dropt into their ſpirits, as rain is caſt or dropp'd from Heaven upon the Earth: And ſo we may read the words out of the Metaphor thus, rain down upon me; do ye, O my friends, like clouds full of water, diſſolve and ſhowre down inſtructions upon me, and ſee if I do not receive and drink them in. And from this word, all doctrine and inſtruction in the Hebrew is called Torah, Prov. 13. 1. and Pſal. 1. 1. And the Jews by way of eminency, call the five books of Moſes (as alſo all the books of the Old Teſtament) the Torah, that is, the Law or rule of holy Doctrine, which God rained down from Heaven, and diſtilled graciouſly upon his people, for their growth in knowledge and in holineſs: And ſo a Teacher, from the ſame root, is called Moreh, Job 36. 22. Who teacheth like Him? who raineth like him? there is no man can diſtil truths, as God doth. Moſes (Deut. 32. 2.) elegantly ſets forth his preaching, by an allegory of rain and dew. My doctrine ſhall drop as the rain; my ſpeech ſhall diſtil as the dew, as the ſmall rain upon the tender herb, and as the ſhowres upon the graſs. And the Apoſtle Paul, Heb. 6. 7, 8. compares a taught people to ground that is well watered with rain; For the earth which drinketh in the rain, that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth fruit, is bleſſed; but that which beareth thornes and bryers, is rejected, and is nigh unto curſing, whoſe end is to be burned. A people well inſtructed, are like that ground which is under continual ſhowres and dews.

And doctrine is fitly compared to rain, and teaching to raining; Firſt, becauſe all true and holy doctrine comes from God, as the rain doth. The rain is Gods proper gift, (Jer. 14. 22.) Can any of the vanities of the Gentiles give rain? All the men in the world, are not able to make one drop of rain; ſo we may ſay of this figurative rain of truth and holy doctrine, Can any of the vanities of the Gentiles? yea, can any of the moſt learned among the ſons of men give this rain? Can any man make any one truth, which hath not firſt been made above? Truth like rain comes from Heaven, it drops from beyond the clouds. Art not thou He? O Lord our God? therefore we will wait upon Thee, ſay they of the natural rain, Jer. 14. 22. and ſo we muſt in regard of the ſpiritual. Hence the word which Moſes uſes (Deut. 32. 2.) for doctrine, dropping as the rain, ſignifies a received learning: Holy truths are ſo called in that language, becauſe the doctrine of Religion is received from God, not deviſed by men. So the Apoſtle phraſes it (1 Cor. 11. 23.) I received of the Lord, that which I delivered unto you. And Chriſt himſelf, As my Father hath taught me, ſo I ſpeak theſe things, John 8. 28. That which Nicodemus ſaid of Chriſt, is true of every one that teacheth truth, Joh. 3. 2. Thou art a Teacher come from God. As truth it ſelf, ſo the teachers of it are from God: as a lie, and the tellers of it are from the Devil, Joh. 8. 44.

Secondly, Like rain (as in regard of the original whence it comes, ſo) in regard of the effect: rain refreſheth the earth, when the earth is weary and faint, when the earth gaſpes and is parched, how doth a ſhowre of rain revive it? When the Pſalmiſt had ſpoken of the rain coming down upon the earth, he preſently adds this effect, The little hills rejoyce on every ſide, they ſhout for joy, they alſo ſing. Thus alſo a people wearied, and languiſhing, and fainting in ignorance, when they receive truths and holy inſtructions, how do their hearts rejoyce, how do they laugh and ſing? In the parable, Matth. 13. Some are ſaid to receive the word with joy; even they who are but formaliſts and hypocrites (for it is ſpoken of them) rejoyce and are refreſhed for a ſeaſon with the word. Truth is ſuch a gracious ſhowre, that they ſometimes receive it with joy, who have no grace. And if truth refreſh men, who are but nature, or move in ſpiritual works, but upon natural principles, how will it refreſh thoſe who have grace, and ſpiritual principles ſutable to it. Thou, O God (ſaith David, Pſal. 68. 9, 10.) didſt ſend a plentiful rain, whereby thou didſt refreſh thine inheritance when it was weary. That's a truth in the letter, and ſome underſtand it of natural rain; but others interpret that plentiful rain in a figure, for the rain of doctrine which God ſent down upon his people, when he gave the Law and dropt thoſe heavenly Oracles from Mount Sinai upon his people Iſrael, that ſhowre of the Law came indeed in a ſtorm, Thunder and Lightning, and a terrible tempeſt accompanied it; But though the thunder terrified, yet the ſhowre refreſhed; and the Saints have ever delighted in the matter of thoſe inſtructions and holy counſels given there, though Moſes a chief among the Saints, feared and quak'd exceedingly at the manner of giving them.

Thirdly, As rain, ſo teaching makes fruitful. The Prophet Iſaiah makes out this part of the ſimilitude expreſly, Chap. 55. 10, 11. As the rain cometh down, and the ſnow from Heaven, and returns not thither, but waters the earth, and makes it bring forth and bud, that it may give ſeed to the ſower, and bread to the eater: So ſhall my word be that goeth out of my mouth, &c. Hence alſo the people of God are compared (Deut. 32. 2.) to graſs and tender herbs which grow and flouriſh, which are fed and bring forth fruit, when watered with the rain. It cannot be denyed, though it be much to be lamented, that many ſouls upon whom whom much of this rain falls, are altogether barren and unfruitful. But, Oh! How barren are those souls, upon whom not a drop of this rain ever fell! They that are deprived of these showres are under a grievous curse, even such a curse as David imprecates upon the Mountains of Gilboa, 2 Sam. 1.21. Ye Mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, &c. When God saith unto a people, let there be no dew, no rain upon you, no Moses to drop doctrine upon you, no Paul to plant, no Apollo's to water you with the Word, this is the saddest showre of curses that can fall upon a People; as without rain, so without the Word, ordinarily, there can be no fruitfulness. You see at this time how upon a little with-holding of the natural rain, we presently fear barrenness and famine; the want of spiritual rain brings in a worse barrenness, though there are not many who fear it, or are sencible of it.

This was preach'd in a time of drought

Fourthly, The Word taught is like rain in regard of the dispensing of it. The rain comes not down alike, at all times; showres are very various; sometimes it rains softly, then we call it a still, soaking rain; sometimes we have a strong mighty rain; at another time rain is accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, while the showres descend, the great Ordnance of Heaven discharge from the clouds, and fill the Air with terror. Thus also it is, or should be in teaching: Many souls require a still, soft, quiet rain: Others must have stronger showres, mighty rains you must pour down upon them. A third sort must have thunder joyned with rain, they need a Boanerges, a son of thunder, a mixture of terror with instruction to bore their ears, and break their hearts. Those teachers mistake their work, who in stead of raining are alwayes Thundering and Lightning. As if their Pulpet were set upon Mount Sinai. And I believe, it is as great a mistake to think Teachers need never thunder. The word of God in all parts of it, and in all manner of dispensations of it, is exceeding useful. A Minister without teaching, is (as Jude speaks) a cloud without water; and he shall do but little good upon some, if he have nothing but water in his cloud. Fire sometime must mingle with the rain, and a Tempest come after or before the dewing, distilling, still voice. The word of God is compared to fire, as well as unto water. Only it must be the wisdom, and it is the duty of every Teacher, to know how to give every one his portion, or as the Apostle Jude counsels, vers. 22,23. Of some to have compassion, making a difference, and others to save with fear, pulling them out of the fire: A difference must be made, some are to be dealt with compassionately, and gently rained upon; others must be saved with fear, that is, they must be made affraid with Thunder and Lightning, with stormy and tempestuous doctrine. Some spirits will not be kept out of the fire, but by casting them into the fire; so much that Text in Jude imports. Others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire; as if he had said, your terrifying them with the fire, will be as pulling them out of the fire. A shower of spiritual brimstone (such as God rain'd on Sodome in the letter) is best for them, if you spare them, you destroy them.

Teach me, [and I will be silent.] Or, I will hold my tongue. The word properly taken, signifies to dig or to plough: And sometime improperly to meditate or think, and it implies much thoughtfulness; because a musing, meditating, thoughtful man is ever digging into matters, he rests not in the outside and face of things, but puts in his plough deep, turning them up to the very bottom. From whence, by one step further into the Metaphor, it is translated to signifie silence, or to hold our peace; because they who have many thoughts, have fewest words; Musing men are no great talkers; when the mind is much at work, and very busie, the tongue usually doth little. Job promises silence, as if he meant to sit down and consider fully, what they should further say unto him.

This promised silence or holding of his tongue, may have a threefold reference.

First, in general to the duty of a learner, Teach ye me, and I will keep silence, I will learn.

Or secondly, To his former complaints, Teach me, and I will be silent: That is, I will give over complaining, I confess I have made a bitter complaint in the third Chapter: but if you will teach me better, I will complain no more.

Thirdly, It may have reference to that which they should speak to him in their next advices. Teach me aright, and I will hold my tongue, that is, I will reply no more, I will not gain-say your counsels, but rather (if I have offended) acknowledge my error, and sit down in silence, I will not wrangle, when I cannot answer, I can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. From hence we may Observe,

First, That, a gracious spirit is a teachable spirit.

A gracious heart calls for teaching. Teach me, and I will hold my tongue. As a gracious heart calls for strengthning from Christ, so it calls for teaching from Christ, and from any who can teach the truth, as it is in Christ. A weak soul saith, Lord draw me, and I will run after thee; an ignorant soul saith, Lord instruct me, that I may understand thee. Give me the wisdom of the prudent, that I may understand my way, and I shall walk therein. A godly man loves not to be at his own disposing, nor at his own Tutoring; He that will learn of none, but himself, hath (sure enough) a fool to his Master; And there is more hope of a fool then of him, that is (thus) wise in his own conceit, Prov. 26. 12. Observe,

Secondly, A teachable spirit is an excellent spirit.

A man that is willing to be taught, is in a better condition then many who are able to teach. It argues a holier temper of the heart, to be willing to be taught, then to be able to teach. And it is far worse to be unwilling to learn, then not to be knowing; Unteachableness is more dangerous then ignorance. It is sad to consider how unteachable many are, they will not be taught, or they think they have learned all, they have devoured all knowledge, they are full and need no more: Some deceived souls (and they most) carry it, as if they had a spirit of infallibility: what? teach them? they are above teaching. It is a sweet frame of spirit, when a man sees he may be out of frame. He is in a fair way to truth, who acknowledge that he may be in an error. And he who will not acknowledge that he may be in an error, is certainly out of the way of truth. The Apostle resolves it, 1 Cor. 8. 2. If any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know, Not as if the Apostles meaning were, that all knowledge must be special or uncertain, all in queries and nothing in conclusions, that we should halt between two opinions, and hang like meteors in the Air. Nor doth he commend to us that proud modesty, which will not let us acknowledge we know what we know; but his mind is to meet with those who think they know any thing so well, that they need not or cannot know it better, and abound so in their own sence, that they have no room to admit the sence of others. As he who thinks himself so good, that he cannot be better, was never so good as he should; so he that thinks he knows so much, that he can learn no more, knows nothing as he ought. It is best to be fixed in judgement, but it is very ill to be fixed in opinion. It is to be feared that man is much divorced from right reason, who is so married to his own, that he resolves nothing but death shall part him and his opinion. What if this man have espoused a fancy of his own, not any truth of God? To be so fixed, that a man may be fixed in evil, is as dangerous, as to be so unfixed, that he may be unfix'd in good. It was a high breathing of holiness, when David said, Psalm 57.7. My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: While we are upon a known duty, or have a known truth on our side, our hearts cannot be too much fixed and set upon them. To be of an unfixed, moveable, wavering spirit in goodness, is within one degree of falling into evil; but to say, I am fixed, I am fixed, I am resolved, resolved, when yet things are doubtful, and under difficult dispute, is actually to be in an error, though possibly the thing we fix on be a truth. The Apostle cautions his Ephesians, and us in them, Chap. 5. 14. That they, and we, be not henceforth children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine; and yet they are under a rebuke, who will not be moved by any wind of doctrine; that is, let never so powerful and forcible a wind of Truth, breathe and blow upon them, they will not be carried or moved in judgment by it. Observe,

Thirdly, Silence becometh learners.

Yet not all silence. There is a speaking helpful to learning. To move doubts is the way to be resolved, and to ask the question, the readiest means for instruction. But he that will have all the talk, shall have but little profit. The ear is the Organ of discipline; Hearing is the sense of Learning, and the seasonable stopping of our own mouths, a ready means to open our understandings. To be swift to hear, and slow to speak (Jam. 1. 19.) is the speediest way to attain wisdom. Observe,

Fourthly, He that is shewed his error, should speak no more, but sit down convinc'd.

Teach me (saith Job) and I will hold my tongue; that is, I will reply no more upon you, I will never stand up in maintaining an error; I will be no patron of evil, though my self am in the fault. Error shall not be excused, or a mistake apologiz'd for by me. Some wits are able to make a fair cover for, and put a gloss upon the most deformed and grossest errors. There was never any opinion in the world, but some have seconded it, and undertaken it's protection. When Conscience hath never a word to say, wit will be very talkative; and when they have ended reasoning, some can wrangle everlastingly. When wit and learning undertake a cause, and leave conscience out of the Commission, there must either be a very ill end of it, or no end. A subtil Sophister will dispute any thing, and bring probable Arguments (where Reason alone sits Judge) against the most undoubted truths. It is an ill office to be an Orator for our own or others errors, for our own or others sinful practices, Prov. 30. 32. If thou hast done evil in lifting up thy self, or if thou hast thought evil (or maintained evil) lay thine hand upon thy mouth; speak no more, never be an Advocate in a bad cause, though it be thine own; when our faults are shewed us, we should not open our mouthes, unless it be to renounce and disclaim them. A sad account will be given of that time, and of those parts, which have been laid out in the patronage of our failings and mistakes. It is as sinful to sew fig-leaves, or make fair pretexts to cover the nakedness of our opinions, as of our practices.

And cause me to understand, wherein I have erred.

As if Job had said, When once you bring me to see clearly, that I am in an error, and cast light into my conscience, you shall find me readily submitting to you.

Confessio est quâ Quintilianus dicit esse cum aliquid iniquum videmur causæ fiducia pati. Apud eum dicitur confessio nihil nocitura. Quint. l. 9. c. 2.

A question arises here in the general, whether Job doubted his cause, or whether or no there were an hesitancy in his spirit, about what he had done or spoken?

I answer, this speech implies not, that he had any doubt of himself, or an admission that he had erred. Job speaks like Orators or Disputants, who when they are sure of a point, will yet grant a little doubtfulness, or raise doubts about what they are able to maintain and confident to carry. It is ordinary to put things by way of supposition, of which we make no question. When Job saith, Cause me to understand, wherein I have erred; it is not an acknowledgment that he had erred; but a submission in case he had, or a concession that he might; Job was not lifted up with an opinion of his own infallibility; he knew to err was common to man, and therefore he speaks of himself under the common notion of all men: not from any consciousness of his own error.

Non submittit se errasse, sed humiliter se submittit amicorum sententiæ. Bold.

Cause me to understand.] It is but one word in the Original, and it signifies to convince by Reason or Argument. Cause me to understand, that is, do not think to force my opinion, or to offer violence to my judgment; do not think to club me down with great words and clamorous threats, but do it by solid Arguments, by evident demonstration of Reason: Do it by savoury advices and counsels, not by bitter reproaches and invectives. Deal with my understanding, not barely with my affections, Cause me to understand

My error.] It signifies local, corporal wandrings and errors, and bodily erring or wandring; and sometimes it signifies the wandrings of the mind, judgment and affections, Prov. 5. 19, 20. Solomon bids the Husband, Rejoyce in the Wife of his youth, let her be as the loving Hind and pleasant Roe, let her breasts satisfie thee at all times, and be thou ravished alwayes with her love. The Hebrew (as our Translators put in the Margin) is, err thou alwayes in her love; that is, Let all thy wandring, erring thoughts and affections be reduced and brought whom to the Wife whom God hath given thee. The next words seem to interpret so, for why (my Son) wilt thou be ravished with a strange woman, and embrace the bosom of a stranger? That's dangerous erring in love: Therefore (saith he) let all thine errings and wandrings, all thy delights and ravishments be (chaste and conjugal) towards the Wife of thy youth.

Further, It signifies erring or wandring out of mere ignorance. This word is often used in Leviticus for the sin of Ignorance, Chap. 4. 2. & 5. 18. & 22. 14. If any man hath sinned through ignorance, or committed an error, then he shall offer these and these Sacrifices and Oblations. So Psalm 19. 12. Who can understand his errors? That is, those sins which he commits out of ignorance and inadvertency. Hence he concludes with this prayer, Cleanse thou me from secret faults. He doth not mean faults which he committed privately, and so were secrets to others; but faults which he had committed ignorantly, and so were secrets to himself: that is, they were sins of ignorance. And I conceive he means not only such sins as he had committed ignorantly, but then knew they were sins, but even such sins as he was ignorant whether ever he had committed them or no; that is, he prays for the pardon of all those sins which possibly he might have committed, though to him as yet altogether unknown and undiscovered.

The Title of Psalm 7. is, Shiggaion of David; it is the same Original word we have in the Text, and some translate it, A wandring Song: and the reason for it, is either because of the variable and wandring Poetry, or because of the variable or wandring tune in which that Psalm was sung, and to which it was set for greater delight; others make the Title (suitable to the translation of the word here) The Psalm of David's Errors; because it sets forth his fears and dangers, which made him wander in body, and sometime also to go a little astray in mind. This Psalm was sung to the Lord, concerning the words or the business of Cush the Benjamite, that is, of Saul who was of Kish and of Jemini (1 Sam. 9. 1.) called here Cush, that is, Ethiopian or Black-moor (figuratively) from his black and ill conditions, his heart not being changed, as the Black-moor changeth not his skin. Saul was a bitter enemy to David, and made him flie and wander, and sometime go a stray in his speeches and actions, upon a sudden gust of temptation. And so a Psalm of that subject may well bear this stile, either from his corporal or spiritual errors. There is a third apprehension upon Shiggaion, taking it for delight or ravishments of mind, and so the Psalm is superscribed, David's delight or solace; that is, the Psalm which he composed and sung to the Lord, to comfort himself in all his troubles with Saul; his soul wandred Heaven-ward in holy ravishments and delights in God, while his body wandred about the Earth in astonishment and sorrows, caused by a bloody-minded man.

Cantio erratica.

The very same Title is given to the prayer of Habakkuk, Chap. 3. 1. A prayer of Habakkuk upon Sigionoth, which some interpret to be so called because of the strange variety or variableness of the Song and tune, the Prophet being in a holy rapture, ravished in spirit, and swallowed up in the contemplation of Gods Power and Majesty, soars up and wanders (like Paul in another case) he knows not whither, or how.

But the Vulgar renders it, A prayer for ignorance, or a prayer for error; which translation is surely an error, if not of ignorance, as to the scope of that prayer; though the letter of the original word (as in the former instances, and in the Text before us) bears that sence.

When Job saith, Cause me to understand my error, his meaning is, that his errors (whatsoever they were) in that business, were secret to him, he had not gone against the light of his own conscience, nor as yet had they brought any light to convince his conscience; he had been charged with errors, extravagancies and wandrings; but he understood not what they were, and, therefore desires them to cause him understand his error. Observe hence,

First, Man is subject to error.

To error in speech, to error in practice, to error in judgment. Man by nature can do nothing else but err, All his his goings, are goings astray, and all his knowledge is bottom'd upon an heap of false principles. All his works (by nature) are errata's, and the whole edition of his life, a continued mistake. Observe,

Secondly, That man is in a fair way to truth, who acknowledgeth he may err.

Cause me to understand wherein I have erred, saith Job; he thought he had not erred: but he grants it was possible for him to err. That which hath fastned so many errors to the Popes Chair, and from thence scattered them all over the world, is an opinion, that he in his Chair cannot err; his supposed spirit of Infallibility, hath made him the great Deceiver, and deceived him. He that thinks he cannot err, errs in thinking so, and seldom thinks or speaks, or doth any thing, but it is an error. He is most secured from error, who suspects he hath erred, and humbly acknowledges that he may.

We may here Observe what an Error is.

Thirdly, An Error strictly and properly taken, is that which we hold or do, out of bare ignorance of the Truth.

It is an Error in practice, when we are ignorant of what is better to be done. An Error in opinion is, when we are ignorant of what is better for us to believe or hold. Heresie is an Error and more, for Heresie hath these three things in it.

First, In regard of the matter, it must be in some great and fundamental truths. The word Heresie is by some derived from choosing; by others from taking away, because it takes us off from Christ, or from the foundations of saving knowledge.

Secondly, Heresie is accompanied with pertinacy and obstinacy, after clear light offered: It is possible one may have an Error about things which are Fundamental, and yet be no Heretick: An Heretick is condemned of himself, Tit. 3. 10. But he will not be convinced by another. Not that he doth formally and in terms, give sentence against or condemn himself; but equivalently he doth, as the Apostle (Acts 13. 46.) speaks to the unbelieving Jews, Seeing ye put the word from you, and judge your selves unworthy of everlasting life, &c. These men did not judge themselves such formally, they came not to the Apostle and said, we willingly submit our selves to Hell and wrath. No, they thought very well of themselves, and judged themselves worthy of eternal life. But their practice judged them, and gave a real sentence against them, while they acquitted themselves. Thus also an Heretick (who ever hath a very high opinion of himself and his opinions) is condemned of himself.

Thirdly, In Heresie there is taking of pleasure and delight: therefore Heresie is numbred among the lusts of the flesh, adultery and fornication, &c. Gal. 5. 20. Hereticks desire to disperse and vend their opinions. A man alone in an error, will weep over his opinions, and it grieves him that he dissents and goes contrary unto others: But he that stifly maintains an error, insults over others, and delights to maintain his opposition: he triumphs and boasts of his war, though he can never obtain victory (Truth only is victorious.) And some learned Criticks observe as much from the form of the Greek word, Tit. 3. 11. So then, Heresie is not only an error in judgment, but a pertinacy in the will, and it takes in delight at the affection.

Observe from these words, Cause me to understand, wherein I have erred, Fourthly, That, an erring brother, or friend, must not be importuned barely to leave his error, but he must be made to understand his error.

Error should not be left, nor truth received blindfold; a man may sin in leaving an error: they do (without question) who lay it down thinking it to be a truth; and there is little question but they do, who leave it before they understand it to be an error. It is much alike to reject an opinion as an error, which we do not understand, and to practice an opinion for a truth, which we do not understand. If a man practice or believe a truth, not convinced that it is, or not conceiving it to be a truth, that truth is but an error to him; because he doth not believe or practice it under the notion of a truth; and so, if he leave an error, which he is not convinced to be an error, his leaving it is not much better (and in some cases it may be worse) then his holding it; because he leaves it not under the notion of an error. We must not dance after other mens pipes, or see with other mens eyes: Except we know it is good we do, and evil which we leave undone, our not doing evil, is not good to us, and our doing good is (to us) no better then evil.

Hæreticus est cui voluptas est falsas tueri opiniones, ea enim est nominum Græcorum in ύδος desinentiũ proprietas, ut ad qualitatem designandam non adhibeantur modo, sed etiam ad innuendã delectationem, quam in ea capit, cui illa qualitas inest. Camer. Myroth. Evang. in cap. 2. Epist. ad Titum.

Vers. 25. How forcible are good words! But what doth your arguing reprove?

Job speaks by way of admiration, How forcible! I cannot tell how forcible. It is an elegant way of expressing the highness of our thoughts, as Psal. 84. 1. How amiable are thy dwelling places, O Lord of Hosts! He admires in stead of speaking: they are so amiable, as I cannot tell how amiable they are. Put your thoughts to their utmost conceptions of beauty, and that beauty is in the dwellings of the Lord: so saith Job here, How forcible are right words! they are so forcible, as I know not how forcible they are, I must admire and be silent.

In Hebræo Admirationem est elegans & patheticum. Bold.

How forcible are right words! The Chaldee Paraphrase reads it, How sweet are right words! interpreting it by that, Psal. 119. 103. O how sweet are thy commandments unto me! they are sweeter then the honey and the honey comb. But the originals differ, though that be a good sence.

We read, How forcible! The word signifies any thing that is strong, potent, or mighty; it notes also acrimony, sharpness or smartness, and so it is often applied to words either good or bad, 1 King. 2. 8. when David lay upon his death-bed, giving his last advice to Solomon, Thou (saith he) hast Shimei with thee, who cursed me with a grievous curse. In the Hebrew it is this word, who cursed with a sharp, strong, forceale curse, he cursed me with all his heart, with all his might he laid load upon me. Evil words are strong, right words are strongest. Job had before at vers. 6. of this Chapter, called the discourses of Eliphaz unsavoury, in this he taxes them for flat or weak: right words have a pleasing acrimony upon the palate of the soul, and a power upon the judgment, to sway and carry it; but yours are dull and feeble.

Some render it after the letter of the Hebrew, words of right, or truth: Others in the concrete, How forcible are the words of a right, or upright man! But take it as we translate, How forcible are right words! Words are right three wayes;

אִמְרֵי יָשָׁר Eloquia rectitudinis Mont. ἀληθῶς ῥήματα. Sept. λόγοι εὐθεῖς. Aquil.

First, In the matter, when they are true.

Secondly, In the manner, when they are plain, direct, and perspicuous.

Thirdly, In their use, when they are duly and properly applied; when the arrow is carried home to the white, then they are right words, or words of righteousness. When this three-fold rightness meets in words, how forcible, how strong are such words?

But what doth your arguing reprove? I confess there is great strength in right words, and in the words of the upright; but you have been long disputing the matter with me, and what have you got? where are your gains? The word signifies, to rebuke with conviction and argument, to shew what is right, and to refute that which is contrary; Job 13. 3. the word is so used, Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God, to reason it out as it were by force of argument with God. The word is answerable in sence to that in the Greek, used by the Apostle Heb. 11. 1. Faith is a conviction, or the evidence of things not seen, that is, an evident conviction: Faith gives a stronger evidence then any reason, yea then sence: therefore though faith be of things that fall not under sence, and are above reason; yet faith is an evidence or a conviction, fuller then any Logical conviction or demonstration. The Argument from such authority as faith grounds upon, is stronger and more convincing then any, or then all the reason in the world.

What doth your arguing reprove? Word for word, What doth your disputation dispute? Or, what do your Arguments argue? as if he had said, Your arguing is no arguing, your reasons are no reasons; that which you have been arguing all this while with me, doth not so much as deserve the name of an argument (in my case) it hath no power or strength strength in it: Job layes a charge upon his friends by this opposition; Right words are forcible, but your arguments are not right, or, you are not right who argue; therefore what force, what power is there in what you have spoken? I can blow it all off as easily as a man can blow off a feather. Mr. Broughton varies somewhat from this sence. And what can your blame soundly blame? That is, you shall find nothing blame-worthy, or reprovable in me. Observe hence,

Quid disceptando conficiet disceptatio vestra, q. d. quod vos redarguitis, redarguendi verbo non est donandum.

First, Words rightly spoken are very forcible.

Take it in the general. What mighty things have words, words duly spoken, done? Abigail, a weak woman, by a few right words overcame the strength and wtath of mighty David, and turned his whole army back: David with all his men, were in the heat of resolution, and upon a hot march to destroy Nabal, yet she stops them; and that woman speaking to Joab (when Sheba fled to the City) with a few right words prevailed to save the City, and stay the fury of war.

Take the Point more strictly; the words of truth, are full of power, full of strength.

Naked truth is too hard for armed error.

Truth hath the strength of God in it, therefore that must needs prevail. The Apostle professes, 2 Cor. 1. 3. We can do nothing against the truth; he means it in regard of the bent of his spirit, his heart could not move against truth; but we may use it in another sence, We can do nothing against the truth, that is, let us put out the uttermost of our power, we can never prevail against the truth. Look upon truth in the promises, that will conquer all; look upon truth in the threatnings, that's forcible to overcome all, Jer. 1. 10. God gives the Prophet a commission, I have set thee over the Nations, and over the Kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build and to plant: Here's a strange commission for a Prophet; how could Jeremiah plant or root up, build or pull down Nations? He never drew Sword, yet he performed this commission fully by his Word: he pulled them down, and rooted them up by the Word of threatning, and he planted them and built them with the Word of promise, Zech. 1. 16. Your fathers are dead, they are gone, but my words (saith the Lord) which I spake by my servants the Prophets, did not they take hold of your fathers? Your fathers are dead, and the Prophets are dead, but my words live still, and did not they take hold of your fathers? you esteemed my words as wind, but they were a strong wind, they blew down the power of your fathers. The Apostle gives this honour to all the Word of God (which is all right) that it is mighty, or forcible, through God, to bring down strong holds, and to bring every thought into subjection unto Christ. And Heb. 4. 12. The word of God is mighty in operation: The energy of it is such that nothing can stand before it, no lust can stand before it, no error can stand before it, it bears down all with fine force.

Therefore take heed of standing in the way of right words. Truth comes with such a force, that no man is able to bear up against it. It is better to have all the men of the world against us, then to have one Word of God against us. One word of Truth will do more against us, then all the Armies in the world; no force can stand against this force, the force of the Word will destroy the force of the Sword. Truth will be the great Conqueror at last.

Take it in the Concrete, in reference to the speaker, How forcible is the word of an upright man! Then Observe, Thirdly, The words of one that is upright-hearted, carry great strength and power with them.

Truth looses by the patronage and defence which some give it. Truth gets little by the tongues of those men who have no grace in their hearts. Truth in the mouth of a wicked man is weakned by the falsness of his heart and filthiness of his life. Sometimes precious truths are spoken by vilest men, but what force have they? they are not received or owned. Christ could not abide to hear the Devil speak truth. A godly man speaks with authority, as it is said of Christ, He spake as one having authority, and not as the Scribes; the Scribes taught that which was truth sometimes, and the Scribes had alwayes authority to teach; the chair of Moses was theirs, they were not intruders upon an office they had no call to. When Christ saith, The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses chair (Mat. 23. 2.) He speaks not only (de facto) of what they did, but (de jure) of what they had right to do; they were not usurpers, or actors beyond their line. But though the Scribes had the right of authority to teach, yet their teaching had no force of authority, it was but talk. And it appears plainly, that the words of that hypocritical generation, the Scribes and Pharisees bare no weight with the people; because Christ gives them a charge, to observe and do what the Scribes and Pharisees bid them: As intimating that the doctrine of those Scribes (though true) was low-priz'd, and lay much unpractis'd, Matth. 23. 3. We must not shorten the hand of God, as if he might not use those who have no truth to publish a truth; he may imploy what instruments he pleases, and he can make those that are evil, instruments of good. But look upon it ordinarily, thus it is, the word of truth hath most power, strength and force, from the lips of those who are upright in heart and holy in life. How forcible are their words? The words of the wise are like goads, or like nails, fastned by the Masters of the Assembly, Eccles. 11. But the words of wicked Masters in the Assembly, are like nails without points, they will not drive, or take hold, there's no fastning of them; or the words of wicked men are like weak nails, which break in the driving: What do you arguing, reproving, teaching, you that carry your selves thus, what force have your words? Truth looses both strength and credit in your mouths: Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thy self? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? &c. are the Apostles chiding expostulations with the Jewish Doctors, Rom. 2. And upon this he charges them with dishonouring God, and causing his Name to be blasphemed among the Gentiles, vers. 23, 24. But what was the blasphemy? Surely this, The Gentiles grew to have a low esteem of the word of God, his Law was of no force with them, because those Teachers were so false to it, and unspoke with their lives whatsoever their Tongues had spoken. That which hath no force upon the speakers heart, hath seldom any upon the hearers. What do your teaching teach, or your comfortings comfort? what do your arguings argue, or your reprovings reprove? Shall vice reprove sin? as we speak proverbially: or if it doth, sin is not much hurt with these reproofs. Words spoken from the heart, go to the heart; and words read in the life, are most forcible to reform the life: Then the word goes first cloathed with life and power, when the Preacher can read his Sermon in his own heart, and the people in his life. He that speaks only out of books, does much after his rate, who (as we say) speaks without-book: And he that lives not what he speaks (what in him lies) kills what he speaks. And how shall such a dead letter ('tis almost a miracle if it doth) conveigh a quickning spirit? Such arguings seldom reprove any but the arguer, and him they alwayes reprove.

VERS. 26, 27, 28, 29, 30.

Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind?
Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and you dig a pit for your friend.
Now therefore be content, look upon me, for it is evident unto you, if I lye.
Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity, yea return again: my righteousness is in it.
Is there iniquity in my tongue? Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

IN the two former verses, Job made an humble submission of himself unto the better counsel and instruction of his friends, if they could yet shew him wherein he had errred. In these five verses, he doth two things further.

First, He expostulates with his friends about their former speech and carriage toward him.

Secondly, He admonishes them to be better advised, more moderate and considerate, in what they had yet to say unto him.

The

The former of these is contained in vers. 26, 27. And there are two branches of it.

First, He taxes them for making so light of what he had said, Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind? vers. 26.

Secondly, He taxeth them for laying such heavy load upon him, in what they had said, Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and you dig a pit for your friend, v. 27. As if he had spoken plainly thus, You have carried the matter hitherto with me, as if I had spoken nothing but bare empty words, words without any weight; yea, as if I were raging mad, distracted, desperate, not knowing, nor caring what I did, or what I spake; as if my whole discourse were no better, then meer vapouring, a puff of wind, a nothing; and ye your selves rage against me with such violence, as a cruel hard-hearted Tyrant is enraged with, against a poor, helpless, innocent and forsaken, friendless Orphan; or at best, ye deal with me, as cunning Sophisters and subtil disputants, seeking to catch me in your intricate discourses and doubtful debates, you make a pit for your friend.

This for the general sence of those two verses, containing an expostulation about his friends unfriendly dealing with him. Now to the particulars.

Do ye imagine to reprove words?

חשב Ad crepandum tantum verbis concinnatis. Vulg.

The word we translate [Imagine] notes a very curious, exquisite and elaborate invention of any thing. The Vulgar refers imagining to the words with which they did reprove, not to the act of reproving. Ye make a neat frame of words to reprove me; and so the sence rises thus, you artificially imagine, mint and coyn eloquent speeches and subtil arguments, to reprove and convince me with; as if you came hither to shew your selves Logicians and Orators, rather then loving friends. This is your dealing, You imagine words to reprove with. Others thus, Do you think that words reprove? That great words shall overcome me, without weight of reason? This sence refers also to the speech of Job's friends; as if he had said, Do you stand devising words against me, or wording it with me? Do you think that your fine phrases and elaborate polisht language will carry the matter with me, will words reprove me? And so we may connect it with the sence immediately foregoing, How forcible are right words? But what doth your arguing reprove? Your arguings that are slight arguings? Your words are meer words, a sound and a noise; *words set alone, are often taken for words only, for naked words, words without any due cloathing of comliness and moderation, and without any ballast or weight of reason and discretion. And do you (my friends) imagine to gain me, by such a parcel of words as these?

Num verba nuda putatis arguere, q. d. putatisne verba satis esse ad arguendum & disceptandum sine ratione. Planior fuerit sensus, si ב ante מלים subaudias, an cogitatis arguere במלים meris verbis. Merc.

* Verba nuda & sola. Ut mulier, mulier bona, Lana, lana alba, & si quæ alia Gramaticis observata. Drus.

But according to the sence touch'd before, Job rather refers to the opinion, which his friends had of his words; Do ye imagine to reprove words? That is, do you think that you have nothing to answer, or reprove, but a company of empty sillables; have I not spoken reason or sence all this while? Do you think you dispute with some idle-headed fellow, who cares not what he saith, or saith he knows not what? Do you think, that your words are strong and full of reason: that yours are irrefragable arguments, and mine, but idle talk or a frothy discourse? That's a second Interpretation, and that which I conceive more clear to this place. It followeth,

And the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind?

We must understand or repeat the first branch, And do ye imagine to reprove the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind?

נואש à radice יאש Diffidit, desperavit, spē omnem rei alicujus efficiendæ aut consequendæ abjecit seu amisit.

The speeches of one that is desperate.] The word signifies a person that is quite without hope, who thinks his estate past remedy or redress, his wound incurable, his loss irreparable, and his breaches such as can never be made up or heal'd. So Jer. 2. 25. where the Prophet counsels the Church to return and repent: but, Thou saidst there is no hope; or as we read it in the margin, thy case is desperate; what do you talk of repentance, and of returning now, all's lost, all's gone, I am undone, my estate can never be recovered, Do ye imagine to reprove the speeches of one that is desperate?

Some refer this also, to the friends of Job, thus: Do ye think that bare words are answer enough for me, and that the speeches of a desperate mad man, which are nothing but wind and sound, are sufficient to refute me. And therefore you rise up against me in this storm and fury, speaking any thing, without study or premeditation.

But we may rather understand it of Job himself, and that as before, he gave their sence of his words, that they were but wind; so here he gives us their apprehension of his person, that sure he was mad or desperate.

Do ye imagine that I am desperate or distracted, because I have little or no hope to be restored? Because I have lost my estate, my strength, my children, do ye also think I have lost my wits, my reason and understanding. I confess I am even worn to pieces, and brought to nothing, I am spent and consumed with sorrows, that's my condition, but am I therefore desperate, and regard not what I speak? It is an easie and a compendious way of refuting all a man can say, to say he is mad. His words must needs be but wind, without weight, who is himself without reason. Do ye think to reprove the words of one that is desperate, that are as wind? Or, as Mr. Broughton reads, Do ye hold the terms of the forlorn, a wind? That is, do ye think, because I am in such a sad condition, and in appearance in a desperate condition, that therefore my words are light and vain, such as are no more to be regarded or heeded, then a puff of wind? And so it is, as if he had said, ye ought not to slight what I speak, because I am in such a low forlorn condition. That of Solomon comes to this sence, Eccles. 9. 16. The poor mans wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.

Haud sanè ita convenit, ut pro futilibus, verba mea habeatis, eo quod afflictionibus attritus sum & tabefactus. Merc.

It is common in Scripture to put light, vain, and unprofitable words under this expression, they are but wind. In Job 15. v. 3. Should he reason with unprofitable talk, or with speeches wherewith he can do no good? Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the East-wind? That is, should a man talk nothing but that which is vain and unprofitable? And so, Jer. 5. 13. The Prophets shall become wind; that is, their propheſies shall become wind; whatsoever they speak (said that unbelieving people) shall be but as a vain thing, it shall be as nothing, it shall pass away, and the place of it shall be known no more; thus they undervalued the Prophets in those times, when they spake the truths of God, and brought them immediate messages from Heaven. Hence Observe,

First, That words without reason, meer vain words, are no words, they are but wind.

Hence those prophane ones in Jeremiah, who said the true Prophets had belied the Lord, and were but wind, add presently, And the word is not in them: That is, the words of these Prophets are no words. Indeed the Lord answers for his Prophets, at vers. 14. telling the people, because they had thus dishonoured his messengers, that they should find those words, which they accounted wind, to be a fire, Thus saith the Lord, because ye speak this word, behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, and it shall devour them. Whosoever esteems the Word of God to be wind, shall find it to be a fire: and they who will not be taught by it, shall be consumed by it. But to the point in hand, we see in that Scripture, vain words are windy words, and windy words are as no words: The Prophets (as they supposed) were wind, and thence they infer, the word is not in them: That is, their words have no substance, strength, or power at all in them. So, Hos. 12. 1. Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the East-wind; what was the wind that Ephraim fed upon? Some vain words, some promises he had from the creature to be delivered, some hopes raised by the word of man, who is a wind; therefore his feeding upon those hopes, was but a feeding upon wind, there was no ground or strength to make those words good: So the next words interpret, He daily encreaseth lies.

Bullatas nugas. Pers. Sat. 5. utpote similia bullis vento plenis.

Such words are (by the Learned) called bubbles; and why bubbles? Because a bubble upon the water is only fill'd with wind, touch it and 'tis nothing. These words have nothing in them, but the breach of the speaker.

Unless the spirit of reason fills our mouths, we speak nothing but our breath, or as we phrase it in our Language, we do but vapour. The Apostle Peter describes such (2 Epist. 2. 8.) They speak great swelling words of vanity; and the Apostle Jude uses the same expression in vers. 16. of his ὑπέρογκα ματαιότητος φθεγγόμενοι.

Epiſtle. Their mouth ſpeaketh great ſwelling words; that is, words greatly ſwel'd with vanity. Or ſwel'd, as the fleſh ſwells, by the gathering of corruption, and ill humors. The greatneſs of theſe words was their diſeaſe, and not their nature. Wiſe men ſpeak great things, and fools ſpeak great words. Obſerve,

Secondly, That windy, empty words, will never either convince, or convert.

Such words do no work: they are wind, and they paſs away like wind without any impreſſion upon the hearers. They trouble the ear, but touch not the heart. When the noiſe of them is paſt, all is paſt. They are a ſound, and beſides that, a nothing. Windy meats are not nouriſhing for the body, neither are windy words for the ſoul. Some knowledge doth not build up, but puff up, 1 Cor. 8. 1. and that's all the knowledge which ſuch words can breed, when they breed any. Obſerve, Thirdly, We are apt to judge the words of thoſe that are greatly afflicted, to be but vain windy words.

And we are ready to conclude, they complain more then they need. When the Iſraelites groaning under the preſſures of that bondage, ſent to Pharoah for ſome abatements of their burdens: we will not diminiſh the tale of the bricks, only let ſtraw be given us: no ſaith Pharoah, Exod. 5. 17. They are idle, let more work be laid upon the people, that they may labour therein, and let them not regard vain words. He reſolved to deal wiſely with them, and therefore muſt count them mad; their perſons were near Job's condition, and their words were fully under the ſame cenſure. Hence note, Fourthly, That it is very ſinful to eſteem the words of the afflicted to be but wind.

It was great uncharitableneſs in Job's friends, thus to expound and gloſs the Text of his complaints. We ſhould hear a man in affliction, as if every word were drenched and ſteeped in the ſorrows of his heart; and take every ſentence, as coming bloody from his wounded ſpirit.

Obſerve how Job deſcribes his own eſtate, he was as a man deſperate (not utterly deſparate, for in another place he profeſſes in higheſt confidence, that though God kill him, yet he will truſt in him) yet deſperate he was in regard of outward help, or temporal ſuccor.

Laſtly, A godly man in affliction may ſometime think his caſe deſperate and remedileſs.

Wicked men reſolve in the Pſalm, There is no help for him in his God; and a good man under a cloud of temptation may ſay, Surely there is no help for me in my God; that is, I ſee not which way I ſhall be helped, I have no aſſurance, no evidence that God will help me: Not that he doubts the power of God to help him: But the providence of God ſeems to ſpeak that he will not, I ſhall one day periſh by the hand of Saul, ſaith holy David. Heman looked upon himſelf, as a man that had no ſtrength, free among the dead, Pſal. 88. 5. As if he had got a diſcharge from the ſervice of this world, and was enfranchiz'd a Citizen of the grave, where all are free. As (to note that only in paſſage) it is ſaid of Azariah, being ſmitten with Leproſie, and ſo put from the exerciſe of the Government, which was a civil death; that he dwelt in a ſeveral houſe, or in a houſe of freedom, 2 King. 15. 5.

Verſ. 27. Yea, you overwhelm the fatherleſs, and you dig a pit for your friend.

After he had convinced them of their uncharitableneſs in accounting his words light and windy, he ſhews them how they dealt with him, what kind of words theirs were towards him: their words were as ſwords, their words were blows, every expreſſion of theirs to his ear, was an oppreſſion upon his ſpirit; Ye overwhelm the fatherleſs; he ſets forth their (as he conceived) cruelty againſt him, by two things, very odious both;

Firſt, The undoing of a fatherleſs child.

Secondly, The digging of a pit (not for an enemy, but) for a friend.

Ye overwhelm the fatherleſs.] The Original is full of Emphaſis, word for word, it may be tranſlated thus, You throw your ſelves upon the fatherleſs; and ſo it is an alluſion to hunters, either to men when they hunt wild beaſts, or to wild beaſts, when they hunt their prey; as ſoon as the hunter can reach the game, he overwhelms it, he caſts himſelf down, or layes all his ſtrength upon it. A dog having caught the hare, falls upon it, and keeps it under. Some conceive that expreſſion, Gen. 49. 9. concerning Judah, compared to a Lion, reaches this ſence, Judah is a Lions whelp, from the prey my ſon thou art gone up, he ſtooped down, he couched as a Lion, and as an old Lion, who ſhall rouze him up? As if that crouching and lying down were when he hath taken his prey; who dares to ſtir up a Lion, when he hath his prey under him: if any dare, the Lion will make them a prey too. We ſee in daily experience, how angry a dog will be, if you ſtir him up, when he hath but a bone under him. Such a violence is noted in this expreſſion, you throw your ſelves down upon a poor fatherleſs one, a man in a low condition, as if you would tear him to pieces, and eat him up at a morſel. Our tranſlation comes near the ſignification of the word, Ye overwhelm the fatherleſs.

The word ſignifies to run upon one with violence, and hence Giants are called Nephilim in the Hebrew, which is as much as to ſay Oppreſſors, becauſe they overwhelm the weaker with force and violence.

Maſter Broughton tranſlates the word to another ſence, as noting, not an open violent way of oppreſſing, but a ſecret ſubtil way of circumventing, To lay a ſnare for the Orphan: The word may bear that ſence, namely, to ſet a trap, or to lay a ſnare: And he parallels it with that word uſed often in the New Teſtament, To ſcandalize or offend a brother, which properly ſignifies to lay a trap or a ſnare, to ſet ſomewhat whereby to entangle or catch a man, that he may be ſtopt and hindred in his way. Thus Job, of his friends, you ſet a trap to enſnare, and make a pit for me to fall into, or you lay a block to cauſe me to ſtumble in, or turn out of the wayes of holineſs, while you would perſwade me, that he who walks uprightly in that way, ſhall never meet with any rub of outward trouble. What is this but to diſcourage me in the way I walk, becauſe therein I have met ſo many troubles. Thus you lay a ſnare for σκανδαλίζω Scandalum eſt impedimentum in via, ut quis vel collabatur & ruat, vel ab inſtituto curſu impediatur.

The fatherleſs.] The word ſtrictly taken, notes a child whoſe parents are dead. Some of the Ancients ſay, the word Pupill, which is from the Latine, ſignifies one without ſight, or wanting the apple or Pupill of his eyes; becauſe being deprived of his Parents, he wants the light of counſel and direction, to carry him on in his courſe through the world. What Moſes ſpake to Hobab his Father in law, is a truth of all good Parents to their Children, They are to them inſtead of eyes, Numb. 10. 31. But here by fatherleſs, we may rather underſtand any one that is deſtitute of help, though himſelf be a Father. He that hath many Children may (in this ſence) be an Orphan, that is, friendleſs and comfortleſs. So Pſal. 10. 14. Thou art the helper of the fatherleſs; that is, Thou art the helper of all thoſe who want help. That's the meaning of Chriſt's promiſe to his Diſciples, I will not leave you comfortleſs; the Greek is, I will not leave you Orphans or fatherleſs; Orphans and fatherleſs are uſually full of ſorrows, therefore to be left fatherleſs, and to be left comfortleſs are the ſame. In this larger ſence take Job's mind, You overwhelm the fatherleſs; that is, you overwhelm me, who am a poor, deſtitute, helpleſs man, who have no friend, ſuccor or ſupport.

Pupillus juxta Auguſtinum & Iſidorum ita dicitur, quaſi ſine oculis, quæ pupillæ dicuntur, i. e. parentibus orbus.

And you dig a pit for your friend.

Word for word thus, You dig for your friend. And this is on all ſides agreed on, to intimate the ſecret circumvention or ſubtle practice (as Job apprehended) of his friends. For in Scripture, to dig a pit, is a proverbial ſpeech, and imports the laying of ſecret plot to circumvent another either in word or deed. So, Pſal. 7. 15. He made a pit and digged it, and is fallen into it himſelf; that is, he deviſed ſome miſchievous device to entrap his brother, and the miſchief is fallen upon his own head, Pſal. 64. 5. They commune of laying ſnares privily; & Iſa. 29. 21. The Prophet deſcribes evil workers thus, They dig deep to hide their counſel from the Lord: Wicked Politicians are diggers and underminers; ſometime this is true literally (as in our Powder-plotters) but myſtically and myſteriouſly every one that layes a plot (though he never breaks ground) is ſaid Velut laqueũ & decipulã ſtruitis ad eum capiendum, i. e. captionibus & cavillis eum nitimini circumvenire. Merc.

to dig a pit for his neighbour. In the old Law (Exod. 21. 33.) a provision was made, that whosoever digged a pit, should cover it, because pits were dangerous, both for men and cattel. To dig a pit for a friend, is to endanger a friend.

In this sence, the latter part of the verse agrees with Mr. Broughton's translation of the first, Ye lay a snare for the Orphan, and ye dig a pit for your friend. False and fallacious arguments are traps and pits, in which the innocent are entangled. And Job supposes his friends intended to cast him down into the pit of despair, by charging him with hypocrisie and rottenness of heart in his profession.

There is a further apprehension concerning this word, You have digged a pit; Some of the Hebrew Doctors translate thus, You make a feast upon your friend. The word signifies not only to dig a pit, but to feast and banquet; and it notes a sumptuous exquisite banquet, 2 Kings 6. 23. And he prepared great provision for them. In this Book, chap. 41. 6. The word is used in that sence, where Leviathan is described too big for a banquet, Shall thy companions make a banquet of him? that is, are the fishermen able to catch and eat Leviathan? As if Leviathan scorned the fishermens engines, their nets and hooks.

Taking the word so, the meaning of the clause may be thus conceived, You overwhelm the fatherless, yea, you are not contented with that, but you feast upon your poor friend, that is, you rejoyce in his misery, and make your selves merry with his sorrows, as the Philistines dealt with Samson when they had put out his eyes; Come, let us bring him out, and make sport with him: So, saith Job, you deal with me, you oppress me, and then you make your selves merry with my sorrows. The tears of an oppressed poor man are as wine to the oppressor, he drinks them down; the groans of a poor man are as musick to a wicked oppressor, and his flesh is as meat to him.

Hence observe, First, To be fatherless, is to be in a sad condition.

They who are fatherless, are friendless, and so most subject to oppression. They who have least help in themselves, have usually least help from others, and often receive most hurt from others. Hence we find (Psal. 10. 18.) the oppressed and the fatherless put together; as if the fatherless were to expect oppression for their portion, and they who needed most protection, should be sure to find most vexation. We use to say, where the hedge is lowest, there men go over; it is so in every dayes experience. The mighty Nimrods ride over the backs of the poor; and where the hedge is low, they make lower gaps to pass over more easily to their own designs. This spirit of oppression is described raging against those who are under heaviest pressures, Psal. 69. 26. They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded. When wicked men see a man afflicted by the hand of God, they afflict him more; when they see God hath wounded him, they will kill him. The trouble he is in, makes their victory more easie: As when the Philistines fell before Jonathan, (1 Sam. 14.) his Armour-bearer slew after him; so do these, they slay those who are fallen before the afflicting hand of God.

Observe secondly, That, It is a great aggravation of the sinfulness of oppression and wrong doing, to oppress or do wrong to the fatherless.

Commonly the poor are most oppressed, but alwayes there is more sin in oppressing the poor, though to oppress or wrong the rich be a sin, and a very great one. What a stock of wickedness do they gather who take from those to whom they are bound to give; who make them naked and hungry, whom they should cloath and feed; who are straightned in justice towards them, to whom they ought to be enlarged in charity? It is a sin to deny them justice, who need not your charity; but to be unjust where we should be charitable, how sinful is that! It is a great sin to take away from him who hath abundance, but to take away from him who is in want, is an abounding sin. Therefore we find that given, not only as a rule, but as a charge, Prov. 22. 22. Rob not the poor because he is poor; make not poverty your advantage for robbery. There is much baseness in it (besides the sinfulness) to trample upon those who cannot resist, and perhaps dare not complain. God is most resisted in wronging those who cannot resist others, or right themselves. When we help a poor man (especially a godly poor man) God himself gains, and (in a sence) is enriched by it; because God receives glory, and is paid (which is his greatest revenue from man) in honour and in praise, for all the help we give such poor. In our almes, we perform Gods promises for him, and they who receive promises, cannot but return praise. On the other side, when we wrong the poor (especially the godly poor) God himself loses, and (in a sence) is impoverished; because not only his praise (as much as we can do) is with-held, but his truth and faithfulness are questioned. Mans uncharitableness would make void the promises of God; and when promises lie unfulfill'd, praise lies unreturn'd. Hence that threatning prohibition, Prov. 23. 10, 11. Enter not into the fields of the fatherless, that is, make not a forcible or violent entry. Why is it more dangerous to enter into his field, then into anothers? Or, is there any licence here to enter into the field of a rich man, or to trespass upon him? No, there is no licence to trespass upon a rich man, or to enter upon his field; but take heed you enter not into the fields of the fatherless; why? For their Redeemer is mighty, he shall plead their cause with thee: Though poor Orphans and Fatherless have no might, no help, they cannot plead themselves, and they have no friend to help or plead for them, they cannot get an Advocate or Counseller speak in their cause, yet their Redeemer is strong, he will plead with thee; he will plead with thee for the wrong done the fatherless, as for a wrong done himself; because thou hast oppress one whom he undertook to protect, and so (as much as thou canst) hast brought up an ill report upon the Lord, as if he were either forgetful of his word, or unable to accomplish it. We vex and tear the promises of God every time we vex and tear the poor of God. How sinful then is this sin, by which at once we break the command which God gives us, to relieve the poor, and weaken the promise which God hath given the poor, that they shall be relieved.

Observe further, from that expression of their cunning dealing with him, you dig a pit for your friend.

Deceitful words are as pits and snares to catch men in. The tongue is a great ensnarer.

The tongue teacheth to lay a snare. Balaam taught Balak to lay a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, Rev. 2. 14. He taught him how to dig a pit, and set such a snare as catcht the people into adultery and idolatry: The tongue is a great Engineer, a trap-setter to catch and entangle both the estates and souls of men,

And we may note another Point, from the relation of the person for whom this pit was digged; You dig a pit for your friend.

It is a great aggravation of unkindness to endeavour their hurt, to whom we are bound by many names and obligations to do good, or to whom we have made profession of our readiness to do them good.

The more duty or respect we owe any man, the more is our sin when we neglect him.

The three remaining verses of this Chapter contain Job's admonition to his friends, wherein he advises them to deal better or more moderately with him, and so he makes a transition to the latter part of his speech, in the seventh Chapter, wherein he returns to the old matter, the justification of that complaint made against his life, and the equity of his desire to die,

Verse 28. Now therefore be content, look upon me, for it is evident unto you, if I lie.

Now therefore be content, &c.] Some read it, Now therefore begin to look upon me, or to look more favourably upon me; as if he had said, all this while ye have hardned your faces, and clouded your brows against me, therefore now begin to be more benign in your aspects towards me. The word signifies, to begin, or take a thing in hand willingly; as also, to be well pleased, content or satisfied, the sence of all comes to one point. We translate in the latter, Now therefore be content, do this thing freely, be satisfied, and acquiesce in it; as we use to cool and calm an angry angry friend, who disputing or speaking to a business, grows hot and passionate, I pray, sir, be satisfied, let us go on meekly and moderately.

Look upon me.] Which notes either his desire of their friendly compliance with, and respect to him, as Mr. Broughton reads; Now therefore be content, regard me: or it notes the strength and firmness of Job's resolution, in this contest with his friends, I am not afraid to look you in the face, or to speak face to face; look upon me, you shall not read either fear or falseness written in my forehead; the lines and characters of my countenance shall shew you nothing but soundness and integrity of my Conscience. For it is evident unto you, if I lie; you will anon read the lie in my face, if there be a lie in my heart; therefore break not off with me, turn not away in discontent, let us discourse a little more about this business, and the truth will appear.

It is evident unto you, if I lie.] The Hebrew is, It is before your face if I lie, that is (as we translate it) it will quickly be evident, and appear unto you by a little sober debate of this business, whether I am right or no.

Et in facie meam mentior; sc. despeream vel moriar, vel non sit mihi propitius Deus, vel tale quippiam. Merc.

Some think, there is a kind of secret imprecation in this Speech, It will be evident to you, if I lie.: As if he had said, Let not the Lord be merciful or gracious unto me, let not the Lord pity or spare me, if I am false-hearted and lie unto you. It is frequent and familiar in the Hebrew to give such expressions of an oath; as in that oath of God, Psal. 95. 11. quoted Heb. 3. 11. Unto whom I sware in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest; which we translate by a plain negative in both places; They shall not enter into my rest. And, Psal. 89. 39. Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David; or, if I lie unto David, then let not my word be taken any more: So Job here; It will be evident to you, if I lie; and if I do, let me not have help, or strength, or support from God any more.

Mentiri est contra mentem ire.

To lie, may be taken two wayes; either strictly, as to lie, is to speak that which is false, with an intent to deceive. To speak against clear knowledge, is the proper, strict sence of a lie: or to lie, signifies to fail, or to come short in that which is expected from us by others: to frustrate any of their hopes, is to lie to them; and so it is applied oftentimes to the fruits of the earth (Hab. 3. 17.) Though the labour of the Olive shall fail; the word is, though the labour of the Olive should lie, that is, though you coming to find fruit of the Olive, should find none there. The Olive whose fair leaves promise and speak you fair, as if you should have fruit, if when you come, it yields none, this Olive lies to you. So (Hos. 9. 2.) The new wine shall lie, we translate it, the new wine shall fail, that is, the Vines which speak thus much, that you shall have new wine shortly, if when you come, there is none, the Vines lie. In either of these sences we may understand it; If I lie, that is, if I speak any thing against my mind, wittingly or willingly; or if I fail in this business, if I am like the Vine, or like the Olive, when they give no fruit according to expectation, it will be evident unto you, you shall see if we discuss this controversie a little further, the truth will out, whether I shall fail or belie your expectation, or no. That place (chap. 24. 25.) will expound it so; Who will make me a liar (saith Job) and make my speech nothing worth? as if he had said, my words shall be made good, and I will not fail in that which I have undertaken, or taken upon me.

Totus hic versus eleganter insinuat remforensem, nempe judicis strictissimum examen, quo fontes & testes interrogat, non solum verbis, sed etiam nutibus oculorum & intuitu. Bol.

There is a further apprehension about these words, Look upon me, it is evident unto you, if I lie, as if they were an allusion to the carriage of Judges and Magistrates towards offenders, in publick judiciary trials: when an offender, or one accused for an offence is brought before a Judge, and stands at the Bar to be arraigned, the Judge looks upon him, eyes him, sets his eye upon him, and he bids the Offender look up in his face; look upon me, (saith the Judge) and speak up; guiltiness usually clouds the forehead, and cloaths the brow; the weight of guilt holds down the head; The evil doer hath an ill look, or dares not look up; how glad is he, if the Judge look off him. We have such an expression, Psal. 11. 4. speaking of the Lord, the great Judge of Heaven and Earth, His eye-lids try the children of men, as the Judge tries a guilty person with his eye, and reads the characters of his wickedness printed in his face: hence we have a common speech in our language, such an one looks suspitiously, or, he hath a guilty look. At that great Goal-delivery described (Rev. 6. 16.) all the prisoners cry out to be hid from the face of him that sate upon the throne. They could not look upon Christ, and they could not endure Christ should look on them; the eye-lids of Christ try the children of men. That of Solomon may help this sence, Prov. 20. 8. A King that sitteth in the Throne of Judgment, scattereth away all evil with his eyes. Wickedness cannot endure to be under the observation of any eye, much less of the eye of Justice. Hence the Actors of it say, Who seeth us? It is very hard not to shew the guilt of the heart in the face, and it is as hard to have it seen there. Job seems to offer himself to the view of the severest Judge, Be content, look upon me, if I am guilty it will quickly appear unto you; my hypocrisie will break out in my face, and you may read my conscience in my countenance. It is noted of Paul, Acts 13. 59. That when he had to deal with Elymas the Sorcerer, he seth his eyes upon him, and said, O full of all subtilty! The Apostle beat him down, as it were, with a cast of his eye; Job bids his friends look upon him as long and as critically as they pleased, he was not afraid of their looks.

Heu quam difficile est crimen non prodere vultu. Ovid. Secund. Met.

Lastly, thus, look to me, that is, attend well what I say, for I will explain my mind so fully and clearly to you, that it will quickly be evident to you whether I am right or wrong.

We may observe from this passage, First, That, Uprightness hath much boldness.

He that hath a good cause and a good conscience, is not afraid to be searched to the bottom; he cares not who looks upon him, or who looks into him. David in regard of the uprightness of his heart, calls unto God himself, Search me and try me, if there be any way of wickedness in me, Psal. 139. 23. David was so assured of his own integrity, than he was not afraid to put himself upon the highest trial in that point. A holy heart is willing that God and men should search it, even search it with candles, as God threatens he would the corrupt and false-hearted Jews.

Secondly, note this from it, Where a lie is, it will not long be hid.

A lie will break forth one time or other; ye may cover and hide a lie, you may keep it close, and sit upon it, as Rachel upon her fathers Images, but at last it will be evident, a lie will out. We say, Truth is the Daughter of Time, and so is a Lie too; a little time will bring that work of darkness to light.

Take the word in the other sence, for failing, and it yields us this instruction,

That, He who hath uprightness of heart, is stedfast for ever.

Truth is uniform; which way soever the wind and the world turn, his posture is the same; Christ will not fail him, and therefore he cannot. Such a man is as Mount Zion, that never shall be removed; where the heart is sound, the actions are steady, and he that moves upon a right principle, moves regularly, and in all changes of events, changes not his way; try him, and try him again, it will be evident unto you he will not lie. Grace is ever the same, and renders them who have it like him (in their degree) from whom they have it, without variableness or shadow of turning. He that is not (for the substance) what he was, was never what he ought to be, sincere. He that is upon a good ground, and knows his ground, will stand to it; trust him (as a creature may be trusted) and he will not fail.

Verse 29. Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity, yea return again; my righteousness is in it.

He goes on to bespeak his friends to hear him better.

Return.] The word signifies,

First, A local return, or returning from a place.

Redire significat, sed sæpe transfertur ad animum; estque à proposito abstinere, institutum vitæ mutare, & pœnitentiam agere.

Secondly, It is used Metaphorically, to return from anger, or to turn anger away, Isa. 5. 25. His anger is not turned away, the Lord did not turn from his fierce wrath. Some understand it so here, Return I pray you, that is, I beseech you be not so angry, be not so hasty and cholerick with me.

Thirdly, To turn or return, notes desisting from our purpose, or the change of our resolutions. And thus it is the same with repentance; the Scripture abounds with the word in this sence, I shall not need to quote Texts. Thus most understand derstand it here, return, that is, Reform, repent of your former hard dealing with me, perſist not in it, perſevere not in your uncharitableneſs.

Vbi redieritis, & rursũ redieritis, id est, ubi iterum atque iterũ omnia diligenter discusseritis, eodem subinde redeuntes, & eadem accuratius reputãtes, meam cognoscetis justitiam.

Or lastly, Return, that is, weigh the matter better, return, look it over again, let it have your second and more setled thoughts; consider whether I speak not as one constrained to this seeming impatience, from real sorrow, rather then from a professed hypocrisie. So he bespeaks his friends again, chap. 17. 10. But as for you all, do you return and come now (that is, be better advised, as the next words expound his meaning) for I cannot find one wise man among you. As if he had said, you have not shewed any great treasures of wisdom in all your disputations against me hitherto; and therefore he tells them (chap. 19. 28.) what counsels became them to take. Ye should say, why persecute we him? let us give over such hard censures and wounding language. Say to your selves, Let us return, as here he saith to them, return, I pray you.

Let it not be iniquity.] Some understand it thus, let not the thing which is objected against me, be iniquity, object not unrighteously against me. Or thus,

Secondly, in this disputation, as it shall be carried on again, deal not so unequally, so unjustly and hardly with me as before, deal fairly, uprightly, candidly and friendly with me; Return I pray thee, let it not be iniquity; let there not be such wrangling and hard speeches between us as hitherto there have been. Mr. Broughton agrees to either sence, Change your mind now; let not unrighteousnesse be objected.

Particula ℞ non semper prohibet, sed aliquando simpliciter negat. Non erat iniquitas in verbis meis scilicet. Merc.

Yet the Hebrew particle (Al) doth not alwayes forbid, but often notes simply to deny; and some translate it here, for a plain denial, rather then a forbidding. Not as we, Let it not be iniquity; but, there shall not be iniquity, that is, in my words, or in that which I shall speak: and we may connect it with the latter part of the verse, my righteousnesse is in it.

Yea, return again.] He advised them to return before, now he doubles his advice, yea, return again. Such repeated doubled speeches in Scripture, note,

First, A vehemency of spirit in the speaker.

Secondly, A necessity of obedience to the thing which is spoken, by the hearer. It is surely a weighty and necessary point, which is spoken and spoken again. That's a double duty, and calls for double diligence, which we are doubly called unto. Return, I pray you, do not think that this is a small matter, a matter of indifferency, return again. (As Cant. 6. 13.) Return, return, O Shulamite, return, return. There was great necessity for the Shulamite to return, when he was so often cried after to return. So, Rejoyce, and again I say, rejoyce, saith the Apostle, to note the vehemency of his spirit, and the necessity of the Gospel-duty, or how exceeding becoming it is for Christians to walk chearfully and rejoyce: Here then, Return, yea, return again, is, as if he had said, there is great cause you should return, and be better advised, that you should consider otherwise of my case, then hitherto you have done.

My righteousnesse is in it.] That is, I am righteous in this matter, in this business; or upon such a further consideration and returning to the question, My righteousnesse (by a true stating of these differences) will appear unto you. Job was no Justiciary, no boaster in, or of his own righteousnesse; but he speaks of the righteousnesse of his cause, and of the uprightnesse of his Conscience; according to that of (Psal. 73. 6.) Thy righteousnesse shall appear as the light, that is, the righteousnesse of thy cause: so saith Job, My righteousnesse is in it; when you return, and return again, to consider diligently and seriously of this business you will find the result of all will be, that my righteousnesse is in it, that is, that I am in the right, or free from blame in this business, that I have not broken the rules of iustice, or departed from a good conscience.

Forte indignabundi discessum parabant, aut jam surrexerant discessuri, quare illos invitat ad promovendã disputationem. Pined.

Further, Others conceive Job bespeaks his friends in this quick language, Return, yea, return again, to recal his friends, who were ready to go away in a pet, or in a fume, as we use to say; they were rising to be gone, and Job hastily calls them back, Return, I pray return; as a man in discourse growing so hot, that the house cannot hold him, but he will break away, is usually re-invited, Pray stay, Sir, return again; so Job, return again, my righteousnesse is in it, you shall see I will make the matter good.

Hence observe (taking the return in a Metaphorical sence)

First, That, A passionate or inconsiderate man goes from himself, and from the matter.

Passion carries as from the business before us. An angry mans discourse runs wild, he had need to be reduced. Consideration is the returning of a man unto himself, or his coming home. As the passions of the concupiscible appetite, and intemperancies of youth, carry a man beyond his bounds (and therefore the prodigal repenting, is said to come to himself (Luk. 15. 17.) so likewise do the passions of the irascible appetite. Anger disorders and discomposes the spirit, as much as Luxury.

Secondly observe, To persist in evil, is worse then the committing of evil.

The one is common to man, the other peculiar to the Devil and his peculiars, who know no repentance. It is bad enough to do ill, but not to return from evil, is inexcusable; therefore the Lord often by his Prophets layes this as the heavieſt charge of all, upon his people. He taxes them with their departures from him: but especially with their refusals to return unto him; yet have ye not returned unto me: this is more sinful then all the sins you have committed, you have not returned, you go on and persevere in evil. The sword of God proclaims a like voice in our ears at this day, Return, return again. We have departed and gone away from God, let us not draw that ancient charge upon our selves, I have smitten you, yet have ye not returned unto me. It is not sinning, but not returning, which brings final condemnation. Impenitency seals the stone of destruction upon persons and nations.

Thirdly, Whereas these words, Return, let it not be iniquity, are referred to Job's friends, as if he had said, Let not this your passion make your sin fouler and greater: you have sinned already, but if you return not, your sin will be iniquity shortly.

Note, He stops his sin from being an iniquity, who hastens his returning from sin.

Every sin, the least sin is sin, as the least drop of water is water; but every sin in a (strict sence) is not iniquity. The nature is the same, but the degree varies. As many a child never comes to be a man, so many a sin comes not to be an iniquity. Happy is he that taketh those little ones, and dasheth them against the stones, That returns before their sin be an iniquity.

Fourthly observe further, how Job calls upon his friends, when he sees them transported (as he thought) with passion; he leaves complaining of his own sorrows, and gives them good counsel; he, for that present forgets his own ruines, that he might amend them.

It is our duty to reclaim and to appease those by gentle entreaties, who we suppose have wronged us, or gone astray from the truth.

Job doth not rail upon or revile his friends, but beseeches them to be better advised, and consider what they did.

Fifthly, In that he saith, Return, yea, return again, taking this for a call to a more serious consideration of the business, we may note,

That, A mans cause and condition must be considered, and considered again, twice, that is, fully considered, before he be condemned.

We must give account of every idle word, much more then of every unjust sentence or censure: It is but wisdom to consider that strictly, about which we must give so strict an account.

Sixthly, In that he saith, My righteousnesse is in it, observe,

That, A good cause, the more it is searched into, the better it will appear.

The deeper you dig into it, the more truth and holiness you will find in it. Search a godly man, and the lower you go, the better he proves, the nearer you come to his heart, the richer treasures of grace and uprightnesse will be discovered. Whereas take an hypocrite, and you may have a little good metal at his tongue, or his lips may be gilded over with good words, but search him to the bottom, and there is all rottenness, even seven abominations in his heart.

A godly man is not gilded, but gold. Search a Job quite thorow, try him to the center, righteousnes is in all his wayes, the further you search, the better he is, and he will be best of all at last.

Verse 30. Is there iniquity in my tongue? Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

Formula est seipsum compellantis, & animum suum scrutantis, facta examinantis. Coc.

Thus he concludes his directory to his friends, and his preparatory for what himself intended to pursue in the next Chapter; Is there iniquity in my tongue? Doth my tongue speak unequal or evil things? Hath any thing been spoken by me against common right, or against the divine rule? Hath my tongue uttered any iniquity from my heart? Hath the sinfulnes of my heart broken forth at my lips? or hath it appeared that I have done wickedly by what I have said? When my words are duly weighed, I shall not appear the man you make me.

Verba per stultitiam & temeritatem prolata latentis pravitatis indices.

The word signifies calamity or misery, as well as iniquity, and so we may take it here, Is there calamity in my tongue? that is, do my words bespeak or invite my afflictions? We find the word used in that sense, Psal. 52. 2. Thy tongue deviseth mischief, or calamity; Iniquity devised or framed by the tongue is often a scourge upon the back, Micah 7.3. The great man uttereth his mischievous desire; the mischievous evil words of his soul. Is there (saith Job) any such mischievous device in my tongue? Have I spoken poyson to infect you, or blasphemy to dishonour God?

Dober Havoth Nappshi.

Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

חך Palatum, eleganti Metaphora, à sensibus externis, ad interiores translata, appellat illam animæ facultatem, qua justa ab injustis, vera à falsis, & æqua ac recta ab iniquis & perversis dignoscuntur, non secus ac palato cibi dulces ab amaris, &c. Merc. Habet & anima unum palatum

Palatum; Cannot my taste? The Hebrew is, Cannot my palat? And because the palat is exquisite in tasting, therefore by a trope the organ is expressed for the act? Cannot my taste discern? cannot my palat? Or as others, Cannot my mouth discern perverse things? That faculty of the soul, whereby we discern or distinguish just from unjust, truth from falsehood, as sweet is distinguished from bitter by the palat, is elegantly called the palat of the soul.

Cannot my taste [discern?] The Hebrew is, Cannot my taste understand perverse things? It is usual in Scripture to ascribe understanding, not only to the senses, but also to the tongue, and sometimes to the hand. Understanding is ascribed to the tongue in the place before named, Psal. 52. Where the tongue is said to devise mischief: The tongue pro perly cannot devise, the tongue doth but utter mischief, it is the mind or heart that deviseth. The shop is within, where mischief is forged and framed; yet the contrivance of it, is in that text, given to the tongue. There is a twofold reason of it, why the holy Ghost attributes the work of the understanding to the tongue, hand or senses.

Magna est rationis & orationis cognatio.

First, There is a great affinity between reason and speech, and therefore the tongue, which is the instrument of speech is honoured with the work of the understanding: And so great is the affinity between reason and speech, that no creature void of reason can speak. Speech is a peculiar property of the rational creature. Speech is or ought to be the immediate issue or birth of Reason. Words are conceived in the mind, and born at the tongue. And words are the image of the mind. We may see what work is wrought in the mind, by that which is spoken by the tongue. The shape of mans heart (when he speaks himself) comes out at his mouth. And therefore before he speaks, he meditates. Meditation is the conception of words, as speaking is the production of them. Thus the Lord charges Joshua (chap. 1. 8.) The Book of the Law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night. One would think it should rather have been said, The Book of the Law shall not depart out of thine heart, but thou shalt meditate therein, or if, not out of thy mouth, then thou shalt speak of it. Meditation is too high a work for the mouth; yet, because there ought to be much meditation about the Law of God, before a word of it comes out of the mouth, therefore the Lord saith, The Book of the Law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night; that is, as oft as thou shalt speak, thou shalt meditate, thou shalt not speak rashly, it shall not be the work of thy tongue alone, but of thy mind and tongue together.

Ita meditaberis ut ex ipsa cogitatione mentis effervescente redundent, & ebulliat, in ore verba.

There is a second reason why acts of the understanding are ascribed to the tongue, or to the senses; because when a thing is well spoken or duly acted by any sense, Reason is the guide, and the bodily Organ is under the dictates of the mind or understanding. So, Gen. 48. 14. When old Jacob in giving the blessing unto Joseph's children, Manasseh and Ephraim, laid his right hand upon the younger, and his left upon the elder, the text saith, he made his hands to understand; we translate, He guided his hands wittingly; there was so much reason, such divine reason in that act of Jacob's hands, in laying his right hand upon the younger, that the Hebrew gives it with this elegancie, he made his hands to understand; which one of the Jewish Writers learnedly expounds thus, He ordered his hands wisely, as if they had been made acquainted with that great mystery of Gods counsels, that the greater blessing was the portion of the younger son. And so the Psalmist (Psal. 78. 72.) speaking of David's reign and government, saith, He governed them by the skilfulnes of his hands. The Hebrew is, by the understanding of his hands; and more, the understandings of his hands: Or, as one renders it, The discretions of his hands, or the prudency of his palms, ascribing all kind of political knowledge and understanding unto David. David, in the outward administrations of the Kingdom, acted with so much reason and justice, that his very hands are said to understand. His hands understood more then the heads of other Princes. As David's hands, so Job's palat or tast, had an understanding; Cannot my palat understand

Prudenter egit manibus suis, acsi ipsæ manus mysteriorum conscia erāt Onkel.

Yet further, it is frequent in Scripture, Metaphorically to translate things which are only acted or apprehended by the inward senses, to the outward. Taste, properly is of meat or drink; the humour or moisture, which is in meats, suitable to the salival humour in the mouth, causeth pleasantnes of taste. Here Job speaks of doctrines or of actions; Cannot my taste discern perverse things? If a thing be perversly or properly, truly or falsly spoken, cannot I taste it quickly? And hence the Word of God is compared to those things which are the object of taste, as to milk and to strong meat, 1 Cor. 3. 2. I (saith the Apostle) have fed you with milk and not with meat, that is, with easie and common truths, not with the more mysterious parts of Gospel-knowledge, because ye were not able to bear it. The taste of such mysteries was too strong for your palats. The same Metaphor is enlarged by the Apostle, Heb. 5. 12, 13, 14. And in this Book we find it more then once, Doth not the ear try words, and the mouth taste his meat (Job 12. 11, & 34. 3.) That is, doth not the ear try words, as the mouth tastes meat? Cannot my taste discern?

Perverse things. [That is, words ill spoken, or wrong placed. The word signifies also any calamity or sad accident. And so Mr. Broughton renders it. Cannot my palat declare any kind of heavy sorrow? Do ye think I have lost my judgment of things, and that I cannut tell when I am pincht or pain'd?

First, In that he saith here Is there iniquity in my tongue? observe,

The tongue oftentimes discovers the iniquity of the heart.

If there be iniquity in the heart, it will one time or other break forth at, and blister upon the tongue. He that is rotten at his heart, is commonly rotten in his talk, Mat. 12. 34. Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaks. And when there is abundance of iniquity in the heart, there is seldom a dearth or scarcity of it in the mouth; especially in times of trouble, that iniquity and corruption, that disease and plague of the heart, will break forth at the lips. As evil words corrupt good manners, so evil words discover, that our manners are corrupt. There are few men, but, as the Damosel spake to Peter, Their speech bewrayeth them, and you may smell the filth of their hearts by their breath.

Secondly, Observe from these words, Is there iniquity in my tongue?

He whose heart is upright, may know that he is upright.

When Job questions, Is there iniquity in my tongue? He resolves There is no iniquity in my tongue; none of that iniquity that you charge me with. I grant a believer hath not always a sight of his own integrity and uprightnes; many a soul bears false witnes against himself, and oppresses his own innocency; yet for the most part, sincerity hath a witnes in it self, and holines carries a light, by which it is seen to him that hath it. An upright heart may know his own uprightnes.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, In that Job is thus stiff in maintaining his own uprightness, and in denying any iniquity to be in his tongue, Observe,

It is a duty to maintain our own integrity and uprightness.

Job was upon it before, and is now upon it again, and he will be upon it afterward; he never gives over justifying of himself against man, though he had not a word to plead for himself against God.

Fourthly, From the latter clause, Cannot my taste discern perverse things? Observe, Reason distinguishes truth from falshood, as the pallate distinguishes bitter from sweet.

Reason it is the souls-taster. Princes have their tasters before they eat, least there should be poison in the dish. God hath given unto man a taster for his spiritual meat. The Pope will not suffer the meat he provides and cooks to be tasted, but will have it swallowed whole, or else he will thrust it whole down their throats. It is a like spiritual tyranny, to starve souls, and to cram them. It is our duty, when meat is set before us, and we are at a full table of Knowledge, where variety of Doctrines and Opinions are served in, then to call for our taster; We may be surfetted else, if not poyson'd. There may be a wild gourd among good herbs in the pot, and so death in the pot too; therefore first taste, then eat, and digest. A Christian hath a taste to discern error from truth, why then should he be denied the use of it? A wo is pronounced against those who offer unwholsom Doctrine, Isa. 5. 20. Wo to those that call evil good, and good evil; that put light for darkness, and darkness for light; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter. A like wo is due to them, who will not give others leave to discern for themselves, what is good or evil, light or darkness, bitter or sweet; as good let another live for us, as another taste for us. And their misery will be little less, then the woes of these men, who cannot, or will not take pains to distinguish; when evil is called good, and good evil; when light is put for darkness, and darkness for light; when bitter is put for sweet, and sweet for bitter; or (as Job speaks here) whose taste cannot discern perverse things. There are some whose taste is so far from discerning perverse things, that it is easie to discern their taste is perverse; for bring them wholsom, true and savoury doctrine, they say it is bitter, or false doctrine; bring them false doctrine, a lie, a dream, a fancy, a meer humane invention, dish out such provision before them, that's excellent chear. This was the heaviest curse which God sent upon the Gentiles. Rom. 1.28. God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient: That is, to a mind void of judgment, a mind that could not taste or distinguish things; therefore the issue or effect was, They did things which were not convenient; as if a man not being able to judge of meats, eats poison, or meats most contrary to his health and constitution. It is a fearful judgment to be given up to an unapproving mind, to a mind that cannot discern truth from false-hood, the Oracles of God, from the forgeries of men, superstition, from holy worship. It is a sad thing to loose our spiritual senses. Such as play the wantons with the Word of God, and walk below the truths they know, are at last given up to a reprobate mind, to a mind not able to know the Word of Truth; and then they swallow down error for Truth, and suck in deadly poyson, like sweet pleasant wine. The Apostle speaking of the difference of doctrines, under the metaphor of meats, saith, Milk is for babes, but strong meat is for them of full age, even for those that by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern good and evil: That is, their spiritual senses exercised to taste this from that doctrine, and not to swallow every doctrine alike. It is a great blessing, when a people have senses exercised; and it is a blessing we have much cause to pray for in these times. That many pallats are out of taste is too apparent by the multitude of heterodox opinions, which go down without distelish. Some which would even make a man tremble to name them, are entertained with delight. Some which dissolve our comforts, and break us off from comfortable communion with Christ: Some which shake, if not overthrow the very foundations of faith, are swallowed as pleasant morsels. Doth not this convince, that there's a want of Job's taste among us to discern perverse things. Therefore get your senses exercised, be established in the present truth, that, ye, as this holy man in the midst of all bodily distempers, and outward troubles) which usually put the natural pallate out of taste) may yet even then, as he, have your inward senses exquisite, and your spiritual pallate exact to discern right from perverse things. Note,

Lastly, False doctrine, or true doctrine falsly applied, is a perverse thing.

False doctrine perverts, First, Reason; Secondly, Scripture; Thirdly, The Souls of men. The Apostle (Act. 20. vers. 30.) prophecies to the Church of Ephesus, and with them to all Churches; That out of themselves men should arise, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them. Holy doctrine draws men to God, and false doctrine draws men to man. As itching ears heap teachers to themselves (2 Tim. 4. 3.) So false tongues heap disciples to themselves. That which is perverse in it's nature, is perverting in it's effect.

CHAP. VII. Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? are not his dayes also like the dayes of an hireling?
As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as an hireling looketh for the reward of his work:
So am I made to possess months of vanity; and wearisom nights are appointed to me.
When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? I am full of tossings too and fro, unto the dawning of the day.

WHere the knot of connection, between this and the former Chapter lieth, is not so discernable; which hath given occasion for much diversity of conjecture about it.

First, It may be conceived, that Job in this discourse, refutes that tenet of Eliphaz, that he was punished and scourged for his wickedness: by shewing that to be afflicted is the common condition of man, and therefore no such judgment of any mans wickedness or sinfulness could be made from his afflictions. Or,

Secondly, That Job here confutes that promise, which Eliphaz made about Chap. 6. 20. concerning outward prosperity, He shall know that his tabernacle shall be in peace, and he shall be delivered, &c. by proving it inconsistent with the present estate of mortals to look for such uninterrupted happiness, or fair dayes without any clouds and storms, as Eliphaz seemed to undertake he should, Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? are not his dayes also like the dayes of an hireling, &c.

Or thirdly, the connection may be made with those words, which himself had spoken at vers. 24. of the former Chapter, Teach me (saith Job) and I will hold my tongue, and cause me to understand wherein I have erred. In which words we shewed, Job makes an humble submission of himself: and in case his friends could instruct him better, he was willing to learn, he was not wedded to his own opinion, or resolved never to be removed from it.

In pursuance of which promised teachableness, he in this Chapter grants what was grantable in the former discourse of Eliphaz. Eliphaz had said, Chap. 5. vers. 7, 8. That man was born to labour as the sparks fly upward, and thereupon presently infers, I would seek unto God, &c. both these, the Doctrine and the Use, Job seems to prosecute in this seventh Chapter; as if he should say, what thou hast rightly spoken, I will grant thee; thou hast said, Man is born to trouble, I say so too, Is there not an appointed time unto man (of trouble?) and are not his dayes as the dayes of an hireling? And thou adviseſt me to seek unto God, and apply my self to him; it is good counsel, and therefore I will follow it: As we read he doth, at vers. 17, & 20. of this Chapter, O remember that my life is wind, what is man that thou shouldst magnifie him; I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Why doest thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? Language full of humility, and sounding out the brokenness of his heart.

But lastly, rather thus, Job having in the former Chapter refuted those arguments by which Eliphaz would convince him, and having renewed his request to die, expostulated with his friends about their unkindness toward him, and admonished them to a more equal dealing with, and hearing of him: he now proceeds to the confirmation of his first request to die, which he doth from divers grounds.

First, From the general condition of mans life, vers. 1. Is there not an appointed time to man, &c.

Secondly, From the condition of some particular men, A servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and a hireling looketh for the reward of his work; may not I therefore desire death, which only will be a shadow to me, till when I shall not have my reward? And

Thirdly, From his own special condition at the third verse, and so forward to the seventh, therein expressing how sad, how restless, how troublesom his life was to him, which (as he apprehended) nothing could give remedy to but only death: My disease appears curably only by a grave, and my only medicine, is a mouth full of earth: Therefore the matter standing so with me, have I not rightly and reasonably desired, either that I had not lived at all, or that I may quickly die, and that God would cut off my life.

Having by these arguments confirmed that former desire, in the next place, he again renews his former complaints from vers. 11. of this Chapter, unto v. 17. Thirdly, he abases himself before God, as unworthy that God should take any notice of him, or bestow a thought, a visit, a smile or a chastisement upon him. What is man, that thou doest magnifie him? that thou doest visit him, &c. Lastly, he concludes with confession of his sin, and earnest desire of pardon, at vers. 20, 21.

Thus in general, both for the dependance of the latter part of his speech upon the former, and the principal parts contained in this.

Vers. 1. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? And are not his dayes also like the dayes of an hireling.

The question affirms, there is an appointed time to man upon earth, and his dayes are like the dayes of an hireling. From whence, we may from his argument thus infer: He that hath a certain term of life appointed him to serve in, doth not sin in desiring an end of his service: But there is an appointed time, &c. Therefore it is not sinful to desire it.

Is there not an appointed time?] The Hebrew thus; Is there not a warfare to man upon earth? So you find it in the margine of your Bibles: Our Translators put warfare there, and appointed time in the Text. The word signifies both, because wars of all other actions have their seasons, and their appointed times; and the life of man is well described under both, or either of those notions.

Consider it first under the most proper signification, and so many read it, Is there not a warfare to man upon the earth? Isa. 40. 1, 2. Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith the Lord, speak comfortably to Jerusalem; Why? Tell her, her warfare is ended. In that place our Translators put appointed time in the margine, and warfare in the Text; as here they put appointed time in the Text, and warfare in the margine: The sence in both is the same. Tell her that her warfare is ended, that is, the time appointed or constituted for her trouble is ended: So here, Is there not an appointed time? That is, is there not a set, determined time of the troubles, or troublesom warfaring life of man?

Græci μετάνοιον, quasi tentationis officinam, ubi homo varia experiatur, variisq; eventis & periculis sit expositus, ut miles in bello.

The Greek Translators interpret it, Temptation, Is there not an appointed temptation to man upon the earth? And that gives us the same meaning; for temptation is a warfare; temptation is our spiritual war, the exercise and probation of a Christian. There are three things in which the greatest exercise of a Christian life consist, Prayer, Meditation and Temptation. First, Prayer, wherein man is seeking unto, and working his heart towards God: Secondly, Meditation, wherein he is preparing himself, by holy thoughts and divine considerations, for his nearer addresses unto God in prayer, and how to walk in every duty towards man: Thirdly, Temptation, wherein he wrastles and strives with those enemies opposing prayer, meditation and the whole course of holy obedience. The life of man is a continued temptation, and that's a spiritual warfare, a continual bickering with a world of enemies; and though they without stand still, yet a soul can scarce pass one hour, but he shall have many fights and bouts with his own heart. In this sence, Is there not an appointed time of warfare, or temptation to man upon earth?

Our life is a warfare in divers respects.

First, It is a warfare, because Christians do or ought, to live under the greatest command of any in the world; they ought to stand armed at a call. A Souldier is under absolute command, he must not dispute the Orders of his General, but obey them; the Centurion in the Gospel saith, I have Souldiers under me, and I say to one go and he goeth, to another come and he cometh, and to a third do this and he doth it: which he speaks not as commending the special vertue and good disposition of his own Souldiers, but as describing the duty of all Souldiers: therefore souldiary is well defined, To be the obedience of a stout and valiant mind, out of his own disposal. A Souldier moves upon direction, so must a Christian: he is in a warfaring condition, he must have a charge or a word from his Commander for every step he treads, or action he undertakes.

Militia est obedientia quædam fortis & invicti animi, arbitrio carentis sui.

Secondly, It is a warfare, in regard of perpetual motions and travels: A Souldiers life is an unsetled life; while he is in actual service, he hath no rest, he is either marching, or changing; and when he comes to his Quarters, his stay is but little, he cannot build him a house, he can but pitch him down a Tent for a night or two, he must away again. Mans life hath no stop, we have here no abiding City, we dwell in Tents and Tabernacles, waifaring and warfaring out our dayes.

Thirdly, A warfare, because of continual watching. It is the watch-word which Christ gave his followers, I say unto you, watch; that's the Souldiers word and work too; warring and watching go together: The Souldier stands Centinel, fearing the enemies surprise: A Christian should stand upon his guard and his watch at all hours, is not that a warfare?

Fourthly, A warfare, because Christians ought to keep their rank and file, that is, the places and relations wherein God hath set them. A Souldier commanded to stand such a ground, must not stir though he die for it, and if he stirs (by Martial Law) he shall die. There is so much keeping of order in War and Battels, that whatsoever keeps order, is said to fight or war. The Stars are said to have fought against Sisera in their courses, Judg. 5. 20. The Stars are embattailed or encampt in their spheares, out of which they move not, and are therefore often called the Militia, or host of Heaven.

Fifthly, A warfare, because so full of hazzards, troubles and and labours, or because so much hardship is to be endured. A Souldier converses with dangers, and dwels in the territories of death continually: This caused Deborah to begin her Triumphant Song, with praise to the Lord, because the people offered themselves willingly. Many are forc'd and pres'd to the wars; and most who are not pres'd by the Authority of others, are pres'd by their own hopes of gain, or desire of vain glory and renown. A true Voluntier in war, is a rare man: There is so much danger in it, that there is seldom much of the will in it.

The whole life of man, is full either of visible or invisible dangers; he passes the pikes every day. The Apostle reckons eight distinct perils in one verse, which met him which way soever he turned, 2 Cor. 11. 26. He was in deaths often. And though there are but few such Heroes as he, yet 'tis seldom but any of us are in deaths: Especially while we remember the mighty spiritual enemies and oppositions which encompass and beset us every day. We wrestle not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers, &c. And are therefore advised to take to us the whole armor of God; never to stir without our Sword.

Sixthly, A warfare, in regard of the issue; victory and triumph, or slavery and death, is the issue of our lives. Either we overcome, and are more then conquerors (that's the Apostles language, Rom. 8.) or else we are conquered, and more then captives; that's the Apostles sence too, (both in allusion) They are taken captive by the Devil at his will: To be led captive by the Devil, is the lowest captivity: lower then any captivity unto men. In reference to the spiritual part of our warfare, there's no coming off upon equal terms: we must be victors or slaves, conquer or die. Only this is the Saints assurance, that as the Captain of their salvation was made perfect by sufferings, and conquer'd by dying, so (at the worst) shall they; spiritual death (as sinners) hath no power over them at all; and when they die (as men) naturally, or by men violently, they shall receive fuller power: Thus our life is a warfare upon earth.

But take the word as we translate, for an appointed time; Is there not an appointed time to man upon the earth? And the reason why it bears that sence, is grounded upon these two things:

Non significat tempus simpliciter; sed tempus certum ac constitutum, eâ analogiâ, quod determinato anni tempore exerceri solet militia. Militia ideo tempus determinatum dicitur, quia non quævis ætas bello apta est, sed determinata & certa.

First, Because there is a special season of the year, most fit and suitable for war, 2 Sam. 11. 1. And it came to pass at the return of the year, when Kings go forth to battel. The time for war, is such a known appointed season, that the same word signifies warfare, and any appointed season.

Secondly, Because men go out to war, at a special time of their age: There is an appointed setled time of mans life, wherein he is fit to bear arms. Every age is not fit for arms: Old men and children are not fit for the field: Hence we find, Numbers the first throughout, that the muster of the children of Israel is thus made, vers. 3, 20, 22, &c. From twenty years old and upward; all that are able to go forth to war. The Roman and Greek Histories are distinct in this; in some Common-wealths, from Fifteen to Fifty; in others from Twenty to Sixty; and in ours the appointed time is, between Sixteen and Sixty, so men are pres'd and listed for war: And because there is such an appointed, or a set time of life in all States to go out to war, therefore that word is elegantly applied, to signifie a set or an appointed time for any business. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth?

Upon earth.] In Heaven our time knows no bounds, there are no terms or distinctions in eternity; seasons and variety of of times vanish and shall not be heard of in Heaven. Eternity is time fixt. But there is an appointed time.

Singulis diebus sua certamina præsto sunt, adeo non nisi cum ipsa vita terminantur labores vitæ, ac proinde secundũ naturam finem vitæ expete. Jun.

To man upon earth.] The word is Enosh, miserable, weak, frail man; is there not an appointed time to this man upon earth? That is, while he walks in this lower region of the world, and lives on mould. The sum of all may be thus conceived, as if Job had said, Every day hath evil annexed, some affliction or other waits upon every hour, so that there is no period of mans sorrow, but the period of his life; and therefore I walk by the rule of sound reason, when that I might see an end of my trouble, I call for the end of my dayes. Observe hence,

First, The life of man, is limited out by the will of God.

Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? There is, As God hath set out bounds and limits to the Sea (Hitherto thou shalt come and no further) by a perpetual decree, so he hath also set out bounds and limits to the life of man, his life is an appointed time: Thus far the line of thy life shall reach, and no further. We live not at adventures, neither can our care lengthen out our own dayes. As all our care cannot add one cubit to our stature, so not one minute to our glass or hour. And as we cannot lengthen, so we cannot shorten our own dayes in respect of this appointed time: They who die in a time when God forbids, yet die when God appoints: And they live out all Gods time, who wickedly shorten their own: They cut their thread of life, but they cannot cut the thread of Gods decree; we live not at our own will, but at the will of God; we are Tenants at his will, in these houses of clay. He is the maker of time, and the measurer of our dayes; he gives us the lease of our lives for what years he pleases; and it is most fit that he who created time, should dispose of time. God is the Lord of time, and farms it out, as, and to whom he thinks good. Christ might do what he pleased upon the Sabbath, for (saith he) the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath; God is the Lord of time, and therefore hath power to appoint, to one more, to another less. My times (saith David) are in thy hand, Psal. 31. v. 15. Thou mayest lengthen or shorten, continue or break them off, as thy pleasure is.

Some live as if they were masters of time, and could appoint out their own term: as if they lived at their own discretion, and could make a covenant with the grave, and agree with death, when to come for them. They article with it, for this year and the next; they say to the grave, thou shalt not take me yet, thou shalt spare me yet, I have such ends to drive, such pleasures to take before I would die. They (Isa. 56. 12.) speak, as if their tongues and their time were their own, and they knew no Lord of either; To morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant; they speak of the next day, as if they could command it, and bid it come to serve their lusts. That wretched rich man, Luke 12. could say, Soul take thine ease, thou hast goods laid up for many years; see how liberal he is to his soul, out of anothers right; and because he had got a great stock of riches, he gives himself a rich stock of time, many years. He resolved to make his life larger, as he had done his barns; and because they were full of corn, he also will be full of dayes; whereas the word came, Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be taken from thee: And he could not live till next morning, who resolved upon many years to live. Observe,

Secondly, That the decrees of God concerning our lives, must not lessen our care to preserve our lives.

Non in absurdum trahenda est hæc Jobi sententia, ut temere se quispiam periculis objiciat, quia spatiũ vitæ æquitũ est.

Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? Yes, that there is; man lives at Gods appointment: but he must not live upon that appointment; that is, withdraw himself from means of his preservation, and say, God hath appointed how long I shall live, therefore what need I take care how to live? Or what need I take care for the preserving of my life? As it is in spirituals, so also in temporals. God hath determined and appointed the portion of every man, all comes under a decree, under an everlasting and unmoveable decree; yet the decree which is past concerning us, must not take us off from our care about our selves. Though only the elect are saved, yet none are saved by their election; Infants who attain not the use of reason, much less the actings of grace, yet are not saved barely by election; what they cannot do, is done for them, they are saved as elect in Christ, not precisely as elect; how they are united to Christ, we know not, but we know they must be united, or else they could not be saved. But they who grow in years, must also grow in the graces of sanctification, otherwise they are not saved by the grace of election: The decree of God appoints us to salvation, but the decree of God doth not save us; we must run through all the second causes, and wayes which the word of God hath chalked out to eternal life and glory. Thus also our temporal life, passeth under a decree, it is by appointment: but wo unto those that shall say, God hath appointed how long I shall live, therefore what need I take care about my life? This is to walk contrary to one part of the decree, while we seem to submit unto the other, For God who appoints life, appoints all the means which concern the preservation of life. It hath no shadow of a warrant, for any man to cast himself upon needless dangers, or to forbear necessary helps for the sustaining of his life, because he hears his time is appointed, and that his dayes on earth are all reckoned and numbred to him from heaven.

Thirdly, Forasmuch as there is an appointed time, we should learn patience, and wait quietly upon God. It is not in creatures (be they never so angry) to prolong the time of our sorrows. The same word which shews us, that our life is a warfare, shews us also that it is an appointed time. Men cannot appoint you one moments trouble, or lengthen this war, when God will shorten it. Our hairs are numbred, much more our dayes. Honour God, and have good thoughts of him; for whether your times be fair or foul, calm or stormy, they are appointed times. The whole life of man on earth is ordered in heaven.

Fourthly, If our lives are for an appointed time, we should be willing to die when God calls. All the time we would live beyond that, is of our own appointment; and we should be willing to live till God calls, for all thats appointed time. As it is sinful not to be willing to do (though it be burdensom) what God appoints; so is it likewise not to be willing to live what time God appoints, though it be painful and troublesom.

And are not his dayes like the dayes of an hireling?

שכיר Marci Varius, à שכר Conduxit. Mercenarius est qui in certum tempus conducitur, & sæpe in diem, quem ideo Græci vocant ἀνθημέρευον μίσθιον. Sicut in unico die operario, quamdiu lucet Sol, non est ulla requies mercenario constituta, ita dum luce hujus vitæ fruimur, nulla nobis requies expectanda est.

An hireling is he, who works a set time, for a set reward: And so this latter clause of the verse is the same in sence with the former. Is there not an appointed time to man, and are not his dayes like the dayes of an hireling? that is, are not his dayes set as an hirelings, with whom we agree for so many dayes, or for such a day.

An hireling.] We may take him either for a hired souldier, a mercenary in war; or for an hired servant, a mercenary in work. An hireling in either notion, is called to labour, sorrow and sweat: Such is the common condition of man, His dayes are as the dayes of an hireling, God threatneth Moab by the Prophet in this language (Isa. 16. 14.) Within three years, as the years of an hireling, and the glory of Moab shall be contemned; that is, within three years, which shall be like the years of an hireling, troublesom years, laborious years, vexatious years, wearisom years, and then the glory of Moab shall be contemned, and utterly despised; as if he had said, Moab is now in great glory, but near great desolation. You shall see three years trouble will stain all the glory of Moab, and wither all her beauty: we feel this truth. England was a Nation of great glory, you see how two or three years, like the years of an hireling, troublesom years, years of affliction, years of hard labour and travel, have almost spoil'd the glory of it.

And yet here Job makes a general description of the life of man: It is not the lot only of some poor afflicted, hard-wrought servants, that their dayes are as the dayes of an hireling; he speaks of mankind, of the master as well as of the servant; His dayes are like the dayes of an hireling. We may note from it,

First, That, Except we labour, we ought not to eat.

For the dayes of man are as the dayes of an hireling; the hireling shall not have his meat except he work for it; neither ought he that hires, or sets him a work. The Master is in this sence an hireling. The Saints are (in this sence) Hirelings. The Apostle speaks to Believers, and reproves them (2 Thes. 3. 12.) There are some who walk among you inordinately, working not at all; now them that are such, we command, that they work and eat their own bread: and ver. 10. If any man work not, let him not eat; even they whom Christ hath made free, are to account themselves as hired servants, that is, they must not eat the bread of idleness; we steal all the bread, which (one way or other) we labour not for; and therefore the Apostle bids the Thessalonians work, that they might eat their own bread. It is not our own bread which we buy with our money, unless we pay (in what we can, and are called to) labour for it also. As we eat that bread pleasantly, so we come by it honestly, which is dipt in our sweat.

Secondly, We are hence taught, That, We ought to take our travels well, we must not murmur at our labours, or complain over our work, and say, what a weariness is it?

As the Lord cannot bear it, that any should murmur at spiritual work, or say with them, in the Prophet, what a weariness is it? so it is very displeasing to him, to say of our callings and the burdens of them, What a weariness are they? Why? It is the common condition of man, why then should we quarrel with that law of labour, which is become the portion of our mortality? The corruption of our Nature hath led us into this condition, and made us all as hirelings. Mans innocency had business, but sin hath brought him to sweat, and changed his labour into toil. Man was put into the garden, as Lord of it, to dress and till it; but now he is put there, as an hireling, to sweat and toil at it. There is a stamp of servility and drudgery upon all the labours which the children of men take under the Sun. That argument which the Apostle uses, to support us in the bitterness of affliction, hath a like strength in it to comfort us in the toilsomness of our labours. As there is no temptation hath taken hold of us, but that which is common to man, 1 Cor. 10. 13. So there is no labour laid upon any of us in our lawful callings, but that which is common to man. Even the Saints whom Christ hath made free, and separated from the world, are not freed from service while they are in the world. And while Christ would not have them careful in any thing, he would have them industrious in every thing. That Canon of the Apostle is clear for it (1 Cor. 7. 20.) Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called; that is, your spiritual calling doth not void your civil. When you have learned to drive a trade for heaven, you must still drive your trade on earth. While there is any thing of sin in us, there must be somewhat of the hireling in us. There is not the most ingenious, no, nor the most spiritual labour we go about, but there is somewhat of the hireling in it; in the duty of prayer, in the duty of preaching, there is somewhat of the hireling, that is, there is bodily pain and weariness, a waste upon our strength, and expence of our spirits. Though in these things the Saints work not for wages, but their very work is their wages, and their labour their reward, though there be nothing mercenary in their spirits, yet they feel the effects of a mercenary work upon their bodies, even weariness and waste of natural strength and spirits.

Thirdly, Seeing the dayes of man are as the dayes of an hireling, Observe,

There is a reward or wages, somewhat follows the labour and travel of this life.

The hireling labours all day, but at night he hath his reward, Mat. 20. Christ compares Believers, even in their spiritual capacity, unto Labourers in a Vineyard, to hirelings, who wrought for a penny a day, and at night they had every one their pay: It is so in reference to the whole course of this life, we are hirelings; in the evening we shall have our penny; verily, There is a reward for the righteous, their labour is not in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. 15. And as the righteous have a reward, so the wicked shall have wages. Satans hireling shall have full pay, though no content, for all their works: The wages of sin is death; there's pay, such as it is, woful pay, a black penny. The dayes of man are as the dayes of an hireling, there is an issue and a reward for every work.

Fourthly, Note from the Metaphor, While an hireling is doing his Masters work, he doth his own too.

That is, his own profit comes in by those acts in which he labours for another. It is thus also in the general state of man; above all, Christs servants and hirelings gain by the duties of obedience they perform to Christ, their own profit comes in with his honour. A godly man cannot do a stroke of work for God, but he works for himself too; the servants of God must not be self-seekers and self-workers, they may not make themselves their end; but as it is with an hireling, let him be never so upright-hearted toward the master he serves, let him lay self by in all he doth, yet he hath a share of profit in all his labours. God hath so espoused and married married his own glory and the good of man together, that whosoever really promotes the one, promotes both. It is so likewise with those who work the works of darkness, and do the lusts of the devil. While his slaves are doing his work, they are gaining toward destruction, and their own wages encreases daily, they are treasuring up wrath and judgment against the day of wrath. As the measure of their sin fills, so doth the measure of their punishment. Thus also the dayes of man are as the dayes of an hireling.

There are two general Observations which I shall but name, because they will occur again.

First, The life of man is short; as the dayes of an hireling.

The servant doth not abide in the house for ever, a hireling is but for a time. And it is good for a man that it is so. Some complain exceeding much, because their lives are so exceeding little. But let them weigh it well, and they shall see cause to rejoyce much, because they live so little. In some respect it is good for wicked men, that their lives are so short; if their lives were longer, they would be wickeder, and so heaping up more sin, they would heap up more wrath against themselves. And it is very well for the Saints, that their lives are so short. Their corruptions and temptations, their weaknesses and infirmities, their troubles and afflictions are so many, that it is well their dayes are so few. If they should have length of life added to heaps of sorrows, and perpetuity with outward misery, how miserable were they! Christ promises it as a point of favour to his, that the dayes of trouble should be shortned; Except those dayes should be shortned, no flesh should be saved (that is, kept or preserved alive in those tribulations) but for the Elects sake those dayes shall be shortned, Mat. 24. 22. It is a favour also to the Saints, that their particular dayes are shortned, that theirs are but as the dayes of an hireling, forasmuch as their present dayes are dayes of trouble and travel. The dayes of the best are so full of evil, that it is good they are not fuller of days.

Secondly, It is good they are so evil or full of trouble.

It is well for wicked men that their dayes are full of trouble; the sweeter their lives are to them, the sinfuller they are against God. Their outward comforts are but fewel and encouragement to their lusts; and while their lives are calm and quiet, they do but sail more quietly down into that dead Sea of everlasting misery. And the Saints have this advantage by the troublesomeness of their lives, to be kept in continual exercise, and more dependance upon God; they would love the world too well, and delight in the creature too much, if God did not put bitterness into their cup.

Job having thus shadowed the state of man, seems to make out his intendment or scope thus, There is no reason why I should be charged so deeply for desiring death; for what is the life of man? Is it not a life full of travel, and of trouble, full of dangers and temptations, is not the time of his life short and set? Is it not a speedy passing time, and yet a firmly appointed time? Why then should not I think the period of my life to be at hand? Why should not I think my appointed time is come? Forasmuch as I have so many evidences and symptomes of death before me, and have heard so many messages and summons to the grave. Death sits upon my lips, ready to come in while I am speaking. Death hath taken possession of me already, and seiz'd my ports. Death is in my face, I am the very picture of death, and images of death stand round about me. Therefore Eliphaz, why should I not call to have my dayes summed up, that I may see the end and sum of these troubles; Or, wherefore wouldst thou stay my complaint against my life, or stop my desire of death, by giving me hopes of many dayes, and of a flourishing estate in this world?

That's his first argument, from the general condition of mankind. Now he proceeds to consider somewhat more special in that condition.

Plurima mortis imago.

Verse 2. As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling loketh for the reward of his work.

Verse 3. So am I made to possess moneths of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me.

שאף Traxit aerē ad os, per Metaphorā, ishiavit, ardenter cupit, qui enim vehementer aliquid cupiunt, præ desiderii & expectationis magnitudine ad os aeren trahunt seu frequentius respirant.

As a servant earnestly desireth.] To desire earnestly, is but one word in the Original; it is so full of sence, that we cannot empty it into any one word in our language. The Letter is, As a servant breaths after the shadow: And because a man that hath an earnest longing desire for a thing, pants, breathes and gaspes after it, therefore that word, which signifies to gape and draw in the air pantingly, signifies also to desire, or to desire earnestly, As a servant earnestly desireth.

The shadow.] Some understand it of the night, when the servant comes to rest himself after his labour all the day. Night is but a great shadow.

Secondly, We may take it for the shadow of the day: A servant that is heated in labour abroad in the open field, earnestly desires a shadow, to get under a tree or a bush; a little to refresh himself. Or,

Thirdly, The shadow may be taken for the house; to come into a mans house, or under a mans roof, is called a coming under his shadow, Gen. 19. 3. Therefore are they come under my shadow, saith Lot to the men of Sodom, that is under the covert of my roof.

Umbra id significat quod protegendo & custodiendo obumbrat.

The shadow is used often in Scripture to note protection and mercy; Shadows are substantial mercies, and the promise of a shadow is a real favour, Isa. 4. 6. The Church hath a promise under this notion; There shall be a Tabernacle for a shadow in the day time from the heat. Isa. 25. 4. A refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat. And, Isa. 32. 2. The Lord promises that he will be as the shadow of a great Rock in a weary Land unto his people. And David flies to this shadow for safety. Under the shadow of thy wings shall be my refuge, till these calamities be overpast, Psal. 57. 1. So, Psal. 17. 8. Psal. 91. 1,

So that in these words, As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, Job means that which is most refreshing and desirable by a servant: And in those Eastern hot countries, shadows were very refreshing and much desired. Jacob reporting his labours in keeping Laban's sheep, saith, In the day time I was consumed with heat, or parched with heat. Therefore a servant hath reason to desire the shadow.

And as an hireling loketh for the reward of his work.

There are two things which a servant or an hireling desires much, rest and reward; shadow and pay. When he is hot, the shadow refreshes him: and when he is hungry, his pay refreshes him; while his hand is at work in the day, his heart is upon the wages he shall receive at night. Hence the Lord in compassion to servants, made a gracious provision for them by a Law, Deut. 24. 14, 15. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant, &c. at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the Sun go down upon it, for he is poor and setteth his heart upon it, lest he cry against thee to the Lord, and it be sin unto thee.

Job puts the instance in both, As the hireling looks for the reward of his work, &c.

He loketh.] The word signifieth to expect a thing with an eye toward it; what we earnestly expect, our eyes move after it. David, in his waiting upon God, saith, Mine eyes are towards thee; I lift mine eyes and my heart to God; the same word is here used, The hireling looks.

For the reward of his work.

So we translate it. The Hebrew is, He looks for his work: Why? He had work before, he had his work all day long, his Master shewed him his work, he needed not look for that; then his work is the reward of his work. In the Scripture, the word work signifies three things.

First, The very act of labour.

Secondly, The effect of labour, the thing wrought, or that which is the product of labour. When a man hath laboured, what he laboured about is visible, and that we call his work, as well as the act of his labour.

Thirdly, The reward or the wages which a man receives for his labour, Lev. 19. 13. We read a plain Text for it. The wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night, until the morning. The Hebrew is, The work of him that is hired shall not abide with thee. So, Psal. 109. 20. Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the Lord; The Hebrew is, Let this be the work of mine adversaries from the Lord. And, Jer. 22. 13. We have the word in the same sence, work for wages. As it is usual to put prayer for the thing prayed for, a petition for the thing petitioned, or for the thing obtained by petition; The Lord hath given me my petition (saith Hannah, 1 Sam. 1. 27.) That is, the child for whom I did petition. It is usual also in Scripture, to put sin for the punishment or reward of sin, Opus est fructus seu merces operis, quæ pro labore datur, per Metonymiam.

Gen.

Genes. 4. 13. My sin is greater, that is, my punishment is greater then I can bear. And the Master is forbid to detain the servants wages, least it be sin to him, Deut. 24. 15. That is, least he be punished for detaining it. Thus also it is usual to put the work for the reward of the work, The hireling expects his work, that is, he earnestly looks that he shall have wages in the evening for his work. Now (saith Job) as these wait, the servant and the hireling, for the shadow in the day, and for their wages at night; so I am made to possess months of vanity, &c.

I shall Note a point or two in passage from the words, as they contain a general truth, before I examine them in this application.

Take the words as they are a direct proposition, A servant desires the shadow, and an hireling looks for the reward of his work. Hence observe,

First, The condition of a servant is a very laborious and wearisom condition.

He longs for some rest, he earnestly desires the shadow. Observe,

Secondly, The servant must have a reward.

There's all the reason in the world he should. Observe,

Thirdly, The hireling hath earnest thoughts upon his reward.

His reward is in his eye. It is the reason given, why the wages of the hired servant should not be with-held, Deut. 24. 15. The Lord the righteous judge between Masters and Servants, gives this account or ground of his Law, Thou shalt not detain his wages, for he setteth his heart upon it; Poor man he hath been working all day, and he hath had his heart upon his wages; the hopes of that gave him some relief and ease in going through his hard task and service, therefore thou shalt not keep it from him, his heart is set upon it.

But it may be questioned: is not this a sin in the servant, to set his heart upon his wages? A charge is given, Psal. 62. v. 10. If riches increase, set not your hearts upon them; and is it approveable in a servant, to set his heart upon his wages or encrease?

There is a great difference (and it is worthy our notice) between those two Scriptures. The word in Deutronomy, (speaking of the poor servant) notes the lifting up of the Soul: He hath lifted up his soul unto it, so we read in the margin of our Bibles; But in the Psalm (where he speaks of the covetous rich man) the word imports, the letting down or setling of his heart upon it. A poor man hath but a little, and his wages (it may be) is above him, his wages (possibly) is more then he is worth, therefore he lifteth up his mind to it, as a mercy and a blessing from God, for the relief of himself and family; take heed (saith the Lord) that thou detain not his wages; for the poor man lifteth up his soul to it, as a thing he reacheth upward for; It is very dangerous to take that out of the hands of a man, which he is taking (as it were) out of the hand of God. But a rich man, who hath aboundance, lets his heart down, he croucheth and broodeth upon the creature. A godly poor man, looks up to his reward, and fetches his bread from Heaven; a covetous rich man looks down to his reward, and takes his bread from the Earth; a godly man is above all earthly things, and yet he lifts up his mind to receive them. A meer natural man is below earthly things, and yet he descends that he may receive them: The things which both receive, are the same, but the conveiance and derivation differ alwayes, as much as Heaven and Earth, sometimes as much as Heaven and Hell. But to the Text. Observe,

Lastly, That, it is the property of an hireling (take it strictly) to eye his reward.

This is the description of an hireling, he is one who looks to his reward, whatsoever he doth to his work. Christ, Joh. 10. 13. confirms this character, The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep; he cares much for the fleece, and for the flesh, but he cares little, if at all for the sheep; that is, how or whether the sheep be fed and prosper. He that works for Christ, finds his reward in his work, and his eye is upon his work, as a reward, as well as upon the reward of his work; he is pleased as much, yea far more with his business, then he is with his wages: Did he not take content, and pay himself in this, that he is in a work acceptable to Christ; he could take no content, he could not be pleased at all, that he is in a work profitable to himself.

Now Job applies this general, about the nature of a servant and an hireling, to his own condition.

So I am made to possess months of vanity, and wearisom nights are appointed to me.

So am I made.] It looks like a strange, and a very unlikely similitude; As a servant desireth the shadow, so am I made to possess months of vanity: Therefore to clear it, we must remember, that this is a similitude with a dissimilitude: The similitude is conceal'd, the dissimilitude is exprest; we may make it out thus, As a servant desireth the shadow, and an hireling looketh for the reward of his work; so I, who am labouring in the heat of these afflictions, do earnestly desire a shadow; and I who am at work as an hireling, would have a reward; that is, I would see the end and issue of these troubles; But (here's the dissimilitude) I am made to possess months of vanity, and wearisom nights are appointed to me; as if Job had said, When the servant hath wrought all day, and is weary, he can lie down at night quietly and rest himself; but alas! the night is as troublesom, and as laborious to me as the day; When the hireling hath laboured and taken pains, he receives his reward at evening; but my wages are months of vanity, and my rewards are nights of trouble; I am paid in ill coyn, months of vanity, wearysom nights are appointed for the reward of weary dayes. Thus the sence is plain. Similitudo dissimilis.

I am made [to possess.] The word signifies possessing by inheritance and descent. Two things are implied in that phrase: יחל Et jure hæreditario aliquid acquirere & possidere.

First, That troubles and afflictions belong to us by right, they are possest as an inheritance, which we receive from our Parents and Progenitors. I am made to possess. And

Secondly, It notes the continuance of troubles upon us: We have not only an ill lodging for a while, or we stay not with trouble, as travellers for a night, but we possess and inherit them as our own. Job's troubles, were not to him as an hired house, or a lodging, but as an inheritance wherein he was setled and estated: I am made to possess months of vanity; as if he had said, you see what the patrimony and inheritance is which descends to me: I have waited for comfort, and have been in expectation of good dayes, but I possess months of vanity, that's all I have found and felt, as the issue of my labours.

Months of vanity,] Some read, Empty Moons, (the word bears that sence) as if Job's Moon were alwayes in the wane, or ever in the Eclipse. The word signifies any kind of vanity, whether in word or in deed, personal vanity, or real vanity, falshood or deceit, any thing that is trivial or light. Such months have I appointed to me. ירחי־שוא

But some may say, Months of vanity? Why doth Job complain of this? Hath any man in the world any other then months of vanity? Why then doth Job take it so ill, that he possesseth months of vanity, when no other fall to the lot or possession of any man? David, Psalm 39. 5. affirms, that man at his best estate is altogether vanity; what reason then hath Job to complain of months of vanity in his worst estate? It was with him as well as with any of his neighbours, we know not who hath any other then months of vanity. The Preacher makes this the preface of his Sermon, Eccles. 1. 2. Vanity of vanities (saith the Preacher) vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

I answer, It is true, our whole life is a life of vanity; but yet there is more vanity in some mans life, or in some part of the same mans life then in another. Vanity is gradual. There is a vain, and a vainer vanity, and there is the vainest vanity. Months of vanity may be understood two wayes.

First, Months of vanity, that is, months empty of comfort, fruitless months, months bringing me no refreshing or content. As Gen. 1. 2. it is said, The earth was without form and void: void, that is, it had neither man, nor beast, nor plant upon it; there was nothing but emptiness upon the face of the earth, as it lay in that rude mass; so Job saith here, mine are months of vanity, void months, that is, Inanis & vacua, quia erat vacua hominibus, jumentis & plantis.

is, months not filled up with any comfort, with any refreſhing, with any joy, with any light or content; all theſe which are as the filling up of our months, and the beauty of time, are taken away from me; mine are empty months, my dayes are all Dog-dayes, or at beſt, the dayes in the Kalendar of my life are blanks.

Vacuum tempus eſt, quod nullam nobis affert utilitatem.

Secondly, Months of vanity, becauſe he had not what he expected, or the iſſue which he waited for: Job expreſſes himſelf in a poſture of waiting, by the former ſimilitudes: The hireling looks for his wages, and I look for ſomewhat, but it is in vain I cannot enjoy it. So the word is uſed, Pſal. 78. 33. where the Pſalmiſt deſcribes the ſinful diſtempers of the people of Iſrael, and Gods anger towards them; They believed not his word, &c. What then? Therefore their dayes did he conſume in vanity, and their years in trouble. The dayes of all men are conſumed in vanity, as we ſaid before; but here was ſomewhat more judicial and penal; it is a ſore judgment to conſume our dayes in vanity, as that people did: As ſoon as they came out of Egypt, they were in a fair way to Canaan; but God leads them about by the wilderneſs, and there lets them wander out forty years, expecting and waiting for Canaan, but no Canaan came, or they came not to Canaan; this was the ſpending of their years in vanity, becauſe they were travelling to their deſired reſt, but enjoyed it not; they went toyling up and down the wilderneſs, as in a maze, finding no way out, but at the door of the grave; their carkaſſes fell in the wilderneſs; thus their dayes were conſumed in vanity. So ſaith Job, I poſſeſs months of vanity, that is, months wherein I am tyred out in continual troubles, and they are fruitleſs, iſſuleſs troubles; I have no ſenſible benefit by them, I ſee no end of them, my hopes are fruſtrate, and put far off from me. And are not theſe months of vanity? Obſerve hence, Firſt, Troubles will prevail upon us, whether we will or no.

I am made to poſſeſs, &c. As if Job had ſaid, I would fain have got over theſe months of vanity, or worn them out, but whether I will or no, I am made to poſſeſs them. The bands of affliction are too ſtrong for the creature to break: when the Lord ſends trouble, he will make a man poſſeſs it, how diſpleaſing ſoever it is; It is beſt for us to ſubmit, where we cannot remedy, and to yield quietly to that which we cannot avoid. Obſerve, Secondly, Troubles come to us, as our natural inheritance.

I am made to poſſeſs months of vanity, they are as mine inheritance, and I would wave my right but I cannot. There are two parts of our natural patrimony, ſin and ſorrow; both theſe deſcend to us, and we are made to poſſeſs them, till we come to our purchaſed inheritance, reſerved in Heaven for us. Obſerve, Thirdly, That, though every mans life have vanity in it, yet ſome men have more.

That is, more troubles and trials, more diſquietments and diſappointments. The common condition of all men, in their beſt eſtate is, that they are altogether vanity; but the vanity of ſome men is more vain, their afflictions more afflicting, their troubles more troubleſom, and their ſickneſs more ſick then their brethren. Job ſpeaks as if he had ſpoiled all the world of this inheritance, and had engroſs'd all vanity to himſelf; I am made to poſſeſs months of vanity: That vanity which is the portion of all men, ſeems ſometimes to be the portion of one man alone. I am the man that hath ſeen affliction, ſaith the Prophet Jeremiah, Lam. 3. 1. why, is that ſuch a ſtrange ſight, who hath not ſeen affliction? True, but Jeremiah had ſeen more then moſt, and therefore he ſpeaks, as if he only had ſeen affliction, I am the man.

And wearisom nights are appointed to me.

Noctes plenæ vigiliis & anxietatibus.

Wearisom nights.] Or nights of labour and wearineſs; at if Job had ſaid, though the ſervant be wearied all day, yet the night is not wearisom to him, he reſts at night, but Noctes laboris, i. e. laboriosas, Menses habeo omni solatio vacuos, ut nec in noctibus quidem liceat mihi quiescere. Adagio ad servi & mercenarii nostri non quietem. Pined.

I am wearied in the day, and wearied in the night: wearisom nights are appointed to me; the night which is given unto others for reſt, is meaſured out to me in watchings and in ſorrows. And this is a great aggravation of his ſad condition; it is ſaid before, that he had moneths of vanity, yet it might be ſuppoſed his nights were comfortable intervals of refreſhing: as a man may ſay, I have had ſeven years of hard labour, yet it is ſuppoſed he reſted all the nights of thoſe years; ſo when Job ſaith, I had months of vanity, it might be conceived, he had at leaſt ſometimes a good night; therefore he adds wearisom nights are appointed to me, I ſpeak not after the rate of ordinary men, whoſe months labor, is a month of dayes, my labouring months include the night alſo.

A ſtrong healthy man goeth forth to his labour and to his work, until the evening, Pſal. 104. 23. But a ſick, weak man, goeth forth to his labour in the evening. The night is moſt laborious to ſick men, then they revolve their troubles, and being free from viſits of friends, they viſit their own afflictions, and ſtudy their own diſtempers freely.

Nox ægris maximè infeſta eſt, toti ſunt in cogitandis malis ſuis.

Are appointed to me.] The Hebrew is, are numbred, or reckoned to me; as if he ſhould ſay, God ſets down my nights by tale, or by ſcores; It is an Arithmetical word, it notes to number by art and skill: And ſome obſerve, that it notes Arithmetick in that operation of it, which we call Subſtraction or Subduction: not that which we call Addition or Multiplication. Wearisom nights are numbred or appointed to me, in a kind of Subſtraction, that is, God takes or ſubſtracts the nights out of the months, and makes them as wearisom and as troubleſom to me, as the dayes are. And becauſe thoſe things which are thus numbred by way of ſeparation or ſubſtraction, are uſually appointed or appropriated to ſome ſpecial uſe, therefore the word is well tranſlated, to appoint or conſtitute: if you ſee a man ſeparate or ſubſtract one thing from another, it is an argument that he hath a reaſon for what he doth, and intends it to ſome extraordinary purpoſe: The word is ſo taken here, to note a ſpecial end to which theſe nights, being ſubſtracted from the reſt of his time, were appointed, namely, they were to be as Job's pay and reward; He was troubled all day, and if he looked for his reward or comfort in the evening, this was given him, A night as wearisom as his day, or he had an ill nights reſt given for his hard dayes labour. The Prophet gives us the word in ſuch a ſence, Iſa. 56. 11, 13. He tells the Jews their ſin in the former words, Ye furniſh a drink-offering to that number; Some underſtand his meaning to be a reproof of that wicked and ſuperſtitious cuſtom, wherein the Jews (it ſeems) did ſymbolize with the Heathens, who were wont to drink to their Idols by number, to ſuch an Idol they would drink ſo many cups, and that was called a drink-offering to that number; Now ſaith God, becauſe you have done thus, namely, furniſhed a drink-offering to that number, therefore I will number you to the ſword, or therefore I will appoint you to the ſword; I will ſubſtract and take you out, and you ſhall be the men ſeparated for the ſword to deal with and deſtroy; I will number you to the ſword, that ſhall drink your blood, becauſe you have been ſo accurate in wickedneſs, to drink by number. The word is applied to Chriſt (Iſa. 53. 12.) He was numbred amongſt the tranſgreſſors; that is, he was taken aſide, and ſeparated from the innocent, and ranked amongſt tranſgreſſors; which notes him appointed, or ſet apart to that end, that ſo he might be the Saviour of tranſgreſſors, and a deliverer of the wicked from their ſins. In Daniel 1. v. 10. when thoſe children of the Hebrews, deſired to be ſpared from eating the Kings diet, I dare not do it, ſaith the Steward, for I fear my Lord the King, who hath appointed your meat and your drink; as if it ſhould be ſaid, he hath numbred out to you ſo many diſhes of meat, he hath numbred out to you ſo many flagons of wine; he hath ſubſtracted ſuch a proportion, and appointed it to you, and I dare not alter it. And in the Propheſie of Jonah, chap. 1. verſ. 17. it is ſaid, God prepared a great fiſh to ſwallow up Jonah, ſo we tranſlate: the Hebrew is, God numbered a great fiſh to ſwallow up Jonah; That is, God did ſeparate or ſubſtract a fiſh from all the reſt of the fiſhes of the Sea, for that end and purpoſe to ſwallow up Jonah. From all which inſtances it is clear, that the word notes an appointment, by way of deſign, or the draw-drawing of a thing to some special use and service. When a Party is drawn out of the body of an Army, they are numbred or appointed to some design; such a meaning is in Job's words, these nights are subtracted or drawn out, and then appointed to be my reward and wages. The sum of all is, Job comparing his estate with that of hirelings, servants and souldiers, finds his far worse then theirs, they have rest in the night, at least some nights they rest, but he had none. Observe here the law of nature,

Night is the time of rest.

Sleep is the parenthesis of our troubles: it puts a stop to our sorrows, and gives intermission to our labours. Observe,

Secondly, That the troubles of every night, and how many troublesom nights any one shall have, are determined by God himself.

I have wearisom nights (saith Job) but they come not by accident, they are appointed and exactly numbred to me. It is matter of great comfort, to remember that God is thus accurate about our sorrows: He gives his people a cup of sorrow, and he appointeth how many drops shall be in their cup, all the world cannot put in one drop beyond his measure: He appointeth out our trouble for the kind, and for the degree, and for the time and continuance of it; how many wearisom nights, how long every night shall be, are all calculated and set down in the Kalender of his heavenly counsels.

I shall add but a word of the next verse, which is only the description of a wearisom night: Job having said, that wearisom nights were appointed or numbred out to him: now resolves us what he means by a wearisom night, or when he accounts a night wearisom.

Vers. 4. When I lie down, I say when shall I arise, and the night be gone? And I am full of tossings to and fro, unto the dawning of the day.

This is a wearisom night, and it is a most exact description of a wearisom night; when a man as soon as he goes to bed, desires to rise; as soon as it is night enquires for day; this man hath a weary time of it.

When shall I arise, and the night be gone?] Master Broughton translates, the duskie time be gone? The word signifies evening, and the verb, to mingle or mix; because the evening is a time wherein there is a mixture (as it were) of light and darkness. Evening, is light and darkness mingled, hence we call it twilight; And though all the night be (in this sence) mixed, because in nature there is no pure darkness, yet in the evening this mixture is more discernable; therefore it is rather appliable to the former part of the night, because afterward the light is more fully overcome and conquered.

When shall the night be gone?] The Hebrew is, When shall the night be measured out? There is an elegancy in that; it signifies to measure a thing, as we measure cloth by a yard, or as ground is measured by a rod or pole; it signifies likewise to measure time, to tell, count and observe the hours: As if Job had said of himself (as many times sick men do) I lie a bed all the night and tell the clock. The clock is the measure of the night: now, saith he, when shall the night be measured out? As if he had (with sorrow) counted the tedious hours, oh when will this time be measured out! What a long night is this! As come to a sick man in a morning, and you shall have him say, What a long tedious night was this? As long as two or three nights.

He adds yet another part of the description, I am full of tossings too and fro unto the dawning of the day. He lay measuring the night, and was unquiet all the while, full of tossings too and fro. The word signifies to be filled with meat and drink; I have my fill of troubles, my fill of torture, I have unquietness enough, as much as I can hold of sorrow.

Tossings to and fro.] The word is understood by some of inward tossings. I am full of tossings too and fro, that is, I have great agitations in my heart, my thoughts are very unsetled. One of the Rabins to that sence, I am full of wandring thoughts; thoughts will tos up and down, forward and backward; a mans thoughts will tos him from one end of the world unto the other, while he is a prisoner in his bed: They tos him from business to business, while he is unfit for any business. A sick man is full of inward tossings, of wandring thoughts, his thoughts run fastest, when himself is bed-rid, or confin'd to his bed; all the night is spent in the travel of his mind, while his body cannot stir a foot.

tat. Saturatus sum vagis cogitationibus. Rab. Let.

But rather understand it of corporal tossings. A sick man full of pain removes from one side of his bed to another, from one corner to another, sometimes from the head of the bed to the foot. The Morallst expresses it excellently, Sick men use changes as if they were medicines, they hope by changing their place to loose their pain by the way, I am full of tossings too and fro.

Ægrotantes mutationibus ut remediis utuntur. Sen.

Till the dawning of the day.] Till the day break, that is, the whole night through. Some understand this for the evening, the word signifies both the evening and the morning. And these interpret this latter part of the verse for his troubles in the day, having complained before that wearisom nights were appointed to him, When I lie down, I say, when will the night be gone? There is an end of the night; but when the night is gone, have I any ease in the day? No, I am full of tossings too and fro until the evening; and so it is an amplification of his troubles in regard of both parts of the natural day, light and darkness. But we may more properly keep it to the description of a wearisom night, and that word which may note the evening is here to be appropriated to the dawning of the day, when darkness begins to depart, and give way to the prevailing light.

This was a great aggravation of the afflictions of this holy man, he had no rest, no ease, in any part of the night, he could not so much as get a nap towards morning.

The night is the time of our truce with troubles, though a man be in conflicts with business all day long, yet there is a cessation at night, all is laid by till morning. Hence the night and sleep are well called The Conquerors of evil, and Victors over sorrow; because in the night a man gets rid of them. Christ saith, Matth. 6. ult. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof: if there be evil enough in the day, who is able to stand before the evils of day and night too? When our very sleep becomes our fight, what can flesh and blood do any more? Sleep is a medicine for all diseases, and Physitians often give a sleepy potion for a medicine, that the body may have a little refreshing, after it hath been worn and tired out with a wakeful sickness.

Malorum Domitrices.

Observe from the Text, as it is the description of a sick man.

That a man in pain looks upon every time as better to him then the present time.

When I lie down, I say, when shall I arise? I hope it will be better with me anon, I hope the day will be better to me then the night: and when the day comes, then he wisheth for night, hoping the night will be better then the day. An afflicted troublesom time is so described, Deut. 28. 67. In the morning thou shalt say, would God it were even; and at even thou shalt say, would God it were Morning: They shall think any thing, or time to come better to them then the present; therefore when they had night, they call'd for day; and when they had day, they sent a messenger for the night; ever thinking the next change of time would be-friend them with a change in their condition. Observe,

Secondly, Change of place giveth no ease of pain.

I am full of tossings too and fro to the dawning of the day; he had changed, and changed, and changed, but could not change his pain for ease, that continued still. Some travel to other Countries to mend their estates. Some go from Kingdom to Kingdom to ease their minds, and some to better their manners; but as he that runs to another country changes his air, but not his heart, alters place, but not his manners, the same is the same still: So it brings no health to the sick, no ease to the pained to change place.

Cœlum non animam mutat, qui trans mare currit.

As a man sin-sick, before he comes to rest and healing in Christ, tosses from place to place, from this duty to that duty, from this means to that means, to get a little ease for his wounded spirit and aking conscience; he hopeth this will do him good, and that will do him good, but all in vain. And as worldly men hope their pleasures and their riches riches will do them good, and so they toss from one pleasure to another, from creature to creature; but all failes, there is no settlement, no composednes, no peace, no redress till the soul fixes upon Christ. So in bodily pains, there is no ease, no refreshing but in God: it is not this or that place of the bed, it is not the bed or the couch, it is not the Countrey or the City, a sharp or a temperate air can do it, God can alone, and he can command any creature to do it.

You that have moneths of comfort, and to whom refreshing nights are appointed, bless God; it is not your bed that gives you rest, but his blessing.

Remember this description of a sick man; present the conditions of a sick man to your thoughts, think what a wearisome thing it is to lie all night telling the clock, calling for the day, and tossing to and fro, praise God for quiet nights, and pity those to whom wearisome nights are appointed.

VERS. 5,6,7,8.

My flesh is cloathed with worms and clods of dust, my skin is broken, and become loathsome.
My dayes are swifter than a weavers shuttle, and are spent without hope.
O remember that my life is wind, mine eye shall no more see good.
The eye of him that hath seen me, shall see me no more; thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.

WE have seen Job in this Chapter confirming his former desires of death.

First, From the general condition of mankind, v. 1.

Secondly, From the condition of some particular men, v. 2.

And Thirdly, From his own present condition, which he draws forth in vers. 3, 4, 5, 6.

The third and fourth verses have been already opened.

In this fifth, he gives us a farther description of himself, and such a one, as might well assure us, that his restless nights were not without reason; My flesh is cloathed, &c. As if he had said, if you think I am thus unquiet without cause, then behold my body, look upon me, and see what a pitiful spectacle I am, My flesh is cloathed with worms, my skin is broken and become loathsome.

These words give us Job's picture; here is his delineation and pourtraicture as he was under the hand of God. They who would take Job's picture, as in the day of his afflictions, must draw him thus, A man cloathed with worms and clods of dust; there's his garment; his skin scabby and discoloured, full of chaps and running sores, angry biles and enflamed ulcers, his posture, lying on the ground, scraping himself with a potsherd.

My flesh is cloathed with worms.

My flesh.] That is, my Body, by a Synechdoche; and the word which we translate flesh, springs from a root, or hath near relation to it, which signifies to bring and publish good tidings or welcome news; and therefore the Gospel is expresst by it (Evangelium) is the same in Latin, or, (εὐαγγέλιον) in Greek with this in the Hebrew; and some Criticks give the reason why flesh is expresst by this word, which signifies to publish or bring good tidings, because there should be a taking of flesh, or making of flesh, namely the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, which should be the best tidings, and the most joyful news that ever the world heard of.

Is cloathed with worms.] In the first Chapter of this Book, at ver. 21. Job describes himself thus, Naked came I out of my mothers womb, and naked shall I return; but now it seems Job had got cloathing, and being ready to lie down in the grave, he had a vesture put upon him; now (it seems) Job should not go naked out of the world. for he saith, My flesh is cloathed; but what is this cloathing? My flesh is cloathed with worms and clods of dust, that is a suit of cloaths very fit and suitable for the grave, but it is usually put on in the grave. Job is in his grave-cloaths before he dies; or he speaks this to shew that he accounted himself dead while he lived, or as Heman mourns (Psal. 88.) Free among the dead; a member of that Corporation, a brother of that Society already. For he was now in that Habit or Livery; A Gown of worms, set or embroidered with clods of dust.

Quavis re vestiri dicimur, cujus accessione vel dedecoramur, vel ornamur.

My flesh is cloathed with worms.] It is frequent in Scripture, when the holy Ghost would heighten the sence of what we are and enjoy, or would note the abundance of a thing, or how man is adorned, or defiled with it all over, then to expres it under the notion of cloathing; God himself is expresst cloathed with Majesty, because he is Majesty all over, and there is nothing but glory upon him: God is also described cloathed with judgment and with justice; why? Because these are his honour and his ornament, he is justice and judgment all over; we find Job in the twenty ninth of this Book, at verse 14. speaking thus of himself in his state of Magistracy. I put on righteousnes, and it cloathed me, my judgment was as a Robe and a Diadem; that is, I was full of righteousnes, I was altogether righteous in dispensing rewards and punishments, in exercising my power among the people. To be cloathed with humility, to be cloathed with the Spirit, to be cloathed with Christ, are phrases of the same importance. So on the other hand, to be cloathed with pride, with shame, with dishonour; Let mine enemies (saith David) be cloathed with shame, Psal. 109. 29. Let them be cloathed with dishonour, Psal. 35. 26. that is, let them be ashamed and dishonoured all over, or, exceedingly ashamed or dishonoured. And so a great desolation is called a cloathing with desolation, Ezech. 7. 27. That which strips a man naked is in this sence called his cloathing, cloathed with desolation.

Thus we are to understand Job, when he saith, That his flesh was cloathed with worms; his meaning is, he had many worms crawling upon his flesh; or lying within his flesh, and so were as a lining to his upper garment of nature: These worms spread themselves all over him, as a filthy and loathsome garment covering his whole body.

And besides this figure, Job spake properly, while he was thus full of sores and botches and biles, to say, he was cloathed with worms; worms are proper to sores; many sores breed worms, and worms are a disease in the flesh, as well as within the bowels, and such diseases are accounted the foulest and filthiest diseases of all other: Such was Job's, his sores and biles corrupted and bred worms, which made him an abhorring to himself. Putrefaction is the soil out of which worms grow. Rotten flesh breeds worms, and a rotten Conscience breeds a worm, Isa. 66. 24. Their worm shall not die. Why doth the holy Ghost say of those men who were never washed, nor healed of their sin-sores, of their soul-sicknesses and pollutions, that when they die, they have a worm that dieth not? It is in allusion to this, because as a corrupt body, or corrupt putrid flesh, breeds noisome worms, so a corrupt Conscience, a soul full of filthines and uncleanness, which was never washed or healed in the fountain of the blood of Christ, this Soul, this Conscience breeds worms, even that gnawing worm which shall live with it, feed upon it, and cloath it for ever. Both the natural and the spirituall worm arise from rottenness, and derive their pedigree from sores, sicknesses and putrefaction.

And clods of dust.] Worms and clods of dust. Here are strange materials, course stuff for Job's cloathing, clods of dust. Some conceive that Job sate in the dust, and so the dust gathered about him as a garment. Others, that these clods of dust were the scrapings of his sores; for the word signifies the filings of any metal, or the scrapings of an unclean thing. It is said expresly in the second Chapter, that he took a potsherd to scrape himself; those clods of filthy dust, or scales scaped from his putrifying sores, these with the crawling worms bred in them, covered his whole body like a garment. and therefore he complains, I am cloathed with worms and clods of dust. גוש

You see what his garment was (to carry on the allusion) his skin, upon which this garment was put: My skin (saith he) is broken, and become loathsome. The skin is the immediate garment of the flesh, his sickness had worn out his skin, he had many holes and rents in that garment, which needed mending, and it was all over so filthy, that it needed washing: My flesh is broken and become loathsome. Sores break the skin, and defile the skin; Job's skin was so broken and chapt, so defiled and filthy, that he was loathsom to all beholders, and to himself.

This is the picture of Job; a few dayes before, you might have have pictured or drawn him thus, Job cloathed with silk and scarlet, his garments set with precious oriental stones, his skin smooth and beautiful, his face chearful and manly, his eye quick and piercing; but now Job is cloathed with clods of dust, his skin is broken and become loathsom.

We may hence learn what our own bodies are. The Apostle (Phil. 3.21.) calls the body a vile body; not that the work of God was vile: The work of God was noble and honourable in all he wrought, especially in that Master-piece of it, the fabrick of mans body; but as the body is come out of the hands of sin, so it is a vile body, that is, it is a body subject to corruption, and will quickly corrupt, be vile and loathsome, 1 Cor. 15. 53. This corruptible must put on incorruption. The body of man is but one remove from worms and corruption, chap. 17. 4. I have said to corruption, thou art my Father, and to the worm, thou art my Mother. We shall quickly bear the image of our parents, worms and corruption.

Then be not proud of your bodies, nor of your beauties; they who are now the fairest and goodliest to look upon, may quickly have a broken and a loathsome skin; a disease, one fit of sickness will spoil all thy beauty, deface and blemish thy excellent feature; and if a disease doth not, old age will: time will draw furrows in thy face, and make wrinkles in thy brow. Strength and beauty of body are no matches for time. All things were made in time, and time will mar all things, So long as generation continues, corruption must.

Again, Take heed of pride in cloathing. The two externals, of which man is most subject to be proud, are beauty and apparel. Cloaths are a flag of vanity, and pride sits upon the skirts. But remember how fine soever your cloathing is this day and hour, God can put you on another suit before to-morrow. We see what change of apparel Job had, a godly man, an humble man. That which God did to try the grace of one, he can quickly do to punish and chastise the sin of another; he can quickly put you on such cloathing, as you shall have little cause to be proud of. He can make you wear cloaths of worms and clods of dust.

And if we consider it, we have little reason to be proud of our cloaths; for if we follow the best of them to their original, they will be found to be but a cloathing of worms, and clods of dust: what are silks, sattins and velvets, but the issue of worms? And what is your gold and silver, what your pearls and precious stones? are they any thing (if you will resolve them into their principles) but clods of dust? They are indeed better concocted by the heat of the Sun, refined and polished by the art of man, but if you search their pedigree, they also are but clods of dust. In your most glorious array, you are but cloathed with dust and worms, and if you be proud of such cloathing, God can cloath you with worms and clods, not only of unrefined and unpolished, but of putrified and filthy dust.

Thus we see the first thing, the picture or description of Job's body; his friends at first sight, might be convinced, that a body in such a case, could take little rest day or night. He carries on his complaint a degree further at the sixth verse.

Verse 6. My dayes are swifter then a weavers shuttle, and are spent without hope.

ὁ δὲ βίος μου ἐγένετο λαφροτέρας λαλιᾶς.

My dayes are swifter.] She Seventy render it thus, My dayes are swifter or nimbler then a word or speech. Nothing moves faster, or passeth away more lightly then a word; a word is gone, and it is gone suddenly: Hence the similitude is used proverbially, Psal. 90. 9. We spend our dayes as a tale that is told, or, as a meditation (so some translate) suddenly or swiftly; a discourse is quickly over, whether it be a discourse from the mouth, or in the mind; and of the two, the latter is far the more swift and nimble of foot, a discourse in our thoughts outruns the Sun, as much as the Sun out-runs a snail; the thoughts of a man will travel the world over in a moment; he that now sits in this place, may be at the worlds end in his thoughts, before I can speak another word. So that the translation or gloss, by speech or meditation, aggravates the sence, and extends it to the highest.

אֹרֶג But the word properly signifies (as we translate) a weavers shuttle, which is an instrument of a very swift and sudden motion. And the word which we render [swifter] signifies that which is fitted for the swiftest motion, any light thing, because those things which are light, move swiftest; and we call a good runner a man light of foot, Hab. 1. 8. The horses of the Chaldeans are thus described, Their horses are swifter (or lighter of foot) then the Leopards; so, swifter or lighter then the weavers shuttle, which passeth the loom or web with such speed, that it is grown to a proverb, for all things which are quick and transient. The Latines express it by that word which signifies a ray of the Sun, which is darted in a moment from one end of the heavens to another. Radius textoris, dictum proverbiale, radio velocius.

But a question rises; Job in the third Chapter, and so in the fifth, complains that his life was so prolonged, and slow-paced, that it was very tedious to him; and in this verse, by a repeated request, he spurs and hastens his life to his journeys end; he thought (it seems) his time not winged, but slow-footed; how is it then that in this place he complaineth of the swiftness of his dayes? My dayes are swifter then a weavers shuttle.

I answer in a word; By his dayes here, we are to understand his good dayes, his dayes of comfort and prosperity; the dayes of my peace and plenty are slipped away and gone, even as a weavers shuttle. But when he complains that his life is slow-footed, and requests that his dayes might move faster, he means the dayes of sorrow and trouble which had overtaken him in his journey; the former were too swift, and the latter too slow: It is as if he had said, Alas, all my fair dayes of prosperity are gone, they are slipt away as a weavers shuttle, they are as a tale that is told, nothing remains of them but the remembrance, which is an addition to my sorrow; but now I have dayes that seem long, very long, they hang upon my hands, I cannot get them off, my sorrows clog my time, and make every hour seem a year. Hezekiah in his complaint upon his sick bed, useth this allusion, Mine age is departed and removed from me as a shepherds tent, I have cut off like a weaver my life, Isa. 38.12. As the weaver cuts of the thred when the web is finished, so it is with me; I have cut off as a weaver, my life; not that Hezekiah was active in his own death, we are not to understand it so, for he prayed that God would spare him, and he spake this upon the promise of God to lengthen out his life, and to tie the thred of his dayes again, according to which the web was woven on for fifteen years more: but this speech of Hezekiah, As a weaver I have cut off my life, is like that of the Apostle, I have finished my course. He compares the passing of his life to a shuttle, and the conclusion of it to the cutting off of the thred; nights and dayes pass this shuttle forward and backward, too and again; the night casts it to the day, and the day to the night; between these two time quickly wears off the thred of life. The Heathen Poets had a fiction answering this allusion of the Holy Ghost; they tell us a story or a fiction rather, of three Sisters, whereof, the one held the wheel or the distaffe, the second drew out the thred, and a third cut it off: In this they shadow the state of mans life; our ordinary phrase for living long, is spinning a long thred; and for dying, the cutting off the thred of life. Tres Parcæ Clotho, Lachesis, Atropos.

And they are spent without hope.] Some translate, They are spent so, as that there is no hope left. The word which here we english spent, signifies both consumption and consummation; or sometimes in a good sence, the end or perfecting of a thing; and sometime in an ill sence, the end or consuming of a thing, Gen. 2. 1. So the heavens and the earth were finished; it is this word, they were ended; God ended his work by way of perfection and consummation, he made his work compleat. But here, and often in Scripture, it notes ending by way of consumption, or as we translate the spending of a thing, Jer. 14. 12. I will consume (or, make an end of) them by the sword: And, Exod. 33. 3. God commands Moses, to go with the people into the wilderness, for (saith he) I will not go up in the midst of them, lest I consume them in the way. ἀπώλοντο ἢ ἐν χερσὶν ἐλπίδι. כלה

And to shew how deep an expence and consumption of time was upon him, Job tells us, it had devoured and eaten up all his hope. It is worse to have our hope spent, then to have our dayes spent; now (saith he) my dayes are spent; and that is not all, my hope is spent. Some translate so, My dayes are spent, and I have want and penury of hope; as I have spent my dayes, so I have spent my hope. And his hopelessness may refer two wayes; I have no hope, or, Cum inopia spei, vel defectu spei, sc. longioris vitæ.

my hope is spent; first, in regard of long life; I see I am so afflicted with this disease, that there is no hope I should hold out under it. Secondly, without hope, that is, without hope of being in a better condition, that is, of having my estate restored unto me again, if I should have health restored, and a longer life continued. In both these sences, as he saw the thred of his dayes cut off, so he saw the thred of his hope cut off; he was near death, and his hope was dead. My dayes are spent without hope, or, there is no hope remaining. This also is a negative to both parts of Eliphaz his promise, either of longer life, or of a better.

We may observe hence, first, a common truth (which I shall not insist upon) about that precious commodity, a commodity more precious then the gold of Ophir, Time.

All time is short, and we have a very short estate in time. Man is not master of one day, and a servant but of few dayes.

The holy Ghost gives us very many remembrances of this, which is an argument that we are very apt to forget it. Man is slow to take notice of the swiftness of time, and very dull in apprehending the speed of his dayes. It is a wonder that such a plain common doctrine should be handled so often, and that the holy Ghost should, as it were, labour for similitudes, and fetch in all things that are more then ordinarily transitory in nature, to teach us the transitorines of our condition: We meet with many in this book, all hinting at the sudden invisible motion of time: This is a point easie to be known, but very hard to be believed; every man assents to it, but few believe it. And surely the holy Ghost would not spend so many words about it, nor gather up so many illustrations of it from sence, if it were not of much importance to our faith. We usually slight the hearing of common principles, and a Sermon preacht upon this subject, the shortness of our lives, and the speed of time, is judged a needless shortning of time; and the hour seems very long which runs out upon the speed of time: we think it an easie doctrine, and a theme for Boyes: But the truth is, if the heart did well digest how few our dayes are, we should have better dayes; and men would live holier, if they knew indeed their lives were no longer. Therefore though I only touch this subject, yet do ye dwell upon it, and stay long in your thoughts upon the shortness of your lives. Common truth neglected, cause a neglect of every truth. Had we more serious thoughts of heaven and hell, that these are, and what these are; that there is a God, and who he is; that there will be a judgment, and what it will be, we should more profitably improve and trade our time and talents.

Secondly note, Time passeth irrecoverably.

When the weavers shuttle is once out of his hand, 'tis gone presently; there is no hope time past should be recalled, or time in motion stopt: To consider time under that notion, should make us very good husbands of our time; or (as the Apostle advises) to redeem the time. Redemptions are made by purchase; to redeem a thing, is to buy it with a price; the price we redeem time with, is our labour and faithful travel. It is matter of mourning to consider that so little care is taken in spending that, which when it is gone, we have no hope it can be restored to us again.

Thirdly, In that Job complained before that his life was so long, and now complaineth of the shortness or swiftness of his life, we may note,

That, Man thinks good dayes end too soon, and that evil dayes stay too long, and will never have an end.

We love the company of good dayes, and are therefore sorry when they depart. When the Disciples were upon the Mount, and had such a good day of it, how desirous were they to have continued there, and sorry they were the day was at an end? Master (saith Peter) it is good for us to be here. The sudden passing of our comforts is our trouble. Time is alwayes of the same pace; no creature keeps his pace more evenly then time doth, it alwayes moves at the same rate, neither faster nor slower; but man thinks this time short, and that time long; this time speedy, and that time slow, according to the several objects he meets with, and to the conditions wherein he is.

Fourthly observe, That, Hope is the last refuge of the soul.

My dayes are spent without hope, my hope is spent too; if I had hope left, I had somewhat left, but my hope is gone. It is so in natural things, it is so in spiritual things. The Apostle, Heb. 6. tells us, that hope is the anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast; while hope holds, comfort holds; and when hope is gone, all is gone.

Lastly observe, That, Sometime a godly mans hope may lie prostrate.

My dayes (saith he) are cut off without hope: Job thought (as I have noted from some passages before) that his case was desperate, his hope lay in the dust, as well as his body or his honour. Every godly man is not an Abraham, of whom it is said, Rom. 4. 18. That against hope he believed in hope: Nay Abraham is not alwayes Abraham; he that hath such a strong hope, hath it not alwayes, even his hope may sometimes possibly be hopeless. There are weaknesses in the strongest, and imperfections may come upon those who are most perfect, ebbings after the greatest flowings, and declinings after the greatest heights of graces and gracious actings. My dayes are spent without hope.

Job having thus complained of his condition, and asserted his own desires of death, now turns from his friends, with whom he had discourst all this while, and betakes himself to God, to speak a while with him: The next words are generally understood, as an Apostrophe to God.

Verse 7. O remember that my life is wind, mine eye shall no more see good.

O remember that my life is wind.] To remember, is not here taken strictly, for to God all things are present: Remembrance is the calling of that to mind which is past; when the act of remembrance is applied to God in Scripture, it hath one of these three sences.

First, It notes a resolution or setled purpose in God, to act his justice, or inflict punishment upon his enemies, Psal. 137. 7. Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom: that is, Lord, bring forth that decree of thine, for the ruine and destruction of these bloody Edomites, who have been cruel against thy people.

Secondly, It signifies an affection in God, ready to help and relieve his own people, Psal. 74. 2. Remember thy Congregation which thou didst purchase of old, that is, do good to thy Congregation, bless thy Congregation.

Thirdly, To remember, imports an act of present consideration; to remember, is fully to weigh, observe and take notice of the estate of things or persons, Psal. 78. 39. He remembred that they were but flesh, a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again; that is, he considered and weighed the estate of man: So in that place, O remember that my life is wind, that is, consider and weigh it well; Lord, put my condition into the ballance, observe what a weak creature I am, how short my life is; therefore deal with me as with a weak short-liv'd creature: thou needest not lay any great stress upon me, thou needest not trouble thy self much to make an end of me, my life is but wind, it is but a puff, which quickly passes away.

O remember that my life is wind. This is a proverbial speech like that before of a weavers shuttle. The word translated wind, signifies the Holy Ghost, the third person in the blessed Trinity; as also a Spirit in general. And because the wind is of a spiritual nature, invisible, swift, powerful, therefore it is applied to that celestial or elementary Spirit; and the operation of the holy Ghost is shadowed by wind or breath, Christ breathed upon his Disciples, saying, receive the holy Ghost, John 20. 22. And the holy Ghost came as a mighty rushing wind, Acts 2. 2.

Quasi ventus Targum.

When Job saith, remember that my life is wind, he means, my life is like the wind: It is a similitude, not an assertion The life of man is like the wind in two things. First, The wind passeth away speedily, so doth mans life. Secondly, The wind when it is past, returns no more; as you cannot stop the wind, or change its course, so all the power in the world is not powerful enough to recall or divert the wind, which way the wind goes, it will go, and when it goes, it is gone, Psal. 78. 34. He remembred that they were but flesh, wind that passeth away; in this sence Job calleth his life a wind, it paſſeth away, and ſhall not return by any law or conſtitution of nature, or by any efficacy of natural cauſes.

Yet here obſerve, Job ſaith not, his ſoul was a wind, but his life was a wind. Some have Philoſophiz'd the ſoul into a wind, a blaſt or a breath; and tell us, that it goes as the ſoul of a beaſt, that life and ſoul are but the ſame thing; when the life is gone out of the body, the ſoul is gone from its being: They acknowledge a reſtoring of it again with the body at the reſurrectiion, but deny it any exiſtence when ſeparate from the body. How diſhonourable this is to the noble conſtitution of man, and how diſſonant to Scripture, is proved in mentioning it; we acknowledge, that life which is the union of ſoul and body, is a wind, and paſſeth away. In all the learned Languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latine, the word which ſignifies ſpirit or life, hath its original from reſpiring; and when we ſay, my wind was gone, or my wind was almoſt beaten out of my body, our meaning is, my life was almoſt gone, in the Creation (Gen. 2. 7.) God breathed into man the breath of life, or of lives, implying the many faculties and operations of life. And in as much as the body of man was firſt formed, and this life brought in after, to act and move it, this is an abundant proof that the ſoul of man is not any temperament of the body, the body being compleated (as a body) before it, and yet no life reſulting. Whereas beaſts (to whom that beaſtly opinion compares man in his Creation) had living bodies as ſoon as bodies, their total form being but an extract from the matter.

Solomon, Eccleſ. 3. 19, 20, 21. brings in the Atheiſt drawing this concluſion from thoſe confuſed oppreſſions which he obſerved in the world; men carried themſelves ſo like beaſts, preying upon and devouring one another, that he (who had nothing but carnal reaſon to judge by) preſently reſolves, That which befalleth the ſons of men, befalleth beaſts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, ſo dieth the other, yea they have all one breath; ſo that a man hath no prehemínence above a beaſt, for all are vanity, all go to one place, all are of the duſt, and all turn to the duſt again. And whereas the Atheiſt heard ſome ſpeak of the aſcent of mans ſpirit after this life, he puts it off as but talk and gueſſing, ver. 21. Who knoweth the ſpirit of man, that goeth upward, and the ſpirit of a beaſt, that goeth downward to the earth? That is, who can tell that there is ſuch a difference between the ſpirit of a man and of a beaſt? who ever ſaw the one aſcending, or the other deſcending? or from what Anatomy was this learned? Thus the Atheiſt derides the doctrine of the ſoul, and will therefore laugh and be merry with his body while it laſts, that's his portion; for who ſhall bring him to ſee what ſhall be after him? ver. 22. Is it not ſtrange, that any who are called ſober Chriſtians, ſhould plant their opinions in this ſoyl of Atheiſm, and make that a proof of their faith, which Solomon brings only as a proof of ſome mens infidelity? The Preacher in this Book perſonated thoſe whom he abhorred, and ſometimes ſpeaks the practices of other men, not his own opinion. There is no more reaſon to ground this Tenet of the ſouls mortality upon thoſe Texts, then there is encouragement to intemperancy in that, chap. 11. 9. Rejoyce, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart chear thee in the dayes of thy youth, and walk in the wayes of thine own heart: Or in that of the Apoſtle, 1 Cor. 15. 32. Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die. If any would learn Solomon's own ſence about this point, let him read it as plain as words can make it (Eccleſ. 12. 7.) Then (namely, when man dies) ſhall the duſt return to the earth as it was, and the ſpirit ſhall return unto God, who gave it.

Hujuſmodi ſententiæ regreſſum animarum in corpora minime negant, ſed neceſſitatem moriendi confirmant & celeritatem.

So then (to the text before us) the ſoul is not a wind, but the life; and all thoſe Scriptures where life is compared to wind and dying, to the paſſing of it without returning, deny the regreſs or returning of the ſoul to a natural, not to an eternal life: and imply the ſhort ſtay of the ſoul in the body, and certain departure from a not-being, when it parts. Theſe two muſt part, and ſo part, never to return to that eſtate again. Thus Job expounds himſelf in the words following.

Videre bonum pro frui nota locutio eſt.

Mine eye ſhall no more ſee good.] Or as the Hebrew, I ſhall not return to ſee good (anſwerable to the Metaphor of a wind.) it paſſeth away, and returns no more.

To ſee,] In this place, as often elſewhere, is to enioy, I ſhall not enjoy good, Pſal. 4. 6. Who will ſhew, or who will cauſe us to ſee any good? It was not the bare ſight of good, which they deſired, but the enjoyment of it. So, Jer. 17. 6. The man whoſe heart departeth from God, is threatned, that he ſhall not ſee when good cometh, that is, he ſhall not enjoy good when it comes; for, though to ſee good, be a mercy, yet to ſee it, and not taſte it, is a curſe. Therefore at the laſt day, they who thought themſelves high in Gods favour, but were indeed under his wrath, are told, that they ſhall ſee Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of God, and themſelves ſhut out; they ſhall ſee what they cannot enjoy, and that ſight ſhall add to their ſorrow. The Prophet cries out, Lam. 3. 1. I am the man that hath ſeen affliction, that is, I am the man that hath felt and had experience of afflictions. And, Pſal. 16. 10. The great promiſe of Chriſt is, that though he took a corruptible body upon him, yet he ſhould not ſee corruption, that is, partake of corruption; corruption ſhould have no communion with, much leſs power over him: And we have the ſame uſe of the word in this Book, chap. 20. 17. Where Zophar tells the hypocrite, that God will deprive and ſtrip him of every good thing: He ſhall not ſee the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter. It is a Rhetorical expreſſion, comparing the affluence of outward things to floods, and rivers and brooks, which ſend forth their ſtreams plentifully; as if he had ſaid, though there be great ſtore of honey and butter (thoſe two are ſpecified for the reſt) though there be rivers, brooks and ſtreams of theſe commodities, yet he ſhall ſee none of them, that is, he ſhall not enjoy or taſte a drop of them. That unbelieving Lord is told by Eliſha, that he ſhould ſee plenty in Samaria the next day, but ſhould not eat thereof, 2 Kings 7. 2. Not to ſee, is not to eat; and he that ſees, but eats not, is not relieved, but troubled at the ſight. Luk. 13. 28.

Mine eye ſhall not ſee [good.] What good? When a man dies, ſhall he ſee no more good? We ſee but little good while we live, and the greateſt good is to be ſeen when we die; or rather, while we live, what do we ſee but evil? and when the Saints die, what have they to ſee but good? How is it then, that Job ſaith, when I die, mine eye ſhall not ſee good? What miſerable creatures were we if there were no good to be ſeen beyond the line of this life? our richeſt ſtock of comfort lies in the good we ſhall ſee hereafter, which is therefore called the bleſſed-making viſion; and Job knew well enough that his eyes ſhould ſee good after death; for he ſaith (chap. 19. 27.) with theſe eyes ſhall I ſee God; he knew alſo his ſoul had an eye to ſee good (and a better good then ever he ſaw in the world) while his body lay in the grave. Then his meaning of Mine eye ſhall no more ſee good, is, no more worldly good, none of theſe good things which I have ſeen; I ſhall be above the ſmart of earthly ſorrows, and above the ſence of earthly joyes. Good is either natural, or civil, or ſpiritual. When God created the world, he looked upon all that he had made, and he ſaw that all was very good: Civil good is the order, peace and proſperity of the world, death ſtops the ſight of all this good. As for eternal or ſpiritual good, death cannot cloſe or dim the eye againſt thoſe objects.

Then here is no plea for Atheiſts againſt the reſurrection, nor any againſt the ſouls Being, or being alive, till the reſurrection. Job ſpeaks only about the ſphear and courſe of nature; when man dies naturally, and is in the ſtate of the dead, he enjoyes nothing, he acts nothing according to the ſtate of the living *, Pſal. 115. 17. The dead praiſe thee not, &c. There is no work, device or buſineſs at all in the grave, Eccl. 9. 10. The hand works not, the tongue ſpeaks not, The eye ſhall no more ſee this good.

* In his & ſimilibus locis, Scriptura intelligēda eſt de ſtatu mortuorum, in morte quis confitebitur tibi? poſt reſurrectionem pii laudabunt Deum, ſed ante illam, quamdiu erunt in ſepulchro, nemo confitebitur ei, anima & corpore ſimul. Dmſ. Juxta naturæ curſum hic loquitur, negans crediturum hominem ubi hinc exceſſit. Reſurrectio mortuorum divinum & ſupra naturam opus eſt, quo hic non reſpicit, naturæ tantum conſuetum ordinem afferens, quomodo intelligenda ſunt quæcunque talia in hoc libro, in Pſalmis, & aliis Scripturæ libris, occurrunt.

Job expreſſes himſelf by an act of the eye, which carries the greateſt ſtrength for refreſhing to the whole man. All the joy and pleaſure we ſhall have in heaven, comes in by ſight, we ſhall ſee him as he is. The beholding of God in Chriſt, is the beatifical viſion, much of the good of which we have in this world, comes in by the ſence of ſeeing; and all the good of the next is placed in ſeeing; therefore he doth not ſay, I ſhall no more taſte good, or no more feel good, but no more ſee good; becauſe the chiefeſt good, eternal good, conſiſts in viſion, therefore proportionably our preſent good doth ſo likewiſe.

Sick Hezekiah ſpeaks in the language of ſick Job; I ſaid, I ſhall not ſee the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living; I ſhall behold man no more, with the inhabitants of the world, Iſa. 38. v. 11. When Hezekiah thought he ſhould die, he deſcribes the ſtate of the dead by a deprivation of all thoſe comforts which are taken in by the ſight of the eye. But you will ſay, how ſaith he, I ſhall not ſee the Lord? He doth not ſay abſolutely, I ſhall not ſee the Lord; but with a modification, thus, I ſhall not ſee the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living. But did Hezekiah ſee the Lord in the land of the living, or while he lived? Yes, as Moſes ſaw him that was inviſible, ſo did Hezekiah: God makes himſelf viſible to the Saints in this life. Though God cannot be ſeen in his eſſence in Heaven, much leſs on earth; yet he is ſeen in his works, in the acts of his providence, and in his ordinances; we may ſee the goings of God in the Sanctuary, and behold the beauty of the Lord, while we enquire in his Temple, Pſal. 27. 4. So that when Hezekia ſaith, I ſhall not ſee the Lord in the land of the living; his meaning is, I ſhall not behold God in his great works and in the ordinances of his holy worſhip, and in the Congregations of his holy people. In all theſe God is viſible, and moſt in the laſt; and therefore he ſaith, I ſhall behold man no more, with the inhabitants of the world; God is viſible in all creatures, but moſt in man, and among men; moſt in his Saints, and among his Saints; moſt when they meet in the comely order of his houſe and worſhip; the ignorant and unlearned coming into ſuch a ſacred throng, ſees ſo much of God, that he is convinced and goes away reporting, that God is in them of a truth. In Chriſt is ſeen the brightneſs of his Fathers glory, and in the Saints much of the beauty of it is ſeen. Chriſt is the expreſs image of his perſon, and in the Saints ſo meeting, much of his image is expreſſed.

Firſt, In that Job betakes himſelf to God, O remember that my life is wind, &c. Obſerve,

That, In our diſtreſſes it is better to cry to God, then to complain to creatures.

God is uſually the laſt, but he is alwayes the beſt refuge, when we have told over the ſtory of our ſorrows and ſad condition, and powr'd our wants into the boſoms of our moſt faithful friends; yet this Apoſtrophe is ſweeteſt to the ſoul, when we can turn unto God, O remember me. It is ſaid of Hezekiah in his ſickneſs, that he turned himſelf unto the wall and prayed; he turned from the people, from thoſe that were about his bed, unto the wall; why what was the wall to him? Or what could the wall do for him? ſurely nothing. As good turn to an Idol for help or eaſe, as to a wall, yea ſuch a turn to the wall, turns the wall into an Idol; Good Hezekiah had no thought of the wall, nor had he any meſſage to any Image hanging there. But as 'tis probable, many of his loving Subjects and ſervants were weeping about the bed of their ſick King, and he had been diſcourſing of his diſeaſe, and telling them of his ſickneſs, but at laſt he turns to the wall; that is, he leaves ſpeaking to the company, and turns away from them, that he might have communion with God; and his firſt word of prayer, is the ſame with Job's, Remember now O Lord, &c. Iſa. 38. 2. Creatures are but creatures, and when they have done their beſt for us, it may be they can do no good for us; when they have tryed all their skill, and all their ſtrength, and ſtirred the utmoſt of their abilities, to give us counſel and eaſe, we muſt ſay to them all, ſtand by, and come to Job's Turn, O Lord remember. That man is moſt to be bemoaned, who can make his moan to man only. He who knows not how to complain to God, or to ſpeak out his ſorrows, and his griefs in the ear of Chriſt, ſhall gain little (though he receive much) by complaining to the creature. But ſo long as we have a God to turn to, and ſpread our caſe before, though men turn from us, yea, though they turn againſt us, and forget us, yet it is enough that we have ſaid, O Lord remember.

Secondly, From the matter which Job puts God in mind of, namely his natural frailty and fleeting condition, that he was a paſſing wind. Obſerve,

It is an argument moving the Lord to compaſſion, to mind him of the frailty of our condition.

There is no argument from our ſelves ſo effectual, to draw out the bowels of Gods compaſſions toward us, either in regard of our ſpiritual or temporal eſtate, as this, to tell him how frail we are; the Pſalmiſt ſhews this the motive of mercy often to that ancient people the Jews, Pſal. 78. 38. He being full of compaſſion forgave their iniquity, and deſtroyed them not, yea many a time turned he his anger away, and did not ſtir up all his wrath. But what moved the Lord to deal thus with his people? What was it out of himſelf? We know the inward moving cauſe was his own free grace, but what did he look upon abroad in the creature? He remembred that they were but fleſh, a wind that paſſeth away, and cometh not again. Job's argument to a letter. He conſidered how eaſily and quickly they might be deſtroyed, and therefore he deſtroyed them not, Pſalm 103. 4. Like as a father pitieth his children, ſo doth the Lord, &c. Why, what ſtirs up this pity? For he knoweth our frame, and he remembreth that we are but duſt; Now, that which God himſelf makes the argument, all the argument in us of his turning to us in mercy, that we ſhould mannage, eſpecially as our argument when we turn to him in prayer. Should we plead before God our perfections, and ſay, Lord remember our holineſs, our zeal, our prayers, our tears, our faſtings and humiliations; could any of this move God, or be any attractive of his compaſſions toward us? If we will plead our perfections, God will deſpiſe our prayer. Our ſtrongeſt argument is to ſay, we are weak, and to tell God we are ſinful, prevails more then to tell him we are righteous: We ſhall gain moſt by ſaying, we are unprofitable ſervants.

But did not Hezekiah, entreat the Lord to remember that he had walked before him in truth, and with a perfect heart, and done that which was good in his ſight? Iſa. 38. 3. And doth not Nehemiah uſe the like plea, Chap. 13. 14, 22.

I anſwer, Firſt, that theſe were the beſt, the moſt ſpiritual and powerful pleadings with God is not proved, becauſe uſed by good men. Grace doth not act alwayes at the height, nor bring out it's choiſeſt treaſures at all times.

Secondly, They move the Lord to remember what good they had done, but they do not move the Lord by that remembrance to do them good. Hezekiah was ſo far from rejoycing in his own righteouſneſs, that the Text ſaith, He wept ſore. And Nehemiah with the ſame breath, deſires the Lord to remember what he had done, and to ſpare him, according to the greatneſs or multitude of mercy. He, that when he hath done beſt, begs a multitude of mercies to ſpare him, is far enough from challenging juſtice to reward him.

Men that are but ingenuous, will be moved moſt with a ſight or report of anothers weakneſs. The begger ſpeaks moſt effectually by his rags and ſores. The woman, 2 Sam. 24. 14. who was hired to move David for the bringing back of Abſolom, uſeth this argument; For we muſt needs die, and are as water ſpilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again: As if ſhe had ſaid, Sir, will you contend with your ſon, thus, alas, his life is but water, and he will die, for this is the common condition of mankind; therefore be compaſſionate and pittiful to him, fetch home your baniſhed. This motive takes much upon the heart of God, as in regard of particular perſons, ſo of a people in general, Deut. 32. 36. The Lord ſhall repent himſelf for his ſervants. But when will he repent himſelf? When he ſeeth that their power is gone, and there is none ſhut up or left. When they have no power or ſtrength, and there is none ſhut up, that is, when they have no fort, no ſtrong places to defend themſelves in, but even lie open to the rage and malice of the adverſary, and are ready to ſinck utterly; then the Lord takes this, both as an argument and ſeaſon for him, to repent of the affliction of his people; that is, to change the way of his adminiſtrations towards them. This promiſe was in part made good to Iſrael in the dayes of Jeroboam, ſon of Joaſh, 2 King. 14. 26. The Lord ſaw the affliction of Iſrael, that it was very bitter, for there was not any ſhut up, nor any left, nor any helper in Iſrael.

Thirdly, Speaking of the world, he saith, Mine eye shall no more see good. Observe then,

That worldly things are good things.

In their sphear and proportion, they are good. Abraham minds the rich man, Luke 16. Son remember, that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things. Therefore we are to use the world, and all the creatures in it, as the good things of God, and the goodness we see in creatures should raise us up to admire the goodness of the Creator; if goodness be stamped upon present and temporary things, how good are things eternal?

Fourthly, Mine eye shall no more see good. Observe,

After this life there is no more use, or enjoyment of wordly things.

The things of the world are but for the world; Mine eye shall no more see, I shall no more enjoy or use these good things. Consider what it is you lay up, when you lay up the things of this life, you lay up those things which after a while your eyes shall see no more; you lay up those things, which after a few dayes, you shall have no more use of; you shall have no use at all of your gold, no use at all of your silver, no use at all of your apparel, no use at all of your goodly houses, no use at all of your rich furniture, no use at all of your lands, you shall have no use of all these good hings Consider then what it is you lay up: a time is coming, when you shall say of them all, I shall no more see, I shall no more use and enjoy any of these good things. Therefore be so wise as to improve this time, which passes like a Weavers shuttle and a blast of wind, to lay up such good things as your eyes shall see, when you are laid down in the grave: lay up spiritual good things, lay up your portion in Christ, make him yours, and then when you die, and lie down in the grave, you may say, we have good things yet to see; our best sight is to come, even such a sight as eye hath not seen. Such a sight as to which the glory of all the Princes of the world is a meer Pageantry. And so much of Job's Apostrophe to God.

The next verse is a further description of the state of the dead.

Vers. 8. The eye of him that hath seen me, shall see me no more; thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.

In the former verse, Job had said his own eyes should see no more good, now he saith, that the eyes of others shall see him no more; The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more. It is a great part of the glory and comfort which men take in the world to be seen of men. As we take in our comfort by seeing, so by being seen. No man would put himself into goodly cloathing, were it not that he goes abroad in company to be seen, and knows others will be looking upon him. Now as Job sets forth the vanity of the creature and of this life, because he should see none of it when he died, so because when he died, others should see him no more: all his beauty, riches and good things must be buried with him. There is an elegancy in putting these two together, to see and to be seen. Death stops both, it takes us from seeing, and it takes us from being seen. As all the good we have will be hid from our eyes, so all our glory and excellency will be obscured from the eyes of others in the dark chambers of the grave.

Ponit hic duo, ut significet quod non revertetur ad conversationem humanam, quæ maximè consistit in videre & videri. Visus cum sit subtilior sensuũ principatum tenet in vita civili. Aquin.

Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.

Job speaks of a three-fold eye; First, Of his own eye, Mine eye shall see no more good, vers. 7.

Secondly, Of the eye of Men, The eye of him that hath seen mee shall see me no more.

Me quærent quem aspiciant; humanitus dictum.

Thirdly, Of the eye of God, Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not. He doth not say, Thine eyes are upon me, and thou shalt not see me: Gods eye looks into the grave, and can see there; when we are out of the eyes of men, we are in the eye of God; therefore he saith, Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not; as if he had said, Lord, if thou shalt defer a little to help me, and then shouldest come to look for thy Job, I shall be dead, I shall be laid in the grave, I shall not be capable of remedy, if my remedy be deferr'd: it is too late to give a man a cordial when he is dead: Thou shalt not have a Job to help, if thou doest not help him quickly. Some understand it in a spiritual sence, Thine eyes are upon me; as if he should say, Lord thine eyes are upon me, to search me, and try out my wayes, and alas I am not, I am not able to stand before thy justice, before thy pure eyes, which can behold none iniquity. But rather take it as an appeal to God, whether or no he were not near death. Thou Lord seest I am as a dead man; as a man not to be numbred among the living. Therefore if thou wilt deliver me, let thy loving kindness speedily prevent me, for I am brought very low. As a sick man in some acute disease, hastens his Physitian, sir, give me somewhat presently, or I am gone, you cannot but see I am a borderer upon death. Thine eyes are upon me, and.

Thuorum beneficiorum, si fortè cupias (humanitus loquitur, cũ occulto quæstu neglectus sui) non ero capax. Coc.

I am not.] That is, I am not alive, I am not among the children of men. Not to be, doth not import a not being, but a not appearing. I am not as I was, nor can I long be at all. Rachel wept for her children, because they were not; Joseph's brethren said to their Father, Joseph is not; and Job himself in this Chap. v. 21. explains this to be his sence, Thou shalt seek me in the morning, and I shall not be; Death is a great devourer, it sweeps all that appears of man into the grave. The world shall no more enjoy him, nor he the world; this is mans not being when he dies, as the two following verses further explain by an elegant similitude.

Vers. 9. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more,

10. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.

Job having moved the Lord to take notice of, and compassionate his transitory condition, his life being but like the hastening wind, gives us another comparison to the same sence and purpose: there his life was but a wind, and here it is but a cloud, As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more, &c.

The Cloud] in a natural notion, is a thick and moyst vapour, drawn up from the earth, by the heat of the Sun to the middle region of the Air, and by the coldness of that heavenly Country (where Snow and Hail, &c. are made and stor'd up) is further condens'd, congeal'd and thickn'd, and so hangs or moves partly from natural causes, the Sun and Wind, but especially by supernatural, the mighty power and appointment of God, like an huge mountain in the Air. To this cloud Job compares the vanishing estate of this life.

Ambulavit, ivit, & per metalepsin de rebus evanescentibus, intereuntibus, &c.

As the cloud (such a cloud as you see hanging in the Air) is consumed, or spent: The same word is used at vers. 6. My life is spent without hope. A cloud comes to it's height, and then 'tis quickly dispersst and vanisheth away; the letter of the Hebrew is, It goeth or walketh away. The walk of the clouds is according to the walk of the winds, we call it the Rock of the clouds. When the Heavens are (as it were) all masked with clouds, and a black vail or curtain drawn between us and the Sun, the Winds in a little time dissipate and scatter them.

It is usual in Scripture to compare those things which are vanishing and suddenly consumed to clouds; In which sence (Isa. 44. 22.) the sins of the Saints are compared to a cloud, and the pardoning of their sins to this consuming and scattering of the cloud, I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins. A cloud is but a kind of a blot in the pure parchment roll of the skies; I am sure a cloud of sin is a foul blot in the roll of our lives. Blot a fair writing, and you cannot read it, but blot out the blots, and then 'tis legible again: yet, the blotting out of sin, intimates it fair written, as an evidence or a record against us, till a pardon blots it out. In which sence Christ is said to have blotted out the hand-writing of Ordinances that was against us, Col. 2. 14. Thy sins (O Israel, so the Lord seems to speak in the Prophet) are as a cloud to hinder the shining of the light of my countenance upon thee: like blots they hinder thee, from reading the evidences of my favour, or they stand like evidences of guilt against thee. But I have blotted out this cloud, that is, I have pardon'd thy sins, and by the breath of my favour and free-grace, scatter'd thy transgressions, with all the evils and sequels which they naturally bring forth. So that now the light light shines fair and warm upon thee; the evidences which were against thee cannot be read, and thou mayest read the evidences of my love and mercy towards thee. The sins of the Saints are but vanishing clouds, whereas sin in it self, and the sins of all those who are out of Christ, are an abiding cloud; they are a cloud firm and immoveable, like a mountain of brass or a rock of stone. Sins make such a cloud, as no power in Heaven or Earth is able to consume, but the power of mercy, and a gale of love, breathing through the covenant of Grace.

And as the life of man is compared by Job to a cloud, so to that which is the matter of the cloud, by the Apostle James, Chap. 4. vers. 14. where he puts the question, what's the life of man? Is it not (saith he) even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away? A vapour is exhaled from the Earth by the heat of the Sun, and is the matter out of which the cloud is made. Mans life is not only like a cloud, which is more condense and strong, but like those thin vapours sometimes observed arising from moorish grounds, which are the original of clouds, and more vanishing then clouds. Even these are but vanishing enough, to shadow the vanishing, decaying, quickly disappearing life of man. As the cloud consumes and vanishes (the next words speak out the mind of the comparison.)

So he that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more.

The grave is a descent; and the word which is here used for the grave is Sheol, about which many disputes are raised among the learned: The root of it signifies to desire, or to crave with earnestness, and the reason given is, because the grave is alwayes craving and asking; though the grave hath devoured the bodies of millions of men, yet it is as hungry as it was the first morsel, still it is asking and craving: The grave is numbred among those things which are not satisfied, Prov. 30. 16. In the Greek of the New Testament, it is translated Hades, which by change of letters, some form out of the Hebrew Adam, and Adamah the Earth, unto which God condemned faln man to return, Gen. 2. 19. We find this word Sheol, taken five wayes in Scripture.

שאול Tã infernus quam sepulchrũ ἅδης. Sept. Status mortuorum vel sepulchrum, nam ut anima de corpore, ἅδης de sepulchro usurpatur, Pl. 16. Drus.

First, Strictly and properly for the place of the damned, Prov. 15. 11. Hell and destruction are before the Lord, how much more then all the hearts of the children of men. God looks through the darkness of hell, which is outer darkness.

Secondly, It is put Metaphorically, for great and extream dangers, or miseries which seem irrecoverable and remediless; these are figuratively called Hell, because Hell properly taken, is a place from whence there is no recovery; there's no release from the chains of darkness; all changes are on Earth, Heaven and Hell know none: When David praises the Lord (Psal. 86. 13.) for delivering his soul from the lowest Hell; he meaneth an estate on earth, of the lowest and deepest dangers imaginable; Mercy helpt him at the worst. To be as low as Hell, is to be at the lowest.

Thirdly, The word signifies the lower parts of the earth, without relation to punishment. Psal. 139. 8. If I go down into Hell thou art there. He had said before, If I ascend up into Heaven thou art there; by Heaven he means the upper region of the world, without any respect to the estate of blessedness; and Hell is the most opposite and remote in distance, without respect to misery. As if he had said, let me go whether I will, thy presence finds me out.

Fourthly, It is taken for the state of the dead, whether those dead are in the grave or no, Psal. 30. 3. Isa. 38. 18, 19. Gen. 37. 53. In all which places, to go out of the world, is to go to Sheol. Jacob in the Text alledged, Gen. 37. 35. said, He would go down into the grave to his son, mourning; yet Jacob thought his son was devoured by a wild beast, he could not go down into the grave to his son, for the bowels of a wild beast was his supposed grave; but he meaneth only this, I will even die as he is dead. So Num. 16. 33. where that dreadful judgment of God upon Korah, Dathan and Abiram is storied, it is said, that they, their Sheep and their Oxen, and their Tents, and all went down into Sheol, that is, they were all devoured and swallowed up. But,

Fifthly, Sheol signifies the place where the body is laid after death, namely, the grave, Prov. 30. 16. Man hath a dimension of Earth, fitted to the dimension of his body; this portion or allotment is his Sheol. Yet it signifies the grave only in general, as it is natural to man-kind, not that grave which is artificial and proper to any particular man, this the Hebrew expresses by another word: He that goeth down to the grave, goes to his long home, to a house out of which he is never able to see or make his way, and therefore it follows;

קבר Ainsw. in Gen. 37.

He shall come up no more.] No? that's sad news indeed to go down into the grave and come up no more. Are all the hopes of man shut up in the grave? And is there an utter end of him when his life ends? Shall he come up no more.

Many of the Greek writers tax Job, as not acquainted with the doctrine of the Resurrection, as if he either knew not that mystery, or doubted at this time of it: And some of the Rabbins say plainly, he denied it: But he is so clear in Chap. 19. that we need not think him so much as cloudy here: And if we look a little farther, himself will give us the comment of this Text: When he saith, he shall come up no more; it is not a denial of a dying mans Resurrection to life, but of his restitution to the same life, or to such a life as he parted with at the graves mouth: They who die a natural death, shall not live a natural life again; therefore he addeth in the next verse,

Hic abnegat Job resuscitationem mortuorum. Rab. Sol. Non negatur resurrectio ad vitam, sed ad similẽ vitã. Pined

Verse 10. He shall return no more to his house.

He doth not say absolutely, he shall return no more, but he shall return no more to his house; he shall have no more to do with this world, with worldly businesses or contentments, with the labours or comforts of the creature, or of his family; He shall return no more to his house.

But some may say, how doth this answer the comparison, That as the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more; for we find another description of clouds, Eccles. 12. 2. where the Text saith, that, the clouds return after rain; So that it seems though clouds vanish and are consumed, yet they return and come again. The clouds are like bottles full of rain, or spunges full of water; God crushes these spunges, or unstops these bottles, and they are emptied, and in emptying vanish away: but yet Solomon affirms, the clouds return after rain; how then doth Job say, that as the cloud vanisheth, so man goeth down to the grave and returns no more?

In that place of Ecclesiastes, Solomon is only giving us a description of old age, and the sad condition of man in it; he calleth it the evil day, and wisheth men would be wise to consider their latter end, remembring their Creator, and laying up a good foundation, before those evil dayes overtake them, before the light of the Sun and Moon and Stars be darkned, and the clouds return after the rain; In old age, the clouds return after the rain, thus: as in some very wet time, when we think it hath rained so much, as might have spent and quite exhausted the clouds, or drawn those bottles dry, yet you shall see them return again; it will rain day after day, as fast as ever; so in old age, when Rheums distill so freely, that you would think an old man had emptied himself of all, yet the clouds will return again, and floods of watery humors overflow. Thus the clouds of old age return; and in this sence the clouds of the air return, after they are consumed and spent into rain: But how doth a cloud return? not the same cloud numerically, that cloud which was dissolved doth not return; the same Sun goes down, and vanisheth out of our sight in the evening, and returneth again the same individual and numerical Sun in the morning; but that numerical cloud which vanished comes not again: Thus man vanisheth, and returns as the clouds return after the rain, that is, after one generation of men are dead, they return again in their children, another generation springs up: other return to life there is none, till all shall return at the general judgment of quick and dead. As now we are, who never were, so shall all return, who were, but are not. It was a witty answer of a Learned Jew, disputing with a Heathen Philosopher, who opposed the Resurrection: If that (saith he) which never was in the world, now is; is it strange, that, that which now is should be again, after it is not in the world? If this be a wonder, the other is much more wonderful.

Neither shall his place know him any more.

His place.] May be taken three wayes. First, For the calling and condition of a man in this life, that's the place of a man, a mans calling is his place. Or secondly, Locally for his house or inheritance where he dwelt; he shall come to that place no more. Or thirdly, Place is taken for dignity, Magistracy, for the eminency of a mans callings; therefore we say of a Magistrate or a man in honour, he hath a great place, or he is a man of place and rank, in all these sences, his place shall know him no more.

His place shall not know him.] That is an elegancy of the holy language. Places are without life and without sense, much more without knowledge; knowing is an act of reason, how is it then said, his place shall know him no more? Did it ever know him? There is a double figure in it: some understand it by an Hypallage, or transmutation of the words, his place shall know him no more, that is, he shall know his place no more. So that is expounded (Psal. 103. 16.) The place thereof shall know it no more, speaking of man passing away like a wind. So Psal. 37. 10. Thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be; his place shall not be; places continue while the world continues: Then his place shall not be, is, he shall not be in his place. Or secondly, Understand it by a Prosopopeia (frequent in Scripture) which is the imitation of life, by things without life: when a place takes upon it the person of a man, or when a place acts or imitates the speech of a man: sence and reason are often ascribed to things without life, and so the meaning of his place shall know him no more, may be conceived thus: When a man lives and comes home to his house, his house (as it were) welcoms him home, and his place is glad to entertain him; as in the Psalm, the little hills are said to rejoyce at the showers, so when a man comes home, his house and all he hath, have as it were, a Tongue to bid him welcom, and open Arms to receive and embrace him; but when he dies he shall return no more, and then his place shall know him (that is, receive him) no more.

Quasi diceret, ipsæ res inanimæ quæ serviunt & parent ad nutum mortalibus, mortuis tamen nulli usui sunt. Illos non agnoscunt dominos. Ea enim est vis verbi cognoscendi & non cognoscendi.

Observe from this briefly (because it is a similitude of the same importance with that opened in the former words)

First, That death is the conclusion of all worldly comforts and relations.

As the cloud vanisheth and returneth not, so (in that sence) there is an utter conclusion of man, he is gone and there is no returning; God by his Almighty power hath fetched back some, and the vanishing clouds have been brought again: so Lazarus (and others at the death of Christ) was raised from the grave; but in a natural way, death seizeth all fast for ever: your places, your relations, your credits, your friends shall know you no more, or give you farther entertainment. Observe,

Secondly, That God hath given us not only the book of Scripture, but the book of the creature, therein to learn and read our own frailty and mortality.

The creatures preach what man is, and that is a reason why the Holy Ghost spends so much time, and is so frequent in giving us the measure of our selves by creatures; these are every hour in our eye, we meet with, and see, and handle, and feel them continually: The wind, the vapors, the clouds, set forth what we are, When I consider (said David, Psal. 8. 3, 4.) the Heavens, the work of thy fingers, the Moon and the Stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him? To consider the greatness of the works of God should abase man; it should amaze us, to remember that God hath made such things for our use, who are our selves so useless (in comparison of what we ought) to God. And when man considers the Heavens and the Earth, and weighs how many things there are in them, which set forth his frailty, he hath reason to cry out, O Lord what is man? Man is but a wind, a cloud, a vapor, even such a thing as I see most perishing and vanishing in the whole compass of the Creation. Psal. 19. 1. The Heavens declare the glory of God, and the Firmament sheweth his handy work: The Heavens are excellent creatures, and full of glorious wonders, they speak the power and wisdom of God, they shew forth his handy work; they can be the work of none but of God only: The clouds also shew forth the handy work and power of God, Psal. 147. 8. Who covereth the Heavens with clouds: The hand of God draws those curtains, and puts that mask upon the face of Heaven.

But as the Heavens declare the glory of God, so they publish and declare the weakness of man, the vapors and the winds shew forth how frail he is: As the invisible things of God, to wit, his eternal power and Godhead are seen in the things which are made; God is (as it were) visible in the creatures: so likewise the frailty and mutability, the weakness and inconstancy of man is visible in the things which are created; we may read a lecture of our own transitoriness, in the most transitory Texts of nature: And that is an admirable contrivance and complication of things, that out of the very same Text of the creature, where the infinite wisdom and power of God may be learned, man also may learn his own frailty: He that studies the creature much, shall find much of God and of himself. Some conceive when Isaac (Gen. 24. 63.) went forth into the field to meditate, that he studied the book of the creatures, probably the holy man did so, but we are sure he might. How will it shame those men at last, who know not God nor themselves, when they have or might have had (without cost or travel) so many tutors and instructors.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

Therefore I will not refrain my mouth, I will speak in the anguish of my spirit, I will complain in the bitterness of my soul.

Am I a Sea or a Whale, that thou settest a watch over me?

When I say my bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint.

Then thou skarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions.

So that my soul chuseth strangling, and death rather then life.

I loath it, I would not live alwayes, let me alone, for my dayes are vanity.

IN the context of these six verses, we may take notice of four things.

First, Job's violent resolution to complain, vers. 11.

Secondly, His vehement complaint, vers. 12.

Thirdly, An amplification of his sorrows, vers. 13, 14.

Fourthly, A renovation of his often repeated desires to die, and the tediousness of his life, vers. 15, 16.

Therefore.] Job having in an apostrophe to God, shewed his weak condition, takes up a fresh resolution of complaining to God; Therefore I will not refrain my mouth, &c. as if he had said, The consideration of these things, is so far from putting me to silence, that it doth rather enlarge my heart, and open my mouth to speak and complain once more; seeing death is by Gods appointment, the certain end of all outward troubles, and perceiving my self upon the very borders or brink of death, my body past cure, my estate irrecoverable and remediless, therefore I will complain yet again, I will yet farther lay open my misery before the Lord, and press him to hasten me through the confines of this land of sorrow, that I may accomplish my dayes, and see an end of these troubles, for my soul is in great bitterness.

I will not refrain my mouth.] The word signifies to stop, inhibit or prohibit: Those Writs which stay the process of inferiour Courts, are called Prohibitions, and then no man may open his mouth more in that business, until the Prohibition be dissolved or taken off: I (saith Job) will not give my self a prohibition, I will not silence or suppress my sorrows: I will give my heart full liberty to meditate, and my tongue to speak out my sufferings: Being emptied of all my comforts, I will surely take my fill of complainings. It will be some ease to me, to make known how I am pained. I will not refrain my mouth. That word is used (Isa. 38. 1.) Cry aloud spare not; when the Prophet is commanded to tell the people of their sins, the Lord sets his tongue at liberty, spare not, thou art not silenced or limited, therefore cry aloud; theirs were crying sins, and crying

But I will ſpeak in the anguiſh of my ſpirit.] Or in the ſtraightneſs of my ſpirit; I am in a ſtraight, I am pent in my ſpirit, and unleſs I let my ſpirit out, my heart will break; I muſt give it vent and Air. I will ſpeak in the anguiſh of my ſpirit.

I will complain in the bitterneſs of my ſoul.] The word render'd complain, ſignifies to meditate, and ſo to ſpeak upon meditation, or to ſpeak deliberately. It implies, firſt, a forming and faſhioning of what we would ſay in our thoughts; Thoughts are the moulds of our words. Job intends not raſh ſpeaking: what he intends to ſpeak, ſhould be moulded, ſhap'd and wrought in his heart, before brought forth by his tongue. Prayer is expreſt by this word, becauſe prayer ought firſt to be formed in the heart: Prayer is the manifeſtation of our deſires to God; If the tongue ſpeaks before the heart, before the heart makes up our requeſts, we take Gods name in vain. Hannah takes up this word (1 Sam. 1. 16.) Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial, for out of the abundance of my complaint (or meditation, ſo the word is rendred) and grief, have I ſpoken. Hannah was praying, her voice was not heard, only her lips moved, which cauſed Eli to ſuſpect and cenſure her for drunk or diſtracted; but ſhe anſwers in words of truth and ſoberneſs, O my Lord, count not thine handmaid a daughter of Belial, for though my voice hath not been heard, yet I have been ſpeaking out of the aboundance of my complaint, that is, out of the aboundance of my meditation; my complaints are not the work of my tongue, but of my heart, and my lips moved not, until my heart moved, my complaint is my meditation. Hence likewiſe that phraſe of pouring out prayer, Pſal. 142. 2. I poured out my complaint before him; He that pours out, muſt have ſomewhat, yea much within, where there is a conſtant ſtream, there alſo is a fountain, I poured out my complaint, or my complaining prayer; it is the ſame word here, I have gathered the bitter waters of ſorrow into my own heart, and now I pour them forth in complainings.

Amarũ non ſolum dulci opponitur, ſed etiam jucundo. Amariorem me fecit ſenectus, i. e. aſperiorem. Plaut.

I will complain in the bitterneſs of my ſoul. What the bitterneſs of the ſoul is, hath been expounded already in Chap. 3. therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon it: It notes only the height or extremity of affliction. Bitter is oppoſed to unpleaſant, as well as to ſweet: In the bitterneſs of my ſoul: The affliction appeared moſt upon his body, but it afflicted him moſt in his ſoul. He ſpeaks little of the pain of his body, in compariſon of the trouble upon his ſpirit, he inſiſts principally upon that, I will ſpeak in the anguiſh of my ſpirit, I will complain in the bitterneſs of my ſoul; not in the pain of my fleſh, or ſufferings of my body; and yet that form of ſpeaking, excludes not his ſence and ſenſibleneſs of bodily pains, for a man may well ſay, his ſoul is in bitterneſs by reaſon of the pains of his body.

Being in this condition, we ſee what his remedy was, he falls a crying and a complaining before God, telling how it was with him.

Job's complaints have been ſpoken of in former paſſages of the Book, and why he complains hath been ſhewed. An afflicted ſoul finds ſome eaſe in complaining of affliction; To complain out of impatience, diſtruſt and hard thoughts of God is very ſinful; in that ſence we muſt be ſilent, as David, Pſal. 39. 9. when the hand of God was heavy upon him, I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, becauſe thou didſt it; in reference to the dealing of God with him, David had not a word to ſay; Our Lord Chriſt (the great pattern of ſuffering) was as a ſheep before the ſhearer, dumb, and opened not his mouth, no impatient ſpeech came from him. Though the grief of Job was very great, and ſo it might ſomewhat (as hath formerly been cleared) excuſe the greatneſs of his complaint, yet in this Job ſhewed himſelf a man ſubject to like paſſions as we are. Man thinks to get cure by complaining, but uſually he gets a wound: What poor ſhifts are we poor creatures often put to? How often do we entangle our ſelves, becauſe we are ſtraightned? Though Job's heart kept cloſe to God in the main, though his ſpirit was preſerved untoucht of blaſpheming, yet we find him touching too often, and too loud upon this ſtring of complaining. He cannot be excuſed from ſome motions of impatience, while we hear him ſetling upon theſe reſolutions to take his fill of, or to let looſe the reins of his paſſion to complain; I will complain in the bitterneſs of my ſoul. Anguiſh is a very ill guide of the tongue. It muſt needs be troubled matter, which paſſion dictates. Obſerve further, Dotemur quanta ſint hominis vires, ſibi à Deo derelicti. Merc.

That when ſorrow continues and hangs long upon us, it grows boyſterous and reſolute.

We have three wills in the Text, as if Job had turned all his reaſon into will, and his will into paſſion, I will not refrain, I will ſpeak in the anguiſh of my ſpirit, I will complain in the bitterneſs of my ſoul; He was grown to a kind of reſolvedneſs in his ſorrow. It is as unſafe for man (in this ſence) to will what he doth, as to do what he will; we ought to will the will of God, but we muſt ſubmit our own. We ſhould not mourn over our afflictions, nor rejoyce over our comforts, but as God wills. Yet in this the will of Job was rather ſtrong then pertinacious. He was not a man of that rough make, to oppoſe his will againſt the will and good pleaſure of God, though that were a pain to him.

Nec tamen is fuit Job, qui quod ſibi liceri non putaret protervè ac procaciter vellet aggredi. Merc.

Having thus reſolved to complain, he complains in this very high language.

Verſ. 12. Am I a Sea, or a Whale, that thou ſetteſt a watch over me?

Theſe are his firſt words, words full of deep complaint, like the Sea, which whether he was or no, he would be anſwered. Am I a Sea? Tell me. His queſtion is of like like importance with that, at Chap. 6. verſ. 12. Is my ſtrength the ſtrength of ſtones, or is my fleſh braſs? He expoſtulates with God, why haſt thou laid ſuch trouble upon me? Am I ſtone or braſs that I ſhould be able to bear it? And here (like a Sea ſwoln with bitter waters) in the bitterneſs of his ſoul, he begins to break the bounds again, Am I a Sea or a Whale, that thou ſetteſt a watch over me?

A Sea, or a Whale.] The Sea and the Whale are often joyned in Scripture, Pſal. 104. 25, 26. O Lord how manifold are thy works, &c. the Earth is full of thy riches, ſo is the great and the wide Sea; there go the Ships, there is that Leviathan, whom thou haſt made to play therein. Again, Pſalm 74. 13, 14. Thou diddeſt divide the Sea by thy ſtrength, thou breakeſt the heads of the Dragons in the waters, thou brakeſt the head of Leviathan in pieces.

But why doth Job ſpeak this language? In brief, the meaning is this, The Sea, you know, is a mighty boiſterous and unruly creature, and the Whale is the ſtrongeſt, mightieſt and moſt dreadful creature in the Sea; the greateſt of the creatures whether upon Sea or Land. The Sea is the moſt boiſterous of all the inanimate creatures, and the Whale is the moſt boiſterous of all living creatures: So that here Job gives inſtance in two creatures, which are the moſt head-ſtrong, violent and out-ragious in the whole creation, The Whale and the Sea. And he ſets forth his own weakneſs, by the Antitheſis of theſe two creatures, ſurpaſſing all in ſtrength, with which God only is able to grapple and encounter. And in asking, Am I Sea or a Whale? he may be conceived to ſpeak thus, Lord thou ſeemeſt to deal with me in a way beyond all thy dealings with the children of men; thou carrieſt thy ſelf towards me, as if I were more proud, heady, hard to be reclaimed, then any man in the world; thou ſeemeſt to take ſuch a courſe with me, as with the unruly Sea, and with the boiſterous Whale, to keep me in compaſs. He ſpeaks as if God laid too heavy an affliction upon him, and took too ſtrong a courſe to tame him, or as if he might be more gently dealt with, and that God needed not prepare ſuch bonds and fetters for him, or lay ſuch law upon him, as upon the mighty Sea, and the monſtrous Whale.

But for the words in particular.

Mare barbarum & indomitum elementũ

Am I a Sea? There are three things in the Sea, ſpecially conſiderable, at which Job might have an aim here.

First, The turbulency of the Sea; the Sea is ſtormy and turbulent, ſo ſtormy and turbulent, that it threatneth to over-whelm all; to over-whelm the Ships ſailing upon it, to over-whelm the dry Land encompaſſing it, and it would do both, if God did not bound it, if he had not ſaid,

Hitherto

Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further, and here shall thy proud waves be staid; did not God put an everlasting law upon it, it would be lawless, Gen. 1. 10. the Text saith, That the gathering together of waters, God called Seas; God gathered them together, thrust them together into one place, and there set a watch upon them, put them in prison, bound them in chains, for he saw what an unruly element it was, and how soon it would disturb all, if left to its own guidance. So, Job 38. 10. He hath set bounds to it, bars and doors to keep it in. He locks and bolts it in by his mighty power. And then Job's meaning may be this. Am I an over-whelming Tyrant or Oppressor, a swallower up of the poor, &c. that thou dost thus imprison and restrain me?

Visus est Deus conjecisse mare in carcerem, atq; illi pedes ac manus constrinxisse propter quã exquisitam Dei providentiam dicitur, Psal. 95.4.

Secondly, There is a wonderful capaciousness in the Sea: the Sea is so big and broad, so extensive and vast, that it takes in all the waters that come of the Land into its bosom, and yet feels no access. And then his meaning may be thus conceived, Am I able to drink in all these floods of sorrow, and rivers of affliction, which are let out and unburthen themselves upon me?

Thirdly, The Sea is of mighty strength, though we say, weak as water; water is a weak element in one sence, yet in another water is a strong Element, so strong that it bears all dowh before it, and bears all the storms that rage upon it. And so his meaning is, am I able to bear continual tempests, perpetual tossings and agitations. Wilt thou ever let loose the winds and gusts of trouble to blow thus furiously upon me?

Vasta sive stupenda quævis animantia significat, sive terrestria, sive aquatilia, sive aëria. Quidam Thinnorim nomen hinc deducunt.

Or (am I) a Whale?] The word signifies any great and terrible creature, any monster whether of Sea or Land, but frequently the Whale; so Gen. 1. 21. God created great Whales; and Lam. 4. 3. The Sea monsters draw out their breasts; which some interpret the Sea calf. It is taken also for the Dragon, which lives partly upon the Earth and partly in the Water (Deut. 32. 3.) Their Wine is the poyson of Dragons; and so Jer. 51. 37. But place it either at Land or Sea, it notes the most fierce, devouring and cruel of all living creatures. Our Translators understand it of that huge stupendious Sea-monster, the Whale or Leviathan, Am I a Sea, or a Whale.

That thou settest a watch (or guard) over me?

à radice שמר
Custodire, servare, significat] custodiam undiq; circumclusam unde nullum patet effugium.

The word signifies to watch a thing so narrowly, that it can neither escape nor do hurt: for upon these two reasons, watches and guards are set; we are afraid some will run from us, that others will hurt us, therefore we set a guard upon them. In this last sence, Job specially meaneth it, Thou settest a watch over me, as thou dost over the Sea and the Whale. Why doth God set a watch over these? It is that the Sea should not hurt the Earth, that Whales and Sea-monsters should not hurt man, sayling upon the Sea, or destroy the lesser fishes swimming there.

In Psalm 39. 2. the word is used for setting a watch upon the tongue, I have set a watch (saith David) upon my lips, &c. A man sets a watch upon his lips, lest he should speak amiss, or lest he should do hurt or wrong in speaking, so (Psal. 141. 3.) the Psalmist desireth God to set a watch before his mouth, and keep the door of his lips. The Tongue is a hurtful instrument, as the Apostle James describes it, a little member which hath a world of iniquity in it: Therefore the Tongue being so hurtful, it is a great part of grace to keep a watch over it, and a great part of our duty to beg of God to set a watch upon it that it may do no hurt, that it may not as a Sea or a Whale, swallow up our neighbours good name. Nehemiah (Chap. 4. 23.) made his prayer (a sweet conjunction) and set a guard or a watch; why was it? To keep off his wicked enemies from hurting him, and hindring the good work he had in hand.

Circum dedisti me carcere. Vul. Sicut carcer latinis à coercendo, sic Hebræis à custodiendo.

Some translate it thus, Am I a Sea or a Whale, that thou shouldest inclose me in prison? It comes to the same sence, and the word signifies a prison in divers Texts of Scripture: prisons are places of watch and guard, from whence there is no escape or getting loose. Job thought himself a man kept in prison, as offenders are. The Sea is a prisoner shut within banks and walls: as a man in prison cannot go where he will, so neither can the Sea. And the Whale of whom it is said, He takes his pastime in the Sea, is yet Gods prisoner there. And the truth is, all creatures are in the prison of providence, the limits whereof they can no more go beyond, then a man that is bound (as Peter) with two chains, and all the doors lock't upon him. Especially afflictions are imprisonments, sickness is an imprisonment. A disease is sent like a Sergeant to attach a man: that shuts a man within his house, confines him to his chamber, and then binds him upon his bed, not to stir till God give a release: sorrow is often called a Cord, Psal. 18. 4. The sorrows of death (the cords of death, as the Hebrew is) compassed me about; and Psal. 116. 3. The sorrows of Hell (or the cords of Hell) were about me. And in that sence Job speaks of himself, why dost thou arrest and cast me into prison, binding me with the cords of these sorrows and sicknesses. So he complains, Chap. 13. 27. Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly to all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet. It is said of the woman (Luk. 13. 16.) that Satan had bound her eighteen years; she was bound with the cords of that infirmity, and kept as a poor prisoner those many years. From all we may collect the sence formerly hinted, that Job expostulates with God for using him after the manner of a Whale or a Sea, as if he were a man so unruly, that nothing could tame and quiet him, but such a severe course as is used with beasts, or as if he were a vexer and a devourer of his brethren, a very enemy to man-kind. Observe from hence,

First, In that Job saith, Am I a Sea or a Whale, that thou settest a watch over me?

The providence of God watches over all his creatures.

All their motions are by his permission or commission; they stir not but by his leave. The providence of God is his watch, and therefore it is called the eye of providence; and providence hath such an eye as never sleeps nor slumbers; and therein lieth our security, that we have a providential eye open for us, when ours are shut and we asleep. Observe,

Secondly, God expresses most care to keep those creatures from hurting man, which are most apt to hurt man.

We see Job instances in these two by name, the Sea and the Whale, and tells us, that God puts a guard upon them; he watches the least creatures; but it speaks most security to man, to hear that these are under a watch. The Lord watches over all wicked men that they should not hurt his people; but such of them as are most harmful, who are very Seas and Whales, men who would swallow and drown his people with a deluge of rage and malice, over these the Lord watches in a special manner. His eye of jealousie (which is alwayes awake) is surely wakeful upon these. As the Lord hath a special eye upon the Saints to do them good, so he hath a special eye upon the wicked, that they do no hurt, or no more then shall turn to good. Hence the Psalmist admonishes all, and it may have a particular application to wicked men, Psal. 32. 9. Be ye not as the Horse, or as the Mule which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee. If the Lord sees men so brutish, that they will not be ruled by reason, he will rule them by rigor, He hath a whip for the Horse, a bridle for the Ass, and a rod for the fools back (Prov. 26. 3.) A rocky shore for the Sea, and a prison for the Whale, rather then they shall come near to hurt his beloved people. Note, Secondly, That, man in the passion, and distempered sinfulness of his nature, is like the Sea or the Whale.

A cruel man is as hurtful, as the most hurtful creature. In the place before noted, while man is warned, Not to be as the Horse, or as the Mule, which have no understanding, it is intimated that many men are; and it is a truth, that all men left to themselves would be like unto a Horse or a Mule, yea like unto a Sea or a Whale in doing mischief. The Prophet (Is. 57. 20.) compares wicked men unto the troubled Sea that cannot rest. There is not in the whole compass of nature, a clearer shadow of mans nature, then the Sea.

First, The Sea is very vast, and would (if let alone) be boundless. Man is naturally vast and boundless in his desires, he is never satisfied.

Secondly, The Sea is unstable, alwayes fleeting and moving, Genes. 49. 3. Dying Jacob characters Reuben thus, unstable unstable as water: The heart of man is a moveable thing, ebbing and flowing forward and backward, tumbling up and down, as the vast Ocean.

Thirdly, The Sea is often provoked with storms and tempests, it is the great stage where the winds act their parts, and strive as it is expresst in the Revelation. There are many winds striving upon the Sea of mans heart continually, and therefore he is so boisterous and so stormy; he hath winds within him, and winds from without him: The winds in his own bowels make the greatest commotions. The Apostle James questions (Chap.4.1.) Whence come contention, and wars, and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members? Lusts are as boisterous winds in the soul, which make it unquiet and unruly: strong lusts and desires like strong winds; and contrary lusts and desires, like contrary winds, contend upon this Sea. Most men are (*Tit.*3.3.) serving divers lusts and pleasures; not only many, but divers, or divers not only in number but in nature; one lust as a contrary wind striving with another, and so making a storm in the heart. And this stormines is caused also by an outward blast; Satan blows upon the heart, and the world blows; so that, till the Holy Ghost breaths heavenly gales to overcome and blow down those storms raised by the blast of strong lusts and temptations, the soul will be ever like a Sea tumbled up and down, or as the Apostle Jude speaks (*vers.*13.) like a raging wave of the Sea, foming out it's own shame.

And this is further considerable, that as the Sea is most turbulent and tempestuous, most loud and roaring about the banks, where it is restrained; so man is most boysterous, where he is kept in and stopt; if God do but set bounds to him by afflictions, he begins to rage at those bounds. It is that which Job (in a degree) complain'd of, he thought God would bind and bound him in by afflictions, and he began to be somewhat unquiet in his shacles. But when God sets bounds to wicked men by afflictions, and hedges up their way with thorns, they are angry indeed and their corruptions break forth the more, by how much the stronger banks are made against them. The great bank and bound, which God hath set to keep the lusts of men from over-flowing all, is his Word and Will, his Laws and Ordinances, by which he speaks to man as to the Sea, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further; Against these banks, the hearts of men naturally rage most. How do their lusts roar and rise up against the holy and righteous will of God, there the some of their corruptions is most wrought and cast up. As Paul himself acknowledged of his natural condition, *Rom.*7.8. Sin (saith he) taking occasion by the Law, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence; my lusts and corruptions were more mad, because they were more restrained, I was like the Sea, which makes most noise at, and most assaults the banks which stay it. So *v.*13. Sin that it might appear sin, wrought death in me by that which is good; there was a good, a holy, and a righteous Law set before me, but the baseness of my heart was such, that I was the worse, for that which taught me what was good, and should have made me better.

Further, Man is as a Sea in this, he ever casts up mire and dirt: when he is moved, corruption moves, every stirring stirs up the puddle of his heart. As he is a Sea for largeness, so he is a very sink for filthiness, Isa. 57.20. The wicked are like the troubled Sea, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.

Lastly, Covetous oppressors have a near resemblance to the Sea in three things. They (as the Sea) suck in all the rivers and streams of profit, which flow in to them from any part of the world, and yet are not filled.

Secondly, They (as the Sea) wrack and over-whelm thousands, and are not at all moved with their out-cryes.

Thirdly, They (as the Sea) have huge treasures in their houses, yet all satisfies not their desires, they are as greedy as if they were not worth a groat.

Look upon man, in the other comparison, He is a Whale, a devourer. In the worst of bruits, you may see the picture of mans nature. They who have power to do what they will, and will do (when their advantage is in it) to the utmost of their power: These are your Leviathans upon dry Land. Senacherib was a mighty Whale, gaping to swallow up the people of God, and therefore the Lord expresses his dealing with him in a word very sutable table to this sence (2 *King.*19.28.) Because thy rage against me, and thy tumult is come up into mine ears, therefore I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, &c. See how God uses him, Senacherib came raging and threatning to swallow all up; God uses him like an unruly beast of the Earth, or like a devouring fish of the Sea, He puts a hook in his nose. It is said of Leviathan, that he scorns the hook and the angle, Job 41. Canst thou draw out Leviathan with an hook? implying that no hook, no tackle is strong enough to hold this Sea-monster, but God hath a hook can hold him. Some men are like this Sea-monster, no takling of mans making will hold them, no power under Heaven can stop them; then the Lord prepares his engines and instruments, he can make a hook will catch Senacherib, the great Whale, as if he were but a sprat, I will put my hook into his nose, and turn him about, or pull him up.

What devouring enemies have alwayes come out against the Church, threaning to swallow, or as the Moabites said of the Children of Israel (Numb.22.4.) To lick up all that were round about, as the Ox licketh up the grass of the field. Yea, they thought (as it is said of Leviathan) That they could draw up Jordan into their mouths, that is, remove the greatest difficulties, and overcome all opposition. But how often hath God put a bridle into the lips of the Horse, and a hook into the nose of these Whales?

Further, If we consider the words, as Job's question, in application unto himself, Am I a Whale? Am I a Sea?

Observe, Man is apt to have good thoughts of himself.

Job would not be the Whale, or the Sea. Note,

Secondly, Man is apt to judge that God layes more upon him then there is need.

Am I a Whale, or a Sea? As if Job had said, Lord thou needest not deal thus strictly and severely with me, or bestow so much care to watch me. I would have come in at a call, thou needest not have bounded me with these afflictions, and put such a hook in my nose, a nod, or a beck would have fetched me in: Wise men sute their preparations to their occasion; we carry not out a piece of Ordinance to shoot at a flye, which we can kill with a phillup; so saith Job, Lord I need not all this, a little admonition, a little chastning, or a check should have reduced me; such are mans thoughts. But the most wise God, never layes more upon man then he hath need of: when God streightens us with such afflictions, he seeth there is somewhat of the Sea in us, he must bound us; somewhat of the Whale in us, he must watch and bring us under. If we see God bestow more rods and blows upon us, we must conclude we could not be without them; some apprehend that such is Job's meaning in vers. 16. What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him? As if he had said, it is too great an honour for man to be afflicted by thy hand. If we see a King make great provisions of war, to go out against an enemy, we say he magnifies the enemy. It is an argument they have great strength, against whom we prepare great strength. So Job, Lord thou magnifiest me, thou makest me to be look'd at, as some powerful creature, a Sea, a Whale, against whom thou actest so much of thy power.

Job having, as he resolved, begun to complain of his sorrows, now amplifies them.

Vers. 13. When I say my bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint, 14. Then thou skarest me, &c.

He amplifies his sorrows upon this general ground, because they were such as he could not find any ease or abatement of, no not at any time, no not by any means; As if he had said, my grief and my pain is so remedilesse, that neither artificial nor natural means give me any ease; those things which have the greatest probability of refreshing, yield me none. He instances in those ordinary wayes, which give sick and distempered bodies some abatement or intermission of their pains; Lying down upon their bed or couch; When I say, my bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint; As if he had said, while I was wrastling all day, and conflicting with my sorrows, I yet had some hope to find comfort at night, and that I should meet with rest in my bed, but my hope fails me ever; or while in the day time my thoughts are overburthened, and my spirit overwhelmed within me, I think sometimes to deceive my pains a little, by taking a nap or a slumber upon my couch; but alas, my pains will not be deceived; when I say, my bed shall comfort me, and my couch shall ease my complaint (I find in stead of ease, further trouble, and in stead of comfort, terrors; For then) thou scarest me with dreams.

and

When I say my bed shall comfort me.

The word signifies to mourn and repent, as well as to comfort; because comfort usually follows holy mourning and repenting. Godly sorrow is the mother of spiritual joy.

In the words, we have either that ordinary figure Prosopopeia, the fiction of a person, when acts of life and reason are ascribed to things without life; and so Job brings in his bed, as his friend speaking to him, when I say my bed shall comfort me, my bed and I will confer together, I am perswaded that will afford me a word of comfort: Or, we may rather undestand it by a Metonymie of the effect, when I say my bed shall comfort me: Comfort is the common and usual effect or benefit of lying down upon the bed: The bed is said to comfort, because ordinarily we find comfort in resting upon the bed; that being a means or instrumental cause of comfort, is called a comforter.

My couch shall ease my complaint.

The words are indifferently translated in Scripture, either for a bed, or for a couch; but if we take them distinctly, then the bed is the place, where we rest in the night, and the couch by day: When Job saith, נשא Levavit, evexit, sustulit.

My couch shall ease [my complaint]; it notes his complaint or sorrow lay as a heavy burden or weight upon him; for the word signifies to ease, or to lift up, or to ease by lifting up; if a man have a burden upon him, the way to ease him, is to lift it off from him; so Job here, I lie down upon my couch, with a burden of heavy sorrows upon me, God knows, hoping my couch will be a means to take off that burden a while, that I may have a little breathing, but (to my grief) I find it doth not. The use of sleep is to unburden the spirit, and take off the load of cares: The word is used in that sence, Gen. 4.13. about the sin of Cain, which lay upon him as a heavy burden, My sin (saith he) is greater then can be forgiven (so some translations) or greater then I can bear; word for word thus, my sin is greater then can be taken off. Forgiveness is the taking sin off from us; it is the word here used for easing: my sin is greater then I can be eased of; as if Cain thought his sin a burden which the arm of mercy could not lift from his shoulders: Pardon is the easing of the conscience, sin the burdening of it; sin is a burden, and so is sorrow. My couch (saith he) shall ease my complaint, by taking off, or at least, intermitting the troubles which cause me to complain; or, my couch shall ease me in my complaint, when I am meditating, revolving, and rowling my troubles up and down in my thoughts, then my couch and I am discoursing together, and reasoning out the matter, but no ease comes. We may observe from hence,

Magnum est peccatum meum præ tollendo, vel majus quam ut tolli possit, Sept. τὸ ἁμάρτημά μου πρὸς με, quā ut remittatur mihi, quam ut sustinere possim. Jun. בשיחי In retractione sive meditatione miseriæ apud animū. Loquens mecum.

First, That, A man in pain, expects ease from every change.

My bed (saith Job shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint) every thing he sees, raises his hope; every man that comes to him, he looks upon him as a messenger of good news, I said, this shall help me, and that shall help me; surely if I had such a thing (saith a sick man) it would do me good; if I had such meat, I could eat; if I had such drink, my palat would relish it; if I were in such an air, it would restore my health, and I should get up again. As a Bee goes from flower to flower, to suck out somewhat, so man from instrument to instrument, from means to means, from bed to couch, still hoping to find relief or mitigation, at least, for his troubled mind, or pained body.

Secondly observe, That The most probable or proper means are unable of themselves to give us any ease or comfort.

What is fitter to give a man rest then a bed? What is more proper to give one refreshing then a couch? But Job goes to his bed in vain, and goes to his couch in vain, nor this, nor that, nor t'other administred him any help. Creatures are not able of themselves to give out the comfort committed to them: Their common nature must be assisted with a special word of blessing, or else they do us no good. If God will command a bed to comfort us, it shall comfort us; if he will say to a couch, ease such a mans complaint, it shall ease his complaint; Job saith it, and his saying could not effect it: Nay, if God will say to a hard stone, give such a man rest, he shall rest and sleep sweetly upon it, when another shall not get a wink of sleep upon a down-pillow; if God say to a prison, give such a man rest, he shall find rest there; if God speaks to bonds and fetters, give such a man content and pleasure, he shall find not only contentment, but pleasure in bonds and fetters; if God say to flames of fire, refresh such as are cast into your arms, the fire will obey him, and refresh them. The most probable means cannot help us of themselves, and a word from God will make the most improbable means helpful to us, yea, that which is destructive, shall save us. For as God can create that good for us which is absent, so he can (as it were) uncreate the evil that is present. Providence can take away or suspend that hurting and destroying power which creation gave; no creature is able to help or to hurt if God forbid and lay his restraint upon it. Bread cannot nourish, or cloaths warm us, if he say they shall not; poyson shall not kill, or fire burn us, if he say, they shall not. Mans saying is but saying, Gods saying is doing. Man may say to his bed, comfort me; to his riches and honours, content me; to his wife and children, please me; to wine and musick, make me merry; he may lay his command, or send his desires to all creatures, and yet remain comfortless, contentless, mirthless. Pleasure it self will not please him, nor having of his will, satisfie his mind at his own saying or bidding.

Fourthly observe, That, Rest and sleep are from the especial blessing of God.

When I said to my bed, do it, the bed could not; sleep is not from a soft bed, or from an easie couch, Psal. 127.2. For so he giveth his beloved sleep, that is, sleep with quietness, or extraordinary quiet refreshing sleep; which some have noted in the Grammar of the Text; the Hebrew word Shena, for sleep, being with (Aleph) a quiet or resting letter, otherwise then is usual in that language. He giveth sleep to his Jedidiahs, as the word is there alluding to one of the names of Solomon. The Lord gives sleep sometimes as a love-token to his beloved. The connection is somewhat obscure, the words before run thus, It is in vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrow, for so he giveth his beloved sleep: How is sleep a consequent of fruitless labour, and eating the bread of sorrow? These rather hinder sleep. Some refer it to the words of the first verse, Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the City, the watchman waketh but in vain, for so he giveth his beloved sleep; the Lord watches and takes a care of a City and family, and thus gives his people rest and quiet sleep; they are not awakened with alarms or surprizes of the enemy. Others read it thus, for surely he will give his, &c. that is, notwithstanding the ungodly are eaten up with cares to provide bread for themselves and families to eat; yet without fail, the Lord of his meer mercy, will give food convenient to his people by their labours, and quiet sleep (which includes all inward contentments) with it. So, Prov. 3.24. Thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet. And, Psal. 41.3. There is a special promise made to the sick man, or to him, who hath been a comforter of the sick, The Lord will make all his bed in his sickness, that is, God will make his bed easie and comfortable in his sickness. When we cannot sleep, we use to complain of our servants, and say, sure this bed was not made to night, or it was ill made; no man complains his bed was ill made when he hath slept well. That his people in such a case, may be sure of rest, the Lord condescends to that low office, the making of their beds. Therefore we are to receive sleep as a matter of special blessing, coming from the hand of God; he makes the bed in sickness and in health too: then bless God for rest, and not your beds. Though we know sleep is the portion of mankind, kind, and many times the worst of men have quiet and refreshing sleep, yet no wicked man ever slept upon the pillow of this promise, nor will God make the bed of the greatest Prince in the world, as such, which yet he is ready to do for his meanest servant; common comforts are to some special mercies. As some enjoy riches and honour by common providence, while others enjoy them by virtue of a special promise, so it is with sleep; He giveth his beloved sleep.

But what found Job upon his bed? In stead of sleep and rest, he found skaring dreams and terrifying visions; as it follows.

Verse 14. Thou skarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions.

As if he had said, I find my self altogether disappointed and deceived, in stead of being comforted, I am skared; in stead of being eased, I am terrified, my bed is to me as a very rack, and my couch my torment, or a little-ease.

Thou skarest me.] The word signifies to be cast down prostrate to the ground with fear, or to be ground to powder with fear; and it is often rendred by that word contrite, which notes breaking of the heart by godly sorrow; such a breaking is upon me through the dreams which fall upon me in, and break my sleep: If I have any sleep, it is terrifying, and not refreshing sleep.

Thou skarest me [with dreams.] That word springs from a root signifying thick vapours; because sleep is caused by thick vapours ascending from the stomach to the brain, and closing up the senses; dreams usually come in that sleep, and the stronger and thicker the vapour is procuring sleep, the more we are subject to dream.

And terrifiest through visions.] In the fourth Chapter I had occasion to speak at large concerning visions, therefore I shall not here insist upon that point, but refer the Reader thither; I shall only say thus much, that these were not visions as those before treated of, for the revelation of any divine secrets, to enlighten the mind of man, but only visions of hellish horror, to darken and vex the mind of man. The Hebrew word signifies to see, whence the ancient Prophets were called (Chozim) * Seers. Our English word Gaze, hath near affinity with it. And we call Star-prophets (who pretend skill in predictions from the visions of the Heavens) Star-gazers.

Visiones istæ quibus percellebatur Job erant terriculamenta, lemures, species, umbræ, spectra, manes, simulachra, & alia hujusmodi à dæmone procurata, quamvis ipse Job sibi à Deo inferri asserit. Cassia Col. 7. cap. 32. * חזה ינוח à radice חזה. Hinc Prophetæ Chozim videntes dicti.

Job had both dreams and visions; for in every dream there is somewhat of a vision: There are many visions without a dream, but there cannot be a dream without a vision. An image or similitude is alwayes represented to, or formed in the fancy, or else there can be no dream. Jacob dreamed (Gen. 28. 12.) and behold a ladder set upon the earth, and the top of it reaching to heaven. The vision here spoken of, was (I conceive) the vision of his dream, though some understand it of day or waking vision.

There is a twofold cause of dreams; there is an inward cause, and an outward cause. And,

The inward cause of dreams is twofold.

First, The accidental motions of the fancy, of which a man can give no reason from any precedent agitation of mind or body.

Secondly, The setled natural temperament and constitution of the body.

The external or outward causes are usually according to the objects with which or about which we are conversant in the day-time, the impressions of these kept in the fancy, are formed into dreams at night; such as the desires or distempers of the mind are, such often are our dreams.

Or take it thus, Dreams have a five-fold cause.

First, The natural temper of the body, and so from the variety of constitutions, variety of dreams are shaped; Cholerick, or Melancholy, or Flegmatick, or Sanguine, produce their special dreams.

Secondly, Dreams are caused by the distempers of the body, either from intemperate drinking or eating any kind of meat, or from the very eating (though moderately) of some meats, or from the diseases and sicknesses of the body; from this latter Job's dreams were much encreased, and Satan took the advantage to raise fumes, and stir the pudled humors of his body up into his brain, out of which his fancy formed terrible representations to his mind. As Melancholy is said to be the Devils Bath, so are other diseased sickly humors; in them he sports himself, and vexes man.

Thirdly, There is a moral cause of dreams, such as the studies and businesses, labours and employments, cares and disquietments of a man are in the day, such often are his dreamings. As he works in the day, his fancy works in the night, Quæcunque mentis agitat insessus vigor ea per quietem sopitum cernit & arcanus refert veloxq; sensus, Sen. in Oct.

Fourthly, Dreams have a divine cause, and are immediately from God. The Scripture is full of instances, I need not stay upon them: Jacob had such a dream, Gen. 28.16. And Joseph had many dreams from God; hence his brethren called him in scorn, The Dreamer, or a Captain-Dreamer, Gen. 27. 19. And not only have godly men dreams from God, but heathens also, Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, men of the earth, received from heaven things of high concernment, revealing the counsels of God, concerning their own Kingdoms, and the latter about the state of all Kingdoms and Monarchies, till all the Kingdoms of the earth shall become the Kingdom of that One, Sole, Supream Monarch, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Fifthly, There are diabolical dreams, dreams which are from the Devil: Not that the Devil of himself is able to cause a dream, he cannot stir the fancy in the night, or tempt in the day, but as he hath a power given him; but permitted, he causes sometimes sinful and filthy dreams; as Augustine bewailes in the tenth book of his Confession; sometimes terrible and troublesome dreams, sometimes treacherous and deluding dreams. It is by some conceived, that the dream of Pilates wife, Mat. 27. 19. was from the Devil; she came to Pilate, and desires him to have nothing to do with that Just man; for (saith she) I have suffered many things this night in a dream because of him. The reason why some conceive that dream was from the Devil, is this, because thereby Satan would have hindred the work of mans redemption, if Christ had not died; and so by saving him, would have destroyed us all. I will not assert this; but it is clear to the point in hand, that there are dreams from the temptations, motions and suggestions of the Devil, who hath a power over us, as God lengthens out his chain both day and night. Aug. Con. l. 10. c. 3

But when it is said, Thou skarest me with dreams; what dreams were these, Divine or Diabolical? Job speaks unto God, Thou skarest me with dreams: doubtless divine dreams had an influence upon his spirit, and left terrifying impressions there. But Satan having power to afflict Job which way he pleased, was instrumental here; and yet Job saith to God, Thou skarest me. As before, when Satan by his instruments took away all from him, he said, The Lord hath taken; so here, when Satan vexed him with visions, representing horrid and fearful spectacles, yet he saith, Thou skarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions; as pointing still unto the power and providence of God, who hath all second causes, Satan and all, at his own disposé. Hence observe,

First, That, Even our dreams are ordered by God.

Though Satan be the instrument, yet we may say, Thou skarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions. Job was not ignorant that second causes had a great power upon the body, to produce dreams and nightly fancies; he was not ignorant, that the strength of a disease might do very much in this, and that Satan, his former enemy was busie to improve the distempers of his body for the trouble of his mind; yet he overlooks all these (as he did before) and saith, Lord, thou skarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions. Dreams are in the hand of God; as our waking times are in the hand of God, so are our sleeping-times; when we are sleeping, we are in the arms of an ever-waking Father; Satan hath no power to touch us sleeping or waking, without leave.

Secondly, God can make our sleep an affliction.

Job's were skaring and terrifying dreams: Some dreams are for warning and admonition; The Lord warned Joseph in a dream: Some are for counsel and instruction; he revealed great things in dreams: Others are for comfort and conſolation. Many a ſoul hath taſted more of heaven in a night-dream, then in many dayes attendance upon holy Ordinances. As the luſts of wicked men have dreams attending them, ſo alſo have the graces of the Saints. Job's dreams were for terror and afflictions.

and

Secondly obſerve, Satans deſire of troubling poor ſouls, is reſtleſs.

It is reſtleſs indeed, for he will not give them leave to reſt, they ſhall not ſleep in quiet, their very dreams ſhall be diſtractions, and their nightly repreſentations a vexation to them. Note further,

That (If God permit) Satan can make dreams very terrible to us.

He can ſhew himſelf in a dream, and offer ugly ſights, extreamly perplexing to the Spirit. He is able to caſt himſelf into a thouſand ill-favoured ſhapes, into horrid and dreadful ſhapes, he can cloath himſelf with what habit he pleaſes, if God give him a general commiſſion. And hence the Devil terrifies, not only by temptations to the mind, but by apparitions to the eye, and is ſeen, at leaſt, conceived to be ſeen (eſpecially by ſuch as labour under ſtrong diſeaſes) like a Lion, a Bear, a Dog, gaping, grinning, ſtaring; whence we ſay of any terrifying ſight, it looks like a Devil. We depend upon God, as for ſleep, ſo for the comfort of ſleep. Many lie down to ſleep, and their ſleep is their terror. As that evil Spirit (in the Goſpel) went about ſeeking reſt, but found none; ſo he hinders ſome, (and would more) from finding reſt when they ſeek it. Therefore bleſs God for any refreſhing you have by ſleep: Bleſs God when your dreams are not your ſcares, nor your beds your rack. See the effect, what deep impreſſions dreadful dreams made in Job's ſpirit; he was ſo affrighted with them, that he profeſſes with his next breath, Verſe 15. My ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling, and death rather then life; I loath it, I would not live alwayes.

So that my ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling.] He renews his former often repeated motion, but with a greater ardency; he not only prefers death before his troubled condition, but a violent death (and in the opinion of ſome) the worſt of violent deaths, ſtrangling; which, though it be not the moſt painful of violent deaths, yet it is looked upon as the moſt ignominious of violent deaths.

Some refer theſe words to the terror which Job had in his dreams and viſions, as if they were ſo violent upon him, that they almoſt diſtracted him, and made him mad, that they even put him upon deſperate thoughts of deſtroying himſelf; My ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling, that is, I am often tempted, and almoſt prevailed with to make my ſelf away, The learned Phyſitians tell us, that their Patients have often attempted to deſtroy themſelves through the terrors of dreams and viſions.

Ab hujuſmodi ſpectris multos ſe jam ſtrangulaſſe, & proſiliiſſe in puteos aſſerit. Hipp.

Yet we may underſtand the word [ſtrangling] only of natural and ordinary death. Every death is a kind of ſtrangling, and ſome diſeaſes ſtop and choak a man, even as ſtrangling doth; ſo that my ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling, may be taken in general, My ſoul chuſeth death rather then life.

My ſoul chuſeth.] He puts the ſoul (as it is often in Scripture) for the whole man; and the ſence of all is, as if he had ſaid, If I might be my own chuſer, if I might have my election, I would even take the worſt of deaths rather then the life which now I live. My ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling,

And death rather then life.] If we take ſtrangling for a ſpecial death, then here death is put in general; as thus, if ſtrangling be too eaſie a death, let me die any kind of death, Death rather then life.

Os à robore dictum, nihil in ipſo tam forte & firmũ, quod vi doloris non debilitarat & confringat. Aquin.

The Hebrew in the Letter is, And death rather then my bones, which ſome render thus, And death rather then to be with my bones; To be with our bones, is to live. Others make this chuſing an act of his bones; My ſoul chuſeth ſtrangling, and my bones death, that is, every part of me chuſeth death, all vote for the grave; I have not a diſſenting member, no, nor a diſſenting bone; when David prayes, Pſal. 6. 2. Heal me, O Lord, for my bones are vexed; His meaning is, I am vexed quite through. And when he promiſeth (Pſal. 35. 10.) All my bones ſhall ſay, who is like unto the Lord? &c. His meaning is, that he will praiſe God quite through, ſoul and body. Again (Lam. 1. 13.) From above hath he ſent fire into my bones, and it prevaileth againſt me; that is, he hath utterly conſumed me. So here, the whole man is expreſſed by parts, ſoul and bones, or body and ſoul, that is, whether I conſider the anguiſh of my ſoul, or the pains of my body, I deſire to die.

Thirdly [Death rather then my bones] becauſe he had ſuch ſore, putrified and afflicted bones, painful bones; for when Satan deſired a Commiſſion to afflict him, he words it thus, Touch his fleſh and his bone, and he will curſe thee to thy face: Doubtleſs Satan had gone as deep as his commiſſion; he had liberty to touch his fleſh and his bone, and he did it: He vexed his very bones (as we ſay) my bones are even rotted and conſumed, the ſores and the putrefaction is ſunk down into my marrow, I had rather have death then my bones, that is, then a body thus conſumed and putrified even to the very bones.

Magis optarem mori, quam talia oſſa & mẽbra putrida, & ulceribus diffluentia. Merc.

Yet further, ſome of the Hebrews give it thus, [Death rather then my bones] becauſe Job had nothing left him but bones, he could not ſay, my fleſh, for his fleſh was conſumed; as we ſay, ſuch a man is nothing but skin and bones, a meer Skeliton: I am nothing but bones, and I had rather die, then live ſuch an Anatomy.

Verſe 16. I loath it, I would not live alway; let me alone, for my dayes are vanity.

He cloſeth up his complaint, as he had often done before, with the tedium that was upon him, and the nauſeouſneſs of his life; I loath it, I am nothing but skin and bone, nothing but ſores and biles, my life is a burden to me, I would not live alway.

I loath it.] The word ſignifies the greateſt averſation poſſible. God expreſſeth his greateſt diſplicency of that, wherein the Jews were commanded to take their greateſt pleaſure under this notion, Amos 5. 21. I deſpiſe your feaſts; you think you keep ſolemn feaſts, wherein I delight as much as your ſelves, but I loath them, my ſtomach turns at every diſh. The ſtomach cloſes with wholeſom meat, and turns to it; that which is unwholeſom, the ſtomach turns againſt, the ſight of it cauſes loathing. Their feaſts were of Gods own appointment, and he uſed (in a ſence) to feaſt with them, but their hypocriſie ſpoil'd the banquet. Job ſpeaks of his own life, what the Lord ſpake of their feaſts, I loath it, even as that meat which is moſt burdenſome to the ſtomach. So, Pſal. 53. 5. Thou haſt put them to ſhame, becauſe God loathed them, or, becauſe God deſpiſed them. They who are loathſome to God, cannot long be honourable or acceptable among men.

I would not live alway.] The word is, I would not live to eternity, or, I would not live for ever. Why, who can, if he would? Why ſhould Job deprecate that which was not attainable? I would not live alway; he needed not trouble himſelf about that (for he ſpeaks of a natural life) it being impoſſible that he ſhould. There is no fear of living alwayes in this world, nor is there any hope of avoiding it in the next. Why then doth Job ſay, I would not live alway? To live alway or for ever, is often uſed in Scripture for a long time. The Ceremonies and Inſtitutions of the Jews were ſaid to be for ever, becauſe they were long-liv'd, yet we know they are vaniſhed and gone: That which continues as long as it ſhould, continues alwayes. So here, I would not live alway, that is, I would not live long, or I would not live out my full time, I had rather be cut off in the midſt of my dayes, or in the midſt of my years, then live to the end of them.

Let me alone, for my dayes are vanity.

Let me alone.] Or ceaſe from me; which is taken two wayes, either, leave off to prolong and protract my dayes, ceaſe from me ſo, do not ſtand by me with thine aſſiſting power to keep my life whole within me; I am ready to die, give me no ſtrong-water or cordial, rather pull away my pillow, let me go: Or, Ceaſe from me, that is, ceaſe afflicting me, take off thine afflicting hand from me, do not any longer hold me in this woful and ſad condition; Ceaſe from me, The world and time, while they continue, are alwayes ceaſing, and therefore have their denomination from this word, which ſignifies to ceaſe.

For my dayes are vanity,] That's the ground of his prayer, prayer, why he requests God to cease from him, My dayes are vanity; why shouldest thou stay me longer in a vain shadow? If we take, Cease from me, or, let me alone, for the ending of his affliction, it is, as if he had said, my life is vanity, there is trouble enough in it; if thou givest me the greatest ease that ordinarily a life can have, yet it is but a vain life, I need not have this super-addition or accumulation of sorrows upon me: Or, let me alone, my life is vanity; why should I converse further any longer with vanity?

חבל A verbo Habal, quod est evanescere. Rem denotat quæ non est quidpiam, aut citò desinit, aut flatus, qui exit ab ore, sic enim halitum infantium appellant Pag.

My dayes are vanity. He saith not, My dayes are vain, but they are vanity. My dayes are Hebel, which signifieth a vain, light thing, a bubble on the water, or a breath of the mouth; my dayes are but a breath or a puff. The root imports vanishing or disappearing, the still, almost unperceivable breath of a little infant, which will scarce move a feather. Alas! my dayes are fleeting and vanishing, vain, yea, vanity; they have no consistency in them, O then cease from me, and let me do what vanity must, vanish out of sight. Hence observe,

First, That which a man loatheth, he longs to be rid of.

I loath it, I would not live alway. When a man loaths his sin, then he saith, I would not sin alway, I would be eased of this burden of corruption; O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death? When a man delights in sin, he would sin alway, he thinks he can never have enough of sinning; it is so in any other instance: where once affection is alienated, we would be estranged and taken off from conversation: We care not to be with that from which our hearts are departed. Assoon as ever Amnon had defiled, he loaths his sister; and as soon as he loathed her, he turned her out of doors; And Amnon said unto her, arise and be gone, 2 Sam. 13.15. He that loaths his life, is glad when a door opens for its departure.

I loath it, I would not live alway.

Secondly observe, Trouble makes a little time seem long.

He had said before, that his life was swifter then a Weavers shuttle; now, I would not live alway. O how long is my life, how tedious! He looks upon it, as if it were a kind of eternity, as if his life would never have an end, never be done, I would not live alway. Pain makes every hour a day, and every day a moneth, and every moneth a year, yea, an age. He thinks his life will never end, whose affliction doth not; he thinks he shall never die, because his troubles live. Every man is ready to say, he lives too long, when he lives not as he would. The souls under the Altar, cried out (Rev. 6.10.) How long, Lord, how long, Lord, wilt thou cease to avenge? &c. Of our good dayes we complain, How short, Lord, how short? And of our evil dayes, we cry out, How long, Lord, how long? This is a long day, and this a long night indeed; this is a long fit, this a lasting affliction. As the eternity which we shall have in heaven, is the longest, so it is the shortest; Eternity is longest in regard of duration, but it is shortest in regard of apprehension. The eternity of heaven shall be no more tedious then a minute or a moment. Eternity is so full of pleasure and satisfaction, that it breeds no fulness of it self; living at the well-head of comfort, in immediate communion with God by Jesus Christ, our comforts renew as much as they continue; whence freshness of appetite, and fulness of satisfaction are perpetually interchangeable. The joyes of that estate are so many, that the years seem but few. Eternal joy makes eternity but as a moment, as eternal pain will make every moment an eternity.

Thirdly observe, Forasmuch as Job saith, I would not live alwayes; he intimates, that there is such a desire in some men; for he speaks of a life in this world.

There is a principle in man drawing out his heart in desires to live alway in the world.

I (saith Job) would not live alway; let others make that their choice if they will, I will not. Most are very greedy of that commodity, and would not part with it upon any terms; and no wonder, for (as the Psalmist describes them) they have their portion in this life: He that hath his portion in this life, would ever have this life; he that hath nothing beyond this world, would never go beyond the world. Such must needs be all for life, all for the world, because these are their all. You shall never come to a worldly man, and find him in a mind to die. Let others take heaven, he is contented with his earth; let others make their best of the next life, the present shall serve his turn.

From the reason of this request, My dayes are vanity; observe,

The life of man is a vain life.

Vanity hath two things in it, whereof the one may seem quite contrary to the other; it hath emptiness in it, and it hath fulness in it; it hath emptiness of comfort, and fulness of vexation; that's the right vanity, Vanity with vexation of spirit; My dayes are vanity, they are empty of good, and full of evil.

Four wayes the vanity of mans dayes may be demonstrated.

First, They are vain comparatively; so our dayes are more then vain, or less then vanity, for they are nothing, Psal. 39. 5. My age is nothing before thee. As in comparison of God (Isa. 40. 15, 17.) The Nations are as the drop of a bucket, &c. they are vanity, yea, they are nothing, yea, they are counted to him less then nothing: So our dayes are vain, they are nothing but vanity, they are less then vanity, or nothing; Nothingness is the substance of vanity, and all troublesomness is the accident of it. We cannot form up an apprehension of our life, so little as it is, we cannot reach so low in our thoughts as the bottom of mans vanity, in either notion. As we are not able to raise our hearts so high as the excellency of that estate which we have by Christ; no mans thoughts are big enough, or can be, to comprehend or take in that: So we cannot little our thoughts enough to consider the estate sin hath brought us into; therefore it is said to be as nothing, and less then nothing, and how little that is, which is less then nothing, no man can proportion.

Secondly, Our dayes are vanity, because they are so unconstant and changeable, so subject to motion and alteration. That's a vain thing which is ever upon its change. That which sets the glory of God highest in opposition to the vanity of the creature, is, That with him there is no variableness nor shadow of turning, Jam. 1. 17. or, shadow by turning; some translate it so, no shadow by turning, because the Tropick or turning of the Sun makes the shadow; while the Sun is in the Zenith, that is, directly over our heads in the highest point of the heavens, we cast no shadows. Now the Lord never turneth, he is ever fixed at a point, and so makes no shadow; or thus, as we render it, no shadow of turning; that is, not only is there no turning in God, but there is not so much as a shadow of it, not so much as the least imagination of a shadow. This sets up the glory of God highest; and in opposition to this point of highest perfection in God, lies the lowest point of the creatures vanity, that in them there is nothing but turning, in them there is nothing but variableness, and the substance of turning. The fashion of the world passeth away, it is ever passing, never standing at a stay. It is more then passing, it is posting from stage to stage, night and day. As the nature of man contains the seeds and principles of all things in the world (and is therefore called a little world.) So his nature contains the seeds and principles of all the changes in the world. Therefore his dayes are vain.

Sicut homo omnes in se ipso res velut mundus quidam, ita omnium mutationum semina continet.

Thirdly, The vanity of these dayes appears in this, because they are unsatisfying dayes. That's a vain thing, which doth not satisfie; for vanity is emptiness, and emptiness can never fill; our dayes are but as a dream. And what is spoken in Isaiah (chap. 29. 8.) concerning the dreamer, is verified of a meer natural life. It is, saith the Prophet, As when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty; or, as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint: neither hunger nor thirst can be appeased by dreams; satisfaction comes not in at the door of imagination. Our dayes of themselves can give us no more satisfaction, no better a breakfast, then a dream of meat and drink doth to a hungry or a thirsty man. All creatures are not able to fill one. There's a satisfaction which comes to us through the creature, but the creature doth not satisfie;

God can make any thing satisfie, the least of all his creatures shall fill the greatest. He can give us as much as we expect from them, that is, look what satisfaction a man would have from a creature, that God can give when he pleaseth; but the dayes of man are vanity in this, because we cannot take this satisfaction our selves from the creature, neither is any creature able to give it us. When creatures have done their best, we are hungry and restless still, empty and unsatisfied still. There is no rest till we return to God, or till God turn his face to us.

Fourthly, The vanity of our dayes appears in this, that they are deceivable dayes; that's very vain to us, which deceives us. And in this the great vanity of the creature consists; it promiseth much, and performeth nothing. Great promises are made, and hopes are raised very high; riches will tell us what they will do for us; and honours will tell us what they will do for us, and how happy they will make us; and the wine will tell us, O that will refresh us; and the sweet and fat will tell us how they will fatten us. All these make golden promises, but leaden performances. They cannot make good what they promise, unless they can with evil. As Satan said to Christ, when he had not so much as a shooe-latchet to dispose of, All this will I give thee; so the creature joyning with our hearts, makes wonderful promises of high content, and then leaves us most discontented; This is vanity and vexation of mans spirit. If the creature were not so free to enter bond and give us security for the payment of that great good, it would not be so ill with us. If the creature would say directly to us, It is not in me, as Job brings in the creatures disclaiming wisdom (chap. 28.) The sea saith, it is not in me; and the earth saith, it is not in me: So if creatures would speak plainly, comfort is not in us, help is not in us, satisfaction is not in us, and so tell us how vain they are, their vanity were less to us, though the same in it self. It is worse to be deceived of good, then to want it.

Surely (saith David of this life) every man walketh in a vain shew, Psal. 39. 6. There is a shew of this, and that, and the other thing, a promise of it, but it is a vain shew; it is but like a Pageant, which feeds the eye, and delights the fancy, or pleases the ear, but passeth away, and leaveth you as empty as before. In the fifth verse of that Psalm, the inventory of mans temporal estate is summed up, and the total amounts but to this, Every man at his best estate is altogether vanity; and lest any should think he had miscounted, an affirmation is prefixt; surely every man at his best estate is altogether vanity: Every man is vanity, and every man is vanity at his best estate; not only in his afflictions and in his losses, in his troubles and in his sorrows, such as Job now was in; but take a man in the height and perfection, and accomplishment of all creature-comforts and accrewments; take the cream, the pith, the marrow, the sweetness of all, extract a quintessence of all that can be had in creatures, all is vanity. Man at his best estate is vanity, yea, altogether vanity.

When Cain was born, there was much ado about his birth; I have got a man-child from God, saith his Mother; she looked upon him as a great possession, and therefore called his name Cain, which signifies a possession; but the second man that was born into the world, bare the title of the world, vanity; his name was Abel, which is the word here used: They called his name Abel, that is, vanity; a premonition was given in the name of the second man, what would or should be the condition of all men, Psal. 144. 4. There is an allusion unto those two names; we translate it, Man is like to vanity; the Hebrew is, Adam is as Abel; Adam (you know) was the name of the first man, the name of Abel's father; but as Adam was the proper name of the first, so it is an appellative, or common to all men; now Adam, that is, man, or all men, are Abel, vain, and walking in a vain shadow.

Abel vivetium omnium typus & representatio. Pined.

Tempus & aetas ejus dies. Pined.

And this word is by some translated nothing; his dayes are nothing; Idols are nothing; time is but the Idol of eternity, and things temporal but the Idol of things eternal. This word signifies in the Hebrew, an Idol, and a vain thing, Deut. 32. 31. Jer. 2. 5. The word Abel is translated Idol; and the Apostle (1 Cor. 8. 4.) tells us, that an Idol is nothing in the world, that is, an Idol is the vainest thing in the world, or the greatest vanity; so that upon the matter, our estate and our dayes here, are but an Idol, that is, the representation of a thing which is not; so much vanity and folly, so much trouble and sorrow, so much affliction is mixed with the dayes and life we now lead, as a nothing is all it can justly be called, or an Idol, a shew of what is not.

And therefore we may well make it an argument (as Job here) to take us off from the world, and to chide worldlings with, as David did (Psal. 4.) O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity! or as Solomon, about that adored Idol of the world, riches (Prov. 23. 5.) Wilt thou set thine eyes (or as the original) wilt thou cause thine eyes to flie upon that which is not. An Eagle will not catch flies (that's no game for her) much less will she make a flight at nothing, when there is no game sprung at all. And wilt thou make a flight with thy heart (for the eye, which Solomon chiefly intends, is the eye of the soul) when nothing springs before thee, but that which is not?

To close this point, if the creature be so vain, and the dayes of man be vanity, let us set our eyes and hearts upon that which is somethiug, upon that which is all, upon that which is lasting, upon that which is everlasting, upon that which is true, upon that which is truth, upon that which will not deceive, upon that which cannot deceive, upon that which will be more in fruition then ever it was in expectation.

The excellency of that estate we have in spirituals, consists in this, that as it promiseth much, so it performeth much, and rather more then it promiseth; a believer finds himself satisfied in Christ beyond expectation; the soul did not expect so much as it finds: As the Queen of Sheba coming to Solomon, had satisfaction beyond report and promise, so shall all who come to Christ; he makes us large promises and if we believe, we shall find larger performances: We shall at last say, that the half of those good things which we now enjoy, were not told us in the promises. God hath laid up all good in his word, but our thoughts are not able to take out the extent of those good things: Hence it is said, that when Christ appears, He shall come to be admired in his Saints; things shall be so far beyond their apprehension, that they shall be all in admiration.

VERS. 17, 18, 19.

What is man, that thou shouldst magnifie him? and that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him?
And that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment?
How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone, till I may swallow down my spittle?

THese three verses contain a farther argument, whereby Job strengthens his complaint. The sum of the argument is taken from a comparison of the Power, Majesty, and greatness of God, with the meanness and misery, with the lowness and poverty of man; What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him, and that thou shouldst set thine heart upon him? Why should the great, the wise, the powerful, the glorious God contend or have to do with weak, miserable, vain man? How unequal is this match?

Paria paribus congaudent.

What is man? The word is, What is miserable man? Enosh, man encompast about with sorrows? What is this sorrowful, miserable man? Job concluded in the former verse, man is vanity. And yet here he questions, What is man?

מה אנוש

The question relisheth of contempt, rather then of ignorance; and carries with it a low estimation of man, let him be what he will; not a want of information what man is: What is man? As we use to say to, or of those we slight, Who are you? or, What is he? It imports the vanity and deficiency of the creature. Or the words are a diminutive admiration; he admires the smalness, the littleness, the meanness, the nothingness of man. Questions in Scripture often abate the sence, Zech. 4. 7. Who art thou, O great mountain? thou lookest very big and very great, but who art thou? tell me who thou art, or I will tell thee, thou art now but a mole-hil, thou shalt be a nothing shortly, Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain; it is a contemptuous undervaluing question against the proud opposers of the Church. Who am I, O Lord, and what is my house (saith David, 2 Sam. 7. 18.) His question extenuates. On the other side, questions often encrease the sence, and raise it to the highest, Ex. 15. 11. Who is a God like unto thee? where is there such a God as thou art? So, Mic. 7. 18. Who is a God like unto thee, pardoning pardoning iniquity, tranſgreſſion and ſin? The queſtion puts the brighteſt glory upon God, in pardoning ſin. Hence man is abaſed in a queſtion, what is man? How low, how poor a creature is he?

Or take the queſtion, barely for a deſire of reſolution; as if this were a piece of a Catechiſm about mans frailty, what is man? He had told us in the words immediately foregoing the Text; that man is vanity, why then doth he enquire in theſe words, what is man? It is not to learn what man is, but to teach us the wonder, that man being ſuch ſhould be thus regarded: As if he had ſaid, Foraſmuch as man is vanity, what is vanity that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie it? Will any one eſteem vanity, and prize a thing of nought? Man is vanity; that's the anſwer to the queſtion.

The Scripture gives many anſwers to this queſtion: Ask the Prophet Iſaiah, what is man? And he anſwers (Chap. 40. 6.) Man is graſs, All fleſh is graß, and the goodlineß thereof as the flower of the field. Ask David, what is man? He anſwers (Pſal. 62. 9.) Man is a lie, not a lyar only, or a deceiver, but a lye and a deceit. All the anſwers the Holy Ghoſt gives concerning man, are to humble man: man is ready to flatter himſelf, and one man to flatter another; but God tells us plainly what we are.

That thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him?] Or make him great? There is a three-fold ſence of that word [magnifie] uſed in Scripture.

First, It implies only a manifeſtation or declaration of anothers greatneſs, or an opening of his intrinſical worth and dignity; in which ſence, man is often ſaid to magnifie God, he declares and publiſhes the infinite, internal worth and dignity of God, Luke 1. 46. the Virgin beginneth her Song thus, My ſoul doth magnifie the Lord. It is impoſſible we ſhould give the leaſt addition to the greatneſs of God: Then magnifying of God, is only a declaring that God is great: So Pſalm 34. 3. O magnifie the Lord with me, that is, let us joyn our hearts and our tongues in this great work, to lift up the honour and Name of our God.

Secondly, To magnifie, is to eſteem or prize greatly: So the Apoſtle ſpeaking of his office, ſhews how highly he priz'd it, by breaking forth into this holy boaſt, Rom. 11. 13. I magnifie mine office. I eſteem this as my greateſt priviledge and honour, that God hath called me to be an Apoſtle: And Act. 5. 19. when the Phariſees were ſo angry with the Apoſtles, and many were afraid to joyn with them, the Text ſaith, the people magnified them, that is, the people had high thoughts of them, and eſteemed them greatly.

But thirdly, (which is chiefly intended in this place) to magnifie, is to make great, or to give ſome real addition of worth and reſpect. Thus the Lord magnifies man, he magnifies him, by adding ſomewhat to him, by giving glory and luſtre to man, who in himſelf is vile, and mean, and contemptible. And thus God magnifies man four wayes.

First, He magnifies man in the work of creation; of that we read, Pſal. 8. 4. where this queſtion is put, What is man that thou ſhouldeſt be mindful of him, or the ſon of man that thou viſiteſt him; The third verſe ſhewes us, what it was which raiſed the Pſalmiſt to this admiration of the goodneſs of God to man; When I behold the Heavens, the work of thy fingers, the Moon and the Stars which thou haſt made? Lord what is man? God in the work of creation, made all theſe things ſerviceable and inſtrumental for the good of man. What is man, that he ſhould have a Sun, a Moon and Stars planted in the Firmament for him; What creature is this? When great preparations are made in any place, much proviſions layed in, and the houſe adorned with richeſt furnitures; We ſay, What is this man that comes to ſuch a houſe? When ſuch a goodly fabrick was raiſed up, the goodly houſe of the world adorned and furniſhed, we have reaſon, admiring to ſay; what is this man that muſt be the tenant or inhabitant of this houſe? There is yet a higher exaltation of man in the creation, man was magnified with the ſtamp of Gods Image; one part whereof the Pſalmiſt deſcribes at verſ. 5. Thou haſt given him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; Thou haſt put all things under his feet, all Sheep and Oxen, yea, and the beaſts of the field, the fowl of the Air, and the fiſh of the Sea, &c. Thus man was magnified in creation. What was man that he ſhould have the rule of the world given him? That he ſhould be Lord over the fiſh of the Sea, and over the beaſts of the Field, and over the fowls of the Air. Again, man was magnified in creation, in that God ſet him in the next degree to the Angels; Thou haſt made him a little lower then the Angels; there is the firſt part of the anſwer to this queſtion, man was magnified in being made ſo excellent a creature, and in having ſo many excellent creatures made for him. All which may be underſtood of man, as created in Gods Image, and Lord of the world; but ſince the tranſgreſſion, it is peculiar to Chriſt, as the Apoſtle applies it (Heb. 2. 6.) and to thoſe who have their blood and dignity reſtored by the work of redemption, which is the next part of mans exaltation.

Secondly, Man is magnified or made great by the work of redemption. That exalts man indeed. Man was laid low, and his honour in the duſt, notwithſtanding all that greatneſs which he received in creation: Though Sun, and Moon, and Stars, the Fiſh of the Sea, and the Fowles of the Air, &c. were made his ſervants, and himſelf a companion of Angels; yet by ſin he fell below all theſe priviledges, and was made a companion for Devils, a Citizen of Hell: Therefore the ſecond magnifying of man, was by the work of redemption. And, what was man that thou ſhouldeſt redeem him, when he was a captive? raiſe him when he was down, build and repair him when he was ruined, when he was loſt ſeek him, and when he was bankrupt and undone, give him a better ſtock and ſet him up again? What was man that thou ſhouldeſt do all this for him? How did the mercy of God magnifie his ſervants, when he gave his Son to pay their debt to his own juſtice? If man was magnified when the Sun, and Moon, and Heavens were made for him; how was he magnified, when God was made man for him? How was he exalted, when the Son of God was humbled for him?

Thirdly, Man is magnified or made great in the work of regeneration, wherein God re-ſtamps his Image upon him, in thoſe ſhining characters of holineſs and knowledge; The firſt creation being ſpoiled, occaſioned redemption, and redemption purchaſed a ſecond creation. Every one that is in Chriſt is a new creature; 2 Cor. 5. 17. Our dignity is far greater in being new creatures then in being creatures.

Laſtly, Man is magnified by thoſe ſeveral acts of favour and grace, which God caſts upon him every day: ſmiling upon him, embracing him in his arms, admitting him to near communion with himſelf, watching over him, tending him, guarding him with Angels, directing him, counſelling him, comforting him, upholding him by his Spirit, till he bring him unto glory, which is the higheſt ſtep of preferment that mans nature is capable of. What is man that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him in all theſe things? Obſerve hence,

First, That, All the worth and dignity of man is out of himſelf.

What is man? As if he had ſaid, man hath nothing of his own, to commend him to or to ingratiate himſelf with God. God hath put ſomething upon him, he hath magnified man, and given him a real worth, becauſe he would. Free-grace exalts man. Hence (Pſal. 90. 20.) the Pſalmiſt prayes, Let the Heathen know themſelves to be but men: As if he had ſaid, man who is high in his own eſteem, conceits himſelf to be ſomewhat above man, he judges of himſelf beyond his own ſphear and border: Therefore Lord bring their thoughts within the compaſs of their own condition, Let them know that they are but men; A man that is acquainted with himſelf, will be humble enough; A mear man is but mear earth. The Prophet tells him ſo thrice over with one breath (Jer. 22. 29.) O Earth, Earth, Earth, hear the word of the Lord. Man is Earth, in the conſtitution of his body, that was framed out of the Earth: he is earthly in the corruption of his mind, that muds in the Earth: The Apoſtles ſtile is, earthly minded men: And he will be Earth in his diſſolution; when he dies he returns to his Earth. A natural man is earth all over; Earth in his making, earthly in his mind, his ſpirit is earthly, Earth gets into his Heaven, his upper regions: and the body, his lower region, ſhall moulder to Earth again: Then, what is man? Hence (I say) it is, that when man at any time would exalt and lift himself up, he thinks himself above man, he hath some notion or apprehension of an excellency, beyond the line of a creature: He conceits he hath or is a piece of a deity. The first ground of hope upon which man raised himself against God, was, that he might be a god; hs was not satisfied in being made like unto God, he would be (which was the highest robbery) Gods equal, and stand by himself: this thought was his fall. There is such a principle of pride in the hearts of all men by nature. They are not contented in the sphear of a creature, they would be somewhat beyond that. The truth is, all the true worth and dignity of man, is in what he hath beyond himself, his excellency is in Christ, and his glory, in being made a partaker of the divine nature. It abased man, when he aspired to take a divine nature to himself, but it exalts man, when God inspires him with a participation of the divine nature. What is man that thou doest thus magnifie him? Christ makes us very great and glorious, by the dignity which he puts upon us: as he tells the Church (*Ezek.*16.14.) Thy beauty was perfect, through my comliness which I had put upon thee; thou hadst no comliness, no beauty of thine own, but thorough my comliness thou art very beautiful. The worth of man is out of himself; the Church shines by those rayes, by that lustre, which Christ casts upon her.

Secondly, Observe from this question, What is man? &c.

Man hath laid himself so low, that he is not worthy of one thought from God.

What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him, and set thy heart upon him? It is a wonder that God should vouchsafe a gracious look upon such a creature as man; it is wonderful considering the distance between God and man, as man is a creature, and God the Creator; What is man, that God should take notice of him? is he not a clod of Earth, a piece of clay? But consider him as a sinful and an unclean creature, and we may wonder to amazement; what is an unclean creature, that God should magnifie him? Will the Lord indeed put value upon filthiness, and fix his approving eye upon an impure thing? One step further, what is rebellious man, man an enemy to God, that God should magnifie him! What admiration can answer this question? Will God prefer his enemies, and magnifie those who would cast him down? Will a Prince exalt a Traytor, or give him honour, who attempts to take away his life? The sinful nature of man, is an enemy to the nature of God, and would pull God out of Heaven; yet God even at that time, is raising man to Heaven; Sin would lessen the great God, and yet God greatens sinful man. Observe,

Thirdly, Though man be low in himself, yet God bestows many thoughts and cares upon him.

Though there be no reason at all in man, why God should magnifie him, yet God doth and will. Free-grace overlooks all the distance that is between God and us, as we are creatures, and it overlooks that greater and vaster distance which is between God and us, as we are sinful creatures. Many a man is ready to think himself so good and so great, that his brother is not worthy one of his thoughts, or a cast of his eye; he thinks it too much to look towards a man, that is of the same make with himself, because he is a little lower statur'd in estate or degree. A great rich man thinks he doth a poor man a very great favour, if he turns about and speaks to him: We may well cry out with admiration, O the pride of man to man! and O the love of God to man! one man hath scarce humility enough to speak to another, who in nature is equal to him, and yet God (who is infinitely above us) hath love enough to magnifie and set his heart upon him.

The language of the Holy Ghost is very gradual about this point.

First, What is man that thou art mindful of him? Or the Son of man that thou visitest him? Phil. 8. 4. To be mindful of a man is not so much as to visit him, we may be mindful of those whom we go not to see, or to whom we send no help.

Secondly, What is man that thou takest any knowledge of him? Or the Son of man that thou makest an account of him? Psal.144.3. It is much that God will take knowledge of a man, or cast an eye upon him; but it is a great deal more, that God will make account of him. But the third and highest step of favour, is this of the Text, that the Lord will magnifie man, and set his heart upon him, as if he could not be without him? Observe, Fourthly, The true apprehension of the greatness of Gods mercy and goodness to us, makes us little in our own eyes.

I ground it thus, when Job had considered how the Lord exalts and greatens man, he then abases and diminishes man; What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him? Nothing should draw man so low in himself, as to think how high God doth, and how much higher, yet God intends to raise him. In the 1 Chron. 17. 16. When David enquired of God by Nathan, whether he should build him an house, God answered no, he should not, but his son after him should; But though the Lord would not have David build him an house, yet the messenger, who was to carry this report, must tell David, That the Lord would build him an house, and establish his sons upon the Throne after him, vers.10,11. Assoon as David had this answer brought him of Gods wonderful goodness toward him, and of those large promises to his family, he breaks out into this diminutive admiration, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? And yet this is a small thing in thine eyes, O God: for thou hast also spoke of thy servants house for a great while to come, and hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God. We hear not of such an humble speech falling from David's lips, till God sent him that message of advancement. And so (2 Sam. 9. 8.) when David out of that abundant love he bare to Jonathan, enquired, Is there any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake? Mephibosheth was found; and when David told him, I will take care for thee, Thou shalt eat bread at my table continually; This favour astonisheth Mephibosheth, what is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am? He spake of himself below man, when he heard David speak so highly of him. A living Dog is better then a dead Lion; but what is worse then a dead Dog? The like impression David's excessive kindness made upon the spirit of Abigail (1 Sam. 25.41.) when he sent messengers to her, after the death of her husband Nabal, to assure her that he would be her husband. This honour (that David anointed King over Israel should desire her to be his Wife) abases Abigail in her own eyes, Let me (saith she) be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my Lord. David's wife! (said she) it is too much preferment for me, to be David's servant; I shall be honoured enough to be his servants servant, and that in the lowest service, to wash their feet. As ingenuous spirits, when they hear messages of great favours tender'd them, fall low in their own thoughts: So much more will gracious spirits. Those magnifying offers of Christ, and pardon of sin by him, of a crown of life, and an exceeding weight of glory purchas'd by him; these magnifying promises (I say) bring the soul upon the knee, upon the meditation and acknowledgment of it's own meanness and vileness; What am I that the Lord should respect me, that the Lord should redeem me, that he should regenerate me, that he should set his love upon me, prepare Heaven and glory, a Crown and a Kingdom for me? What am I? There is nothing doth more empty us of self-conceit and high thoughts, then duly to consider what high thoughts God hath of us.

Note one thing further from these words, What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him?

If God magnifie man, one man should not vilifie and debase another; one man should not contemn and slight another.

Who art thou that contemnest thy brother? Thou canst not (really) magnifie thy brother, and wilt thou debase him? It is a most dangerous attempt to abase those whom God magnifies, to despise those whom God honours. That, on whom God sets his heart against him, man should set his heart, or tongue, or pen. God seeks occasion to magnifie us, though we give him advantages every day to cast dishonour upon us. Let man take heed how he dishonours those thoſe whom the great God now doth, and intends to honour more. When Pharoah magnified Joſeph, he cauſed the people to cry Abrech, that is, bow the knee before him, Geneſ. 41. 43. And when Ahaſuerus intended to advance Mordecai, he commanded him to be arrayed in Royal apparel, &c. and proclamation to be made Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour, Eſther 6. 11. Princes expect that all ſhould favour and honour thoſe whom they honour and make their favourites. Surely then the great God will not bear it, that they ſhould be deſpiſed, whom he delights in, and caſts honour upon.

But here a Queſtion ariſes, How this is appliable unto Job? Why doth Job, who lay upon a dung-hill, and was caſt into ſo low a condition, ſpeak of magnifying? Was Job magnified? Doth Job wonder at his preferment and exaltation, when he was brought down to the duſt? Poor Job! Thou waſt almoſt nullified, and made no body, and doſt thou ſpeak, as if thy honour were too big for thee, What is man that thou ſhouldſt magnifie him? We may anſwer.

First, By connecting this word [Magnifie] with the words that follow; What is man that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him, and that thou ſhouldeſt ſet thine heart upon him? As if he had ſaid, What is man that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him, by ſetting thine heart upon him? And ſo ſetting the heart upon man, is an explication of what is meant by magnifying man. And that is a clear truth; when God ſets his heart upon a man, he magnifies him ſure enough; that act of God is the exaltation of the creature: Man needs no greater honour then this, that God ſets his heart upon him; he that knows that, knows himſelf high enough. Whatſoever man ſet his heart upon, he (as man can) exalts and magnifies it. If a man ſets his heart upon another man, he magnifies that man. Yea if a man ſets his heart upon a beaſt or a ſtone (he in a ſence) deifies that beaſt, that ſtone. If he ſets his heart upon any creature, he makes that creature a god to him: for nothing ſhould have the heart but God alone. And the reaſon is, becauſe ſetting the heart upon any thing is the higheſt exaltation we can give it. Therefore nothing ought to have the heart ſet upon it, but God, for he is Lord over all. And the Lord calls us to ſet our hearts upon him, becauſe that is the higheſt honour creatures can give him. Now as our ſetting our hearts on God magnifies him, ſo the ſetting of his heart on us doth wonderfully magnifie us. And he therefore ſets his heart upon us, that we might at once ſee and admire how much he honours us. If a King ſet his heart upon a man, that man is greatly magnified; he is magnified in the opinion of others, and not only in the bare opinion of others, but there is a real dignity put upon that man, on whom a King puts his heart. How much more if God ſets his heart upon a man, is man really magnified. That God ſets his eye upon a man is a magnifying of him. It was the priviledge of Solomon's Temple, that the Lord promiſed his eye would be upon that place: and it was a high honour to the Temple, that God would look upon it continually, 1 King. 8. 29. If it be a condeſcenſion in God to eye the creature, He humbleth himſelf to behold the things that are in Heaven and in the Earth, Pſal. 113. 6. How great is his condeſcention in ſetting his heart upon the creature. So there is a truth in this ſence, and we may make a comfortable improvement of it, What is man that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him, by ſetting thine heart upon him?

Secondly, Job may have reſpect to his former greatneſs, when God magnified him, and made him the greateſt man in the Eaſt; and is now bemoaning his own change, in the changeableneſs of mans condition; who when he is lifted up to the higheſt, fairly built and adorned, yet in a moment may be caſt down and ruined. Therefore Job comes with his wonder, Lord, what is man! What is the ordinary ſtate of man, that thou ſhouldeſt take care to make him great! As if he had ſaid, why didſt thou magnifie me, to make me the greateſt man in the Eaſt? Why didſt thou ſet thine heart upon me to bleſs my family, and provide for me, as if thou hadſt none elſe to provide for? Thou ſeeſt mans beauty is blaſted in the twinckling of an eye, and then all thy work is loſt. It is not worth the while to do that which may be undone ſo ſoon. Would any one be at coſt to build a houſe, to beſtow a great deal of charge and pains upon it, and it may be ſpend ſome years about the adorning and furniſhing of it; and when all is done, it is ſuch a houſe, that the next breath of wind may level with the ground. What is ſuch a houſe that a man ſhould build it? When man is raiſed up and built, a puff of wind, a blaſt of affliction blows him down, and brings him to the duſt; what is this man that he ſhould be magnified? This is a good ſence of the words; that Job reflecting upon his former greatneſs, and honour, now defaced and overthrown, breaks out into this expoſtulation; what is man? Why ſhould God in his providence lay out ſo much to magnifie and ſet a man up, who may be ſo quickly down, as you ſee I am at this day.

Quorſum in me locupletando tam operam poſuiſti, tam providentiâ oſtendiſti, quare me ad eum ſtatum evexiſti in qua perſiſtere non poteram.

But thirdly, rather take it thus, What is man that thou ſhouldeſt magnifie him? Namely by dealing with him thus in chaſtnings and afflictions by diſciplining and tutoring him with the rods of thy correction.

But you will ſay, Is it a magnifying of a man to afflict a man?

Yes, It is a magnifying of man; man is magnified two wayes by affliction.

First, In that God who is ſo great will deſcend to chaſtiſe and correct, or to order the chaſtiſments and corrections of man. Man is magnified, when God deals or contends with him. That God wraſtles and ſtrives with man, is an honour to man. David (1 Sam. 24. 14.) ſeems to look upon it as too great an honour (though it were a burthenſom one) that Saul, a King, one ſo much above him, would follow and purſue him; Againſt whom is the King of Iſrael come out? Againſt a dead Dog, or againſt a Flea? Alas, I am no match for thee, thou putteſt too much weight upon me, in that thou contendeſt with me. To make great preparations, and to ſend out a great Army and skilful Commanders againſt an enemy, magnifies that enemy, that is, it begets an opinion, that ſurely he is ſome great and potent enemy againſt whom ſuch great preparations are made. In this ſence you may underſtand it, that affliction is a magnifying of a man, becauſe the great God comes forth to battel againſt him, who is but duſt and aſhes, but as a dead Dog, or a Flea The Heathens had ſuch a notion, they looked upon it as no ſmall priviledge for a man to be ſlain by ſome famous great Commander; Comfort thy ſelf in this miſerable death (ſaid one) thou falleſt by the hand of great Æneas, thou art magnified enough in this, that thou haſt ſuch a man as Æneas to fight with thee. And another, To die by the arm of Hercules, a mighty favour and alwayes to be remembred. Some kind of trouble is an honour, as well as a trouble: The magnifying of man, as well as an afflicting of him. Man is ſo far from deſerving any favour from God, that as a creature, he is not worthy a blow, though as a ſinner, he is moſt worthy of death from God.

Indignus ſit quem vel percutias, contemptior ſum quam ut adverſus me manum exa tindas.

Hoc tamen infœlix miſeram ſolabere mortē. Æneï. magni dextrâ cadis, Virg. l. 10. Occumbens, Is nunc Herculis armis. Donum ingens ſemperque tuis memorabile factis. Valer. Flac. l. 3. Argon.

But ſecondly, we may anſwer it, that man is (not only thus notionally, but) really magnified by afflictions, and that two wayes.

First, In this life, the very humbling of the Saints are their exaltations: their afflictions are their glory. There was never any ſo famous for greatneſs, for riches, for honours, as ſome have been for ſufferings. Who is there upon Record throughout the whole book of God? Who is there in any Hiſtory of the world ſo famous for greatneſs and riches and high atchievements, as Job a ſufferer? All the victories of Alexander or Cæſar, yea of Joſhua and David, have not rendred them ſo famous to poſterity, as the conflicts of Job. His afflictions have magnified him more, then all his other greatneſs, or then the greatneſs of other men hath magnified them. If Job had only been the richeſt man in the Eaſt, I believe we ſhould never have had a word of any of his acts, or ſo much as mention of his name in Scripture. That which gave him the honour to have a whole book written of him alone by the pen of the Holy Ghoſt, beſides the often mention of his precious name in other books, is this, that he endured ſo much. That man is magnified really, who is thus afflicted, and comes off holily.

Secondly, Afflictions have an influence upon the life to come. The Apoſtle is expreſs in that, 2 Cor. 4. 17. where he exhorts, not to be troubled with our preſent afflictions, for they work for us a far more exceeding weight of glory. That which works for us an exceeding weight of glory, magnifies us. It is not said any where in Scripture, that a mans honours, or his riches, or his greatness in the world, work for him a far more exceeding weight of glory: There is no such thing ascribed or attributed to outward comforts and priviledges; but our afflictions work for us a far more exceeding weight of glory. Not (as Papists abuse that Scripture) as if afflictions did merit glory; but as the way and course wherein God sets men, and through which he will exalt and lift them up to greatest glory. Glory is the purchase of Christ, and all the heaviest sufferings of the creature are not able to purchase one grain of glory, not the least imaginable weight of glory, much less an exceeding weight of glory; but God brings his people to glory, and makes them (as he did the Lord Christ) in their degree perfect through sufferings. Hence observe,

Duntaxat significatur, quo itinere ad gloriam perveniatur.

That, Afflictions are (if rightly improved) the exaltations and magnifyings of the Saints.

The rod of Discipline in Gods hand, becomes a Scepter of honour in ours. This crosses the common thoughts of the world. The truth is, there is scarce a soul in the world under affliction, but he thinks himself abased by it, and saith, that God hath laid him low. Yet the right use and improvement of affliction is the best preferment. The Apostle, James 1. is express, Let the brother of low degree rejoyce in that he is exalted. The low have an exaltation; yea, their lowness is their exaltation; yet, we are ready to have undervaluing thoughts of our selves, when the hand of God is upon us; when God takes away that for which men set a price upon themselves, they scarce think themselves worth any thing. But this especially reaches that sinful contempt of others, a man afflicted is esteemed by most as a man abased. They who have prized a man, and had great thoughts of him, when he had a great estate, &c. let him once fall in temporals, though he continue the same in spirituals, yea though he encreases in them, and his Grace shines as much or more then ever, yet he is disesteemed and laid low in their thoughts. So much for those words, what it is to magnifie, and likewise how they may have a sutableness with Job's condition, he being so afflicted and emptied when he spake them.

And that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him.

To set the heart, notes four things in Scripture.

First, Great care and intention of spirit, Prov. 27. 23. Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and look well to thy herds; the Hebrew is, set thy heart upon thy herds: The heart is set upon the herds in providing and taking care of them, in looking to the welfare of the herds and of the flocks, Samuel uses that language to Saul (1 Sam. 9. 20.) when he came seeking his fathers Asses; As for the Asses (saith he) set not thine heart upon them, that is, take no care for them, never trouble thy self more about that business, that care is over, they are found. In this sence God sets his heart upon man; What is man that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him? that is, that thou shouldest take so much care of him, and watch over him: As the Lord speaks of his Vineyard (Isa. 27. 3.) I the Lord will keep it, lest any hurt it; I will keep it night and day: He set his heart upon the vineyard to watch it, lest any should, touching, hurt it. God in this sence takes so much care for man, that he seemeth (as it were) careless of all other creatures, 1 Cor. 9. 9. Doth God take care for Oxen? God doth take care for Oxen: The Apostle having shewed the goodness of God to beasts, providing by a Law, that they should not be muzled, presently he questions, Doth God take care for Oxen? As if he had said, surely there is somewhat more in it; or saith he it altogether for our sakes? Not altogether, doubtless God had regard to Oxen; But for our sakes no doubt it was written, that is, chiefly for our sakes, That he which ploweth, should plow in hope, and he that threshеth in hope, should be partaker of his hope. So when Christ speaketh of the Lilies, Mat. 6. If God so cloath the Lilies of the field, how much more will he cloath you? You shall have the strength of his care to provide for you, to feed and cloath you. Thus God sets his heart upon man, he looks to his people as to his houshold, to his charge; he will see they shall have all things needful for them. And so not laying to heart (which is the contrary) signifies carelesness, Isa. 47. 7. It is reported of Babylon, Thou saidst I shall be a Lady for ever, so that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart, that is, thou didst not regard these things, to take care about them. And, Ezek. 40. 4. The expression is very full, where God calls the Prophet to attention, and he calleth him all over; Behold (saith he) with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart on all that I shall shew thee: He awakens the whole man; see, and see with thine eyes; hear, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon it; the sum of all is, be thou very intentive and diligent about this business to the utmost.

Secondly, To set the heart, notes an act of the affections and desires. A man sets his love upon what he sets his heart; that is the meaning of Psal. 62. 10. If riches encrease, set not your heart upon them, that is, let not your love, your affections, your desires close with these things: when riches abound, let not your desires abound too. It is an admirable frame of heart to have narrow, scant affections in a large plentiful estate. He is the true rich man, who loves his riches poorly. Set your affections on things that are above, Col. 3. 2.

Thirdly, To set the heart, notes high esteem and account, this is more then bare love and affection, 2 Sam. 18. 3. When a Council of war was held by David's Commanders, about going out to battel against Absalom, they all vote against David's personal undertaking, upon this ground, They will not care for us, they will not set their hearts upon us, or value us, their hearts are set upon thee, thou art the prize they look for, and therefore the heat of the battel will be against thee. Again, 1 Sam. 4. 20. When the wife of Phineas was delivered of a son (a son is the womans joy and glory, yet) the text saith, when the women that stood by, told her that a son was born, she answered not, neither did she regard it, she did not set her heart upon it, because the glory was departed from Israel.

In either of these sences, the Lord sets his heart upon man, he greatly loves man; the love of God to man, is the spring of mercy to man; yea, love is the spring of love, love acted, springs from a decree of love (Deut. 7. 7.) The Lord thy God did not set his love upon you, &c, because ye were more in number then any other people, but because the Lord loved you. Love also led in that highest work of mercy, the giving of Christ: So God loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, John 3. 16. As love is the spring and root of all the real duty which man performs to God, and is therefore called the fulfilling of the Law, our love fulfilleth the will of God; so the love of God is the root of all that good we receive; his love fulfilleth our will, that is, whatsoever we will or ask according to the will of God, the love of God fulfils it for us. Our love fulfils the law of Gods command, and Gods love fulfils the law of our wants and lawful desires. His heart is set upon us, and then his hand is open to us.

Further, God doth not only love man, but his love is great, and his esteem of man very high; and he realizes the greatest love by bestowing the greatest mercy: How did God set his heart upon us, when he gave his Son, who lay in his bosom, for us? He set his bosom upon us when he gave us his Son, who came out of his bosom.

Hence let us see our duty. Should not we set out hearts upon God, when God sets his heart upon us? The Soveraignty of God calls for our hearts; he, as Lord, may use all that we have or are: And there is more then a law of Soveraignty why we should give God our hearts; God hath given us his heart first: he who calleth for our hearts, hath first given us his. What are our hearts to his heart? The love of God infinitely exceeds the love and affection of the creature. What were it to God if he had none of our hearts? But wo to us, if we had not the heart of God. This phrase shews us the reason why God calls for our hearts; he gives us his own; it is but equal among men, to love where we are loved, to give a heart, where we have received one; how much more should we love God, and give him our hearts, when we hear he loves us and sets his heart upon us, whose love and heart alone is infinitely better then all the loves and hearts of all men and Angels?

There is yet a fourth consideration about this expression, the setting of the heart. Setting the heart is applied to the anger and displeasure of God; so the phrase is used (Job 34. 14.) If he set his heart upon man, all flesh shall perish together; that is, if God be resoved to chastise man, to bring judgjudgments upon him, all flesh shall perish together; none shall be able to oppose it. As it is the highest favour to have God set his heart upon us in mercy and love, so it is the highest judgment to have God set his heart upon a man in anger and in wrath, to set his heart to afflict and punish. The Lord answers his own people, Jer. 15. 1, 2, 3. that notwithstanding all the prayers and motions of his beloved favourites in their behalf, his heart could not be towards them. Then his heart was strongly set against them, or upon them in extream anger; therefore he concludes, they that are for the sword, to the sword, and they that are for destruction, to destruction, &c. If God set his heart to afflict; he will afflict, and he can do it. And there may be such a sence of the text here. What is man that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him? that thou shouldst come so resolved to contest and contend with man who is but dust and ashes? The words following (though I adhere rather to the former interpetation) carry somewhat toward it.

Verse 18. That thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment?

Here are two acts more about which the question is put. What is man that thou shouldest visit him every morning? And, what is man that thou shouldst try him every moment?

That thou shouldest visit him every morning?

פקד Visitavit in bonum & in malum.

To visit, is taken three wayes, and they may all be applied to this text.

To visit, is first, to afflict, to chasten, yea, to punish; the highest judgments in Scripture come under the notion of visitations, Exod. 34. 7. Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, that is, punishing them. And in the Prophets, Jer. 5. 9. Shall not I visit for this? shall not my soul be avenged on such a Nation as this? Jer. 48. 44. When God came against Moab with those terrible judgments, it is called the year of their visitation: I will bring upon it, even upon Moab, the year of their visitation. And it is a common speech with us, when a house hath the Plague, which is one of the highest stroaks of temporal affliction, we use to say, Such a house is visited. Hence observe, Afflictions are Visitations.

They are called so, because then God comes to search our hearts and lives; Afflictions are Gods searchers and examiners. Jerusalem is threatned to be searcht with candles, and that was the time of Jerusalems visitation. To search with a candle, notes the most accurate searching; as the woman when she had lost her groat, lighted a candle, and sought diligently till she found it; she visited every hole to find it out. When you see the Lord afflicting, then he is visiting; he lights a candle to search every corner of your lives.

And if afflictions be Gods visitations, it is time for man to visit himself when he is afflicted. We should visit our souls when God visits our bodies, our estates, our families, or the Kingdom where we live. Wo to those who do not visit themselves when God visits them. The Prophet calls to this duty in a time of saddest visitation, Let us search and try our wayes, Lam. 3.

Yet further, if God in affliction visit us, let us visit God; let us answer his visitation of us with our visitation of him. Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, they powred out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them, Isa. 26. 16. Would you know what the visiting of God is? It is praying unto him; They visited thee, they powred out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them. We visit heaven in our afflictions, when we pray much in our afflictions. When God visiteth us, let us visit him, and never give over visiting him, till he remove his visitation from us, or sanctifie it to us. That's the first sense.

Secondly, To visit, in a good sence, signifies to shew mercy, and to refresh, to deliver, and to bless, Ruth. 1. 6. Naomi heard how the Lord had visited his people, and given them bread. Gen. 21. 2. The Lord visited Sarah, and she conceived, &c. Exod. 3. 16. The Lord hath surely visited his people, when they were upon dawnings of deliverance out of Egypt: That greatest mercy and deliverance that ever the children of men had, is thus expressed, Luke 1. 68. The Lord hath visited and redeemed his people. Mercies are visitations, when God comes in kindness and love to do us good, he visiteth us. And these mercies are called visitations in two respects.

First, Because God comes near to us when he doth us good: Mercy is a drawing near to a soul, a drawing near to a place. As when God sends a judgment, or afflicts, he is said to depart and go away from that place; so when he doth us good, he comes near, and as it were applies himself in favour to our persons and habitations.

Secondly, They are called a visitation because of the freeness of them. A visit is one of the freest things in the world. There is no obligation but that of love, to make a visit; because such a man is my friend, and I love him, therefore I visit him. Hence, I say, that greatest act of free grace in redeeming the world, is called a visitation, because it was as freely done as ever any friend made a visit to see his friend, and with infinite more freedom; there was no obligation on mans side at all, many unkindnesses and neglects there were. God in love came to redeem man.

Idiotismus est, elegans apud Hebræos pro eo quod est diligentissimè & exactissimè rem investigare. Bold.

Thirdly, To visit, imports an act of care and inspection, of tutorage and direction. The Pastors office over the flock, is expressed by this act, Zech. 10. 3. Acts 15. 36. And the care we ought to have of the fatherless and widows, is expreſt by visiting of them. Pure Religion (saith the Apostle James) is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction Jam. 1. 27. & Mat. 25. 34. Christ pronounceth the blessing on them who, when he was in prison, visited him; which was not a bare seeing, or asking how do you; but it was care of Christ in his imprisonment, and helpfulness and provision for him in his afflicted members. That sence also agrees well with this place, What is man that thou shouldest visit him? that is, that thou shouldst take care, have such an inspection over him, look so narrowly to, and provide for him? That thou shouldst visit him every morning?

Every morning.] The Hebrew is, in the mornings. And the word here used for morning is considerable: There is a twofold morning, which the Jews distinguished exactly by their watch. One morning was that which they accounted from an hour before Sun-rising, from the very first breaking of the day, till the sun appeared above the Horizon, which is about the space of an hour. And the word which they use for it is Shachar, which signifies to be darkish or blackish, because that first morning is somewhat dark; and so the Latine word (diluculum) which is for the first morning, is by the Criticks called a little of the day; but their other morning was the space of an hour after Sun-rising, and the root of that word signifies to seek or enquire, to enquire diligently. And the reason why they expres the second morning so, is, because when the Sun is up, we may seek and search about our business, or go on in our callings and affairs. The height of the day they call the body or strength, we, the heat of the day; either morning may be here meant, though the word bears the latter properly: Thou dost visit him every morning, that is, as soon as the Sun is up, yea, as soon as day breaks, or there is any light, thou art visiting. Mans visits are usually in the afternoon; it is an extraordinary thing to visit one in the forenoon, more extraordinary to visit in a morning, and most, early in the morning. Gods visits are extraordinary visits. they are visitings in the morning, and visitings every morning, as often as the morning returns, so often doth God come to visit; not a morning that we miss him.

Reliquum diei tempus, quasi ob majorem lucis intensionem vocant. עצם חיום Ghetsem Hajom, i. e. corpus, robur diei. Bold.

To do a thing every morning, notes, first, the doing of it alwayes; or secondly, the certain doing of it; Thou dost visit every morning, that is, as surely and as certain as the Sun riseth, and the morning cometh, so certainly doth God visit man. Or thirdly, it notes the speed the haste that God makes to visit; he visits in the morning, that is, betimes, God delayes not until noon, much less stayes till it be night; but he cometh in the morning, Psal. 46. 5. God shall hear her, and that right early; the Hebrew is, God shall hear her in the morning, betimes, speedily. The late coming in to work in the vineyard, is expreſt by coming at the eleventh hour, they came speedily, who came in the morning, at the first hour. And to shew that we ought not to continue in wrath, and keep up our anger, it is said, let not the sun go down upon your wrath, that is, do not continue all day angry, let your anger go down speedily, even before the Sun.

Hoc ad conservationem & generalē providentiā pertinet. Metaphora à pastoribus singulis matutinis oves suas recensentibus. Coc.

In this sence, Job saith, that God visits man every morning, as a shepherd his flock, lest any should be hurt or straid, we may apply it, as before in the several sences of visitation, either to Gods visiting of us in afflictions, or in mercies, he afflicts (if he pleases) continually, speedily, certainly. And as sure as the Sun riseth, and the morning cometh, so sure God visiteth his with mercies; therefore his mercies are said to be renewed every morning, Lam. 3. 23. or fresh every morning. Unless God bring new mercies every day, the old would not serve: we cannot bring the mercies of one day over to another. The mercies of a former day will not support us the next, therefore they must come every morning; sufficient for the day, is the evil thereof, Matth. 6. and, but sufficient for the day, is the good thereof. As we are therefore commanded to pray every day for our dayly bread: the bread you had the last day, will not serve this day, you must pray for the bread of this day, and for a blessing upon it, that God would visit your bread, and your store in mercy. So if need require, God afflicts every day: And the hearts of some men want as much the rod every day, as bread every day; they could not be without affliction every day, to keep them in order, and God will be as careful to correct his children, as to feed them. If a man be watchful over his own wayes, and the dealings of God with him, there is seldom a day, but he may find some rod of affliction upon him: But, as through want of care and watchfulness, we lose the sight of many mercies, so we do of many afflictions. Though God doth not every day bring a man to his bed, and break his bones, yet we seldom, if at all, pass a day without some rebuke and chastning, Psal. 73. 14. I have been chastned every morning, saith the Psalmist: Our lives are full of afflictions; and it is as great a part of a Christians skill to know afflictions, as to know mercies; to know when God smites, as to know when he girds us; and it is our sin to overlook afflictions, as well as to overlook mercies.

Secondly, Take the word as it imports care and inspection: Then Observe,

The care of God is renewed every morning.

The eye of God is alway upon us: He visiteth so as he telleth all our steps, he tells our very wandrings: he visiteth us so, that we can turn no way but he is with us; his eye of inspection, as a Tutor, as a guide, is ever upon us; he looks to his people as a shepherd to his flock, who knows their wandrings.

And try him every Moment.

בחן Periculum fecit, experitus est, tentavit. αὐτὸν κρινεῖ. Sept.

It is of the same sence with the former. [Try him.] The word signifies an exact and thorough trial: Some take it to be an allusion to the practise of those who set the watch in Armies or Garison Towns; who lest their Centinels or Watchmen should sleep, use to come suddenly upon them (possibly) divers times in a night, to try whether they are faithful and wakeful; The Prophet Isaiah hints at such a custom (Chap. 21.) The watchman is set, v. 6. Go set a watchman, let him declare what he seeth: The watchman is tryed, v. 11. He calleth to me out of Seir, watchman what of the night? Watchman what of the night? And it is observed in Forraign parts, that their watchmen in Frontier Towns are tryed every hour of the night, the token being, their giving so many tolls with the Bell hanging in their Watch-tower, as the great City-clock strikes. This is a good sence of the place, the Lord visits us every morning, and tryes us every moment, that is, very, very often, as often as may be, to see whether we keep our watches, and stand duly upon our guard.

But secondly, It may note a trial, as a Schollar is tried, by examination: We call it Probation day, when the proficiency of Schollars is examined; God cometh to examine and make probation of mens proficiency; what have you gotten? How have you improved such times, such opportunities for the gaining of spiritual knowledge? What have you learned, what know you more of your selves? What more of God and Jesus Christ, whom to know is eternal life?

1. κρίμα. 2. πειρασ. 3. πάθημα.

Thirdly, It may note tryal by affliction: There are three words which signifie the troubles which God brings upon man: They are, First, strictly, Judgments which he sends in wrath upon enemies: Secondly, Chastisements, and corrections: Thirdly, Temptations or tryals: these are proper to his children. Hence Observe, Afflictions are tryals.

The Lord proves what grace there is in the heart, and he tries what corruption there is in the heart by affliction. There are many graces in the heart of man untried, and there are some that cannot be tried, till God bring him to an hour of trouble. There are many corruptions in the heart of man which he takes no notice of, nor can till he is afflicted; many a good soul would not believe that he had such an unbelieving heart, such a proud heart, till God tried him and then corruption discovered it self. The reason why God brought his people such away about in the wilderness, was (Deut. 8. 2.) to prove them, to try them, to know what was in their heart. God knows what is in the heart of man intuitively, and he needs not go about; he can go the neerest way into every mans heart; he proves it only to make it known to others, and to make a man know himself. They could not think their hearts were so rebellious, so full of murmuring and unbelief, if God had not taken them about to prove and try them those forty years.

Prosperity and comforts are trials too: whatsoever God doth with a man, he some way or other tries him. Look not only upon your afflictions as trials, your mercies also are trials: God gives you them to see what you will do with them; he gives riches, and honour, and credit, to see how men will use and improve them: as by afflictions, so by outward comforts he tries both what grace and what corruption is in our hearts. He gives comforts, to see how we can live upon God in Christ, when we have the creature: and that we may shew how much we make of him, without whom we cannot live, when we have all things besides him. Prosperity tries corruption, then pride and creature-confidence break forth, which before were undiscerned: We say, Magistracy shews a man, nature when it is exalted shews it self, as much as when it is vext.

He trieth every moment.] A moment is the least part and division of time: To try every moment, is to try not only frequently, but continually: Hence Observe,

The temper and state of mans heart is so various, that there needs new experiments of him every moment.

Why doth God try us every moment? Because we are one moment in one temper, and the next moment in another: The acting frame of a mans heart this hour, cannot be collected, from the frame it was in an hour before; therefore there is a continual trial. Some things if they be tried once, they are tried for ever; if we try gold, it will ever be as good as we found it, unless we alter it: as we try it to be, so it continues to be. But try the heart of man this day, and come again the next and you may find it in a different condition; to day believing, to morrow unbelieving; to day humble, to morrow proud; to day meek, to morrow passionate; to day lively and enlarged, to morrow dead and straightned; pure gold to day, and to morrow exceeding drossy. As it is with the pulse of a sick man, it varieth every quarter of an hour, therefore the Physitian tries his pulse every time he comes, because his disease alters the state of his body: so it is with the distempered condition of mans spirit, God having tried our pulse, the state of our spirit, by crosses or by mercies this day, next day he tries us too, and the third day he tries us again, and so keeps us in continual trials, because we are in continual variations: That sickness, and disease within us, alters the state and condition of the soul every moment. Our comfort is, that God hath a time wherein he will set our souls up in such a frame, as he shall need to try us, but that once. Having set us up in a frame of glory, he shall not need to try our hearts for us, or to put us to the trial of our selves any more, we shall stand as he sets us up to all eternity.

I must yet come down from the thoughts of this blessed eternity, and shew you Job tired out with his time, and earnestly calling, but for a minutes respite from his pains and sorrows, in the voice of vers. 19.

Vers.

Verſ. 19. How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone, till I may ſwallow down my ſpittle.

In this verſe Job makes application of the two former to himſelf; as if he had ſaid, ſeeing man is a creature ſo weak and unworthy in himſelf, and I am ſuch among the reſt, why doeſt thou viſit me, and try me every moment? How long ſhall it be ere thou depart from me? or, how long wilt thou not look away from me?

The word under another conſtruction, ſignifies to look upon a man with reſpect and complacency. So Geneſ. 4. 5. The Lord had reſpect unto, or he looked graciouſly upon, Abel and his offering. But here to look away, and ſo Iſa. 22. 4. Look away from me, I will weep bitterly. And becauſe they who with-draw their eyes from us, are ready alſo to with-draw their preſence from us, therefore it ſignifies to depart. How long wilt thou not depart from me, &c.

But is this the voice of Job? Is he burthened with the preſence of God? Or doth he think the time long, till God be gone from him? The wicked ſay unto God depart from us, (Chap. 21. 14.) And the Lord threatens this as the ſoreſt judgment againſt his own people, Jerem. 6. 8. Be inſtructed O Jeruſalem, leſt my ſoul depart from thee; And by the Prophet Hoſea (Chap. 9. 12.) Wo alſo unto them, when I depart from them. The promiſe of ſtrongeſt conſolation to the Saints, is this, I will never leave thee, nor forſake thee, Heb. 13. 5. And the very offer of a departure, did ſo afflict Moſes, that he was ready to throw up all. Lord, if thy preſence go not along with us, carry us no further (Exod. 23. 15.) How earneſtly do the ſervants of God deprecate the hiding of his face, how bitterly have they complained upon thoſe hidings: how importunately have they prayed, that he would return, look on them, behold them, cauſe his face to ſhine, and lift up the light of his countenance upon them? And is Job ſo weary of Gods company, that he begs of him to depart? Is this the voice of Job? Will a man that is in darkneſs, bid the Sun go from him? Or will a man that is thirſty, ſay to a fountain, turn away from me?

I anſwer, the Lords preſence may be conſidered two wayes.

Firſt, As his pleaſed comforting preſence.

Secondly, As his angry afflicting preſence. When Job ſaith, How long, wilt thou not depart from me? His meaning is, How long, wilt thou not with-draw thine afflicting hand from me? We may expound it by that of David, Pſal. 39. 10. Remove thy ſtroke away from me, I am conſumed by the blow of thine hand. Hence ſome tranſlate, How long doeſt thou not ſpare me? And another gloſſes, Turn thine anger away from me. Or as himſelf ſpeaks of a third perſon (Chap. 14. 6.) Turn from him, that he may reſt, till he ſhall accompliſh, as a hireling his dayes. This ſence is given us fully in the next clauſe of the verſe.

Uſquequò non parcis mihi. Vulg. Iram aliò converte. Jun.

Nor let me alone, till I may ſwallow down my ſpittle.

Accipienda ſunt hæc de Deo affligente non providente, & curante.

This is not a refuſal of ſupport from God in the way of his providence, by which he upholds every creature: For the truth is, if God ſhould ſo let us alone, we of our ſelves are not able to ſwallow down our ſpittle. We are inſufficient barely of our ſelves, not only for ſpiritual acts, but alſo for natural. We can, not only not pray, and hear, and believe, and repent without the ſtrength of Chriſt, but we cannot go, nor walk, nor eat, nor drink, nor ſpit, nor ſwallow down our ſpittle without an aſſiſtance (ſutable to thoſe acts) from him, for in him we live, and move, and have our being. This letting alone, is like the departing before ſpoken, in the firſt clauſe of the verſe. As we uſe to ſay to a man aſſaulting or ſmiting us, Pray let me alone; Such is Job's meaning, pray give over theſe bitter chaſtenings, leave off to wound or ſmite me any more.

The word ſignifies to looſen or unty that which is bound or ſtraightned, and ſo to deal more gently and tenderly then before. The word is uſed ſometimes in a good ſence, to note, that the Lord keeps cloſe and ſtraight to his people, as being knit and bound to them by the tie and knot of his own love and free-grace (Joſh. 1. 5.) I will never leave thee, or let thee looſe from me. And as it is applied in the negative to the cloſe-keeping of God to us in love; ſo in the affirmative, to our departure from God by unbelief, Prov. 24. 10. If thou fainteſt in the day of adverſity, or art looſned from God, by fear and want of faith, thy ſtrength is ſmall. If thou fainteſt thus in the time of ſtraights and poverty, it argues thou haſt a very ſtraight, narrow, poor ſpirit. That's the elegancy of the original.

Si remiſſus fuiſti in die anguſtiæ, anguſta fortitudo tua. Mont.

When Job deſires to be let alone or looſened, his meaning is, looſen the bonds of my affliction, take me off from the rack of theſe tortures and troubles. As we are girded with ſtrength, ſo alſo we are girded with weakneſs. Job ſpeaks of God in this word (Chap. 12. 21.) He weakneth the ſtrength of the mighty; The Hebrew is, he looſeth the girdle of the ſtrong. The ſame God, who looſeth the girdle of our ſtrength, looſeth the bands of our infirmity: and therefore Job prays, O depart from me, looſen me, let me alone, let me go. Hence Obſerve,

In his preſence there is fulneſs of joy, and at his right hand there are pleaſures for evermore (Pſal. 16.) Yet he can make his preſence to be the fulneſs of ſorrow, and give us pains with his right hand. As he can be to his people like a Sun to warm and comfort them, ſo like a fire to conſume and burn them; as like a ſhield to defend, ſo like a ſword to wound them. The Lord is a Sun and a ſhield (Pſal. 84. 11.) yea, and he is ſometime as a fire, and a ſword, even to thoſe who walk uprightly. The ſinners in Sion are afraid, fearfulneſs hath ſurprized the hypocrites. Who among us ſhall dwell with devouring fire; who among us ſhall dwell with everlaſting burnings: That is, who ſhall be able to bear the diſpleaſed preſence of God, which makes him to ſinners as a devouring fire, Iſa. 33. 14. And thus the Saints in Sion are ſometimes afraid, and fearfulneſs ſurprizes the upright in heart: Even they cry out, how ſhall we dwell with this devouring fire, with this everlaſting burning? They eſpecially who have ſlighted the preſence of God, may quickly feel the burden of it. Not only do they ſo, who ſay formally and in plain terms, depart from us; but they alſo do it in a great meaſure, who do not prize the preſence of God, who do not welcom and entertain him in all his approaches to them. If a friend come to your houſe, and you will not look upon him, or ſpeak to him, you bid him be gone, and your ſilence interprets his non-acceptance with you. Then take heed of neglecting the comfortable and ſanctifying preſence of God, leaſt you fall ſpeedily into his afflicting preſence. The angry preſence of God is never ſo terrible to us, as it is after our undervaluings of his gracious preſence. Note, Secondly, If the preſence of God chaſtening, be ſo grievous, what will his preſence be puniſhing and tormenting.

If afflictions which are but for trial, and are all ſteeped in love, be ſo grievous; what will thoſe terrors be, which are all ſteep'd in pure everlaſting wrath? If his chaſtnings be ſo intollerable to ſome of his deareſt friends, what will his revenges be to all his profeſſed enemies? Wicked men are now burdened with the preſence of God becauſe he is ſo holy; they ſay depart, for we deſire not the knowledge of thy law; but hereafter they ſhall find the preſence of God burdenſom to them, becauſe he is ſo juſt; O how will they cry out, How long, ſhall not thy wrath depart from us! How long wilt thou be angry for ever, and ſhall thy jealouſie burn like fire for evermore? Yes, that it ſhall, They who have ſo often ſaid in their hearts to God, depart from us, ſhall hear his voice ſaying unto them, Depart from me ye curſed, &c. Ye who have not loved my preſence, ſhall be baniſhed from it for ever. Obſerve, Thirdly, Troubleſom times are very tedious times to us.

How long? The Pſalmiſt under ſome hidings and eccliples of divine favour, thought himſelf in an everlaſting night, Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious, &c. Will the Lord caſt off for ever? Pſal. 77. 8. Obſerve from the latter branch, Fourthly, That afflictions are bonds.

First, They ſhould bind and hold us faſt from ſin, and to our good behaviour. It is better to be bound faſt with the cords of affliction, then to be looſe and at liberty in the wayes of ſin.

Secondly,

Secondly, They will bind us from taking in our worldly comforts; and sometimes they do (which they ought not) bind us from taking in spiritual comforts. Observe,

Fifthly, That man cannot rescue himself out of the bands of affliction, till God please to loosen him.

If he bind none can unty; if he imprison, none can set free; we cannot break his bands, nor cast away the cords of his afflictions from us. He opens and no man shuts, he shuts and no man opens, Revel. 3. 7. Be ye not mockers, saith the Prophet, lest your bands be made strong (Isa. 28. 22.) that is, stronger then they were. So I may say, be ye not strivers or struglers with God, for your bands are made strong. It is said, Exod. 4. 25, 26. That the Lord met Moses in the Inn, and sought to kill him. The Lord is never to seek to do what he pleases; but thus he speaks after the manner of men, who offer or assay at any business, They seek to do it. But Zipporah having circumcised her son, He let Moses go. It is this word, He slacked or loosened, having before as it were arrested and attached him, or clapt him in prison for making that great default, the neglect of circumcision.

Sometimes we find the Lord himself speaking, as if he were at the mercy or under the power of man, and therefore calling (in this word) to be loosened or let alone, Deut. 9. 14. Let me alone that I may destroy them. The prayer of faith is as a band upon Gods hand, holding him so fast, that he seems as one that cannot strike or destroy, till a Moses will give him leave by ceasing to pray unto him. To be sure we are at Gods mercy, and under his power so, that nothing but the prayer of faith can loosen us. And therefore Job doth not attempt to break the cords, or cut them asunder, nor seeks he to unty their knots, but desires God himself to do it, let me alone, loosen me: I will be a prisoner, till thou openest the door for my deliverance.

As Jephtah's daughter said to him (Judg. 11. 37.) when he had bound himself and her in the bands of a rash vow, Let me alone for two months, or loosen me from the engagement of my vow for two moneths, as if she had said, I will not loosen my self by a wilful refusal, but do thou give me a willing dispensation. So a godly man bespeaks the Lord in his streights, Loosen me Lord. Unless God be pleased to loosen him, he will be contented, and (when in a good frame of heart, and freeness of spirit) well-pleased with his bands. In some sence he speaks, as Paul and Silas, when they were in prison (Act. 16. 37.) Let the Lord himself come and fetch us out. That is, let us see such means of our enlargement and freedom from trouble, as may assure us that the Lord hath loosened and enlarged us. A godly man had a thousand times rather be put into a prison by God, then put himself into a paradise. He had rather be bound by Gods hand, then loosened by his own. That place touch'd before, may reach this sence (Prov. 24. 10.) if thou faintest (so we) or loosnest thy self in the day of adversity, Thy strength is small; that is, the strength of thy faith and patience is small. There is nothing discovers our weakness more then striving to break the cords of our afflictions. The stronger we are in faith, in love, in humility, the more quietly we lie bound. Faith seeks ease and release only in God: to say Lord loosen me is a duty, to loosen our selves is both our sin and our punishment.

Till I may swallow down my spittle.

רק Saliva, undè quidã deducunt Raca, Mat. 5. 22. quod κατάπτυστον interpretantur, i. e. conspuendũ vel dignum qui conspuatur. Alii à ריק vacuus quasi cerebro vacuus & judicio carens. Drus.

Some conceive, that from this Hebrew word (Rak) which we translate spittle, Raca is derived (Matth. 5. 22.) as if to call a man Raca, were as much as to say, he is worthy to be spit upon, or that one should spit in his face: though others spring that word from Rik, which signifies empty, as if it were as much to call a man an empty fellow, without wit or brains, or within one degree of a fool, which is the next word in Matthew.

But what is Job's intendment, in desiring God to let him alone, Till he might swallow down his spittle.

First, Some refer it to a bodily distemper, as if Job were troubled with a * squinsie or sore throat, which hindered the swallowing of his spittle.

* Inter cætera mala Synanchen habuisse se perhibet. Hieron.

Another takes it in a Philosophical notion; as if Job had said, Lord let me have some ease, that I may at least taste once more, what it is to live or how sweet life is. For that sence of taste works by the salival humor or spittle in the mouth, which mixing with the juyce or sap that is in meats, affects and delights the pallate. Dimittet me, ut gustum aliquem hujus vitæ capiam. Alber.

Thirdly, These words are taken as the description of a man ready to die, who is disabl'd either to swallow his spittle or to void it. As if he had said, I am now even at the point of death, let me alone a little; David's Prayer comes near this sence, Psal. 39. 13. O spare me that I may recover strength, before I go hence and be no more.

Fourthly, It may be taken proverbially, and that two wayes.

First, To note the shortest time, even so much as may serve a man to spit. As if he had said, O let me have a little intermission, a little respite; such is the sence of that phrase, Chap. 9. 18. He will not suffer me to take my breath. And the like are those used in some Countries, I have not leisure or time to scratch my ear, or to pare my nails, My sorrows know no interim: my feaver is one continued fit, I have no well dayes, no nor a good hour; therefore let me at least have so much time of ease, as I may swallow my spittle, let me have the shortest time, that I may once more know (though but for a moment) what it is to be without pain. To which interpretation that also subscribes, which makes these words to be a circumlocution for silence. For while a man is swallowing his spittle, his speech stops: he cannot bring up his words, and let down his spittle at the same time; so his meaning is, I am forced to complain continually, I would be silent and forbear speaking, but my grief will not suffer me. Sermo proverbialis talis est, neq; ad sculpendas aures mihi otium est. Ne tantillũ quidem temporis est quo non tenter à te. Con.

The second Proverbial understanding of the words, is that they import a very strict watch held upon another in all his motions: so that he cannot stir a finger, or move his tongue (silently) in his mouth un-observed. If I do but stir my tongue, to swallow my spittle (which is one of the most unperceivable acts of man) thou takest notice. O do not hold so strict a hand, and so curious an eye upon me. Let me have a little liberty, do not examine every failing, do not question me upon the least infirmity. Elegans proverbialis loquutio ad denotandum diligentem in alium intuitum quo minimas in alio discernet actiones. Saliva fere imperceptibiliter absorbetur.

From the former Proverbial exposition. Observe,

First, Afflictions are continued upon some without any intermission.

Job had not so much whole skin, as one might set a pin on, nor so much whole time, as a man might spit in. Every hour brought a wound with it, and the renewing of every moment, renewed his affliction. Observe,

Secondly, A short refreshing may be a great mercy.

Dives in Hell desires not a large draught, but a drop of water, which alas! could not have eased him so long, as a man is swallowing down his spittle. The eternity of pain in Hell shall not find so much abatement, as that either in time or in degree. Every affliction in this life, by how much it is with less intermission, by so much the more like it is to Hell; and every comfort by how much the more it is unbroken, and without stops, by so much it is the more like to Heaven. Consider then your mercies, who have un-interrupted mercies, dayes and years of ease, and not pained so long as a man is swallowing down his spittle: your mercies are like the glory and the joy of Heaven.

From the latter Proverbial exposition. Note,

That God observes the least, the most secret motions of man.

He tels our steps our wandrings; and those not only corporal, but moral and spiritual. He knows how many steps our hearts fetch every day, and how far they travel, Thou hast searched and known me (saith David, Psal. 139. 1, 2.) and this search is not made in the out-rooms only, but in the inner parlor and closest closets, Thou understandest my thoughts, and those (not only present, or produced, but to come and unborn) thou knowest them a far off. What can scape that eye, which a thought cannot? And he that sees man swallowing down his spittle, how shall not he both hear and see him, coughing up and spitting out the rottenness and corruption, the filth and flegme of his sinful heart?

VERS.

VERS. 20, 21.

I have ſinned, what ſhall I do unto thee, O thou preſerver of men! why haſt thou ſet me as a mark againſt thee, ſo that I am a burden to my ſelf?

And why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſion, and take away mine iniquity? for now ſhall I ſleep in the duſt, and thou ſhalt ſeek me in the morning, but I ſhall not be.

JOB having in the former part of this Chapter conteſted with his friends, and expoſtulated the matter with God; now turns himſelf into another poſture, even to humble his ſoul, and make confeſſion of his ſin. He had juſtified himſelf againſt the accuſations of men, but now he accuſes and judges himſelf in the preſence of God; He will a while forget his ſorrows, and bethink himſelf of his ſins, I have ſinned, what ſhall I do unto thee, O thou preſerver of men!

The words may be taken two wayes.

1. As a Confeſſion or a Prayer.
2. As a Conceſſion or a Grant.

I ſhall firſt open them under the notion of a repenting prayer and confeſſion of ſin.

I have ſinned. As if he had ſaid, Lord, if thou holdeſt me thus long upon the rack of this affliction, to gain a confeſſion of me, to make me confeſs, here I am ready to do it, I do it; I have ſinned.

חטא Significat errare, aberrare, declinare, deflectere à via vel ſcopo.

The word ſignifies to miſs the mark we aim at, or the way wherein we would walk. And ſo it is put ſtrictly for ſins of infirmity, when the purpoſe of a mans heart is (like the Archers, when he draws his Bow) to hit the white, or (like the honeſt travellers in his journey) to keep the right way, and yet he miſcarries, and is drawn aſide.

I have ſinned. But is this a ſufficient confeſſion? What! to ſay only in general, I have ſinned. Did not hard-hearted Pharaoh (Exod. 9. 25.) falſe-hearted Saul (1 Sam. 15. 24.) and traitor-Judas (Mat. 27. 4.) make as good a confeſſion as this. Every one of theſe ſaid I have ſinned; and what doth Job ſay more? It is ſurely no great coſt nor pain to ſinful nature, to bring up ſuch a confeſſion as this.

I anſwer, Firſt, A general confeſſion may be a ſound confeſſion: It is one thing not to expreſs particular ſins with the circumſtances of thoſe ſins, and another thing purpoſely to conceal them. I grant, Implicit confeſſion may be as dangerous as implicit faith. And to dig in the earth, and hide our ſins in the Napkin of our excuſes, is worſe then to hide our talents in the Napkin of our idleneſs: And as it is moſt dangerous knowingly to conceal ſin from God, ſo it is very dangerous to do it through ignorance and inadvertency; ſome confeſs ſin in general terms only, becauſe they know not what their ſins are, or have quite forgot them; as Nebuchadnezzar called the Aſtrologers, and Sorcerers, and Chaldeans, and told them he had dreamed a dream, but he could not tell what it was; for the thing was gone from him, Dan. 2. 5. Some ſuch there are, who can or will only ſay, they have ſinned, they have ſinned; but what, they cannot tell, or they do not remember, Thoſe things are gone from them. That which is written of the learned Bellarmine, a great Cardinal, and a champion for auricular, particular confeſſion of ſin to man, ſeems very ſtrange, that when he lay upon his death-bed, and the Prieſt, after the Popiſh manner, came to abſolve him, he had nothing to confeſs; at laſt he thought of ſome ſlight extravagancies of his youth, which was all he had to ſay of his own miſcarriages: We ſee a man may be a Scholar in all the knowledge of the world, of nature, and of Scripture, and yet not know his own heart, nor be ſtudied or read himſelf. He that is ſo in a ſpiritual notion, can never want particular matter in his moſt innocent dayes to confeſs before the Lord, and to ſhame himſelf for. What though he hath eſcaped the pollutions of the world, and is cleanſed from the filthineſs of the fleſh? yet he knows that ſtill in his fleſh there dwells no good thing, and that in his ſpirit, there are, at the leaſt, touches of many ſpiritual filthineſſes, as pride, unbelief, &c. beſides his great deficiencies in every duty, and in his love to Jeſus Chriſt, which is the ground of all. So then, in any of theſe ſences, to confeſs ſin only in general, is a ſinful confeſſion. And yet Job made a holy confeſſion here, and ſo did the Publican (Luke 18.) when he ſmote his breaſt, and ſaid only thus, God be merciful to me a ſinner.

For ſecondly, Though to ſpeak a general confeſſion, be an eaſie matter, and every mans work, yet to make a general confeſſion is a hard matter, a work beyond man. As no man (in a ſpiritual ſence) can ſay, Jeſus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghoſt (1 Cor. 12. 3) ſo no man can ſay (in a holy manner) I have ſinned, but by the holy Ghoſt; good and bad, believers and unbelievers, ſpeak often the ſame good words, but they cannot ſpeak the ſame things, nor from the ſame principles; Nature ſpeaks in the one, in the other Grace. The one may ſay, very paſſionately, he hath ſinned, and ſometimes almoſt drown his words in tears; but the other ſaith repentingly, I have ſinned, and floods his heart with godly ſorrows.

Thirdly, To clear it yet more, the general confeſſions of the Saints have theſe four things in them.

Firſt, Beſides the fact, they acknowledge the blot, that there is much defilement and blackneſs in every ſin; that it is the only pollution and abaſement of the creature.

Secondly, They confeſs the fault, that they have done very ill in what they have done, and very fooliſhly, even like a beaſt that hath no underſtanding.

Thirdly, They confeſs a guilt contracted by what they have done, that their perſons might be laid liable to the ſentence of the Law for every ſuch act, if Chriſt had not taken away the curſe and condemning power of it. Confeſſion of ſin (in the ſtrict nature of it) puts us into the hand of juſtice; though through the grace of the new covenant, it puts us into the hand of mercy.

Fourthly, Hence the Saints confeſs all the puniſhments threatned in the Book of God to be due to ſin; and are ready to acquit God, whatſoever he hath awarded againſt ſinners: O Lord, righteouſneſs belongeth unto thee, but unto us confuſion of face, as at this day, to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, Dan. 9. 7.

And as in this confeſſion, for the matter, they acknowledge the blot, the fault, the guilt, the puniſhment of ſin; ſo for the manner (which ſets the difference yet wider between the general confeſſion of wicked and godly men) they confeſs, Firſt, freely; Acknowledgments of ſin are not extorted by the pain and trouble which ſeizeth on them, as in Pharaoh, Saul and Judas. But when God gives them beſt dayes, they are ready to ſpeak worſt of themſelves; and when they receive moſt mercies from God, then God receives moſt and deepeſt acknowledgments of ſin from them. They are never ſo humbled in the ſight of ſin, as when they are moſt exalted in ſeeing the ſalvations of the Lord. The goodneſs of God leads them to this repentance, they are not driven to it by wrath and thunder.

Secondly, They confeſs feelingly; when they ſay they have ſinned, they know what they ſay. They taſte the bitterneſs of ſin, and groan under the burdenſomeneſs of it, as it paſſes out in confeſſion. A natural mans confeſſions run through him as water through a pipe, which leaves no impreſſion or ſcent there; nor do they (upon the matter) any more taſte what ſin is, then the pipe doth of what reliſh water is. Or if a natural man feels any thing in confeſſion, it is the evil of puniſhment feared, not the evil of his ſin committed.

Thirdly, They confeſs ſincerely; they mean what they ſay, and are in earneſt both with God and their own ſouls, Bleſſed is the man in whoſe ſpirit there is no guile, Pſal. 32. 2. The natural man caſts out his ſin by condition, as Seamen caſt their goods over-board in a ſtorm, which in the calm they wiſh for again. They ſo caſt out the evil ſpirit, that they are content to receive him again when he returns, though it be with ſeven worſe then himſelf. Even while they confeſs ſin with their lips, they keep it, like a ſweet bit, under their tongues, and wiſh it well enough, while they ſpeak it very ill.

Fourthly, They confeſs believingly; while they have an eye of ſorrow upon ſin, they have an eye of faith upon Chriſt: Judas ſaid he had ſinned in betraying innocent blood (Mat. 27. 4.) but inſtead of waſhing in that blood, he defiles himſelf with his own, he goes away and hangs himſelf. No wicked man in the world (continuing in that ſtate) did ever mix faith with his ſorrows, or believing ing with confessing he had sinned. So much for the clearing of the words, and the sence of this general confession.

Hence observe, First, While a godly man maintains his innocency, and justifies himself before man, he willingly acknowledges his infirmity, and judges himself before God.

Job had spent much time in wiping off the aspersions cast upon him by his friends, but he charges himself with his failings in the sight of God.

Secondly observe, God speaks better of his servants then they do of themselves.

When God speaks of Job, we find not one blot in all his character, all is commendation, nothing of reproof. He saith (c. 1.21.) In all this Job sinned not; but for all that, Job saith, I have sinned: A hypocrite hath good thoughts of himself, and speaks himself fair; He flatters himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful, Psal. 36. 2. A godly man thinks and speaks low of himself, he accuses himself in his own eyes, though his integrity be found very acceptable with the Lord.

Thirdly observe, The holiest man on earth hath cause to confess that he hath sinned.

Confession is the duty of the best Christians. First, The highest form of believers in this life, is not above the actings of sin; though the lowest of believers is not under the power of it. And if the line of sinning be as long as the line of living, then the line of confessing must be of the same length with both. While the ship leaks, the pump must not stand still. And so long as we gather ill humors, there will be need of vomits and purgings.

Secondly, Confession is a soul-humbling duty, and the best have need of that, for they are in most danger of being lifted up above measure. To preserve us from those self-exaltations, the Lord sometimes sends the messenger of Satan to buffet us by temptations, and commands us to buffet our selves often by confession.

Thirdly, Confession affects the heart with sin, and engages the heart against it. Every confession of the evil we do, is a new obligation not to do it any more. The best in their worst part, have so much freedom to sin, that they have need enough to be bound from it in variety of bonds.

Fourthly, Confession of sin shews us more clearly our need of mercy, and endears it more to us. How good and sweet is mercy to a soul that hath tasted how evil and how bitter a thing it is to sin against the Lord? How welcome, how beautiful is a pardon, when we have been viewing the ugliness of our own guilt?

Fifthly, Confession of sin advances Christ in our hearts. How doth it declare the riches of Christ, when we are not afraid to tell him what infinite sums of debt we are in, which he only, and he easily can discharge? How doth it commend the healing virtue of his blood, when we open to him such mortal wounds and sicknesses, which he only, and he easily can cure? Wo be to those who commit sin abundantly that grace may abound; but it is our duty to confess sin abundantly, that grace may abound.

Lastly, Though we need not confess sin at all to inform God: he knows our sins, though we will not make them known; and hath an eye to see, though we should not have a tongue to confess. Though (I say) we confess not to inform God what we are, or what we have done, yet we must confess to glorifie God. While we shame our selves, we honour him. My son (saith Joshua to Achan, c. 7. v. 19.) give I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him. Every attribute of God receives this gift of glory by mans confession. Justice is glorified, and mercy is glorified, patience is glorified, and holiness is glorified. Holiness is glorified in opposing sin, and patience in sparing the sinner; mercy is glorified in pardoning sin, and justice in receiving satisfaction at the hand of Christ for the pardon of it.

Fourthly observe, Holy confession of sin, leads the way to gracious pardoning of sin.

Job begins the next verse with a vehement prayer for pardon. And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? Sin concealed and kept close, grows upon us: And it grows three wayes. First, In the strength of it. Secondly, In the guilt of it. Thirdly, In the terror and vexation of it, Psal. 32. 3, 4. When I kept silence, my bones waxed old, through my roaring all the day long. Confession is a means to obtain the abatement of sin in all three. The strength of it is weakned, the guilt removed, and the terrour overcome. Then hear the counsel of the Prophet (Isa. 43.26.) declare that thou maist be justified.

Thus far of the words as they are a confession of sin. I shall now handle them as they are a concession or a grant that he had sinned; and so the sence may be given thus; I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee? As if he had said, Let it be granted, or suppose that I have sinned, and sinned as deeply as my friends have charged me; suppose I have been as wicked as they imagine, what then? if this were my case, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men?

The latter words plainly import a question, What shall I do unto thee? But the sence of the question is not so plain: The question may be taken two wayes; either affirmatively, or negatively. Take it affirmatively, and so the sence is, What shall I do? that is, Lord direct me, counsel me, order me, teach me what becomes me to do in such a case, in such a sinful condition as I either confess my self to be in, or am supposed to be in. That's the affirmative sence.

What shall I do?] The word which we translate [do] signifies working or doing, under a twofold qualification.

First, Working with great willingness and readiness of mind; and hence it is applied to the workings of sin in natural men, who work with the greatest freedom that can be. Man sins naturally, and therefore freely; he is carried on with a full swing, with tide and wind; he sins, nothing in himself contradicting or giving a contrary vote; he is a true worker of iniquity, Psal. 5. 5.

Secondly, Working with energie and success, and the doing of a thing not only effectually, but willingly, Num. 23.23. What hath God wrought? When God works, he works throughly, he doth not his business to halves. So, Isa. 26. 12. Thou hast wrought all our works in us, that is, thou hast brought them to pass, they have succeeded through thy help, and the influences of thy blessing.

The word being taken in this height of sence, and the question for an affirmation, what shall I do? that is, shew me, direct me what to do; we may observe from it,

First, That, What to do in case of sin, is a point of the highest consideration.

I have sinned, what shall I do? If ever we have need to go and ask counsel, to sit down and debate the matter with our selves or others, it is, when we have sinned. Such is the nature of sin, and such the consequences, that it calls us to highest consideration what to do about it. Matters of great consequence are matters of great consultation: Sin hath an influence upon an eternity. If any thing be more worthy your thoughts then that, let it have them.

Secondly, Look upon the question as following Job's confession: Whence observe,

That, Sincere confession of sin, makes the soul very active and inquisitive about the remedies of sin.

I have sinned; The very next word is, What shall I do? Many make confession of sin, who are never troubled about the cure and redress of sin; Lord, what shall I do? is not the next question to Lord, I have sinned. Nay, it may be, the next action is to sin over the same sin they have confest. As soon as those Jews heard of the foulness of their sin in crucifying Christ, and of the sadness of their condition their question is like this of Job, What shall we do? What shall we do that we may be saved? As Christ speaks to the woman of Samaria (John 4. 10.) when he offered her the water of life, If thou didst know the gift of God, and who it is that speaks unto thee, thou wouldest have asked, &c. That is, if thou wert sensible of the excellency and virtue of this water, and thy need of it, thou wouldest be very inquisitive how to get it, how to have a taste of it. As in regard of Christ, and the benefits we have by him, so of sin and the evils which come by it: When a man hath confest and acknowledged his sin, we may say to him, if thou didst but know what thou hast confest, if thou didst but know what thou hast acknowledged, thou wouldest presently be asking, how shall I get free? how shall I get clear of these sins which are so deadly, poysonous, destroying and condemning? He that is but sensible what the wound of sin is, will never be at rest, never give over enquiring, till he hath found a plaister or a medicine for it. He that knows what he saith, when he saith I have sinned, will resolve as David in another case, that his eyes shall not have a wink of sleep till he sees where to have help against it.

Thirdly, In that he saith, what shall I do? observe,

That, A soul truly sensible of sin, is ready to submit to any terms which God shall put upon him.

What shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Put what terms thou wilt upon me, I am ready to accept them. That was the sence of their question (Acts 2. 32.) What shall we do? shew us the way, let it be what it will, we will not stand making of conditions, we will not pick and chuse, this we will do, and that we will not do; this we will submit unto, and that we will refuse; no, let the Lord write what Articles he pleases, we intend not to debate, but yield and subscribe unto them. When the Jaylor found himself in the bonds of his iniquity, he was ready to enter into any bonds of duty, Acts 16. 30. Sirs, what must I do to be saved?

Lastly, From the question in the affirmative, observe,

That, God is to be consulted and enquired after in all doubtful cases, especially in our sin-cases.

I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? He calls upon God to know what he should do, and to learn what course he should take. Though, when we have opportunity to speak to men, that's good and a duty; yet we must not rest in the counsels of men, what to do in sin-cases: God must be consulted. After the people had committed Idolatry in making the Calf, you have sinned (saith Moses) and now I will go up unto the Lord, that I may make an atonement for you: I will go up to the Lord, that I may understand from him what course to take for the removing of this sin. Though we have not such a Mount to go up unto as Moses then had, to speak to God; yet there are wayes for the soul in all sin-cases, to make addresses unto God: A sinner may say, I will go to the Lord, and make my atonement; whatsoever advice and direction we receive from men, we must enquire whether it be an advice and counsel established in heaven. And the reason is clear, God is the person offended in every sin, and therefore he must be consulted about the remedy of sin. Again, God only can resolve us what will please him; we may pitch upon a wrong course, and take a wrong way; we, in stead of pacifying God, may provoke him; in stead of satisfying, further displease him: therefore we must say, when we have sinned, Lord, what wilt thou have us to do? His advice will lead us to Christ for ease and peace.

So far for the question taken in the affirmative sence, What shall I do unto thee? shew me what I shall do, and I will readily submit unto it.

Secondly, Take the question negatively, What shall I do unto thee? And so I find two sences of it.

Quid tibi nocui, aut quid te læsi? Olymp.

First, Some render it thus, What have I done against thee? And then the meaning is this, I have done nothing against thee, or I have not hurt thee by sinning: What have I done against thee? Wherein have I injured thee, that thou layest thy hand thus severely upon me in these grievous afflictions, both upon my soul and body? I am hurt, what have I hurt thee? There is a truth in this, though I take it not for the truth of this place. A man when he saith he hath sinned, what hurt have I done unto God? and yet all the hurt and wrong which God receives, he receives by sin. Our sins are no hurt unto God, by abating any thing of his happiness or fulness, or intrinsecal essential honour; take it thus, and our sins cannot hurt God: All the darts of our sins fall infinitely short of God, they cannot reach him, so as to annoy him. And we have that language expresly in Job 35. 6. If thou dost sin, what dost thou against him? (that is, thou dost nothing against God, as a real dammage to him) or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what dost thou unto him? Sin as many sins as you can, you cannot impair the happiness of God, or diminish his greatness; he is out of the reach of the creature in that sence. As on the other side, if a man be never so holy and good, or do never so many acts of righteousness, yet God hath no good or gain by it; we cannot advantage God by our holiness, and that is the language of this Scripture too, Job 35. 7. If thou be righteous, what giveſt thou him, or what receiveth he of thine hand? We make no addition to the happiness of God by all our holiness, Job 22. 3. Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that thou art righteous? or any gain unto him that thou makest thy wayes perfect? That which is infinite cannot encrease, neither can it be encreased. God is above all gain and loss, above all accesses of pleasure and pain. When the Scripture saith, he is delighted in the services of his Saints, and takes pleasure in his people, we must understand them in the same sence as those Scriptures, which describe him displeased with the sins of men, angry and grieved, because of their provocations. All the motions of Gods delight or grief, pleasedness or displeasure, are only expressions towards the creature, not any impressions upon himself. But I shall let that sence pass.

Secondly, In the negative, take the question thus, what shall I do unto thee? Or, as the Septuagint reads it, what can I do unto thee? That is, I can do nothing to thee. Lord, I have sinned, and if thou seekest for satisfaction at my hands, I am able to make none. And so he speaks like a poor, undone, broken man to his rich Creditor arresting him for a debt which he is unable to pay. The poor man falls down at his feet, and saith, Sir I confess I owe you a great Sum, you have my Bonds, I confess my Hand and Seal, but what shall I do unto you? I cannot pay you a penny, I have nothing, I have lost all, I am not worth a groat, what will you have of me? This sounds such a kind of melting pitiful language, I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Lord, when I look into my stock, into my treasure and revenues, I see I have nothing to satisfie this debt of sin I have run in and stand engaged to thy Majesty for; what can I pay thee? and so the word [do] signifies a retribution or recompence; so it is used in the second verse of this Chapter, where he speaks of the hireling, waiting for his work, that is, for the reward or recompence of his work, the payment of his wages. What shall I do? is as much as, what shall I pay, or, what shall I render? This is a due debt, but I have nothing to pay, no way of making satisfaction for all the dammage I have put thy holy Majesty to by my sins.

Εἰ ἐγω ἥμαρτον τί δυνήσομαι σοὶ ποιῆσαι. Sept.

Or thus, there may be a threefold negation in the Question, What shall I do unto thee?

First, I can do nothing to escape thy power. I cannot get away from thee, I cannot rescue my self from under thy hand.

Secondly, I can do nothing to satisfie thy Justice.

Thirdly, I can do nothing to pacifie thine anger. I cannot only not pay the debt, but I cannot appease thee, or turn away thy displeasure in the least degree.

From the Question taken in this sence, we may observe,

First, That, The holiest man on the earth by all his sufferings and doings, cannot satisfie the justice of God for one sin. I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee?

When the Angels had sinned, what could they do unto God in this respect? These three negations lay upon them, and do lie to this day, and shall to all eternity. They sinned but once, yet could they not escape out of the hand of God. Though Spirits and Powers, yet they could not maintain their state against the power of God, and are therefore cast into prison, and reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day. They could not pacifie the wrath of God towards them, God is as highly displeased, and his wrath burns as hot against them as ever. Now if sinning Angels could do nothing to God, what can sinful man do? The Question is put, Micah 6. 6. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord? and bow my self before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousand rivers of oyl? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? These Questions are denials; come not before God with any of these. Then what is it that God doth require? He hath shewed thee what is good, to do judgment and righteousness, to walk humbly with thy God. But why these things? What though I cannot make a price for my sin with calves and rams, and rivers of oil, though my children will not be accepted as a ransom for my transgressions, yet can I make a price for them out of justice and righteousness and humble walking? No, not out of these neither. The The Lord doth not require these for the payments of our debt, as we are sinners, but for the payment of duty, as we are creatures. There is a double debt to God; a debt to the justice of God for sins committed, and a debt to the Law of God for duties enjoyned. The former no man is able to pay but with eternal sufferings. The latter, the Saints (through grace) do pay by their daily holy actings.

There is a threefold deficiency in all that man can do, to satisfie the justice of God.

First, All is imperfect and defiled, our services smell of the vessel through which they pass, and taste of the cask into which they are put. There is a stamp of our sinfulness even upon our holy things. And can that which is sinful satisfie for sin?

Secondly, Whatsoever we do is a debt before we do it. All our duties are owing before we perform them. And can we pay the debt of sin by those duties which were due though sin had never been committed.

Thirdly, The greatest deficiency is this, our works want the stamp of Gods appointment for that purpose. God hath no where set up mans righteousness, as satisfaction for mans unrighteousness. Hence, if it should be supposed, we had performed perfect righteousness according to the whole will of God commanded, yet we could not satisfie the justice of God offended, unless God had said, that he would accept that way of satisfaction; it is the appointment and institution of God which renders what we do acceptable unto himself. Surely all that Jesus Christ did or suffered for us in the flesh, had not satisfied the justice of God, if God had not appointed that Christ should do and suffer those things for the satisfying of his iustice. It was the compact between Christ and his Father, which made him a Sacrifice, Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire. Sacrifices were refused by God, it being impossible that they should purge sin (Heb. 10. 4.) Then the ear of Christ was opened or bored, as a servant, according to the Law in that case, Exod. 21. 6. to receive and do the will of his Father. Or, as the Seventy interpret, which the Apostle follows, God prepared him a body. Then Christ undertakes the work; And said, Lo I come to do thy will, O God. Why? In the Volume of the Book it is written of me. That is, thou hast decreed and ordained from everlasting; the record is clear for it, that I am he whom thou hast ordained to do thy will. Hence the Apostle concludes at ver. 10, That we are sanctified (that is, saved) by that will through the offering of the body of Jesus once for all; as inferring, that the very offering of the body of Jesus Christ could not save us, but by the will and ordination of God. His hanging and dying on the Cross had not delivered us from death, unless it had been written in the volume of the Book. There is nothing satisfactory but what the Law, or the will of the Lawgiver makes or agrees to accept as satisfactory. In the volume of the Book there is nothing written which appoints man such a work, and therefore he cannot do it.

There is somewhat to be done by way of thankfulness, but nothing can be done by way of payment. That question (Psal. 116. 12.) affirms as much, What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits? We must render unto the Lord for his benefits; but we cannot render to the Lord for our sins. We ought to take up the cup of thanksgiving; but Christ hath, and he alone was able, and he alone was ordained to take and drink the cup of satisfying.

Secondly, Observe (which depends upon the former.)

That, Pardon and forgiveness of sin come in at the door of free-grace.

Free grace doth all. What can I do? I can do nothing, O thou preserver of men; I can only (nor that without thy help) acknowledge my sin: it must be thine infinite goodness to pardon it. When a man hath travelled through all duties and doings, he must at last sit down in Gods love, and rest in this, that God is merciful to poor sinners, Isa. 55. 1. Come unto me, O all ye that are thirsty, come without money or without price. There is nothing in the creature that God requires as a price of his favour; his milk and his honey, his bread and his water, are all gifts and bounties unto his people. He calls us to buy these, because we shall have them as willingly from God, as any things from man for our money; and he calls it a buying without money, because no value can be set upon it high enough, nor any heart receive it freely enough. To offer money, that is, to think to obtain any of that favour by what we do, is the most dangerous offer in the world. We read how dreadful the issue was to Simon Magus, when he offered money for the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and yet those gifts were such, as a man man may have, and go to hell with them; for they were but gifts of miracles and of healing, and the like: But this gift of the favour and love of God in the pardon of sin, is such a gift, as whosoever hath it, is sure and safe for ever; and therefore (the gift being much more precious then that of Simon Magus) take heed of offering this kind of money for it, your works and doings. To do so, is the worst Simonie in the world. Better offer literal money for those gifts of the holy Ghost, then this figurative money for the favour of God in the pardon of sin. What Peter threatned Simon Magus, may be affirmed of them, Their money must perish with them, that is, their prayers and tears, their sorrows and their humblings, their almes and good deeds, forasmuch as they have thought that this gift of pardon may be obtained by such money, they have neither part nor lot in that mercy, for their hearts are not right in the sight of God. A good work trusted to, is as mortal as a sin unrepented of.

Again, There is somewhat to be done when we have sinned, but nothing to be paid. That's Gospel-language, when a man hath sinned, to say, What shall I do? Those Converts in the Acts, who enquired, What shall we do? were told by the Apostles of somewhat to be done; Repent and be baptized, believe and thou shalt be saved. These are wayes wherein salvation is tendered, not works for which it is bestowed. It is as dangerous an errour so to lift up the grace of God, as to deny the industry of man through Grace: and because he can do nothing by way of satisfaction, that therefore he must do nothing. The Apostles gave Gospel-counsel, yet when men asked them, What shall we do to be saved? They said not, ye must do nothing, God will save you by his free Grace; no, they called them to repent and believe, &c. Take heed, when ye have sinned, to say we need not mourn for sin, we need not be humbled, we need not repent; for, Lord, what can we do unto thee, O thou Saviour of men? These are the inferences of our own spirits, not of the Spirit of Christ. They who lift up the grace of Christ, to lessen the necessity of gracious actings in themselves, shew they know not the meaning of his Grace, and have not indeed tasted how gracious the Lord is. To deny our own righteousness, and to be very active in the wayes of righteousness, is the due Gospel-temper. The Apostle. Phil. 3. 8. counts all things but loss and dung; all duties and humblings, all legal righteousness and obedience; not that he refused righteousness, or neglected duties, but he would not mingle them with Christ, or bring them in as contributions to the purchase of blessedness. Our righteousness and holy duties are dung and dross in justification, but they are Gold and precious things in sanctification; without these we cannot walk worthy of our holy calling, or as it becomes the Gospel of Christ.

So much for these words, What shall I do unto thee?

O thou preserver of men!

Here is the compellation, or the title under which Job bespeaks the Lord (and it is a royal one) The Preserver of men. The word signifies both to preserve and to observe; and hence it is applied to our keeping the Law of God, Psal. 119. 22. I have kept thy testimonies, I have kept them by observation, that is, I have obeyed thy Commandments. The word is often applied to God, in reference to mans protection and preservation, Deut. 32. 10. Moses describes the care of God over his people Israel, He found them in the wilderness (as a people wandring and going astray) and he kept them as the apple of his eye, that is, he looked to them, and had a continual tender care over them. So, Psal. 17. 8. Keep me as the apple of thine eye.

The

ὁ ἐπισκοπῶν τὸν νῦν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, qui perspectam habes mentē hominum. Sept.

The Septuagint render it, O thou observer of men; What shall I do unto thee, O thou who art the observer and looker into the very hearts of men? Lord, saith he, what wilt thou have me to do? Thou lookest quite through me, and seest all that is in me, I need not declare my self unto thee, thou knowest me altogether, Thou who art the searcher of the heart, and the trier of the reins; Thou who art a most vigilant watcher over all my wayes, what have I done or spoken, but thou knowest and canst easily observe. Thus Job speaks at Chap. 14. vers. 16. Thou numberest my steps: A man observes another curiously, when he tells how many steps he treads, it is an expression, noting the exactest observation. Salomon joyns the Act of keeping with observing, Prov. 24. 12. If thou sayest, Behold, he knoweth it not (this is the refutation of an Athiest) Doth not he that pondereth the heart, consider it, and he that keepeth thy Soul, doth not he know? He that preserveth us in our wayes, must needs see us in all our wayes.

Again, Preserving or keeping may be understood two wayes.

First, There is a preserving or keeping of Man, that he shall not escape. And, Custos hominum, sc. qui hominem talibus malis quasi quadā custodia includit, ut non sit effugium.

Secondly, A preserving or keeping of Man, that he shall not take hurt. Some understand it in the first sence, O thou preserver of men! that is, O thou, who art so strict a keeper and watcher over men, that they cannot escape thine hand. A man is said to be in safe custody, when he is a prisoner, and so the sence is thus given, Lord, thou hast me fast enough, I cannot break away from thee, I am lockt up within iron-gates and bars, what wouldst thou have me to do unto thee? Thou mayest put what conditions thou pleasest upon me, I must submit. Such language we have (Lam. 3. 5, 7.) which may illustrate this. He hath builded against me, and compassed me with gall and travel, he hath hedged me about, that I cannot get out, he hath made my chain heavy. You see he speaks of God (as we may speak with reverence) as of the Master of a Prison, who saith to his under Officers, there is such a one, look to him well, make his chain heavy, that he may not get away, put him in a place where there is a strong wall, least he break prison. This sence of the word makes Job speaking like Jeremy, He hath builded against me, he hath compassed me about, he hath made my chain heavy upon me.

But the second sence, according to the letter of our Translation, is most clear and apt, O thou preserver of men! Thou who keepest man, least he take hurt or fall into danger; As if Job had bespoke God thus, Thou art the Saviour and Protector of men, thou hast not only given man a being, but thou provideſt for his well being: thou art a preserver of our outward estates, and a preserver of our spiritual estates. A God in whom we live, move, and have our being, as well as we receive being, life and motion from thee; and therefore seeing such is thy nature, and this thy office, to be a preserver of men, what wouldst thou have me to do unto thee? Why dost thou thus destroy me, and break me to pieces? Why dost thou follow me with affliction upon affliction, till I am utterly ruin'd and undone? Thus Jacob (Gen. 28. 15.) If thou wilt keep me in the way that I shall go; he makes a vow to God, and indents or articles with God to be kept and preserved by him. The word there is Shomer, but that and this are used promiscuously, as Psalm 121. 4. The keeper of Israel. In the word of the Text, and Psalm 31. 23. The Lord preserveth the faithful; he preserveth them from the reach of dangers and troubles, incompassing them on every side.

So then in this title, we have the work and office of God held forth, the second act of his power. The first is the act of Creation, the second is this act of Preservation or providence. Preservation or providence is a continued Creation. Observe from this title,

First, Man wants a preserver.

If God having made man, and set him in the world, had left him to his own keeping, what would become of him? When God trusted man to go a little alone, and did not hold a special hand of preservation over him, to keep him from, or in temptation, how quickly did he fall and lose himself? Man like a little child (which if the mother or the nurse leaveth alone unwatched or uneyed) runs into dangers and deaths every moment. Man is a weak creature, therefore he needs a preserver. Again, man (as fallen especially) is a fooliſh creature, he hath no understanding to guide himself, he is as ignorant as a child (if God leave him) how to dispose of his own wayes, and order his goings; The way of man is not in himself, neither is it in him that goeth to direct his own steps.

Lastly, Man walks in the midst of enemies. He is beset with dangers, therefore he needs a Protector; what would become of a man, living in a throng of adversaries, were it not that he hath a God, whose Name is, the Preserver of men?

It is good for us to know God by this Name in every letter of it, in the full extent of it.

Mirus sanè Dei amor in populū suū, mira providentia Sanct. in Zech. 2.

First, Immediately, his own hand and out-stretched arm is our safety, Zech. 2. 5. I will be unto Jerusalem a wall of fire round about; If you want a wall, I will be your wall, my immediate providence shall be your defence, rather then you shall not be defended. Is my strength the strength of stones, or is my flesh brass? Was Job's question, Chap. 6. 12. We may resolve it, the strength of God is more then the strength of stones, and he, The Spirit is more firm then brass. The Romans in their Wars used to call out the Tutelar gods of those Cities they besieged, &c. as believing them a stronger defence to those places, then walls or forts. And yet our God is more then a wall of stone and brass, he promised to be a wall of fire. Now who can batter down a fire, that is it's own fewel, or who can set up ladders to scale the flames?

And as the Lord is a wall of fire, so a wall of water for the safety of his people, Isa. 33. 21. There will I be a place of broad rivers, and of streams; that is, I will be their preservation; the broad rivers preserves a place from the invasion of enemies: Waters are stronger then Bulwarks of stone. And least any should object, though broad rivers keep off Foot or Horse, yet they give advantage to Ships: therefore it is added, I will be such a river to thee, as wherein shall go no Galley with Oars, neither shall gallant Ship pass thereby. But if any shall venture their Navies upon these streams to thy annoiance, then know (as vers. 23. intimates) Their tacklings shall be loosed; they shall not well strengthen their masts, they shall not spread their sails; They shall be so ruffled and entangled, that the lame shall take the prey, that is, the weakest resistance shall subdue them and make prize of their whole Fleet, even of their Invincible Armado's. I love the Lord my strength, my rock, my tower, my fortress, my buckler, the horn of my salvation; Psal. 18. 1, 2. all these titles meet in this one, The preserver of men.

Secondly, God is a preserver of men mediately by instruments: he preserves man by man, and man sometimes by the beasts of the Earth, and fowls of the Air, but chiefly he preserveth men by Angels; Are they not ministring spirits, sent out for the good of those that shall be heirs of salvation? (Psal. 91.) He shall give his Angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy wayes; they shall bear thee up in thy wayes, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. A promise so full of sweetness for faith to feed on, that the Devil hath no way to elude it, but by tempting us (as he did Christ) to over act it, and surfet faith into a presumption, by a wilful needless throwing our selves into danger.

And there is a necessity that God himself should thus take upon him the preservation of men: This necessity is three-fold.

First, None are strong enough to preserve us without him, our enemies would break through all strength below God: so that, if he were not our preserver, none could: In vain is salvation hoped for from hills, and from the multitude of mountains; truly in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel, Jer. 2.

Secondly, None are wise enough to preserve us, except the Lord. As evil spirits are powers, for strength; so likewise Serpents, for policy and craft; this craft of Hell cannot be discovered, much less disappointed, without wisdom from Heaven.

Thirdly, None but God are patient enough to be the preservers of men, I believe if the Angels left to their natural temper, were set to be keepers of men, they had all given over this charge long before this time; as it is supposed, they who fell refused to undertake, or take it up at first: Angels have not the patience to keep such a froward piece as man. It is a wonder God doth not give over that care, and in ſtead of preſerving, daſh him in pieces. When the Lord told Moſes, he would ſend an Angel before him, and drive out the Canaanite (Exod. 34. 2.) For I will not go up in the midſt of thee, for thou art a ſtiff necked people leſt I conſume thee in the way. The Text ſaith, when the people heard this evil tidings, they mourned, and no man did put upon him his Ornaments. Why what was it that troubled them? Was it that the Angel is ſent now to conduct them to Canaan? That was told them (Chap. 23. 20.) and they well ſatisfied with it, Behold, I ſend an Angel before to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. I anſwer, the Angel in Chap. 23. is by all (that I meet with) agreed to be the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the great Angel of the Covenant; but the Angel, Chap. 33. appears to be a created Angel, and rather threatned them then promiſed them. And though the Lord is pleaſed to ſignifie a reaſon of ſending this Angel in favour to them, namely, leſt He himſelf conſume them in the way for their ſtubbornneſs. Yet the people are not ſatisfied with this tidings; ſurely they thought if the Lord was not able to bear their provocations, much leſs could an Angel; and therefore if he ſhould ſend an Angel, and withdraw his own preſence from them, they muſt periſh; A mere Angel could not have bore their manners as the Lord did; receiving provocations from them, and continuing preſervations over them this fourty years.

It is yet further obſervable, that the Hebrew is not only ſingular, but a particular: The preſerver of Adam, or of that man, which hath ſome ſpeciality in it: We tranſlate in general, the preſerver of men, but the preſerver of man, or of that man, is more emphatical. God preſerveth all, but he hath a ſpecial eye of preſervation upon ſome, Thou preſerveſt Man and Beaſt, ſaith the Pſalmiſt; the beaſts of the earth are preſerved, but man is preſerved more: And among men, ſome are more preſerved. It is a truth, the great God preſerveth his greateſt enemies: a wicked man were not able to lift up a hand or a tongue againſt him, if God did not uphold him: but God is the ſpecial preſerver of that man, that is, the preſerver of a godly Man, or of godly Men. As Chriſt is the Saviour of all Men, but eſpecially of thoſe that believe; ſo the Preſerver of all Men, but eſpecially of thoſe that believe; he hath a care of them, beyond the care he hath of the world. The care which God hath of the reſt of the world, compared with that towards his own, is but careleſneſs, and he as it were neglects the whole world to look to his own People. As it was ſaid of Conſtantine, that for the love he bare to Conſtantinople, he undreſſed and unadorned all the other Cities of the Empire, to beautifie and adorn that: God ſeems to take off from all men in the world to lay it on upon his people; the very gleanings of thoſe mercies which his people have, are better then the whole vintage of the world: And the Lord is therefore a ſpecial Saviour to his people, becauſe, Firſt, They are more precious then the reſt of the world: and that calls for moſt care, which hath moſt worth. A man takes more care of his jewels, then of the lumber in his houſe; Theſe are my Jewels, ſaith God (Mal. 3.) A man carries his jewels about him, or keeps them in a ſafe cabinet.

Secondly, Nearneſs of relation calls for that care; will not a man preſerve his Wife, his Spouſe? The Church is the Spouſe of Chriſt. Will not a man preſerve his Children? If his houſe be on fire, bring my Children out ſaith he: The heart of God is towards his Children, he muſt provide them a portion. Yea they are his portion, he makes a revenew of them (Deut. 32. 9.) A man will preſerve his revenew, that wherein his eſtate lies: All that God hath on earth (though he hath ſuch a fulneſs in himſelf, that he needs nothing from his Church, yet, all that he hath) he is pleaſed to ſay, he hath it from his Church: and therefore God is ſaid to be great in Zion; he is the ſame great God all the world over, but it appears not ſo, what he is to the men of the world, as to the Saints in Zion it doth: yea he is little in the eye of the world, in compariſon of what he is in Zion, therefore he takes great care to preſerve his Zion. Obſerve, Laſtly, The preſerving care of God over man, eſpecially over that man, over his own people, is a perpetual care.

Preſervation is a continued act, if God ſhould leave us one moment, and ſtop providence, Creation would be diſſolved: This continuance of his care, is eminent towards his Church; Iſa. 27. 3. Leſt any hurt it, I will keep it night and day. Night and day divide all time between them: to do a thing night and day, is to do it continually, Pſal. 121. 4. He that keepeth Iſrael, neither ſlumbereth nor ſleepeth. A ſlumber is leſs then ſleep; but God will not ſo much as ſlumber in his thoughts towards as, all his are waking thoughts. Further, his love is without intermiſſion, that knows no ſtops nor breaches, therefore his care is ſo too. His peoples dangers are without intermiſſion, therefore his preſevation is ſo too. Enemies oppoſe his people without intermiſſion, therefore he protects them ſo too. The Devil goeth about like a roaring lion, he is ever in motion, he goeth about as an Abaddon or Appollyon, the deſtroyer and devourer of men: The care of Chriſt prompts him to a like vigilancy, He goeth about preſerving; his act of preſervation runs parallel with that of the enemies oppoſition: God watches that his people may have ſome quiet reſt and ſleep. As the ſtory reports of Alexander the Great, that he told his Souldiers, I watch more then any of you all, that you may ſometimes have quiet ſleep: his care diſpenſed with ſome of their careleſneſs. It is moſt true of God, he wakes for ever, and he watches for ever, to preſerve us that we may ſleep in quietneſs and confidence. Solomon reproves ſome ſecure ones, who are as they, who ſleep on the top of the maſt (Prov. 23.) But the Saints may ſleep (in regard of fear, though not of indeavour) on the top of the maſt, while they remember that both the helm and the winds are in Gods hands. As our ſpiritual eſtates, ſo our temporal are kept (as with a garriſon in their degree) by the power of God through faith unto ſalvation. So much for the Title, O thou preſerver of men.

certo ſcio me plus vigilare quam vos, ut ipſi ſomnos quietos capere poſſitis. Arian. l. 8.

Why haſt thou ſet me as a mark againſt thee, ſo that I am a burden to my ſelf?

Why haſt thou ſet me as a mark againſt thee?] The word ſignifies to meet one, to come the oppoſite way; Hence ſome tranſlate this, why haſt thou ſet me contrary to thy ſelf? Becauſe he that meets another, comes the contrary way, the way oppoſite to him: why haſt thou put me as an object againſt thee? or, as an enemy to thee? the object ſtands directly before us, and we deſire to have an enemy right before us. And the word may be taken ſimply for an enemy, or adverſary, who ſtands oppoſite to us, both in his actions and deſigns, and againſt whom we direct both ours. We render, wherefore haſt thou ſet me as a mark? And that ſuits the ſence of the word fully, becauſe a mark at which a man aims, is ſet in direct oppoſition to him; we level our arrows or bullets at the mark right before us: Job thought himſelf thus placed, why haſt thou ſet me as a mark to meet with, or intercept thy ſhot, thy arrows, thy bullets, thy blows upon my breaſt? Wilt thou make the boſom of thy ſervants, like the breaſt of an enemy, a Butt to receive all thy arrows? A mark is as a ſtanding enemy; and an enemy is a moving mark to ſhoot at: a mark is a liveleſs enemy, and an enemy is a living mark: his meaning then is, Thou haſt ſet me againſt thee, as if I were an enemy, as if I were one againſt whom thou reſolveſt to direct all thine arrows, and aim every ſtroak: ſo the word is uſed, Judg. 8. 21, where Zeba and Zalmunna, two Kings taken captive by Gideon, ſaid to him, riſe thou and fall upon us; it is this word, ſet us before thee as a mark for thy victorious ſword: So the Prophet (Amos 5. 19.) tells us that a man in hopes to eſcape the hand of God, ſhall be as if a man did flee from a Lion, and a Bear met him, ſuch a man is but a mark for a Bear, who thinks to out-run this Lion. That expreſſion (1 King. 5. 4.) is very clear to this ſence, where the peace-fulneſs of Solomons reign is deſcribed, thus, there was neither adverſary nor evil occurrent; the word we tranſlate, evil occurrent, it is that in the Text, no evil met or befell them. So then the ſum of all is, That Job expoſtulates or complains before God, that he was as it were the man choſen out amongſt all the men in the world, to be as the mark and butt againſt which God ſhot his afflictions, and level'd all his arrows: As if he had ſaid, There are many more about me, and thou doeſt not ſo much as touch one of the hairs of their head, there are men that receive not ſo much as one ſhot from thee, but I am made thy standing mark, why is it thus Lord? So he expresseth himself in other words, but to this very sence, *Chap.*19 11. &. 13.24. Wherefore holdest thou me for thine enemy? Or (according to the Letter of the Hebrew) among those who straighten thee, as an enemy straightens a City, in the time of a siege; and this he doth to move God to pity and compassion; Lord, saith he, I am set as a mark against thee. You would be much moved (a tender heart would) to see a man bound fast to a post, and another standing off with his bow bent, and his arrow on the string, with his gun or pistol cock'd, aiming at his breast: Job presents himself in such a posture, as if the Lord had bound him fast to a post or to a tree, and were pouring vollies of shot, and sending showers of arrows upon him continually.

Observe, First, The manner of the language, which is by way of a vehement question, or expostulation, Why hast thou set me as a mark against thee?

Man is very inquisitive to know the reasons of Gods dealings with him.

That's one thing. And secondly, which is near the same

It is some satisfaction and ease to the mind smitten by the hand of God, to know the reason why he wounds, why he smites.

Why hast thou set me as a mark? As if he had said, if I could but learn this, and see the reason of it, surely I should receive thy wounds as kisses, and take thy stroaks as embraces. When Gideon saw so many evils and troubles upon Israel; *Judg.*6. and the Angel told him, the Lord was with him, Then why is it thus (saith he) Can you give me a reason, why God being with us, it is thus with us? To know the reason of our pain, is a great ease, and almost the cure of it. If the people of God did but know what infinite reason he hath (reason of the highest temperament of wisdom and goodness) why he layes affliction upon them, and makes them as his marks, they would be abundantly satisfied with it. What is the reason why the Saints coming out of great affliction, are willing to confess, It is good for us that we were afflicted, and blessed be God that we were chastned. It is, because then they see more clearly the reason why God afflicted them, and they then begin to taste the fruit of those afflictions. If while the affliction is upon us, we knew what good God meaneth us, what honour he intendeth us, we should bear it not only with courage and with patience, but with joy. If Job had been fully acquainted with this, that God therefore set him up as a mark to shoot at, that he might be to all the world a mirror of patience: that God intended him this honour, that his name should be upon record in his Book so long as there was a Church; surely he would have born all with more patience and ease then he did: But he was groping in the dark, and therefore enquires, Wherefore hast thou set me as a mark against thee? The words are not only, or not so much, an expostulation, because he was set as a mark, as an Inquisition, why he was set as a mark. Note, Thirdly, God sometimes seems an enemy to his faithful servants.

For one to be before God as a Butt continually shot at, what other interpretation can sence make of it but this, that God looks upon him as an enemy? Jacob saith of Joseph (Gen. 49.23.) the Archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him. Joseph was as the common mark of his brethrens envy. But in this case, as it is said of Joseph (Gen. 42.) when his brethren came to him, He made himself strange to them. (Joseph strained himself, and used his Art, to overcome his nature, He made himself strange: Joseph was of a meek and loving disposition, and therefore like a Player upon a stage, he only acted the part of a rigid master or governor.) Thus many times the Lord takes upon him the posture of an enemy, and forces a frown upon a poor creature, whom he loves and delights in with all his heart; he makes him as his mark to shoot at, whom he layes next his own heart. Thus the Church speaks, Lam. 3. 12. He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for his arrows; And (Job 16. 13.) that you may see how his language agrees with our Scriptures: His archers compass me round about, he cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare. He poureth out my gall upon the ground. How exactly he speaks! A man shoots at a hairs breadth that shoots thus: when God sends his archers, their bows shoot so true, that they cleave the reins asunder: the reins are in the midst of a man, and to cleave the reins is to shoot level: as pouring out the gall, or unbowelling, imports to shoot dead.

Fourthly, Observe this, Why hast thou set me as a mark?

God takes the most eminent and choisest of his servants, for the choicest and most eminent afflictions.

He makes a Job the white. Why hast thou chosen me? There was great reason, God should choose him, he was the most eminent in holiness and grace of all about him: he was the most remarkable man for grace and goodness, therefore he must be the mark. They who have received most grace from God, are able to bear most affliction from God. God doth this in infinite wisdom: as the Apostle, Rom. 14. 11. gives an excellent advice in reference to weak brethren, such as are weak receive, but not to doubtful disputations, take heed how you ingage your weak Brethren in doubtful disputes, you may loose them so; take those that are strong and able, such as are well ballasted for a storm, take these men if you will to doubtful disputations, but do not take weak brethren. If God will not have us take a weak Christian to a doubtful disputation; surely then he calls such to sufferings, of whose strength he is well assured: A man under great affliction, is brought to a very doubtful disputation; therefore the Lord will not bring a weak one, one low in grace to it, but he takes out the strong: As the General of an Army chuses out the valiantest and most experienced veterane Souldiers, to put them upon hard adventures, it is not wisdom to venture a fresh-water Souldier upon difficult services. God will not put new Wine into old bottles: as it is in acting duties, so in sufferings. And as Christ orders the word in such wisdom, that he will not have counsel given to any soul, who is unprepared to receive it, or unable to bear it. John 16. 12. I have many things yet to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now; therefore I will defer until you have got more strength: So God saith of a young Christian, one that is newly come in; thou hast great afflictions to undergo before thou dies't, but thou art not fit to bear them yet, I will defer thy trial till thou art grown more hardy, through more communion with me, to fit thee for that encounter. As our Lord Christ told Peter (Joh. 21. 18.) When thou wast young, thou girdest thy self, and walkedst whether thou wouldest; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whether thou wouldst not. That is, when thou wast young and unexperienced, thou enjoyedst thy liberty; but when thou shalt be grown older in years, and stronger in grace, thou shalt willingly stretch forth thy hands, and quietly suffer thy self to be bound to the Cross (Peter was not nailed as Christ, but tied to the Cross) and there die in witness of my truth; For this Christ spake, signifying by what death he should die, and glorifie God, ver. 19.

Fifthly, In that he saith, Why hast thou set me as a mark against thee? Why dost thou run thus against me? Observe,

Man in sinning, runneth contrary to God; and God in afflicting, seemeth to run contrary to Man.

Every act of sin is a direct opposition unto God: we set God as a mark, and shoot arrows of disobedience against him; sin is a missing the mark of duty, but it aims to hit the Lord as a mark, who charges us with that duty. In affliction God runneth upon us, and makes the transgressor his mark. Moses (Levit.26.41.) speaks both wayes; If your uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and ye acknowledge that ye have walked contrary unto me, and that I have walked contrary unto you; that I have made you a mark, and shot at you by my judgments, and that you have made me a mark, shooting at me by your sins; then I will remember, &c. So that our sinning is a walking contrary unto God, and Gods corrections are his walking contrary to us: There is an excellent expression, noting how sin strikes, and (as it were) shoots at God (Job 15.25,26.) He stretcheth out his hand against God (speaking of a wicked man) and strengthneth himself against the Almighty: (here this word is used) he runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick boſs of his bucklers. See how he deſcribes a wicked man in his natural courſe; what doth he? He runs upon God, he runneth upon him, even upon his neck as a man that encounters an enemy, runs upon him, and ſets his feet upon his neck; he runneth upon the thick boſſes of his bucklers: a warrior hath boſſes upon his arms, both for beauty and defence. The enemy runs upon the very boſſes, and fears nothing; ſuch is a wicked man: He runs againſt God; and will not God run upon him? He will certainly be upon the boſſes of their bucklers, and upon their necks too one time or other, till they ſhall be forced to cry out, that as they have been burdens unto God, ſo now they are burdens to themſelves. Thus Job concludes in his own caſe.

So that I am a burden to my ſelf.

The former words are the cauſe, and theſe are the effect. Thou haſt ſet me as a mark: what follows? Oh I am a burden to my ſelf! The Septuagint read thus, ſo that I am a burden unto thee; or, ſo that I am burdenſome to thee. And then his meaning may be conceived thus; Lord, thou ſetteſt me as a mark, ſo that I become burdenſome unto thee; I have ſuch a weight of afflictions upon me, that I am forced to complainings and expoſtulations, wherein I am afraid I am burdenſome to thee; as poor ſuiters, when they cry long in the ears of a Judge or Magiſtrate, he ſaith, forbear, you are very troubleſom, very burdenſom to me.

Sum ſuper te onus. φόρτιον. alii vertunt φορτικόν. onerioſus, moleſtus, quo alludit ur ad importunos peccatores, qui auribus Iudicum perſtrepunt.

The Rabbins obſerve, that this was the ancient reading of the Text, I am a burden unto thee, and that the Scribes, who wrote out the Bibles in Hebrew, made this alteration, a burden to my ſelf; becauſe they conceived it was unbecoming the Majeſty of God, that Job ſhould ſay, he was a burden to him. There is a general truth in that Tranſlation, a burden unto thee: The ſins of man are burdenſome to God, the frowardneſs and impatience of men are burdenſome unto God; But I conceive our tranſlation carries the ſence fairer, in a reflection upon his own tired ſpirits, So that I am made a burden to my ſelf, that is, thou doſt even throw me upon my ſelf, whereas heretofore thou waſt wont to bear me, and take my burden upon thy ſelf. Alas, I faint, I cannot ſtand under my ſelf, I am weary of my life, becauſe I am left alone to bear it, I know not what to do with my ſelf, I am ſo burdenſome to my ſelf. Hence obſerve, עליך tibi quod Scribæ mutarunt in עלי mihi, quod indignum divina majeſtate arbitrarentur, ut homuncio ſi oneri eſſet. Ab. Ez, Druſ.

First, Outward afflictions, poverty, ſickneſs, want, &c. are burdens, and they make a man burdenſome to himſelf.

It is a great burden to have our comforts taken away from us. The removing of comforts lies like a heavy weight upon the ſpirit; the removing of health from the body is a weight upon the ſoul; fear is a burden, care is a burden, and ſo is pain. Therefore God calls us to caſt all thoſe burdens upon him, Pſal. 55. 22.

Man is much born down by weight of natural corruption. Hence the Apoſtle calls it a weight, and the ſin which doth ſo eaſily beſet us (Heb. 12. 1.) or dangle about our heels to burden us, as long garments do a man that runneth. Our ordinary callings and affairs, left upon our own backs, preſs us to the earth, much more do our extraordinary troubles and afflictions. And therefore he adviſeth, Caſt thy burden upon the Lord (he aſſures in the next words) and he ſhall ſuſtain thee. As implying, that man cannot ſuſtain or bear his own weight. And though it ſhould ſeem we have ſtrength to ſpare for others, and are therefore commanded to bear one anothers burdens (Gal. 6.) yet no man of himſelf, no not the holieſt Atlas, nor the ſpiritualleſt Porter on earth, is able to bear his own ſelf, unleſs Chriſt be his ſupporter, who is alſo therefore ſaid to uphold all things by the word of his power, Heb. 1. 3. Becauſe no creature in a natural, or man in a ſpiritual capacity, can bear his own weight.

Thirdly, From the connexion between theſe two phraſes, Thou haſt ſet me as a mark againſt thee, ſo that I am a burden to my ſelf, what is it that makes my life to be ſo burdenſome to me? It is this, becauſe I am ſet as a mark before thee, that is, becauſe thou ſeemeſt to be an enemy to me: And ſo the Note from the connection is this,

That which preſſes and burdens the ſoul above all, is the apprehenſion that God is againſt us.

Job in many things looked unto God under theſe temptations with ſad thoughts, as if he were his enemy; ſo he expreſt himſelf in the ſixth Chapter, The poyſon of his arrows drinks up my ſpirits, he ſetteth himſelf in battel array againſt me. In theſe temptations and deſertions, this was the burden of his ſpirit, that God appeared as an adverſary; Why doſt thou ſet me as a mark againſt thee? Let the Sabeans and the Chaldeans ſhoot at me as much as they will, let fire and winds contend with me, and make me the mark of their utmoſt fury, I can bear all theſe. Job was light-hearted enough when he thought he contended only with creatures, and that creatures only contended with him, but in the progreſs of the trial, he finds God againſt him, withdrawing comforts from, and ſhooting terrors at him; now he is a burden to himſelf, he can bear this no longer. As Cæſar ſaid in the Senate, when he had many wounds given him, yet this wounded him moſt, that he was wounded by the hand of his ſon; What thou my ſon? So when a Believer looks this way and that way, and ſees many enemies, Satan and the creatures all in arms againſt him, he can bear all their charges and aſſaults; but if he apprehend God oppoſing and wounding him, he weeps out this mournful complaint, What thou my Father? what thou my God? Thou who haſt ſo often ſhined upon me, doſt thou darken thy face towards me, and appear mine enemy? Theſe apprehenſions of God, will make the ſtrongeſt Saint on earth a burden too heavy for himſelf to bear. That which cauſeth the moſt burdenſome thought in the Saints, is the inevidence of their pardon. Sin unpardoned is in it ſelf a burden, and our not knowing ſin to be pardoned, is a greater burden; but our jealouſies and fears that it is not pardoned, is the greateſt burden of all, and that which adds weight, yea an intolerableneſs to all other burdens. Hence Job in the next verſe, and with the laſt breath of his anſwer, points directly at that which pincht him.

Verſe 21. And why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſion, and take away mine iniquity? for now ſhall I ſleep in the duſt, and thou ſhalt ſeek me in the morning, but I ſhall not be.

In the former verſe, we found Job humbly confeſſing his ſin, and earneſtly enquiring of the Lord a reaſon of his ſorrows, why he had ſhot him ſo full of arrows, that now he was not ſo much wounded as loaded, and become a burden to himſelf.

In this verſe he ſues for the pardon of thoſe ſins, and ſo for the removal of thoſe ſorrows; that the bow might ſpeedily be unbended, and not a ſhot more made at his bleeding breaſt. In the anſwer of which ſuit, he deſires ſpeed and expedition, leſt help being retarded, come too late; for he profeſſeth that he cannot hold out this ſiege long, he muſt needs make his bed in the grave, and then being ſought for, he ſhall not be found.

And why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſions?

We may conſider the words two wayes.

In the { 1. Form / 2. Matter } of them.

In the form they are a vehement expoſtulation; Job's ſpirit hath been heated all along with the fire of his ſufferings, and here he ſpeaks in the heat of his ſpirit, and with fiery deſires after mercy: He keeps up his heart to the ſame height and tenour ſtill. There it was, Why haſt thou ſet me as a mark againſt thee? Here's another why, and why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſion? As before he was grieved to be ſet up as a mark for afflictions to aim at; ſo now he deſires to be made a mark for mercy to aim at.

I ſhall note one thing from hence, before I come to open the words; They who are ſenſible of the evil of ſin, will pray heartily for the pardon of ſin, Expoſtulation is earneſt prayer; expoſtulation is a vehement poſtulation, a vehement enquiring after, or deſiring of a thing; Why doſt thou not pardon my ſin? may be reſolved into this, O that thou wouldſt pardon my ſin! Or, wilt thou not pardon my ſin?

The

The matter of this Prayer requires ſuch a form, ſuch a vehemency of ſpirit in him that prayes. If there be any petition in the world, about which the ſpirit ſhould be fired, it is in this, when we pray for pardon of ſin.

Will not a man whoſe body is defiled by falling into the mire, call haſtily for ſome to cleanſe and waſh him? will he not ſay, if it come not ſpeedily, why do you not bring away the water there? ſin is the defiling and bemiring of the ſoul, and pardon is the cleanſing of it.

If a man be deeply and deadly wounded, will he have only ſome few feeble deſires, or make cold requeſts for a Chirurgeon? will he not call and call aloud? call and call again for help and healing? Sins are the wounds of the ſoul, and pardon is the only cure of it.

If a man hath broken his bones, will he not be very very earneſt to have them ſet again? Sin is the breaking of the bones, and pardon is their ſetting. How doth David cry to the Lord (Pſal. 51. 8.) That the bones which he had broken might rejoyce: Sin had broken his bones firſt, and the hiding of Gods favour from him, was a ſecond breaking.

If a mans peace, or the peace of a Nation be diſturbed, is there not earneſt crying (as at this day) to have it repaired and re-eſtabliſhed? Sin troubles our peace, the peace of the ſoul, and the peace of Kingdoms; Sin is the great make-bate, and pardon is the returning of our peace, and quieteth all again, and therefore no marvel if we cry out, Why doſt thou not pardon our ſins?

He that is greatly in debt, and fears every hour to be arreſted and caſt in priſon, is trying all friends to get ſecurity and protection. Sinning is a running in debt with God, and it brings us under the danger of his arreſt every moment; forgiveneſs cancels the bond: when the ſin is pardoned, the debt is paid, and the ſoul diſcharged; and therefore no wonder if in this caſe, we hear or make ſtrong cries, Why doſt thou not pardon our ſins? My ſon (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 6. 4. ſpeaking about ſuretiſhip) if thou be ſurety for thy friend (if thou haſt engaged thy ſelf for another) give not ſleep to thine eyes, nor ſlumber to thine eye-lids, deliver thy ſelf as a Roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler. Not to give reſt to the eye, nor ſlumber to the eye-lids, notes the hotteſt purſuit and greateſt intention of ſpirit about a buſineſs: Thus buſie Solomon adviſes a man to be who becometh ſurety for another. Then what ſhould we do, who have contracted huge debts our ſelves? How ſhould we in this ſence, give our eyes no reſt, and our eye-lids no ſlumber, till our ſouls be delivered, as a Roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler, that is, from all the power and challenge which the Law without us, Conſcience within us, Satan purſuing us, and the Juſtice of God threatning us, can any way make or have againſt the peace of our ſouls. That's the firſt thing, from the manner or form in which Job ſues for the pardon of ſin, his ſpirit doth not fall, he grows not flat upon this point, but is as high and earneſt here for the pardon of ſin, as in any of his requeſts for the eaſe of his pained body, or the diſſolution of it.

Why doſt thou not pardon my ſin, and take away mine iniquity? I ſhall firſt ſhew what is meant by pardoning and taking away; and then, what by tranſgreſſion and iniquity, and ſo put the ſence of all together.

Why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſion?

Διὰ τὶ οὐκ ἐποιήσας λῆθην τῆς ἀνομίας μου, accipiunt נשא tanquam à נשה oblitus fuit.

The Septuagint reads it, Why doſt thou not forget my tranſgreſſion? or bury it in the grave of oblivion, and the word may ſignifie to forget, as well as to take away. But generally it imports the lifting up, or taking away of that which lies heavy upon us, either in a moral, or in a natural notion, Hoſ. 11. 4. I was to them as they that take off the yoke; and becauſe pardon is the taking away, or lifting off of ſin, therefore it is often put for the act of pardoning.

נשא Tollere, levare, per Metaphoram donare id quod munera & dona in altum elevari ſolerent, ſicut ſacrificia cum Deo offerebantur.

Hence alſo it is applied to that geſture of the Prieſts, when they received gifts and ſacrifices, becauſe they were wont to elevate and lift them up. Hence Chriſt, the ſubſtance of all the Sacrifices, is ſaid to be lifted up; himſelf ſaith, As Moſes lifted up the Serpent in the wilderneſs, ſo muſt the Son of man be lifted up (John 3. 14.) We may ſay, as Aaron lifted up the Sacrifices at the Altar, ſo the Son of man was lifted up. This lifting up noted alſo the acceptance of thoſe Sacrifices, and the favour of God to thoſe who brought them. When Pharaoh beſtowed a great favour upon the chief Butler, Gen. 40. 30. according to his dream, he lifted up his head: Joſeph expounded it ſo, After three dayes, Pharaoh ſhall lift up thine head, that is, he ſhall freely pardon thy offence, and beſtow ſome great honour, gift or reward upon thee. And in this ſence it is proper to the Text, when ſin is pardoned, a mans head is lifted up, himſelf is advanced indeed.

The Lord proclaims his name in this tenour (Exod. 34. 7.) The Lord, the Lord, forgiving (or lifting up) iniquity. And, Pſal. 32. 1. Bleſſed is the man whoſe tranſgreſſions are forgiven, or lifted up.

Further, this word ſignifies, not only to take or lift off a burden from another, and lay it down; but ſo to lift it off from another, as for a man to take it upon himſelf, and bear it in his ſtead, from whoſe ſhoulders it was taken. And in this ſtrict ſence we are eſpecially to underſtand it in the point of pardon; for pardon is not the taking away of ſin from a man, and laying it none knows where; but ſin being taken off from a man, ſome other ſhoulders are prepared to bear it, even the ſhoulders of our Lord Chriſt, on him our ſin is laid; All we like ſheep have gone aſtray, we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all, Iſa. 53. 6. When the burden of debt was taken off from us, it was charged on Chriſt. He did not take or lift the burden of ſin from us, and throw it by, but he bare it himſelf; nothing but this could compleat the work of pardon; therefore it was alſo propheſied, Iſa. 53. 4. Surely he hath born our griefs, and carried our ſorrows. And (1 Pet. 2. 22.) Who his own ſelf bare our ſins in his own body on the tree, that is, in his humanity or humane nature, while he dwelt with us in the body. Body is not here oppoſed to ſoul, but includes it; as ſometime the whole work is laid upon the ſoul of Chriſt, not excluding his body, Iſa. 53. 10. When thou ſhalt make his ſoul an offering for ſin. By the whole man this offering was made, and the whole man bare our ſins on the tree. That paſſage, Mat. 8. 17. (where the firſt Propheſie of Iſaiah is quoted, is very emphatical) when Chriſt had healed many of their outward diſtempers, this reaſon is added, That it might be fulfilled which is written (ſc. Iſa. 53. 9.) himſelf took our infirmities, and bare our ſickneſſes. Now Chriſt took our infirmities, and bare our ſickneſſes, when he took and bare our ſins; when he took ſin, he took that which was the neceſſary fruit of ſin, our ſickneſſes and our ſorrows; for as in Scripture Chriſt is ſaid to be made ſin for us, that is, with the ſin he bare thoſe afflictions and ſorrows which are the conſequents of ſin; ſo here, when it is ſaid, he bare our ſorrows and our ſickneſſes, it takes in the bearing of thoſe ſins, which procured and produced thoſe ſorrows.

Τὰς ἀσθενείας ἔλαβε καὶ τὰς νόσους ἐβάστασεν. Aſſumpſit ſecum, atque recepit quaſi ad ſe trahendas ſtulit.

The Greek words uſed by the Evangeliſt, are full with this ſence, He took them to him, he received them upon himſelf; he (as it were) tranſlated them from poor ſinful man, to his own body.

The word alſo imports his taking our ſins and ſickneſſes upon him, as a veſture or garment, and ſo wrapping himſelf in them. We know our ſins by nature cloath us as a garment, ours is not only a burden, but a cloathing of ſin and filthineſs, Take away his filthy garments (ſaith the Lord concerning Joſhua the High-Prieſt) then follows, And unto him I ſaid, I have cauſed thine iniquity to paſs from thee, and I will cloath thee with change of raiment. Man ſaw not his own nakedneſs till he was cloathed with ſin, Gen. 2. Chriſt to anſwer that, cloaths and wraps himſelf with our ſins, as we our ſelves were wrapped about and cloathed with them; he cloaths himſelf with our ſorrows, as we our ſelves were cloathed with ſorrow. In which ſence (among others) Chriſt may be called a man of ſorrows; as we may call a man cloathed with rags, a man of rags; and a man cloathed with ſilk, a man of ſilks.

The ſecond word of the Evangeliſt, Mat. 18. 17. ſignifies to bear as a Porter bears a great burden; Chriſt took up that burden under which all the Angels in heaven would have ſunk; he took it up like a mighty Samſon, and carried it out for us. The Scape-Goat was a type of this, Levit. 6. 22. And the Goat ſhall bear upon him all their iniquities into a Land not inhabited; of a Land cut off and ſeparated from other Lands and people, figuring hereby the total aboliſhing of our ſins, which being carried into a Land, where no man dwells, ſhall be as loſt and gone for ever, not to be found when they ſhall be ſought for; who can find that, which is where no man ever was? Pardon'd sin is carried and (as it were) hid out of the sight both of God and man, for it is not; and that which is not, is not (according to man) to be seen. In allusion to all which, Christ (Joh. 1. 29.) is pointed at by the Baptist, with, Behold the lamb of God that takes away the sins of the world; he takes sin off from the world, upon himself, and carries it away no man knows whither. That for the first word, pardon, Why dost thou not pardon my sin?

who

עבר Est, 1. Simpliciter præterire. 2. Interire, perire, evanescere, mori.

The second word is rendred by our Translators, Take away, Why doest thou not take away mine iniquity? Others thus, Why doest thou not cause mine iniquity to pass away? Or; Why doest thou not put away mine iniquity? So we translate, 2 Sam. 12. 13. where assoon as David confest his sin, saying, I have sinned, Nathan answers, and the Lord hath put away thy sin; he hath made it to pass away.

The word signifies, first simply, to pass away or to pass by.

Secondly, To die, perish or vanish away, that which passes by us is vanished, as to us: So the word is taken, Psal. 37. 36. where David speaking of the flourishing estate of wicked men, saith, I have seen the wicked in great prosperity, flourishing as a green bay tree, yet he past away, and loe he was not: A man unpardoned, sees, or should see, his sins growing up as a mighty tree: sin unpardoned, flourishes like a green bay-tree, it roots in the soul, and guilt nourishes it; but when pardon comes, sin passes away, and it is not, because that which gave it sap is not.

Quando dicitur de mandato, pacto, juramento significat transgredi, violare, peccare.

Further, this word (which is very considerable) is applied to the committing of sin, as well as to the pardoning of sin: For when it is joyned with those words, The Commandments of God, the Statutes of God, the Word of God, or the like; it signifies to violate, to break the bounds, to transgress: for in sinning a man passes by the word and commandment of God, the precepts which God hath given, and the charge God hath laid upon him, he goeth away from all; when man sins, he passeth by the Commandment of God, and when God pardons, he passeth by the sin of man, or he causeth his sins to pass away.

Transire facis, i.e. impunitum relinquis, condonas.

So that this word, Take away, put away, or cause to pass, notes the removing of sin, both in the guilt and punishment; When sin is past by, all the punishments due to sin are passed by, the sinner shall never be toucht, or feel the weight of Gods little finger in judgement; when God comes with his revenges, he passeth such by, as in that Plague of Egypt, of the slaying of the first born, which was therefore called the Lords passover, in memorial whereof that great Ordinance was appointed the Jews, of keeping the passover, and eating the Pascal Lamb, Exod. 12. 13, 14. In this sence the word is used, Amos 7. 8. when God was resolved to punish and charge the sins of that people upon them, he saith, Behold, I will set a plumb-line in the midest of my people Israel, and what follows? I will not again pass by them any more. God came before, once and again, armed to destroy them, but when he came, he past by them, he put up his sword, he unbent his bow, he stopped up the vials of his wrath; when a cloud of blood and judgements hung over their heads, he sent a breath of mercy, and caused it to pass over them; but now (saith he) I will not again pass by them any more; that is, I will surely punish them, so the next words interpret, the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste.

Verbum Ebraicum העביר quoties in scripturis sanctis ex persona Dei ponitur, pro pœna accipiendum est, ut nequaquam apud eos maneat sed pertranseat. Hieron. in Amos. παρελθέτω. Non ultra dissimulabo ei scelera sua Pagan Mer.

Some translate that in Amos, I will not any more dissemble your wickedness or your sin; and that carries a fair sence, for when a man pardons or will not punish an offence, he seems to take no notice of it, for that (properly) is to dissemble a thing (as simulation is to pretend that which is not, so dissimulation is to take no notice, or not to hold forth that which is;) God passeth by and dissembles the sins of men in a gracious way, when he will not observe or look upon them to question or punish them.

The Greek word (Matth. 26. 39.) answereth this Hebrew, where our Lord Christ prayeth earnestly about the removal of the cup, Father (saith he) if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me; In the same sence that sin is said to pass away, the cup of Gods displeasure and wrath passes also away, when sin is pardoned: therefore Christ prayed thrice, that the cup might pass away from him, that he might not be dealt with as a sinner, but that there might be a course found out to spare him, and save the glory of his Fathers justice: Yet (he submits) not my will, but thy will be done, if it must not pass away, I am contented it should not pass. Thus far we have seen, what is meant by pardoning and taking away.

A word upon those two terms, Transgression and Iniquity (which are the objects on which pardoning mercy works) Why doest thou not pardon my transgression, and put away mine iniquity? Transgression and Iniquity, are words of great significancy: for in them all manner of sins, especially sins of a greater stature are comprehended.

The former, Transgression, notes a violation of the commands of God with a high hand, or a rebellion of the mind, when pride of spirit shews it self very much. There is a spice of pride in every sin: Because of pride (saith Solomon) cometh contention; all the contentions we maintain against the word and will of God, rise from the pride of our own hearts, because we cannot submit to the will of God; but in some sins, pride holds up her head more proudly. Such sins, this word notes, it is not (simply) any sin, but sin very proudly and rebelliously committed.

The latter word Iniquity, imports the crookedness and inequality of a thing; when it turns this way or that way, and extends not in a strait and right line. Hence it is applied to the vitiosity and perversness, to the crookedness and inequality of mans nature. Our nature is a crooked piece, and that makes all the crookedness in our lives. The Latines speak so, in a moral sence they call ill manners, and ill manner'd men, crooked men, and crooked manners. David, Psal. 51. 5. bewailed his birth sin under this notion, I was born in iniquity: And he that was first born in the world, applied this word to himself, saying, my iniquity (the perverseness, the crookedness of my wayes) is greater then can be forgiven, or made straight, Gen 4. 13. So that this word also (take it strictly) implies more then a bare act of sin, arising from infirmity, weakness or inanimadvertency; it rather notes those sins which are committed from a crooked purpose, from an ill or false bent of the heart: when the mind sees that which is right and good, just and straight, and yet turns to crooked paths, and follows that which is perverse and worse.

Peccata denotat quæ fiunt ex προαιρέσεως & destinata malitia seu proposito, cùm sc. mens videt quod æquum est, & tamen indulgens cupiditatibus sequitur deteriora. Moller. in Psal. 106. 6.

Take one thing further, This word in Scripture, signifies not only the act of such sins; but secondly, the punishment of them, Psal. 31. 10. Gen. 19. 15. And thirdly, it is put for the means of expiation or pardon, Hos. 4. 8. They eat up the sin of my people, and they set their hearts on their iniquity. But how did the Priests eat up the sin, and set their hearts on the iniquity of the people? Sin can make us but a hungry banquet. The Text bears variety of interpretations. But to the point in hand, sin is here put for the sacrifices offered up for sin, out of divers of which the Priests had a portion for themselves to eat; so that the Prophet here describes the horrible prophaneness of those degenerate Priests, who set their hearts upon the sacrifices, because themselves were fed by them; not because the people came to seek the favour of God, and make their peace by them when they had sinned. As Physitians may be said to eat the diseases of the people, and set their hearts upon their sicknesses, when they (because their own gain is in it) are pleased to hear of spreading sicknesses, &c. Or as Lawyers, eat the contentions and quarrels of the people, when they are glad to hear of Suits, &c. because they grow rich by it. So those base-spirited Priests were said to eat the sins of the people, and set their hearts on their iniquities, because they were glad to hear of a multitude of sacrifices, their provisions being enlarged by them. So that then iniquity is the sacrifice for iniquity, in which sence also Christ is said to be made sin for us, namely a sacrifice for sin, 1 Cor. 5. 21.

From the words thus opened, we may Observe,

First, To whom Job addresseth himself for pardon, is it not unto God? And why doest not thou pardon my transgression?

God only can pardon sin.

Pardon is his act, his proper and peculiar act, he can do it, and none can but he. We read it among his Royal titles (Exod. 34. 7.) the Name of God is proclaimed in this stile. The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and in truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin. Pardoning sin, is put the last of those seven Attributes in which the Lord manifested himself to Moses, as being that wherein all the former are summ'd up, and into which they conveigh their several blessings, to make man compleatly blessed; or to shew that none can be a pardoner of sin, but he who is vested with all those fore-going glorious titles, and therefore none but God alone. Hence the Prophet Micah (Chap. 7. 18.) puts the question, and challenges all the world; Who is a God like unto thee, pardoning iniquity? Shew me one if you can, there is no sin-pardoning God besides thee. Who is a God like unto thee? Pardoning; As if the Prophet had said, some will be or have been offering at this work, but they all have been or will be found meat bunglers at this work; None can pardon as thou doest. None can pardon, 1. So freely. 2. None so fully. 3. None so continually. 4. None so eternally. 5. None so indifferently, whether in respect of sinners or sins as thou doest. It is all one to thee what the sins are, and all one to thee whose the sins are, so they come to ask thy pardon. And that which is a disadvantage to ask pardon of man, is an encouragement to ask it of God, the greatness of our sins. The Psalmist did, and any man may make that his plea, Lord pardon my sin, for it is great. Dare any be a competitor with God in this work? The Pharisees put the question right, if they had not mistook the person to whom they put it, Mark 2. 7. Who is this that forgiveth sins? none can forgive sin but God alone. Again, sin (in one sence) is committed only against God, and for that reason also God only is the pardoner of it, Psal. 51. Against thee only have I sinned. Only the creditor can remit the debt, and he the offence to whom we have done the wrong. God is wrong'd in all sins chiefly, and the wrong is so much his, that it may well be called only his, therefore without him no pardon.

But man is charged to forgive his brother, Luke 17. 4. Forgive thy brother seven times; and Christ hath taught us to pray for the forgiveness of our trespasses, as we forgive those that trespass against us, Matth. 6. 12.

I answer, there are two things in all Second-table sins; First, Disobedience against God; Secondly, Injury to man; That which man can, or is required to forgive and be a pardoner of, is only the injury done unto himself, so as not to revenge it; he cannot take off the sin against God, or stay him from taking vengeance.

But other Scriptures speak of a power committed to man, to remit and forgive sin, Joh. 20. 23. Whose sins ye remit are remitted, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained.

I answer, This power is not authoritative and magisterial, but ministerial and declarative: God hath set up such an institution, that man should pardon man, because many men, yea most men are not competent judges of their own estates, whether they be fit for pardon or no: Many wicked men would remit and loosen themselves when as their sins are to be retained; they see not their sins, as another man may and doth see them: The Apostle Peter could say to Simon Magus, Acts 8. 23. I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity; Simon Magus did not perceive it, he did not know his own condition, he flatter'd himself, and thought all well, because lately sprinckled with the water of Baptism; therefore some must declare these men bound, and hold them still under sin.

Again, there are others whose hearts are upright and sincere, such as are indeed reconciled to God, and all whose sins are pardoned; but they are not able to make it out, and they cannot clear up this thing from the word to their own hearts: therefore they need a helper, to declare them pardoned, for they cannot speak or declare it to their own souls: in such cases both for the conviction of presuming sinners, and the help of upright hearted, yet weak and doubting Christians, God hath left this power with his Ministers; Whose sins ye remit they are remitted, and whose sins ye retain they are retained. As in the case of Leprosie, Lev. 15. The Leper was brought to the Priest, and set before him as a Judge in that point; many were not competent Judges of their own diseases, they could not resolve it whether they had the Leprosie or no; some perceiving a scab or a sore rising upon them, thought (presently) it was the Leprosie, when indeed it was not, and so wronged themselves; Others who were indeed infected, would not be perswaded that they were, therefore the Priests office was to determine these cases, to bind and restrain, to loosen and let them go as he saw cause: In which ceremonial practice, we have the shadow of this Gospel practice, in the power of remitting or retaining, of binding or of loosing sin, according to the various conditions of men. Yet all this while God keepeth the great work in his own hand, he is the pardoner, and therefore Job (as the whole tenor of the Scripture rules it) made his address to him, Why doest not thou pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity?

Secondly, From these expressions about the pardon of sin, we may learn what the pardon of sin is; Pardon of sin, is the removing or the lifting off, the passing away of sin from the sinner; that properly is pardon of sin. Scripture language is very various and copious about this thing, and yet all runs into this general; I shall instance some of them.

First, Pardon is often expressed by a metaphor from paying of a debt, 1 Joh. 2. 12. I write unto you little children, because your sins are forgiven you; the word notes your sins are paid, your debts are satisfied; the same word the Apostle useth, Rom. 8. 32. in reference to the sufferings of Christ, God spared not his Son; He did not spare him the debt, that is, he neither forgave the whole, nor compounded with him to take half, or a part, and remit the rest; no, he made him pay all fully down. So to be pardoned, notes the sparing of the debt, letting the debt pass, without calling us to account about it.

Secondly, Pardon of sin is the removing it out of sight, (Isa. 38. 17.) Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back, saith Hezekiah, that is, thou hast put them out of thy sight. As when man is said, to cast the word of God behind him; Psal. 50. 17. or behind his back, Nehem. 9. 26. The meaning is, he regards it not at all to obey it; so when God casts the sin of man behind his back, the meaning is, he will not regard or see it at all to punish it. That phrase used by the Prophet Micah, is of the same importance, though of a deeper sence, Chap. 7. 19. Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the Sea. Who can dive thither to fetch them up? But may they not rise up or swim out of themselves? Surely no; our sins are not cork or wood, but they are iron or lead, they are like stone, or like a mil-stone. To shew how irrecoverably the Egyptians were destroyed in the Red-sea, it is said, they sank like lead in those mighty waters (Exod. 15. 10.) and to shew how irrecoverably Babylon shall be destroyed, the Holy Ghost saith, that Babylon shall be like a great Mil-stone cast into the Sea by a mighty Angel (Rev. 18. 21.) The casting of a stone, iron or lead into the Sea, was anciently the Emblem of everlasting forgetfulness, or of a resolution never to recal that which was resolved. * A learned Hebrician observes, that it was a custom among the Jews, to take those things which they abominated as filthy and unclean, and cast them into the Sea; which act noted either the purging of them, or the overwhelming them out of sight for ever: And a like usage, is noted by † a reporter of the manner of the Americans, that those barbarous people either desciphering some wicked thing upon a stone, or making a symbole or sign of it, used to throw it into a River which should carry it down into the Sea, never to be remembred.

Thirdly, Pardon of sin is noted by washing and purging, to shew that the filthiness of it, is removed from us, Psal. 51. 2.

Fourthly, By covering, Psal. 32. 1. and by not imputing, ver. 2.

Fifthly, By blotting out, Isa. 43. 25. and bloting out as a thick cloud, Isa. 44. 22. All these notions of pardon concur in this one, that sin passes away, is lifted up and taken off from the conscience of the sinner when it is pardoned: The sum of all which is read in that one Text, Jer. 50. 20. In those dayes, and in that time, saith the Lord, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none, &c. (why?) For I will pardon them, whom I reserve. So that pardoned pardoned ſin in Gods account is no ſin, and the pardoned ſinner, is as if he had never ſinned: Forgiveneſs deſtroyes ſin, as forgiving a debt deſtroyes the debt, and cancelling a Bond, deſtroyes the Bond. Obſerve, Thirdly, When ſin is pardoned, the puniſhment of ſin is alſo pardoned.

Both words ſignifie both the puniſhment and the ſin; and Job having complain'd that he was ſet up as a mark, and wounded by ſharp afflictions, now ſeeks eaſe in the ſureſt and ſpeedieſt way, the pardon of ſin. Why doeſt not thou pardon my tranſgreſſion, &c.

There are three things in ſin; The inward matter, the foul evil, the ſtock, the root of ſin, which is natural corruption dwelling in us, and flowing out by actions. Secondly, The defilement and pollution of ſin: Thirdly, The guilt; when we ſay ſin is pardoned or taken away, it is not in the former (though in pardoned perſons corruption is mortified, and the actings of it abated) but in the latter, the guilt is taken away which is the obligation to puniſhment, and ſo the puniſhment is taken away too: nothing vindictive or ſatisfactory to the juſtice of God, ſhall ever be laid upon that ſoul whoſe ſin is pardoned: Hence Iſa. 33. 24. the Prophet fore-ſhewing, how happy a pardoned people ſhall be, aſſures them, The Inhabitant ſhall not ſay, I am ſick, the people that dwell therein, ſhall be forgiven their iniquity; When iniquity is forgiven, our infirmity is cured: When the ſoul is healed, the body ſhall be recovered, both the body natural, and the body politick. Plague, and ſword, and famine, and death, all theſe evils go away, when ſin goes; Judgments are nothing elſe but unpardoned ſins; ſin unpardoned is the root which giveth ſap and life to all the troubles which are upon man or Nation: And as ſin committed, is every judgment radically, that is, there is a fitneſs in ſin to produce and bring forth any evil upon man; ſo pardon of ſin is every mercy radically; when you have pardon, from thence every other particular mercy ſprings; you may cut out any bleſſing, any comfort out of the pardon of ſin, particular mercies are but pardon of ſin ſpecificated or individuated, brought into this or that particular mercy; of all bleſſings you may ſay, This is pardon of ſin, that's pardon of ſin, and t'other is pardon of ſin. Forgiveneſs deſtroyeth that wherein the ſtrength of ſin lies, it deſtroyeth our guilt, and to us aboliſheth the condemning power of the Law: in theſe the ſtrength of ſin lies. Hence when the people of Iſrael had committed that great ſin in making the golden Calf, the firſt thing Moſes did, was to pray for the pardon of ſin, and he did it with a ſtrange kind of Rhetorick, Exod. 32. 32. Oh, this people have ſinned a great ſin, and have made them gods of gold. And now if thou wilt forgive their ſin; what then Moſes? There's no more ſaid; Moſes is ſilent in the reſt, it is an imperfect ſpeech: a pauſe made by holy paſſion, not the fulneſs of the ſentence. Such are often uſed in Scripture, as Luk. 13. 9. And if it bear fruit, what then? Our own thoughts are left to ſupply the event: our Tranſlators add, well. The Greek Tranſlators ſupply that in Exodus, thus, If thou wilt forgive them the ſin, forgive them: We may ſupply it with the word in Luke, If thou wilt forgive them, well. As if Moſes had ſaid, Lord forgive them, and then though they have done very ill, yet, I know it will be very well with them; God cannot withhold any mercy, where he hath granted pardon, for that with the antecedents and requiſites of it, is every mercy. Moſes knew what would follow well enough if they were pardoned, and what if they were not: therefore he adds, And if not, blot me I pray thee out of thy book which thou haſt written; If their ſins muſt ſtand upon record, Moſes would not; he knew if they were an unpardoned people, they were an undone people, all miſeries would quickly break in upon, yea overwhelm them, and he deſired not to out-live the proſperity of that people. If Iſrael muſt bear their ſins, they muſt alſo bear the wrath of God, and if their ſins be but taken off, then his love is ſetled on them: God gives Quailes ſometime, but he never gives pardons in anger. Obſerve, Fourthly, The greateſt ſins fall within the compaſs of Gods pardoning mercy.

The words in the Text are of the higheſt ſignification; Job ſpeaks not in a diminutive language, he is willing to lay load upon himſelf; they whoſe hearts are upright will not ſtand mincing the matter, and ſay they have ſins, but theirs are ſmall ones, ſins not grown to the ſtature of other mens. As the ſins of a godly man may be very great ſins, ſo (when they are) he acknowledges that they are. I know not where to ſet the bounds in regard of the nature or quantity of ſin; what ſin is there which a wicked man commits, but a godly man (poſſibly) may commit it, excepting that againſt the Holy Ghoſt? Theſe Job did, and the Saints may put to God in confeſſion: and as he did not, ſo they need not be diſcouraged to ask pardon for them, becauſe they are great. The grace of the Goſpel is as large as any evil of ſin the Law can charge us with. The grace of the Goſpel is as large as the curſe of the Law; whatſoever the Law can call or ſhew to be a ſin, the Goſpel can ſhew a pardon for it; what ever the Law can bind us with, the Goſpel can unlooſe. The Mercy-ſeat covered the whole Ark; The Mercy-ſeat noted the forgiveneſs of ſin; and if you read the deſcription of it (Exod. 25.) you ſhall find that it was exactly, to a hairs breadth, of the ſame dimenſions with the Ark, wherein the Law was put; intimating that there was mercy and pardon for ſin, let it come out of any part of the Law, laid up in that Ark. As the leaſt ſins muſt of neceſſity have a pardon, ſo the greateſt ſins are in a poſſibility of pardon: And the truth is, there is no ſin, as it is an Anomy, a tranſgreſſion of the Law, without the compaſs of pardon. It is not the malignity of the ſin, but the malignity of the ſinner, that makes it incurable; the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt is not unpardonable, becauſe there wants mercy large enough to pardon it, but becauſe it refuſeth the mercy which ſhould pardon it, and the medicine that ſhould heal it.

Fifthly, Obſerve who it is that here preſſeth thus for pardon; it is Job, and was Job never pardoned till now? Or was this (think you) the firſt time that ever Job prayed for pardon? Had not Job thought of this buſineſs before? Without queſtion he had; he was one of whom God gave this teſtimony, that he was a juſt and an upright man, one that feared God and eſchewed evil; He that did all this, and was all this, muſt firſt be in favour with God, and yet Job crieth out, Why doſt thou not pardon my tranſgreſſion? Whence Obſerve,

They whoſe ſins are pardoned, muſt yet pray for the pardon of ſin.

Yea, they who upon good grounds, have aſſurance, that their ſins are pardoned, muſt yet pray for the pardon of their ſins, 2 Sam. 12. 13. When Nathan told David, God hath put away thy ſin; he aſſured him that he was pardoned, and doubtleſs the heart of David opened by faith to let in that gracious meſſage; he was not faithleſs, but believing. Yet David in his penitential Pſalm penned afterward, prayes (O how earneſtly!) for pardon, again and again? That which a man is aſſured he hath, he may pray to have and injoy; make it ſo high, which ſome make the grand objection againſt this point. Why ſhould we pray (ſay they) for that which we have already? I ſay, a man may pray for that which he hath already, and is aſſured he hath. Chriſt himſelf was aſſured of the love of his Father, and that his Father would ſtick to him for ever, and he knew God was near unto him, yet he cries (Matth. 27. 46.) My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Which Queſtion may be reſolved into this petition, My God, my God, do not forſake me. When David had received a meſſage by the Prophet concerning a great temporal mercy, the eſtabliſhing of his houſe, that God would ſettle him and his poſterity in the Throne for ever, the Text ſaith (2 Sam. 7. 15.) he preſently went in, and ſate before the Lord, and there makes a moſt earneſt prayer; and what is it about? He prayeth that God would ſettle and eſtabliſh his Kingdom, verſ. 25, 26. And now O Lord God, the thing which thou haſt ſpoken concerning thy ſervant, and concerning his houſe, eſtabliſh it for ever, and do as thou haſt ſaid, &c. And let the houſe of thy ſervant David be eſtabliſhed before thee.

Might not the Lord anſwer (according to this Objection) why doeſt thou trouble me about this? Did not I ſend thee a meſſage even now, that I would eſtabliſh thy Kingdom? Doſt thou think I have forgotten my promiſe, or will be unfaithful to it? We find not David thus chidden for praying thus. Nay at verſ. 27. you ſhall ſee how David vid makes this the very ground of his prayer, Lord (saith he) thou hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house, therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee, &c. Even because thou hast revealed this unto me, that thou wilt build me an house, therefore upon this very ground I make this prayer, that thou wouldest build it. And to shew that he was full of faith the thing should be done, before he prayed it might be done, he adds, ver. 28. Thou art that God, and thy words be true, and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant. Now therefore let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant. No man could be fuller of assurance, or fuller of prayer then David was. Likewise Christ knew and was assured, that his sheep, his elect people should continue for ever, and that none should be able to take them out of his hand, yet how abundantly doth he poure forth his spirit in prayer about these things? John 17. Again, Christ was assured he should be delivered and upheld in death, yet in the dayes of his flesh he offered up prayers and supplications with strong cries and tears to him that was able to save him from death, and he was heard in what he feared, Heb. 5. 7. He was not afraid of the event, whether he should hold out and prevail or no, whether he should conquer and obtain the victory or no, he doubted not the success of this war, though it were with principalities and powers; his fear was only a natural passion, which he took upon him, when he took our nature upon him. He was certain of the issue, and knew he should carry the work through against all the armies of hell, he would never have undertaken it else; yet he prayeth with strong cries that he might be strengthened. So then it is no argument, because a Believer knoweth his sin is pardoned, that therefore he should not pray for pardon; for many things of which there was clear and certain evidence that they were or should be, have been prayed about; it is our duty, for it hath been the practice both of Christ and of his people to pray in such a state.

Further we may answer, matters of faith are of two sorts.

First, Such as as are fully accomplished, acted and compleated in all the parts and circumstances of them; for, and about such things we are not to pray. No man is to pray for the redemption of the world; for that is a thing past, and yet it is a matter of faith; but the pardon of sin though it be compleat in it self, and a matter of faith too, yet it is compleating and perfecting every day more & more. Pardon given us, yet we feel not all which pardon gives: It is a setled act on Gods part, yet it is in motion on ours, that is, in a perfective motion; therefore, though we are assured that our sins are pardoned, and shall stand pardoned for ever, yet we may pray about the pardon of them.

Thirdly, Suppose a man know his sins are pardoned, yet he may pray to know it more, and that his evidences may be known yet clearer to him; for though sin cannot be more pardoned in respect of God at one time then another; yet in regard of man, it may. He apprehends the pardon of his sin more now then before, and may hereafter apprehend it more then now: And it is worth the while to bestow pains in prayer for pardon, to have the pardon a little more enlightned: The degrees of any grace or favour, as well as the matter and substance of them, are worthy all our seekings and most serious enquiries at the Throne of Grace.

Fourthly, He that hath assurance of the pardon of sin, is to pray for the pardon of sin, because he continueth still to sin: And though it be a truth that sin uncommitted is pardoned in the decree and purpose of God, yet we must not walk by the decrees of God, but by his commandments and rules. His decree pardons sin from all eternity; but his rule is, that we should pray for pardon every day, as we pray for the bread we eat every day, Mat. 6. 11, 12. We must not say, God hath pardoned all sin at once, therefore no matter to ask it again; or I have once had the sight of pardon. and therefore the sight of sin shall never trouble me; seeing we are directed to search our hearts for sin, and to seek to God for pardon continually. So long as we sin, it becomes us to be suitors for the pardon of sin. He that hath ceased to sin, may cease to ask the forgiveness of sin, till then, I know neither rule nor promise that gives a dispensation for this duty.

To close this point, there are two cases wherein Believers are especially to renew their suits about the pardon of sin.

First (which though it be lamentable, yet it is possible) in the case of falling into scandalous and gross sins: These not only weaken assurance, and benight the soul, but exceedingly dishonour God, and grieve the holy Ghost. This caused David to pray and cry for the pardon and purging of his sin as freshly and as strongly, as if he had never received a pardon, or any evidence of Gods love (of which yet he had great store) before that day, Psal. 51.

Secondly, In times of great troubles and trials, whether personal or national, the Saints re-inforce prayer about pardon. This was Job's case, his personal afflictions occasioned to beg the remission of sins; and not only remission for sins then committed, but for all the sins he had committed either before or after conversion. Even our formerly pardoned sins need pardon; when we lose the sight of pardon, and when the soul hath no visions, but visions of terrour, it must seek visions of peace in the free grace of God, renewing and sealing pardon in the blood of Jesus Christ.

Job having thus breathed his spirit in arguings, complaints and prayers, moves the Lord for a speedy end and gracious answer; otherwise he sees no way but he must breath back his spirit into the hands of the Lord who gave it, and lay his body in the dust from whence it was taken.

For now shall I sleep in the dust, and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be.

לעפר אשכב
Propriè ist cubare, hinc mortui שכבים vocantur, ut etiam ישנים
Nunc in pulvere dormiam. Vulg. Lat. ἐν γὰρ χώματι λεῖος ἔσομαι.

Now shall I sleep in the dust.] What he means by this sleep hath been handled (chap. 3. 13.) where it was shewed that death is called a sleep, why and in what manner death is a sleep. The word here translated to sleep, signifies properly to lie down; but the sence is the same, because men lie down when they compose and fit themselves to sleep. And the dead are called down-liers as well as sleepers in the Hebrew. The Septuagint reads it, Now shall I go to the earth. David speaks near this language, Psal. 22. 15, Thou hast brought me to the dust of death.

Observe hence whither we are travelling, and where we must take up a lodging for our bodies ere long. They whose heads are highest, they who lie in beds of Ivory, must lie down in a bed of earth, and rest their heads upon a pillow of dust. Most sleep in the dust while they live, but all must sleep in the dust when they die: Earthly men have earthly minds, and they cannot rest but in earth, for it is their center. Only he who hath laid up his heart in heaven, can comfortably think of laying down his head in the dust.

Further it is remarkable in how pleasing a notion Job speaks of death when his life was most unpleasant to him. He complained of restless nights in vers. 3, 4, 13, 14. of this Chapter; yet he could think of a time when he should lie quietly in his bed, and not have so much as a waking moment, or a distracting dream. And when he was once gone to this bed, the curtains of darkness being close drawn about him, he should open his eyes no more till the eyelids of that eternity-morning opened; therefore he concludes,

Thou shalt seek me in the morning (sc. of time) but I shall not be.

Si diluculaveris me, fiet ellipsis verbo.

In the Hebrew, Thou shalt seek me in the morning is but one word; and some cut out a Latine word fit to serve it. We may English it strictly to the Letter, If thou morning me, that is, if thou comest to seek me (as the force of this word hath been formerly given) with never so much diligence and care, I shall not be found, thou wilt not have Job alive upon the earth to bestow thy mercies upon;

For, I shall not be.] The Hebrew is, And not I, that is, I shall not be alive, I shall not be to be had, he means a non-existence, not, a non-essence; a being he should have, but he should not appear. It is as if he had said, Lord, I shall not be a subject capable of outward deliverances, and bodily comforts unless they come speedily; Lord, if thou wilt give me any help, give it, for death hastens upon me, as if it hoped to be too nimble for, or to out-run thy succours.

Non ego, subaudi sum, vel ero.

Mr. Broughton's translation seems to intend another sence, which other of the learned Hebricians favour too. He renders the latter part of the verse thus, Whereas I lie now in the dust (referring it to his present condition; I am now lying in the dust, to be pitied of the keeper of men, so he himself expounds, Lord, I lie in the dust, a pitiful object, then) why dost thou not quickly seek me out, that I should no more be? which he cum jam in isto pulvere decumbam? aut quid non tempestivè requisiisti me, ut non essem? Jun.

he interprets, I would by a quick death be rid from these pains, As if in these words Job had again renewed his former desire of death; concerning which, many things have been spoken from preceding passages of his reply, I will not double upon them here.

But I take the former reading and meaning of the words, as most proper to the coherence and conclusion of Job's discourse; and so they are but a repetition or re-inforcement of what he spake at vers. 7, 8. There he said, O remember that my life is wind, mine eye shall no more see good, the eye of him that hath seen me, shall see me no more. Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not. Here he speaks the same thing in some variety of words, Thou shalt seek me in the morning, and I shall not be. The severity of my sickness threatens to prevent thy earliest preparations for my relief.

Thus (through the strength of Christ) some discoveries have been made about this first congress or charge between Eliphaz and Job. But Job hath not yet done; behold a second and a third Combatant ready to enter the List against him: And when these three have once tried their skill and strength upon him, they all three charge him afresh a second time, and two of them a third. Was ever poor soul held so hard to it as he? How much doth the life of Grace make him exceed man, when he (as a man) could scare be reckoned among the living? Truth and Grace will triumph and prevail, notwithstanding all the disadvantages of flesh and nature, Is it not strange, that a man should not be weary with arguing, while he often professes he was wearied with living? That while he could scarce fetch his breath for pain, he should do so much work (in a manner) without a breathing. For as the messengers of his troubles gave him no rest; But while one was yet speaking, there came another also and said, &c. And while a second was yet speaking, a third came and said, &c. So neither did these Disputants about his troubles. While Eliphaz and Job were yet speaking, Bildad answered and said, &c, While Bildad and Job were yet speaking, Zophar answered and said. What Eliphaz said, and Job answered in his first undertaking, you have heard: The opening of what Bildad had to say, and Job to answer, waits (till the Lord shall be pleased to vouchsafe it) a further oppertunity. What is now (as himself hath pleased to inable his unworthy instrument) offered, waits upon him for his blessing. To him all blessing is for ever due; on him let praises ever wait for all his blessings, Amen.

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE EIGHTH, NINTH, AND TENTH CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. VIII. Verſ. 1, 2, 3.

Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid,
How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? And how long ſhall the words of thy mouth be like a ſtrong wind?
Doth God pervert judgment? Or doth the Almighty pervert juſtice?

THE anſwer of Eliphaz to Job's firſt complaint, hath been opened in Chap. 4. 5. together with Job's reply, in the 6, & 7. In which he labours to diſ-aſperſe and vindicate himſelf from what Eliphaz had raſhly taxed him with, Hypocriſie, The name of an Hypocrite (like that of a Heretick) is ſuch, as no man ought to be patient under.

But while Job endeavours to clear himſelf in the opinion, or from the imputations of one of his friends, he runs into a further arrere of prejudices with a ſecond: Some of thoſe Arguments which he had framed to pay his debt to Eliphaz, and ſave his own integrity, being again charged upon his account by his friend Bildad the Shuhite; who preſents himſelf (a duty very commendable) as an Advocate for God; and he conceived there was but need he ſhould. Job in his reply having (in his ſenſe) wronged the juſtice of God, he takes himſelf obliged to ſtand up and clear it, to ſhew Job his ſuppoſed ſin, and provoke him to repentance, both by threatnings of further wrath, and promiſes of ſpeedy mercy. Thus in general.

More diſtinctly, there are four parts of Bildads ſpeech.

Firſt, A confutation of Job's reply to Eliphaz; and he gives it us ſhadowed by an elegant ſimilitude in verſ. 2. How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? And how long ſhall the words of thy mouth be like the ſtrong wind? There's a cenſure upon all that he had ſpoken.

Secondly, He gives us an aſſertive Queſtion, concerning the juſtice of God; to clear it from, and ſet it above, whatſoever might ſeem to ſtain it in the eyes of men. This we have at verſ. 3. Doth God pervert judgement? Or doth the Almighty pervert juſtice? Not he.

Thirdly, In the body of the Chapter he urges divers Arguments to confirm this concluſion, that, God is juſt; and there are three heads of Argument, by which he confirms it;

Firſt, From the example of Job's Children, and from his own preſent, with the poſſibility of his future condition, in caſe he repent, from verſ. 3, to 8.

The ſecond Argument is drawn from the teſtimony of antiquity, and that's laid down in verſ. 8, 9, & 10.

The third Argument appears in the ſimilitudes;

Firſt, Of a ruſh or flag, in verſ. 11, 12, & 13.

Secondly, Of a ſpiders web, in verſ. 14, 15.

Thirdly, Of a Tree flouriſhing for a time, but anon plucked up, in verſ. 16, 17, 18, and 19. Theſe are the Arguments and Illuſtrations of his grand aſſertion.

Doth God pervert judgment? Or doth the Almighty pervert juſtice? No he doth not. And thou mayeſt learn this leſſon from thy own experience, from the example of thy Children, from the teſtimony of antiquity, yea the withering ruſh, the ſpiders-web, the luxurious roots and branches of a tree may all be thy Maſters and inſtructors to teach thee this truth, That God is juſt.

The fourth and laſt part of the Chapter, ſets forth the favour of God, to thoſe who are faithful and ſincere: for having maintained the juſtice of God, and ſhewed how terrible he will be to hypocrites who deal falſly with him; he now mitigates and mollifies his diſcourſe, by proclaiming the goodneſs of God to ſinners repenting, yea (who are the worſt of ſinners) to hypocrites if they repent, pluck off their masks or diſguiſes, and truly humble themſelves before him. This is the ſubject of the three laſt verſes of the Chapter, Behold God will not caſt away a perfect man, &c. As if he had ſaid, Though God be juſt to deal with hypocrites, as he hath dealt with thee and thy Children, yet he will not caſt away the perfect and upright; ſhew thy ſelf ſuch, and he will receive thee. This he quickens by ſubjoyning the further ſeverity of God, to thoſe that ſhall perſiſt in their hypocriſie, verſ. 20. and in the cloſe of the 22. Neither will he help the evil doers, and the dwelling place of the wicked ſhall come to nought.

Thus you have both the general ſcope, and likewiſe the ſpecial parts of Bildad's diſcourſe, which will give us ſome help towards a more clear diſcovery of particulars.

Verſ. 1. Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid.

The ſpeaker is Bildad; I ſhall not ſtay upon the perſon; who this Bildad was, of what line and pedigree, was touched in opening Chap. 2. verſ. 11. and therefore I ſhall paſs to the matter about which he ſpeaks.

Verſ. 2. How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? And how long ſhall the words of thy mouth be as a ſtrong wind?

He begins very chidingly, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things?] The words import either, firſt, admiration, How long! As if he had ſaid, Could any man have believed that thou wouldſt have ſpoken ſuch things as theſe, and theſe ſo long! How ſtrangely haſt thou forgot thy ſelf, to twiſt ſuch a thred, and ſpin out a diſcourſe ſo ſinfully, ſo frowardly, ſo long?

Secondly, The words may carry a ſence of indignation in the ſpeaker, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? As if he had ſaid, I am not able to bear thee any longer, I cannot endure ſuch language, it grates harſhly upon mine ear, and is a burden to my ſpirit; for ſhame give over, hold thy peace, enjoyn thy ſelf ſilence, lock up thy lips, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things?

Thirdly, The charge of an accuſation may lie under theſe words, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? That is, How long wilt thou ſpeak vain and fooliſh words, indiſcreet and falſe words, dangerous and blaſphemous words, imputing injuſtice unto God? Art thou obſtinate and pertinacious? Wilt thou not yet hearken to the admonitions and wholſom counſel of thy friends? How long! Thus he taxes and cenſures him. How long wilt thou ſpeak? We have the like ſence in that Queſtion, Pſal. 4. 2. where David conteſts with his hardned enemies, O ye ſons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into ſhame? How long will ye love vanity, and ſeek after leaſing? How long, and how long? It is matter of admiration to think that reaſonable creatures ſhould be ſo unreaſonable to love vanity, and to love it long. His ſpirit riſes and boyls ſo high with holy indignation, to ſee men ſo fooliſh, that his mouth muſt run over in cenſure and accuſation, How long! The Text of Wiſdoms expoſtulation, Prov. 1. 22. (How long ye ſimple ones will ye love ſimplicity?) bears the ſame gloſs, one interpretation fits both. How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things?

Interrogatio ex adjuncto tempore aculeos addit reprehenſioni. Sanct.

Theſe things.] The demonſtrative particle may have reference to the words immediately fore-going, and only to them, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? That is, the things which thou haſt ſpoken in Chap. 6, 7. The language is undervaluing and contemptuous, How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? Such poor ſtuff. How long wilt thou trouble thy Auditors with ſuch matter, ſuch fruitleſs, frothy, crude, and undigeſted matter; matter ſo injurious, ſo diſhonourable to God, ſo unſavory, and unedifying to man.

Taking Job (under Bildad's apprehenſion) as having failed and erred in his diſcourſe, Obſerve,

First, Perſeverance in evil is worſe then the doing of evil.

How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? If thou having ſpoken once amiſs had'ſt recall'd thy ſelf, and ſtopped there it had been more excuſable; To outlaſh ſometimes in a word, may be a wiſe-mans caſe: but to make ſuch a continued ſtudied oration as this, and be out in all, and all to be an invective againſt Heaven, who is able to bear it? To ſpeak or do ill, though but once, is too often by once; To act evil often, is to double every act. The ſhorteſt time is too long to ſerve any luſt in. When the Apoſtle Peter (1 Pet. 4. 3.) ſaith, The time paſt of our life may ſuffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; his meaning is, the time paſt is too much: our luſts have got too much of our lives, as the world hath got too much of our loves. One minute is more then we owe to the ſervice of ſin. The ſufficiency here ſpoken of is an exceſs; the time paſt of our lives is too much to work the will of the Gentiles. We may not make an equal diviſion of our lives between our luſts and Chriſt, ſo much to Chriſt, ſo much to luſt. Nothing is more unequal then this equality. We can never ſerve Chriſt too long, nor ſin too ſhort a time. We can not beſtow too much of our breath in holy ſpeeches and conferences; nor can we beſtow two little in thoſe which are vain and ſinful. We may juſtly take off thoſe who are moſt conciſe and laconical in uſeleſs diſcourſes, with, How long will you ſpeak theſe things? Frothy words are the waſte of time as well as of breath.

Secondly, Note, Bildad rebukes Job for his laviſh language.

It is our duty to be watchful over our words.

How long wilt thou ſpeak thus; we muſt obſerve our own words, and know what we ſpeak. We ſhould ſtop our own mouths, and put our ſelves to ſilence, when the tongue grows unruly. It were very happy that ſome had power as well as authority over their own mouths, and knew how to put that bridle (ſpoken of in the Pſalm) upon their own lips. It is better for a man to ſtop his own mouth by prudence, then that another ſhould ſtop it by reproof.

Thirdly, Taking Bildad's ſuppoſition ſtill, that Job was in the wrong. Note,

It is our duty to give check to fruitleſs and frothy ſpeeches, much more to blaſphemous and wicked ſpeeches.

Bildad thought it high time to ſilence Job, ſeeing Job would not ſilence himſelf. The Apoſtle repreſents to Titus the tongue-folly of the Cretians, There are many unruly and vain talkers among you, eſpecially they of the circumciſion; and what muſt be done with theſe, who cared ſo little what they ſaid? He is counſell'd how to deal with them in the next words, Whoſe mouths muſt be ſtopped, who ſubvert whole houſes, &c. It is a ſin in the hearer to let another ſpeak ſinfully, without a ſignification of his diſtaſte. The word which the Apoſtle uſeth to Titus, is a metaphor taken from the muzling of barking howling dogs, when they open unſeaſonably and are unquiet; Rational conviction is a Goſpel-muzle, and an effectual ſtop-mouth for unruly talkers. And it is obſervable, that the Apoſtle uſeth this ſimilitude of muzling a dog, when he ſpeaks of thoſe of the circumciſion, concerning whom he had given caution in a very ſutable character (Phil. 3. 2.) Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the conciſion; that is, of thoſe who ſtood for circumciſion. Writing to the Philipians, he calls them dogs; and his adviſe to Titus is, they muſt be muzl'd. The noxious iſſues of the tongue muſt either be cured or ſtopped, Evil words corrupt (which is worſe then the corrupting of good air) good manners. An infection taken in at the ear, hath often poyſon'd the heart.

Fourthly, Taking Bildad as miſtaken (and ſo he was) in this reproof and cenſure upon Job, Obſerve, Reproofs are often grounded upon miſtakes.

It is eaſie to reprove, what we do not apprehend. Bildad perceived not the reach and drift of Job, and he falls heavily upon him with reproofs. A due underſtanding of his ſcope, would have given a fair comment upon his words. But Bildad clothes the ſpeech of Job in a ſence which he abhorred; and having put it in that ugly dreſs, he reproves and cenſures it accordingly. Many diſ-figure the opinions and doctrines of others with conceits of their own, and preſuming they hold or mean thus and thus, they diſpute not againſt the real opinion of the oppoſite party but their own diſguiſe. As the perſons of the Primitive Chriſtians were often put into Lions, or Bears-skins, by their barbarous and heatheniſh perſecutors persecutors, and then baited with Dogs; so are the opinions of many later Christians debated.

And how long shall the words of thy mouth be as a strong wind?

רוח כביר Spiritus sumitur pro halitu & per Metonymiam pro verbis, i.e. pro aere articulato, & per loquelæ instrumenta in verba formata. Bold.

The Hebrew, word for word, runs thus; And the words of thy mouth a strong wind: we resume in this latter clause, How long, and add, be like, to supply the sence. There is no tearm of comparison expressed in the original, yet the strength of one is implied, and therefore to fill up the meaning, we render, And how long shall the words of thy mouth be as a strong wind? Mr. Broughton translates it without a note of similitude, How long wilt thou talk in this sort, that the words of thy mouth be a vehement wind?

Words are air or breath formed and articulated, by the instruments of speech. Hence breath and words are put for the same in divers Scriptures (Psal. 33. 6.) By the word of the Lord were the Heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. Breath in the latter clause, is no more then word in the first, for it was a powerful word, which caused all the creatures to stand out in their several forms. So Isa. 11.4. He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips (or with the wind of his lips) shall he slay the wicked; It is not blowing upon wicked men that will slay them, but it is speaking to them; there is a power in the word of a Prophet, when spoken in the Name of Christ, which destroyes those who will not obey it, Hos. 6. 5. I have hewed them by my Prophets, I have slain them by the words of my mouth.

Græci & Latini Prophetas quosdam ex Hebræo Cabiros cognominarunt, ob insignem eorum ad extra gravitatem & loquacitatem idem dicti Corybantes. Bold.

Secondly, Bildad is conceived to allude to a certain sort or sect of men. For from Cabir here translated strong, the name of certain Poets or old Prophets is derived, whom the Greeks and Latines called Cabirs or Cabirims. These men had an affected outward gravity, yet were full of words, and much given to Battology, repeating the same thing over and over. Bildad ranks Job (say some) with those Prophets, How long shall the words of thy mouth be like those roming Cabirs, who by a needless multiplying of words, grated the ears, and burdened the spirits of all the hearers? Why doest thou speak, as if thou couldst carry the matter with empty words, and bare repetitions.

Quos Authores Latini Divos potes, seu potentes vocant Græci κάβειρους dicuntur ab hac voce, quæ potem sive potentem denotat. Drus. Ad magnanimitatem referri potest, quod corpore attenuato exhaustisq; viribus fortiter tamen persisteret in loquendo & respondendo. Cajet. Jobi oratio non fuit frigida & languida sed vehemens & concitata. Pined.

Thirdly, The word strong wind, may note the stoutness of Job's spirit, or magnanimity he expresst in his words. Job's language was not cold and chill, as if his breath were frozen, but he spake with height and heat; The spirit and courage of a man, breathes out at his lips; How long shall the words of thy mouth be a strong wind? When wilt thou yield to God, and lie humbly at his feet? What a heart hast thou? Thou speakest as big, as if thou hadst never been touched, as if God never laid one stroke upon thee; thou hast a weak body, but a stiff spirit: Thou speakest as if thou wouldst bear all down before thee, and by thy boldness, storm and bluster those out of countenance, who are here to give thee counsel.

Fourthly, Take in the similitude, How long shall the words of thy mouth be as a strong wind? That is, how long wilt thou speak so much, and speak so fiercely. For the word Caber is more then Gadol, which signifies barely great. Grammarians note, that it signifies both continued quantity and discreet quantity, multitude and magnitude. How many words wilt thou speak? and how great words wilt thou speak? Shall thy words be as a great, various, unfolded wind? (so the Vulgar) Wilt thou blow all the points of the compass at once, and like a whirle-wind, invade and circle us on every side.

Spiritus multiplex sermones oris tui. Vulg. πνεῦμα πολυρρήμων. Spiritus multiloquus. Sept.

Such words are like a strong wind.

First, Because of their blustering noise. There are stormy and tempestuous words. The tempest of the tongue is one of the greatest tempests in the world. Passionate language troubles both the air and the ear, makes all unquiet, like an enraged angry wind.

Secondly, In such words, as in stormy winds, there is great strength to bear all down before them, or to sway all to that point they blow for. As all the trees in a Forrest look that way which the wind sits: so all the spirits in any Assembly, are apt to turn that way, which words bearing a fair shew of reason direct. How often are the judgments and opinions of men, carried by words either to good or evil, to truth or error. And unless a man have good abilities of judgment and reason, to manage what he knows or holds, and to make himself master of it: It is a hard thing upon a large wind of anothers discourse, not to have his opinion turned. Hence the Apostle (Tit. 1. 11.) speaking of vain talkers, saith, Their words subvert whole houses; as a strong wind, so strong words blow houses down, They subvert whole houses; as that subverts the frame and materials of the house, so this the people or inhabitants of the house; when Christ breathed graciously towards Zacheus, he said (Luk. 19. 9.) This day is salvation come to this house; when false Teachers breath erroniously, subversion comes to many houses. The Apostle (Ephes. 4. 14.) using this similitude about the doctrines of men, adviseth us to look to our ground, and that we be well rooted; That we be no more children, tossed too and fro, and carried with every wind of doctrine; as if he had said, The wind that blows from the lips of seducers (unless you be well established) will carry you to and fro like children, or wave your tops up and down as trees, yea endanger the pulling you up by the roots.

Thirdly, Strong words are as strong winds in a good sence, for as many strong winds purge and cleanse the air, making it more pure and healthy; so those strong wholsom winds from the mouths of men, purge the mind of error, and cleanse the soul of sin: This is the special means which Christ hath set up to cleanse his people from infectious and noisom opinions. These he disperses and dispels by the breath of his Ministers, in the faithful and authoritative dispensation of the Gospel.

Fourthly, There are ill qualities in strong winds; some are infectious winds, they corrupt the air, conveying ill vapors to the places on which they breathe: So there is a strong, unwholsom wind of words, which carries unto sin or error. How often are the spirits and manners of men infected and poison'd by such a breath?

Fifthly, They may be compared unto strong winds, in regard of the lightness of them; the wind hath little solidity in it, and that's it which Bildad especially reproveth in Job; here are a great many words, much of the tongue, but here's little matter, Words without weight are but wind: when you gather them up, weigh and consider them fully, you can make nothing of them, there's no tack in them. Wind will not feed, no more will such words; but wholsom and faithful words are meat and drink, strength and nourishment to the soul: Sound discourse yields a well-tempered understanding, many refreshing morsels.

Lastly, They are like strong winds for the swiftness of them; words pass speedily, and fill all quickly; Their line is gone out thorow all the earth, and their words to the end of the world, Psal. 19.4. Another Psalm speaks as much of wicked men, Their tongue walketh through the earth, Psal. 73.9. As the wind runs from one part of the world to another; so do words, when they are sent upon an errand, either to do good, or to do hurt; therefore God chose the Ministry of the Word as an Instrument to save his people. And it is the fittest Instrument, running swiftly into the ears, and so conducting truth into the hearts of thousands at once. Upon the day of Pentecost (Acts 2. 2, 3.) when the Disciples met together, the Text saith, Suddenly there came a sound from Heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting: first comes a rushing wind; what followeth? There appeared unto them cloven tongues with fire. These represented the manner how the Gospel should be conveyed through the world: The Holy Ghost is sent in tongues, to shew, that by tongues tipt and inspired, acted and moved by the Holy Ghost, the word should be subdued to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. The tongue is the chief Organ of speech. And observe, with the tongues there comes a wind, a rushing wind, implying that words spoken by those tongues should be as a mighty rushing wind, and like that wind, which filled all the house where they sat, should fill the world, even all Nations with the sound of the Gospel; that, like a strong wind they should bear down the errors, sins and lusts of men before them, and like a wholsom wind, purge and winnow out all the filthiness and uncleanness, the chaff and dust of mens spirits. By cloven tongues, and a rushing wind, wonders have been wrought in the world. As those unruly talkers (Tit. 1. 11.) subverted, so those who talk by rule have converted whole houses; The wind of words blows both good and evil to the world; and we may as much encourage holy tongues, Let your words be long and long, a strong wind: as check a vain talker in the language of Bildad, How long shall thy words be a strong wind.

Vers. 3. Doth God pervert judgment? Or doth the Almighty pervert justice?

ἀδικήσει κρίσιν. Injuste agit judicans. Sept. Thesis est diendorum.

As if he had said, Job, thou hast spoken words which like a strong wind pervert all things, and turn them up-side-down. But, Doth God pervert? Doth he turn things up-side-down? This blasphemy is the interpretation of many of thy complaints. Thou seemest to lay this aspersion upon God but (with indignation I speak it) doth God pervert judgment.

The Question is resolvable into a vehement negation, God doth not pervert judgment, neither doth the Almighty pervert justice. He gives it with a question for greater emphasis, Doth God pervert judgment? Dost thou think he will? Far be it from thee to think so; Injustice lies far from the heart of God, Justice lies at his heart, He loveth judgment, Psal. 37. 28.

To clear the Text, I shall briefly touch upon the single terms; 1. God. 2. Almighty. 3. Judgment. 4. Justice: And then shew what it is to pervert judgment and justice; from all it will appear, how extreamly opposite it is to the very nature of God to pervert either.

Doth God.] The word is, El, signifying the strong God, the mighty God, the powerful God. In the second clause, Doth the Almighty pervert justice? We have the word, Shaddai, which name of God was largely opened at Chap. 5. v. 17. I shall not stay upon it here, but only as it respects the point in hand, and so there are three interpretations of that Title observable.

First, It notes God all-sufficient to do what he pleaseth, or to effect what he designeth: if he gives direction for any judgment to be executed, he is Shaddai, It shall be done. As he is El, a powerful Judge to give sentence, so he is Shaddai, an Almighty God to execute the sentence: There is no resisting his power, no getting out of his hands, his name is Shaddai.

Alii vertunt uberrimum, abundantem copiosum, cujus virtus, & munificentia, per omnia permeat, & cujus uberibus & bonitate omnia alantur & nutriantur, qui nullius indiget, qui bonorum nostrorum nulla cupiditate tangitur. Pined. ὁ τὰ πάντα ποιῶν. Sept. Quod sic explicant, qui cunctarum rerum naturas summo ordine & equitate constituit, is in te affligendo, quod justum est, non subvertet.

Secondly, The word signifies, one who hath all abundance, plenty and fulness in himself; As also whose power, goodness, and bounty, flow out to the supply of others, himself having no need to receive from any other. He is a fountain of all for all. Hence Shaddai cannot but do justice; He that hath abundance in himself needs not take bribes to pervert justice; Needy Judges are often covetous Judges; they who have not a fulness of their own, are under a great temptation to wrong others, to supply their wants. But he that gives to all, needs not receive from any. This consideration sets God infinitely above one of the strongest temptations to Injustice.

Thirdly, The word Shaddai, is rendred, The maker of all things. Will the Almighty, the maker of all things, who hath set the world in such an exquisite form and order, who hath given so much beauty to the creature; will he put things out of order, or do such a deformed act as this, pervert justice? He that is the maker of all things, and hath made them in number, weight and measure, will he turn the world up-side-down, or make confusion in the world? It is not possible he should.

So then the name Shaddai, in these three senses, is aptly applied to God, in opposition to the perverting of justice. As Abraham debates the matter with him (Gen. 18. 25.) Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? It is impossible for God who judgeth all men, to do an act of injustice unto any man. He that judgeth all can do injustice to none. God takes no advantage to be unjust, because none can call him to account for injustice. They should be furthest from doing wrong, who need not fear any appeal from them, or complaint against them, if they do wrong. The Judge of the whole earth hath none to judge him. He will do right to all, who cannot be judged by any.

Further, Consider those two words, judgment and justice.] Judgment and justice are often put in Scripture for the same, and when put together, the latter is as an epithite to the former, Psal. 119. 121. I have done judgment and justice: that is, I have done judgment justly, exactly, to a hair. Sometimes they have a distinct signification.

Facere legē & præceptū est facere judicium. Deus ideo leges suas judicia vocat, quod æquissima sunt, quæ præscribit.

First, Judgment signifies, that right which every man ought to do at all times (Psal. 106. 3. Isa. 56. 1.)

Secondly, The Law or rule it self, according to which every man is to do right, Levit. 26. 26. Psal. 19. 10. God calls all his Laws judgments, because they are all most just and equal. Judgment hath a three-fold opposition, by which we may understand the nature of it.

First, Judgment is opposed to anger, rigor and severity, Jerem. 10. 24. Correct me, O Lord, but with judgment, not in thine anger: That is, Correct me mercifully, moderately, and in measure: suffer not thy whole displeasure to arise; do not exact the utmost farthing. In which sence the judgments of God upon wicked men in Hell shall be without judgment: And thus to do a thing without judgment, is all one, as to do it without mercy. Ezek. 44. 24

Secondly, Judgment is opposed to folly, or to foolishness: Judgment is Wisdom; when we say, Such an one is a man of judgment, we mean, he is a wise man. Thus judgment is an ability to judge.

Thirdly, Judgment is opposed to injustice and wrong, which is the vulgar and common meaning.

We may take it in any of these senses here. As judgment is opposed to anger, so it is moderation in justice, Will the Lord pervert judgment? That is, Will not he be as moderate in executing judgment, as equity can admit? Hos. 11. 9. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger. I will not return to destroy Ephraim, for I am God and not man, the Holy One in the midst of thee, and I will not enter into the City. As an enemy having taken a City, to shew them some favor, saith, I will not enter your City with my Army, to spoyl and plunder you: so God speaks here, Though men be as wicked as they can, yet God will not be as angry as he can.

Again, Will he pervert Judgment, as it imports Wisdom? No, He walks exactly by the rule of Wisdom, of the highest and purest Wisdom. There are no mists or clouds of ignorance before the eye of his understanding. And as he hath no darkness, so no false lights.

Lastly, Take it as opposed to injustice; Will the Lord pervert judgment? Will he wrong any man? Carries he a matter sinisterly or partially? He will not do it.

משפט Judicium, jus & mos seu modus in judicando.

Again, As judgment and justice are taken precisely or distinctly.

Judicium est in vero absq; errore cognoscendo, justitia in tribuendo cuique quod suum est.

First, Judgment signifies due order in trying and finding out the state of a cause: And Justice the giving of sentence upon that tryal.

Secondly, Judgment is a clear knowledge of what ought to be done: And Justice is the doing of that which we know. Justice is an evenness and uprightness of Conscience, in passing every thing according to received light.

Judicium pœnam respicit, justitia compensationem bene actorū. Drus.

Thirdly, Some distinguish them thus: Judgment is in condemning those that are guilty; and Justice is in absolving and acquitting those that are innocent, or rewarding those who have done well.

Fourthly, Thus, Judgment respects capital causes, which are for life; and Justice respects civil causes, which are for estate or liberty.

Take them in any of these senses, or under whatsoever other distinction they are considerable. The Lord God El-Shaddai, is no perverter of either. He never disturbs or clogs the order of tryal: He is no hinderer of the sentence from due execution. He exactly understands every cause, and he awards what is due to every person. He wrongs no man in life or limb, in estate or liberty.

Thus we see what Judgment and Justice are: I shall now open what it is to pervert Judgment and Justice. The same word is used in both. *

Ista repetitiones divina eloquia multum commendant, sive eadem verba alta sententia sive aliis verbis eadem sententia repetatur, illa enim ejusdem rei resumptio, moram quandam in meditando & ponderando requirit, quod in Psalmis frequens.* August.

Doth

Doth God pervert?] Some tranſlate it, ſupplant Juſtice. And ſo it imports, ſecret, cunning wayes of injuſtice; for to ſupplant, properly is to come behind a man, and to ſtrike up his heels, and caſt him down, or to lay ſomewhat in his way, upon which he may trip or ſtumble, and then fall. God doth not ſupplant Juſtice, he layes no plots, he ſets no ſnares, to entangle or overthrow a man in his cauſe.

More largely, The word ſignifieth, To make crooked, and ſo it very well anſwers the point in hand. Judgment and Juſtice are both carried by a ſtraight line: They are the rectitude of our actions. To pervert Judgment, is to make crooked lines: So we have the word (Eccl. 1. 16.) That which is crooked cannot be made ſtraight. He means it of civil, not natural things, whoſe crookedneſs is often cured by art; but who can cure all civil evils? Man is not able by all his diligence to turn the courſe of things which God hath determined, though to him there appear much crookedneſs, and many diſtortions. Solomon himſelf makes this interpretation (Chap. 7. 13.) where he ſhews, that it is beſt to ſubmit to God, becauſe his will is irreſiſtible, and the effects of it unavoidable; Conſider the work of God, for who can make that ſtraight which he hath made crooked? So then, to pervert judgment is to make judgment crooked; or to make judgment (to which all things and perſons ſhould bow) to bow it ſelf down, as the word is alſo uſed, Eccleſ. 12. 3. In the deſcription of old-age, The ſtrong men ſhall bow themſelves; the legs and knees in old-age bow and double under us. To pervert juſtice is to creeple juſtice, to make it lame and halt. This word is tranſlated, to overthrow (Job 19. 6.) Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compaſt me in with his net. Job ſpeaks in a great paſſion, as if God had come upon him violently in judgment, and caſt him: We ſay a man is overthrown or caſt in his ſute. God overthrows men and Nations; but he never overthrows Juſtice. A man who overthrows his adverſary, may ſettle Juſtice. Job looked upon himſelf, as one againſt whom God had entred his action, and overthrown him in the ſute. Lamenting Jeremy cries out (Lam. 3. 59.) O Lord thou haſt ſeen my wrong (it is this word) Thou haſt ſeen how I am vexed, and wreſted by the hard dealings of men, judge thou my cauſe; Thou wilt judge me aright, and ſet me ſtraight again.

Judgment is perverted two wayes.

First, By Subtilty.

Secondly, By Power.

First, Some pervert judgment by ſubtilty; They are wiſe to do evil. The Lord hath infinite wiſdom, and ſo is able to go beyond and over-reach all creatures; he is wiſe enough to befool all the world: but he is not wiſe to do evil; His wiſdom is not a trap or a ſnare to others, but an unerring guide and light to himſelf.

Secondly, Some pervert judgment by violence and force: if they cannot untye the knot by craft, they will cut it aſunder by power; and if they have not law for it, they have will for it, and an arm for it, and it ſhall be done. The Lord can do what he will, but he hath no will to do what is evil. He can put forth as much ſtrength as he deſires, but he hath no deſire to pervert juſtice, or to act his power to over-aw and maſter it.

Further, To pervert judgment and juſtice, hath theſe two things in it.

First, To darken and obſcure the rule of judgment.

Secondly, To torture or miſ-interpret the rule of judgment.

First, Judgment is perverted by darkning and obſcuring the Law or rule of Juſtice. God doth not do ſo: He never caſts a miſt before his Word, or a vail over it, that he may act againſt it.

Secondly, Neither doth he miſ-interpret his Law. A good Law ill expounded is made the warrant of an evil Judgment. A gloſs corrupting the Text of the Law corrupts Juſtice. Where tongue and conſcience are ſet to ſale, the wit muſt find out ſomewhat to help the market.

The words opened invite theſe Obſervations,

First, That God is moſt exact in judgment, God is a juſt God.

It is a high truth, and we ſhould adore it, that whatſoever God doth, he is juſt in doing it. When Reaſon cannot reach, or make it out, yet Faith muſt; and we muſt honor God in what we cannot underſtand: The Lord is righteous in all his wayes, though his wayes are paſt finding out. For,

First, He hears every cauſe before he judges: He doth not judge one ſide before he knows the other, or judge any man before he hath heard him fully out: We ſee both (Gen. 11. & Gen. 18.) in thoſe two great acts of Juſtice, when God confounded the builders of Babel, and when he deſtroyed Sodom, I will go down and ſee whether it be altogether according to the report that is come up unto me. God needs no Intelligence to be brought him unto Heaven; neither doth he that fills all places go to any place to inform himſelf: but he ſpeaks thus, to note how exact he is in point of Juſtice; to ſhew that he deals with the Children of men, as a man: who hearing a report of ſuch a thing done, ſaith, I will not judge of it by what I hear, but I will go to ſee whether it be ſo or no. Without evidence of the fact, the ſentence cannot be juſt, though it may be right.

Secondly, He examineth and takes confeſſion, which is another point of Juſtice. So he proceeded with our firſt Parents (Gen. 3.) propoſing Interrogatories unto them, and then the Judgment is pronounced according unto what was confeſt; he judgeth them out of their own mouths, verſ. 17. Becauſe thou haſt done this, and harkned unto the voice of thy Wife, therefore, &c.

Thirdly, God proceeds by the evidence of the Law, as well as by the evidence of the fact; and this alſo ſets forth the exactneſs of his judgment: Theſe two things make judgment perfect; you muſt not only have the evidence of the fact, that ſuch a thing is done, but you muſt have the evidence of the Law condemning ſuch a deed. Though God himſelf be an everlaſting Law, and he may judge all from his own breſt, yet he hath given out a Law, which gives the knowledge of ſin. It is ſaid, Rom. 2. They that have ſinned without the Law, ſhall periſh without the Law; as if ſome ſhould be judged without Law: but he means without a Law formally publiſhed, not materially enacted. For he ſpeaks of the Gentiles, who were not within the hearing of Mount Sinai, and had not ſeen that formality of a Law written in Tables of ſtone; yet they had a Law written in their hearts: They that have not heard the Law publiſhed or ſeen it written in a Book, ſhall be judged by the Law written in their hearts, their conſcience bearing them witneſs, and their thoughts accuſing, or elſe excuſing one another.

Fourthly, God is impartial in giving judgment: He doth not ſtrike one and ſpare another, who is under the ſame condemnation; nothing can ſway or byas him, nothing can preponderate the ballance of Juſtice in his hand; you cannot put in any conſideration to ſway his beam, beſide the right.

There are three things which uſually cauſe men to pervert juſtice, the Lord is free from them all.

First, Fear of greatneſs: Some would do juſtice, but they dare not; the buſineſs concerns a great man, and to do juſtice upon ſuch, is, To take a Bear by the tooth, (as we ſay) or to play with the paw of a Lion. Now the Lord is not turned away for fear, nor defers he Juſtice for any mans big looks, The day of the Lord (ſaith the Prophet, Iſa. 2.) ſhall be againſt the high Oaks. He is El-Shaddai, the Almighty, the all-powerful God, and therefore cares not for the might or power of man.

Secondly, Hope of reward; that's another thing which cauſeth many to pervert judgment. With ſome their hope is ſtronger then their fear: They care not for the greatneſs of men, but they hope for gain. A bribe taken or promiſed clogs and obſtructs the courſe of Juſtice (Hoſ 4. 14.) Her Rulers with ſhame do love, Give ye; the Hebrew is, Her Shields; Magiſtrates ſhould be as Shields to the people to protect them; but what did they? They love, Give ye; that word pleaſed them. They were more pleaſed with receiving rewards, then with doing right. The Lord is above all gifts, he is Shaddai, he hath all in himſelf, and needs not that any ſhould give unto him; and he tells them expreſly (Ezek. 7. 19.) That their ſilver and their gold ſhall not be able to deliver them in the day of his wrath; offer thouſands of ſilver and gold, he will not ſtay judgment a minute for it; Prov. 11. 4. Riches profit not in the day of wrath; In the day of mans wrath they ſometimes will, but never in the day of Gods.

Thirdly, Affection and neareneſs of relation pervert judgment. Many have clean hands, free from bribes, and ſtout hearts free from fears, yet they are overcome with affection and relations; theſe put out the eye of juſtice. The Lord is above all relations. As he commands us in our cleaving unto Christ, not to know Father or Mother, Yea to hate Father and Mother, Wife, &c. (and those are nearest to us) that we may keep close unto Christ; So himself doth not know the nearest relation, to pervert judgement or do wrong in favor of it. Hence he saith of Coniah (Jer. 22. 24.) Though Coniah be as the signet upon my right hand, yet will I pluck him thence: Let him plead nearness (as men do, such a man is of your blood or alliance, pray spare him) God will not spare the signet on his right hand, that is, he will not stop justice upon any pretence of nearness or usefulness.

Etiamsi fuisset Jeconia mihi charissimus quem semper in oculis ferrē. Jun.

Fifthly, God is exact (take them distinctly) both in judgment and in justice. He is as curious in searching out the cause, as in sentencing the person. As ready to acquit the innocent, as to condemn the guilty: as careful to relieve the oppressed, as to chasten the oppressor: as zealous in rewarding those who deserve well, as in punishing those who do evil. Not to reward is as great injustice, as not to punish. What God hath promised shall be performed, and what he threatens shall be inflicted. He will neither discourage goodness by neglecting it, nor encourage sin by winking at it. He hath bread in one hand, and a sword in the other.

Pervertit jus, qui non punit improbos; pervertit justitiā, qui non remunerat justorum bona opera. Drus.

Thus we see the Lord is most exact in justice (Psal. 48. 10.) The right hand of the Lord is full of righteousness. His power and might are his right hand; and that right hand hath nothing but righteousness in it. Few men come to that of Laban, It is in the power of mine hand to do thee hurt, but I will not: most do as much hurt as is in their power. God hath all power in his hand, but he wrongs no man. As none have now any cause to say, that they have received wrong from the hand of God: so at last all shall confess they have not.

Further, Bildad speaking upon supposition, that God was wronged in justice, teacheth us,

That, It is a duty to vindicate the justice of God, whensoever we hear it wronged.

When we hear any wounding God in his faithfulness, truth, or justice, we should presently stand up to plead for him; What, will God be unfaithful? Will God pervert judgement? Will God be untrue? &c. Thus we should plead for God. When Jeremy could not make out the justice of God, he is an advocate for his justice, Lord, thou art righteous, yet let me plead with thee. He would not have the matter once questioned, though the manner was enquired. Observe,

Lastly, That, the judgments of God may be secrets to us, but they are never injuries to us.

Justice is in all the dealings of God, but his justice is not alwayes visible. His judgments are founded upon reason, when upon his will, for his will is the highest reason. God cannot be unjust, and he ever punishes those who are. He is so far from subverting judgment, that he subverteth Kings and Magistrates, yea, Nations and Kingdoms for subverting judgment; To subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approveth not, Lam. 3. 36. The Hebrew is, The Lord seeth not: That is, He doth not see it, to approve it; but he doth see it to punish it. He is an avenger of those who will not avenge the oppressed. And as he looks for judgment in all places, so especially among his own people, upon whom he bestows most mercy (Isa. 5. 2.) When the Lord had done so much for his vineyard, He looked for judgment, and behold oppression: for righteousness, but behold a cry. God makes privy search thorow a Nation to find this jewel: Judgment between man and man in commerce, which is, commutative justice; judgment from Magistrates to the people, which is, distributive justice: for these God is searching at this day; one of the greatest sins among us, is the perverting of judgment: And until judgment return to man, how can we expect mercy should return from God? (Jer. 5. 1.) Run to and fro thorow the streets of Jerusalem, and seek in the broad places thereof, if you can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that loves the truth, and I will pardon it. A Land is seldom fill'd with the judgments of God, till it is emptied of judgment among men. What a sad thing is it that there should be so many cries against injustice on earth, in a time when there is so much crying out for mercy from Heaven: That in such a time when the Judgments of God are upon our selves, we should not learn righteousness to act it among our selves! I am perswaded the Sword of War had been rusting in its sheath to this day, if the Sword of Justice had been used as it ought, both to punish offenders, and protect the innocent. And when the Sword of Justice shall be both wayes imployed, I doubt not but the Sword of War shall be sheathed again, and imployed no more, but be beaten into plow-shares, and our spears into pruning hooks. Keep ye judgment (saith the Lord by his Prophet, Isa. 56. 1.) for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed. God hath done terrible things in righteousness among us, and we hope he will do comfortable things in righteousness among us: seeing the righteous destructions of God have been upon us, and his righteous salvations (we hope) are near us, let not our righteousness be far off.

VERS. 4, 5, 6, 7.

If thy Children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression.
If thou wouldst seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty.
If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy Righteousness prosperous.
Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly encrease.

THese four verses contain the first confirmation of the former general Position, That God is just: which is resolved out of those Questions, Doth God pervert Judgment? Or doth the Almighty pervert Justice? He doth not. Then, God is just, there's the Position. And as that Position consisteth of two parts, so also doth this proof or confirmation of it.

First, That God doth not pervert judgment (taking judgment under that strict notion for punishing of offenders) he proveth by the example of Job's Children, whom God punished because of their transgression, as he conceived.

Secondly, That God doth not pervert justice (taking justice under that strict and distinct notion of rewarding and relieving the innocent) he proveth by the readiness of God to do Job good in case he should humble himself and repent, in vers. 5, 6, 7.

His Argument for the former may be thus conceived.

He doth not pervert judgment who punisheth those who have sinned against him.
But God hath punished thy Children for their sin.
Therefore he doth not pervert judgment.

His Argument for the latter may be thus formed.

He doth not pervert justice, who is ready to pitty as soon as an offender humbly seeks, sues and submits unto him.
But God is ready to help thee as soon as ever thou humbly seekest unto him.
Therefore God doth not pervert justice.

Thus you have the general sence of these four Verses, as Arguments brought for proof of the former point, that God doth not pervert judgment or justice. I shall now open them distinctly.

If thy Children have sinned against him.

There may be a two-fold sence given of these words.

First, Thus, Although thy Children have sinned against him, and he hath cast them away for their iniquity; yet, if thou wilt seek unto him, he will do thee good. Which translation makes the sence more clear then ours, If thy Children have sinned against him, &c. The one is a supposition of what might be; the other a concession of what was.

Secondly, By way of proportion, thus, As thy Children have sinned against him, so he hath cast them away for their transgression. And so Bildad argueth with Job upon the same principle that Eliphaz had done before, scil. that his sons and himself had exceedingly provoked God, and that therefore God had sent that judgment, and laid that heavy stroke upon them, If thy Children, or, although thy Children have sinned.

Against

חטאו לו

Against him.] That word is to be opened a little. The Hebrew is, Have sinned to him. Which is indifferently Translated, either before or against him; we take the latter.

Every sin is committed against God; that's the first. Sin is most opposite to God. It is against God in his Nature: against God in his Will: against God in his very Being. Sin would thrust God out of the world, if it were possible; and therefore it is rightly translated, They have sinned against him. No marvel if God do so much against sinners, when sin doth so much against him; but it is not a miracle, that God should do any thing, especially such great things for sinners, when sin doth so much against him? David (Psal. 51. 4.) saw his sin was so much against God, that he overlooks all others against whom it was; Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight; which some mis-interpret, as if, because he was a King, he could do no injury to his Subjects, and therefore saith, Against thee, thee only have I sinned. But, They who rule men, may sin against man; and David sinned in that act against man: First, By doing private wrong: Secondly, By giving publike scandal. The reason then why David spake thus, was because the sin he had committed was so much against God, that though he had grievously offended against man, in taking away the life of one Subject, the chastity of another, and by endangering the whole Army to compass a cover for his sin, yet in this, his sin exceeded in sinfulness, that he sinned against God; and therefore he saith, Against thee, thee only; or take it comparatively, the sin is so much against thee, that what is against any other is not worth the naming. God is not only wronged, but he is chiefly wronged in every sin. As, because in the wrong done to the life or estate of a Subject, the King is chiefly wronged, therefore all Inditements run in this stile, Against the peace of our Soveraign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity. Lastly, That place may be understood in the second sence of, Against thee, that is, Before thee; and so it seems to be expounded in the latter part, Against thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight; that is, though others took no notice of this, though it was done in secret (2 Sam. 12. 12.) yet it was committed clearly and plainly before thine eyes, thine eyes which are ten thousand times brighter then the Sun, beheld me in the darkness of that folly; and therefore against thee have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight; as noting, that though it were conceal'd and hidden from men, yet it could not be conceal'd and hidden from God. If thy Children have sinned against him.

Tibi, tibi soli.

And he have cast them away for their transgression.

Bildad's position is true in it self, but false in the application, If thy Children have sinned against him. It is a truth, that godly parents may have wicked Children. Grace doth not always run in a Blood. But it was unevident unto Bildad, that Job's Children had sinned against God in his sence. It is not the common sinner whom Bildad meaneth; by sinning against God, he intends not the inevitable actings of sinful nature, but the voluntary studied improvements, heightnings, and provocations of sinful nature.

Further, In that he concludes, They were cast away for their transgression: He faileth again. It is a truth, that sin is the meritorious cause of punishment, Thy destruction is from thy self, saith the Lord, Hos. 13. 9. Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee, Jer. 4. 18. Sin will help us to sorrow enough. Yet this is not a truth, that every man is afflicted for his sin. As no man knows the love or hatred of God; so no man knows the sin or holiness of man by all that is before him: we cannot argue every one is cast away for his transgression, because he is cast away.

He hath cast them away for their transgression.] The Hebrew is very elegant, He hath sent them away in the hand of their transgression: or, He hath put them into the hand of their transgression. Mr. Broughton translates it so: As thy Children have sinned against him, so he hath sent them into the hand of their trespasses. Into the hand, that is, into the power, as (Chap. 5. 20.) the hand of the Sword, is, the power of the Sword: and (Psal. 63. 10.) They shall fall by the Sword: the Hebrew is. They shall fall by the hand of the Sword. Then, He hath delivered them into the hand of their transgression, is, into the power of their transgression.

There are two things considerable about this expression of sending or giving up into the hand of transgression.

Simpliciter mittere aut ejicere significat, quasi cum recto tramite aberrassent, aberrandi copiam pro libidine fecisset.

First, It may Note, That God had delivered up Job's Children unto the raign or dominion of their own sinful hearts, or had laid the reyns in their necks, suffering their lusts to hurry them whither they would, to carry them captive unto every sin, and rush them head-long into every evil. The word —— here used, signifies either simply, to send, or violently to cast, or to put a thing away from us: and so, it is as much as if Bildad had said, For as much as thy children would sin against God, he suffered them to sin their fill; they being wicked, he gave them up to do all wickednesses: They loved to wander from him, and he let them wander. We have this sence of the word (Prov. 29. 15.) A Child left unto himself brings his Mother to shame: The Hebrew is, A Child sent away, sent to himself, or put into his own hands; A Child sent away to himself, or left alone, bringeth shame, that is, will certainly run into vile and enormous courses, to the shame of her that bare him. A Child left, or sent to himself, is one that hath no guide, no governor, no instructor, but himself. A man that will learn't only of himself, hath but a fool to his master; How much more then a weak Child, what a Master, what a Tutor hath a Child, if he have none but himself? To be left or sent out to themselves, is, to have none to counsel or advise them in a right way, or to give them any stop and check in an ill way. The character that Paul and Barnabas gave of the former times, when they preached to the Heathens at Lystra, was this (Act. 14. 16.) We exhort you to turn unto the living God that made Heaven and Earth, who in times past suffered all Nations to walk in their own wayes. He let them go, and never staid them at all, they had no bridle of restraint, not so much as a word to bring them back; He suffered all Nations, as if he had said, He left them in the hand of their transgression, that their own evil hearts should do what they would with them. In which sence we may also understand that place (Act. 17. 30.) when Paul at Athens disputed with the Philosophers, he tells them that now God began to look towards them, and had sent them the knowledge of Christ, The times of that ignorance God winked at; but now he calleth all men every where to repent. The words undergo a two-fold interpretation: Some thus, to note the indulgence of God, The time past of that ignorance God winked at; that is, he did not deal severely and strictly with them, when they sinned, because they had no means, or so little means to keep them from sin. And there is a truth in it, for though ignorance doth not totally excuse sin, yet it doth abate the degree and measure of sin. But there is another sence, which I rather embrace, The times of that ignorance God winked at; that is, in those times wherein there was so much darkness and blindness in the world, God let men go on in their sin: they sinned, and he never called upon them, he never opposed them, or sent any to teach them better. God did not manifest his will to them as unto the Jews, Psal. 147. 19, 20. He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and judgments unto Israel; he hath not dealt so with any Nation, &c. So that this winking is opposed to favor, rather then to justice. To have the eye upon a place, or upon persons, is to shew them favor, 1 King. 8. 29. The later branch clears this meaning, But now he calleth all men every where to repent: now he doth not leave men in the hands of their transgressions: He doth not wink and let them do what they list: now Gospel-light is risen to the world, and there are many sent out to call in and reclaim wandering prodigals, many to cry, Return, return. He speaks of it as of the mercy and priviledge of that age, beyond what the former ages had enjoyed. That of the same Apostle hath a paralel sence (Rom. 1. 20, & 26.) where describing the dealings of God with the Gentiles; who sinned against the light of nature, he concludes, Therefore God left them in the darkness of nature, in the worst of nature: they came not up so high as the principles of nature might have led them in the worship of God, therefore he left them below the principles of nature in the things of man, He gave them up to vile affections, which is as much as to say, He put them in the hands of their transgressions. And ver. 28. He gave them over to a reprobate mind, to a mind that could not judge aright, which which had not a true understanding of any thing: Hence they elected the worst, reprobated the best things. The like we have (Psal. 81. 11.) of Gods own people the Jews, So I gave them up unto their own hearts lusts, and they walked in their own counsels. The Hebrew is, I sent them into the pertinacy of their hearts, because I had so often called upon them, and they would not hearken, nor return unto me, Therefore I said, forasmuch as you will not hear, you shall not hear; because you will not obey, you shall have none to call you to obedience; follow the counsels of your own hearts, as long as you will. This is the first sence, of putting or sending them into the hand of their transgression, scil. a leaving them to the raign of their lusts.

Expulit eos è mundo propter prævaricationem. Pagn. Permisit eis pervenire, quod scelus eorum postulabat. Tygur.

Secondly (Which is the sence our translation holds out) Thou hast left them, or sent them into the hand of their transgression; that is, Thou hast left them in those evils, which their transgressions did deserve and call for. Our reading carries that meaning, He hath cast them away for their transgression: Others thus, He hath thrust them out of the world for their transgression; He hath suffered that to befall them which their transgression called for. According to these, the sence is, Thy Children sinned against him, and he hath let those evils which their sin deserved fall upon them; He hath rewarded them according to their iniquity (Isa. 64. 6, 7.) Our iniquities like the wind have taken us away: Thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast consumed (or melted) us, because of our iniquities. The Hebrew is, Thou hast consumed or melted us in the hand, or in the power of our iniquities.

Allisisti nos in manu iniquitatis nostræ. Vul.

And somewhat parallel to this sence, is that (Gen. 4. 6.) If thou doest ill (saith God to Cain) sin lies at the door; As if he had said, Thou shalt be given into the hand of sin presently, thy sin shall arrest thee, and bring those evils upon thee which it deserveth, thou shalt not need any other punishment then thy own wickedness.

Hands and power are ascribed to sin, because God gives men over to those punishments which their sins challenge at his hands. Some sins have a louder voice then others; but every sin unpardoned (the mouth whereof is not stopt by the blood of Christ) cries to God for vengeance, till God put the sinner into the hand of sin, that he may at once receive pay for, and from his own folly. Observe from the former interpretation,

First, That, the Lord doth often in judgment give man up to the power of his sinful lusts.

This is a general truth, though we cannot draw it down to the instance of Job's Children: The Lord in wrath leaves man to himself. Every man by nature sins freely, and many are left by God to a judiciary freedom in sinning. He cannot restrain himself, and sometimes God will not restrain him, but lets him take his fill of sin, and be as wicked as he will (Rev. 22. 11.) He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; he that is filthy, let him be filthy still. This permission is the highest and sorest affliction. This liberty is worse then any bondage. Thus also the Church leaves those to their ignorance, who obstinately refuse instruction (1 Cor. 14. 38.) He that is ignorant let him be ignorant still. Those souls are in a desperate condition, who are put out of the care either of God or of his Church. Observe,

Secondly, That, sin is a punishment.

Tu, Domine, dixisti, & ita est, ut omnis malus animus sibi ipsi sit pœna. August.

Sin is the punishment of sin: Thy Children sinned against him, and he gave them into the hand of their sin; he never goes unpunished for sin, who sins and repents not. Thou, Lord (saith one of the Ancients) hast decreed it, and so it is, That every evil mind is it's own scourge. The Apostle tells us (Heb. 10. 31.) that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hand of the living God: it is indeed; and it is as fearful a thing to fall into the hand of deadly sins, or dead works. How dreadful a thing is it to be under the power and tyranny of our own hearts. The committing of sin is worse then the enduring of trouble? The Lord doth not only punish men according to their sins, but he makes their sin their punishment, yea, their sins are their punishers. He puts them into the hand of sin, as into the hand of a tormenter.

Ulciscentur eum mores sui. Cicero ad Attic.

A Heathen could threaten a wicked man, thus, His manners shall be his revenge. Holiness carries its reward with it, and though no creature will recompence the good we do, yet doing good is a recompence. In keeping the Commandments of God, there is an exceeding great reward, Psalm 19. 11. The act of keeping them is a reward, as well as the issue. A good work is pay enough to the worker. So also is an evil work, Prov. 1. 32. The turning away of the simple shall slay him. A simple Child, that will not be ruled, counsel'd or ordered (such Solomon speaks of, Ye simple ones, how long will ye love simplicity? That is, your own foolish, vain wayes) The turning away of such simple ones from the counsel of the wise, shall slay them. The way of sin is death, as well as the end or wages of it. As saith the Proverb of the Ancients (they are the words of David concerning Saul, 1 Sam. 24. 14.) Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, but mine hand shall not be upon him. David knew that Saul was a man so wicked, that he needed no other revenger but his own self, his own sin would bring misery enough upon him: therefore, saith he, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, that is, the punishment of wickedness proceedeth from the wicked man himself. Observe the occasion of those words, it was, when some about David advised him to slay Saul; not I, saith he, my hand shall not be upon him; I know he is a man so given up to sin, so enslaved to his own vile affections, that there's enough upon him already, and in a short time more will be upon him; Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, but mine hand shall not be upon him; I will leave him to the hand of his sin, which is his Plague already, and which in a little time will attach him, and do me right, though he never would. When God took up a resolution against his own people, that he would not hear or be intreated, and protested his mind could not be towards them, he saith (Jer. 15. 2.) Let them go forth, such as are for the sword, to the sword; and such as are for the famine, to the famine; and such as are for the captivity, to the captivity. This was a dreadful sentence; but for God to say to a people, Let them go forth in the wayes of their sin; he that is for drunkenness, to be drunk; he that is for uncleanness, to be unclean; he that is for pride, to be proud; he that is for swearing, to oaths; and he that is for envy, to be envious; and he that is for Idolatry, to his Idols. O how unconceivably miserable are such a people! To be left in the hand of these sins, is a spiritual judgement; and these sins will quickly bring in temporal judgements, and not long hence eternal.

From the latter interpretation, Observe,

Sin shall not always go away unpunished by outward, sensible evils.

God will sink and cast men away for their transgressions. If sin be in the house, punishment lies at the doors, and will turn the lock and open it, or break it open upon the sinner. And though he hide himself in vaults or secret corners, yet his iniquity will find him out. He that will not cast away his transgression, shall be cast away for his transgression, whether he will or no.

So much for these words, wherein Bildad sets before Job the sinfulness of his Children, thereby to vindicate the justice of God in giving them up to the dominion of their sin, or to destruction for their sin. In the next words he advises Job to take heed by their harms, and assures him of happy success, in case he do. As if he had said, Though they perished in their transgression, yet do not thou despair. For,

Vers. 5. If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty, &c.

God hath been just in punishing thy Children, and he will be merciful in pardoning thee, in accepting thy person, in prospering thy estate, if now at last thou apply thy self to seek him diligently; Though thy Children have fallen into the hand of their transgression, yet there is hope that thou mayest escape. Thus he deals with him in a way of counsel, as Eliphaz had done before, Chap. 5. 8. I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause; this is the counsel I give thee, and the course I would take my self, Bildad speaks the same in effect, and almost in the letter; If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication unto the Almighty, &c. He would awake for thee.

There are two parts of Bildad's counsel.

First,

First, To humble himself in prayer, verſ. 5.
Secondly, To purge himself by repentance, verſ. 6.

Or, we may look upon this counſel as a pattern of repentance, and turning to God in three things.

First, To ſeek unto God.
Secondly, To acknowledge our own unworthineſs to receive any mercy from God.
Thirdly, To be ſincere and upright-hearted with God in both.

If thou wouldeſt ſeek unto God betimes.

שחר Eſt quaſi aurorare aut diluculare Deũ Diligenter, ſedulo, & magno ſtudio quærere. Qui mane ſurgit precandi cauſa, dicitur manicare Deũ. Drus.

We have met with the word more then once before; and in ſtrictneſs of tranſlation it ſounds thus much, If thou wouldeſt ſeek unto God in the morning; or, If thou wouldeſt morning God, be with him early in the morning, that is, If thou wouldeſt ſeek unto him diligently: they that come in the morning about buſineſs, are diligent in their buſineſs. The Apoſtles rule is (Heb. 3.) To day harden not your hearts; but here Bildad adviſeth, Whileſt it is morning, which is the firſt part or beginning of the day, pour out thy heart to God. So then, it may be taken for ſeeking God either at the firſt of the day, the morning; or, for any earneſt, diligent and fervent ſeeking unto God in any part of the day; To ſeek God diligently, though in the night, is according to this Hebraiſme, a ſeeking him in the morning.

It was an ancient cuſtom to ſeek God in the morning (take it in the letter) early in the morning. David profeſſes this, Pſal. 5. 3. My voice ſhalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord, in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up. And Heathens by the light of nature, took this courſe in their profane and ſuperſtitious worſhip. Herodotus in his tenth book, tells us of the Perſian Magi, who addreſſed themſelves early in the morning to ſeek their falſe gods. And the Primitive Chriſtians were wondred at for their early devotions. Pliny in an Epiſtle to Trajan, and Tertullian in his Apologeticks for the Chriſtians, report their Aſſemblies before day-break to pray and call upon God. And there hath been and ſtill is a ſuperſtitions abuſe of this among the Papiſts, who call their morning prayers, their Mattins, becauſe they begin early in the morning. Hence Obſerve,

First, Prayer is our ſeeking unto God.

That's the general deſcription of prayer. When we pray, our work is to get near to God, to find God; every ſoul that prayes indeed, feels it ſelf at a loſs for ſomewhat that God only can beſtow. In God all that we want is to be found, and therefore he invites us to ſeek him. In this life the Saints are a generation of ſeekers: in the next, they ſhall be a generation of enjoyers; when God is fully found, there's nothing more to be ſought: Having him, we have all. The work of Heaven is to bleſs God for what we have found, not to ſeek him for what we want.

Secondly, God muſt be ſought unto without delay.

As it is with vows, ſo with prayers, Defer not to pay them; defer not to pray, Iſa. 55. 6. Seek him whileſt he may be found, Matth. 6. 33. Seek firſt the Kingdom of God; firſt in time, not only chiefly, but early, put not God behind in the latter end of the day, or in the latter end of your buſineſſes. It is beſt to begin with him who is beſt.

Thirdly, God muſt be ſought unto with diligence.

We muſt lay our ſtrength and ſpirits out in ſeeking God. It is not a ſleight enquiry which finds out God. We read that he is found of ſome who ſeek him not at all, but that he is found of any, who ſeek him negligently, we read not. Free-grace prevents thoſe who have no ability to ſeek him, but it meets not thoſe who will not lay out their abilities in ſeeking him. If thou wouldeſt ſeek unto God betimes,

And make thy ſupplication to the Almighty.

Verbum חנן denotat gratuitam illã commiſerationem, quæ ſine ullo merito impenditur.

The word which we tranſlate [Make thy ſupplication] is very ſignificant of the manner how we ſhould ſeek unto God, namely, bottoming our ſelves upon free-grace alone. A thought of our own worth is inconſiſtent with a ſupplication; Call upon the Almighty for pity, ſaith Mr. Broughton, when we ſupplicate, we deſire that to be done for us, for which there is no reaſon in us why it ſhould be done. To make ſupplication: is to ſeek help and relief freely or gratis; acknowledging there is nothing in us worthy of love. That adverb uſed in the firſt, and repeated in the ſecond Chapter, where the Devil objects, Doth Job ſerve God for nought, that is, without reſpect of good pay for his pains from God, that adverb (I ſay) comes from this verb. As we ought to ſerve God (in this ſence) for nought, and not like mercenaries for our hire: So God helps us for nought, without looking to any thing in us, or from us, as an hire of his help. The Baptiſt had his name (John) from this Word, either becauſe he preached the Free-grace of God in Chriſt, then exhibited; or, becauſe God beſtowed him upon his Parents in their old-age, as a ſpecial grace and favour: The poor (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 18. 23.) uſeth intreaties; ſome render it thus, The poor maketh, or ſpeaketh ſupplications; a poor man hath nothing of deſert to plead, why he ſhould receive your charity, but he lies at your feet and begs ſomewhat, becauſe he is in want, becauſe miſery hath arreſted and taken hold upon him: The poor uſeth entreaties, he doth not call for any thing of right, and he will not wreſt any thing from you by force; he only ſupplicates your favour. We in our drawing nigh unto God ſhould pray for grace and favour, as a poor man, begging an alms, who makes this his plea, that he is poor. So then, Bildad's counſel to Job is this, Stand not upon thy terms with God, plead not thine own integrity and good works, but caſt thy ſelf at his feet for mercy, Make thy ſupplication unto him. The word is uſed by Moſes, Deut. 3. 23. when he deſcribeth his own unbelief, for which God ſaid he ſhould not go into Canaan. And I beſought the Lord at that time, ſaying, &c. When Moſes perceived God was angry, he did not reckon his former good ſervices to ballance this failing, but he ſought unto God for mercy, as one that had never done him any ſervice at all. And as man expreſſes his deſires of Free-grace by this Word, ſo doth the Lord his higheſt actings of it, Exod. 33. 19. I will be gracious unto whom I will be gracious. To ſhew, that to make ſupplication, is, to deſire the Lord to be gracious: and to be gracious is to do that, which is deſired by a ſupplication; the ſame word in the Hebrew ſignifies both an act of loweſt humility in us, namely the making a ſupplication, and an act of the higheſt grace in God, namely the granting of a ſupplication. Hence Obſerve,

First. In ſeeking God we muſt look to receive all from his Free-grace and undeſerved favour.

Seek unto God, and make thy ſupplication to him. Mercy in God is the ſpring of all the mercies received by man. What can a beggar, who comes to a King, ask upon deſert? That's the condition of every one that comes to God: we are a company of beggars, the riches both of temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings are treaſur'd up in God. Bleſſed are the poor in ſpirit, they who look upon themſelves as mean and low, as not having a rag of goodneſs about them, as emptied of themſelves, are the veſſels which God will fill, He that is full loatheth a honey-comb, and he that thinks he is full, is loathed ſo much by God, that his real emptineſs ſhall never be filled. When Jacob held God ſo faſt, that he would not let him go without a bleſſing, he had quite let go all hold, yea, or opinion of his worthineſs to receive a bleſſing, I am leſs then the leaſt of all thy mercies (Gen. 32. 10.) Then we are fit to receive great things from God, when we are little, and then fitteſt, when we are leaſt in our own eyes. Yea, we muſt ſupplicate God, not only as a beggar, but as a Traitor or a Rebel doth a King: who hath not only nothing in him to commend him to his acceptance, or procure his favour, but much to provoke his wrath, and incur the weight of his diſpleaſure. Every ſin in it ſelf renders us rebels againſt God. And though his own people, coming unto him in Chriſt, are under another notion, they are his ſons, yet, even they ought to have ſuch apprehenſions of themſelves for ſin. Abraham believed in him that juſtifieth the ungodly, Rom. 4. 5. Even Abraham after he was juſtified in the ſight of God through faith, looked upon himſelf as ungodly, in reference to his own works. In all our approaches to God, we ſhould reflect upon our ſelves, not only as having many wants, and no worthineſs, but as having many ſins, and (of our own) no goodness. God (in justice) visits iniquity upon them that hate him (Exod. 20.6.) and he sheweth mercy unto thousands of them that love him, and keep his Commandments; They who love God and keep his Commandments, receive all from mercy. Justice punishes those who break the Commandment, but mercy doth them good who keep the Commandments. We have at any time sin enough to merit the wrath of God, but we never have goodness enough to merit his favour. And as no objection from our sinfulness can obstruct the way of Free-grace from moving towards us: so no argument from our holiness can open the way, for Free-grace to move towards us. In all our duties we are to lie in the dust, yea, we are to lay our duties in the dust, and to seek all of God in humble supplications.

Consider this verse in connexion with the former, and then two points are observable from it. Bildad assuring Job, that though his sons had fallen by their sin, yet, if himself would seek unto God, and make his supplication, it might be well with him, teacheth us,

First, That the falls of others, whether into sin, or under judgment for sin, should be warnings to us.

Thou seest what is become of thy sons: let them be as a looking-glass for thee. Children may teach their Parents, Parents are often whipt upon their Childrens backs. The hand of God upon others points towards us, and while they are smitten, we are instructed. The Apostle sums up the most remarkable judgments which fell upon the Jews in their passage from Ægypt to Canaan, and closeth all with this application to Christians, These things happened unto them as ensamples, and they are written for our admonition, &c. to the intent that we should not lust, 1 Cor. 10. 11. As if he had said, God let them fall into the hand of their sins, and their falls may help us to keep our feet. Their falls were types (so the word is) these things happened unto them typically, in them we may see what God will do with us, if we take their course, and go their way.

τύπος, proprie significat notam insculptam pulsatione seu percussione effectam, Beza. in Joh. 20. 25. τύπος παρὰ τὸ τύπτειν, percutere. Unde Ars Typographica.

The Greek is very elegant and expressive of this sence. For a type is such a form or representation of a thing, as is made by hard pressing or striking of it, such as we see in stamps and seals. It is the leaving of a mark with a blow; implying, that the Lord by those stroks upon his ancient people, left marks upon their bodies, or printed letters there (the Greek word for a Printer is a Type-writer) which were legible to their posterity, and are to this day. Hence the scar which the nails made in the hands of our blessed Saviour upon the Cross, is called, The print of the nails, or, The type of the nails, Joh. 20.25. Such a type or print sufferings leave behind them. How many such types have we this day? Where can we go; but we see the print of the Sword, and thrust our hands into wounded sides, Let us not be faithless, but believing? The Apostle Peter (2 Epist. 2. 6.) brings the apostate Angels, the old world, filthy Sodome, as admonitory examples unto those that should live ungodly. They made themselves evil examples by committing sin, and God made them good ensamples by punishing them for their sin.

Secondly, From the connexion, Observe,

That they who are equal in sin, may be unequal in punishment.

Job was (in the judgment of his friends) as deep in sin as his Children; but though he had sinned like them, or more then they, yet he might be unlike them in suffering, or suffer less then they. God (saith Bildad) hath taken them quite away, he hath but wounded you, and if you seek unto God he is ready to heal you. The same sinners for matter, are in Heaven and in Hell, that is, take two who have committed the same sins for matter, and for degree also (as sin is a transgression of the Law) and the one of these may be found in Heaven, and the other in Hell at the last day. Yea, I believe, there are many in Heaven that have committed greater sins then some that are in Hell. It is not the matter of sin committed, but the obstinacy, impenitency, or unbelief of the sinner, which binds on the guilt, and seals up the sinner to judgments temporal, and to condemnation eternal.

Vers. 6. If thou wert pure and upright, he would awaken for thee, &c.

Bildad counsels Job to seek God, yet he puts in a caution, If thou wert pure and upright: As if he had said, I advise thee to seek unto God, and to make thy supplication to him; but take heed of doing this with a purpose to continue in thy sin, If thou wouldst seek unto God, and make thy supplication to him in purity, and uprightness of heart, He would awaken for thee. Holy prayers awake God. Be holy, and thou shalt be sure of audience and acceptance when thou prayest.

In the former verse he gave advice for the duty to be performed, here he gives advice in reference to the person who is to perform the duty. Thy duty is to seek unto God, and to make supplication to the Almighty, but look thine own heart be pure and upright. Take heed of coming to a holy God in thine unholiness.

Pure and upright. The word signifieth to shine or glister, as glass or crystal, noting, that the purity of our lives in holiness shines as light, Matth. 5. Let your light so shine before men. The works of the Saints should be clear as crystal: The word is used (Lam. 4. 7.) to set forth the exactest beauty, Her Nazarites were purer then snow, they were whiter then milk, they were more ruddy in body then Rubies, their polishing was of Saphyr. The oyl (Lev. 24. 2.) and the frankincense (Exod. 30. 4.) appointed for the use of the Sanctuary, are both thus expressed, pure oyl, pure frankincense, shining oyl, or shining frankincense, transparent oyl, &c. such as you may look thorow, not obscure or dark. The oyl and frankincense were a type of their purity, who had communion with God in holy things. The same word is used by David, complaining under a temptation (Psal. 73. 15.) of lost labour, or labour in vain in washing himself. Some wash in vain, because they are still unclean, and get not out their spots; others think they wash in vain, because though clean, they cannot obtain their comforts. Thus David thought he washed in vain, I said, Verily I have cleansed mine heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency, for I am chastned, &c. David by cleansing got the sin-spots out as well as most men, but he could not get the affliction-spots out, this was his temptation. Sin is a blot, a spot, an uncleanness, a filthiness; holiness is purity, beauty, honour, light; things which have the greatest excellency and lustre, are but the shadows of holiness.

Thus lucidissimum, pellucidum.

Peccatum vocatur macula, & sanctitas mundities, quod quæ maculata & infecta erant habebantur profana & divino conspectu indigna.

There is a two-fold purity: First, The purity of our natures, which is received at conversion. Secondly, The purity of our conversations, which is renewed by repentance; we may understand both, or either in this place.

And upright. It is the word used in Chap. 1. v. 1. Perfect and upright. Here pure and upright: we may thus distinguish them; purity refers to outward acted holiness, or holiness of life; and uprightness, to inward sincerity, or holiness of the heart; and so his meaning is, If thou wert pure in thy wayes, and sincere in thine ends; If thy outward man, and inward man were washed and reformed, Then he would awake, &c. Observe hence, Purus ad cor pertinet, rectus ad actiones, ut dicat purus corde, rectus opere. Drus.

First, Holy persons are fit for holy duties, and onely they.

Sin is our separation from God, and holy duties are acts of communion with him: how then shall sin and duty stand together?

Make thy supplication, seek unto God, but be thou pure and upright. What have unholy persons to do about holy things? God cannot like the services of those who are unlike him. Prayer purifies, yet purifying must be a preparative to prayer. Psal. 66. 18. If I regard iniquity in my heart (if I lodge filthiness there) God will not hear me; he will not regard my prayer. The blind man saw this truth, John 9. 31. (it seems this was a received maxim among them) God heareth not sinners. We are commanded to pray, lifting up pure hands, 1 Tim. 2. 8. An Heathen being at Sea in a great storm, and perceiving many wicked wretches with him in the ship, calling upon the gods, O (saith he) forbear prayer, hold your tongues, I would not have the gods take notice that you are here, they will sure drown us all if they do. If an Heathen by the light of Nature, could say this, much more may we by the light of Scripture, That God heareth not sinners, Isa. 1. When you spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear, your hands are full of blood. As he speaks out of the fulness of the grace of God, (Come let us reason together, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, &c.) So also the necessity of gracious purity in man, Wash ye, make ye clean, &c. Observe,

Silete (inquit) nequos hic navigare dissentiant. Bias.

Secondly, The prayers of the pure and upright are prevailing prayers.

In the next words God awakes, Jam. 5.16. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Fervency of prayer effects nothing, unless the person praying be righteous; God is not melted into compassion by the heat of our words, but by the holiness of our hearts. In the prayer of a righteous man there is strength, prevailing strength, such as God himself yields to. As a Prince thou hast power with God, and hast prevailed, saith he to Jacob when he wrestled with him. Observe, Thirdly, It is no way contrary to the doctrine of Free-grace to say we must be holy, if we desire to be heard.

Bildad's doctrine is an excellent piece of Divinity; though he said before, Thou must seek unto God, and make supplication to him, that out of his Free-grace he would bestow a blessing upon thee, yet he adds, If thou wert pure and upright. Though we are not heard, because we are pure and upright, yet none can come with a warrantable confidence to be heard in their impurity and hypocrisie; if they do, God will reject their confidences, and they shall not prosper in them. It is impudence, not confidence, to make supplication to God with a reserve, or a resolve in secret, to go on in sin. The greatest sinners in the world may come to God, they that are most impure and filthy may find favour; yet every man that cometh unto God, must come with this desire, to have his impurities removed, and his backslidings healed; Unto the wicked, saith God, What hast thou to do to declare my Statutes, or to take my Covenant in thy mouth, seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee, Psal. 50. 16. It no way crosses the doctrine of Grace, when with the same breath we say, God will do us good freely for his own names sake, and that we must be pure and upright who come to God; With the pure thou wilt shew thy self pure, and with the upright man thou wilt shew thy self upright, and with the froward thou wilt shew thy self froward, Psal. 18. 25, 26. But doth the Lord take colour from every one he meets, or change his temper as the company changes? That's the weakness of sinful man, he cannot do so, with whom there is no variableness nor shadow of changing. God is pure and upright with the unclean and hypocritical, as well as with the pure and upright, and his actions shew him to be so. God shews himself froward with the froward, when he deals with them, as he hath said he will deal with the froward; deny them, and reject them. God shews himself pure with the pure, when he deals with them as he hath said he will; hear them and accept them. Though there be nothing in purity and sincerity, which deserveth mercy, yet we cannot expect mercy without them. Our comforts are not grounded upon our graces, but our comforts are the fruits or consequents of our graces.

Bildad having shewed Job his duty, shews him a promise of mercy, If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee. There is a three-fold gradation of mercy in this promise.

That God would
1. Awake for him.
2. Prosper or pacifie his habitation.
3. Abundantly encrease and multiply him in his latter end.

The first step of mercy, is, That God would awake for him. Surely now he would awake for thee. And there are three things observable about this.

First, The certainty of it, in the word [Surely] without all doubt, or, peradventure if thou wouldst thus seek to him, He would awake.

Secondly, The speediness of it; Surely now he would awake [Now] without delay or demur; thou shouldst no sooner seek to God, but find an answer of mercy from him.

יעיר עליך Thirdly, The benefit of it to Job, He would awake for thee. For Job might say, I may awaken a sleepy Lion to rise up against me; God may be angry with my prayer, and in stead of blessing pour out some further judgment upon me: No, saith Bildad, I assure thee, if thou thus seek to him, He will awake for thee, not against thee.

God sometimes awakes against us, Jer. 31.28. It shall come to pass, that as I have watched over them, to pluck up, and to break down, and to destroy, and to afflict, so will I watch over them to build, and to plant, saith the Lord. As the Lord would watch to do them a good turn; so he had watcht to do them (as we speak) a shrewd turn. He threatens them with such a watchfulness, Chap. 44. 27. I will watch over them for evil, and not for good. When we are dull and sleepy in doing the Will of God, he will be watchful and active to afflict us. And when men cannot sleep till they do evil, God will not sleep till he brings evil. So, Daniel, in the ninth of that Prophecy, and vers. 14. having humbled himself before God in prayer and fasting, and confessed the sins of the people, concludes, Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us. God not only awakes, but watches to do a people evil, who have long abused his goodness. As men in maliciousness of spirit watch for advantages and spy out opportunities to revenge themselves, All my familiars watch for my halting, saith Jeremy, Chap. 20. 12. So the Lord in abundant holiness and exactness of justice, though with a great deal of wrath and severity, watches to revenge himself of a wicked people. He takes all opportunities and advantages against them, Thou hast watched evil, and brought it upon us. His love to a returning people is as vigilant, as his anger against a backsliding people.

Surely now he would awake for thee.

Awake.] The word signifies both to awake, and to arise. There are two interpretations of this awaking.

Some take the words transitively, thus, He will awake good for thee. Not, of Job awakening God by prayer, but of God awakening prosperity, or stirring up blessings for Job. As if Bildad had said, Job, now blessings are (as it were) asleep, but if thou pray, God will awaken them; He will stir up mercies for thee, he will cure thy broken condition, he will restore that which is fallen; repair that which is ruined; and fetch thee out of the grave of thy desolate estate. As a mans spirits, gifts, yea graces are sometime asleep, and need awakening; so also are, and do our outward comforts. It is frequent in Scripture to call the repairing of a mans estate, or the bringing of good to him, the raising of him up, He raiseth the poor out of the dust; he awakens them out of that low condition. Job was in the dust, and his Children in the grave, God made a resurrection of both for him. That's a good sence.

Suscitabit super te bonum. Transitive accipitur; excitabit super te, sc. bonum quod nunc in te sopitum est.

But rather understand it (as our translation reads) of God awakening. He will awake for thee.

He will awake.] The Psalmist assures us (Psal. 121.4.) He that keepeth Israel doth neither slumber nor sleep. God never sleepeth: How is it then said, that God awakes?

For the opening of this Metaphor; First, As, the Church confesses and professes (Cant. 5.2.) I sleep, but my heart waketh; when the Church is asleep, yet her heart is awake towards God: So much more, when in regard of outward providences God seems to be asleep, his heart is awake toward his Church, his heart (scil. his affection, &c.) never slumbereth nor sleepeth.

Secondly, God is said to sleep, when he doth not answer our prayers; and when he hears prayer, then he is said to awake. Hence the Septuagint render this Text, not as we, He will awake; but, He will hear thy prayer for deliverance.

Ἀκούσεται σου. Deprecationem exaudiet tua. Sept.

Thirdly, God sleeps, not in regard of the act, but the consequents of sleep. Natural sleep is the binding or locking up of the senses. The eye and ear of God is never bound. But to mans apprehension the affairs of the world pass, as if God did neither hear nor see. When men are asleep, things are done which they can take no notice of, much less stop and prevent. The Parable tells us, (Matth. 13.) While men slept, the envious man came and sowed tares: While the housholder slept, the thief brake the house; and the Pharisees direct the watchmen to say of Christ in the Sepulchre, While we slept his Disciples came and stole him away. So now, when things are so carried in the world, as if the God of Heaven did not regard or take notice of them; when he doth not prevent or hinder evil, when he doth not stop or restrain the rage and malice malice of men; this retiring of himself in the way of his providence, is called his sleep.

The complaint runs high, Psal. 44. 9. &c. Lord, thou goest not forth with our Armies, we are become a reproach unto our enemies; Thou sellest thy people for nought, we are killed like sheep all the day long. There's a description of the confusion of things; then followeth (Vers. 23.) Awake why sleepest thou, O Lord? Arise, cast us not off for ever; wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction and our oppression. Such a time was accounted the sleeping time of God.

Hence when God, in the workings of his providence, searcheth out the wicked, and brings them to destruction; when he breaks their designs, and turns theis counsels backwards; when he turns their wickedness upon their own heads, and catches them in the snare which they have laid for others, then he is said to awake, Psal. 78. 65. He gave his people over to the sword, and the fire consumed the young men; then the Lord awakened as one out of sleep, and like a Giant refreshed with wine; He smote his enemies in the hinder parts, and put them to a perpetual shame. Such a time was accounted Gods waking time.

So then, sleeping and awaking, note only the changes of providence. Hence also the providence of God is described by an eye (2 Chron. 16. 9.) which is the proper organ of sleeping, or waking; and the exactness of providence, is set out by seven eyes, Zech. 3. 9. The Scripture speaks this language in reference to our soul-sleep and awakening. When we sin and let things go which way they will in our hearts, without taking any care, or keeping our watch against temptation, then we are asleep in sin: And when we begin to consider our estates, and return to our selves, when we take notice how it is with us, and ask our hearts the question, What have we done? This in a spiritual sence is our awakening, Awake thou that sleepest, Ephes. 5. 14. Our spiritual sleeping and waking are the decayes or quicknings of soul-endeavors. And Gods providential sleeping and waking are the seeming stops and visible motions of his power, mercy and justice in the world. This is the awaking which Bildad promises; If thou wouldst seek God, &c. Surely he would awake for thee.

The words opened teach us,

First, That holy prayer shall certainly be heard.

If thou make thy supplication to him, surely he will awake. God cannot sleep when a poor believing soul cries in his ears, If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear my prayer. (Psal. 66. 18.) But verily God hath heard me, he hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me. What, God turn prayer away? No, he cannot lie still (as I may so speak) when prayer knocks at the door, he must arise and open presently. Note, Secondly, Prayer shall be heard presently.

What presently? Yes, presently heard, though not presently answered; Surely now he will awaken for thee, even now. Holy prayers are never deferred the hearing, no not a minute, Isa. 65. 24. Before they call I will hear, and while they are yet speaking I will answer. In the very act of praying the answer came forth; yea, the answer sometimes antedates our asking, and the grant cometh before the petition. The giving out of the answer may be defer'd, but the answer is not defer'd. We may be heard, and heard graciously, and yet not presently receive the thing we ask; but every prayer is heard and laid up, as soon as put up; he hangs it upon the file, he hath it safe by him. Prayer receives an answer in Heaven, as soon as spoken upon Earth, though the answer be not returned to us on Earth. God sleeps not at the prayer of those who are awake in prayer. Observe, Thirdly, Prayer is the best means to awaken God.

God hath many wayes to awaken man; and he hath directed man a way to awaken himself. When we are asleep, he awakeneth us chiefly two wayes: First, By the voice of his word: Secondly, By the voice of his Rod. He now awakens us by the loud sounding Trumpet, and the alarms of War: when God awakeneth us by judgments, it is time for us to awaken him by prayer. We find two things in Scripture which awaken God. First, The prayers of his own people. And secondly, The rage and blasphemy of his enemies, Psal. 78. 65. The Prophet having described the cruelty and rage of the enemy, adds, Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine: David makes this an argument in prayer, (Psal. 7.) Because of the rage of mine enemies awake for me to the judgment which thou hast commanded. As if he had said, Lord, shall mine enemies rage, and wilt thou sleep? Wilt thou not awake for me? Arise, I pray thee. The noise of blasphemy, and the cry of violence from wicked men, stir up God when he seems to lie asleep. The noise of prayer, the cries and calls of faith in his own people, will not let him sleep. A man whose heart is drenched in the world, and drowned in rivers of earthly pleasures, prays himself asleep, and his prayers bring God asleep too; he sleeps when he prays, and God sleeps at his prayers, that is, God regards not his prayer; he is as one that sleepeth, as if he heard not what was said. A worldy man doth not hear what he speaks, he knows not what his own requests are. God sleepeth when men are thus asleep; But when we (as the Apostle directs) watch and pray, then God awakes at our prayers. As in the former verse Job was counselled to awake to pray to God, so now he is promised, That the Lord will awake when he prayes.

Fourthly, Seeing the Lord is awakened by prayer: We learn,

That, Prayer ought to be very strong and fervent.

As men are gradual in their sleep, so is the Lord in his. A man is sometimes slumberingly asleep, that the least noise will awake him, you cannot stir, but he will hear it. At another time a man is so dead asleep, that though you hollow in his ear you cannot awake him, thunder cannot stir him. Sometimes God departs so little, that the least voice calleth him again, he comes at the first word; at another time he is gone so far, that (as to a man in a deep sleep) you must cry and cry again, call and call again, cry aloud before he hears. And we may (in a safe sence) apply that to the true God, which Elijah did to that false god, Baal, when his Priests were calling to him from morning to night. Elijah mocking, bids them cry aloud, it may be (saith he) he sleepeth: We may say (with reverence) thus, when any pray to God, and he doth not hear, pray aloud; not in regard of the voice and outward sound, but pray with louder desires of heart, with more fervency and zeal of spirit, Peradventure God sleepeth; peradventure he is in a deep sleep at this time, and he will not suddenly be awakened, therefore cry aloud. When God seemed to depart far from the Church of the Jews, with how much fervency do they cry after him (Isa. 51. 9.) Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord, awake, as in the ancient dayes? &c. They double and treble it upon him, and cry with an outstretched voice, Art not thou he that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the Dragon? What a clamor, what a holy stir was here to awaken God? God himself sometimes seems (as it were) willing to take his rest; as when he said to Moses, Let me alone; he spake like a man that is in bed, or very sleepy; Do not trouble me, let me alone; as he in the Gospel (Luke 11. 7.) when he was awakened in the night to come and give bread unto his neighbour, Do not trouble me (saith he) the doors are shut, and I am in bed with my Children, I cannot rise and give thee, let me alone. Thus in some sence the Lord expresses himself to his people, I am now in bed, do not trouble me, Let me alone. What must we do in this case? We must knock harder at the door, as he in the Gospel did, For whom, though his neighbour would not rise and give him, because he was his friend, yet because of his importunity he rises and gives him as many loaves as he needed. We must be the more importunate to awake God, by how much he seems more unwilling to hear us; our modesty (in this case) pleases him not: we must call and call again: He will take it well at our hands if we do so. We must give our selves no rest, and let him take none; so the Prophet resolves (Isa. 62. 1.) For Jerusalem sake I will take no rest, I will never give over praying; and at vers. 6. I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night, you that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the Earth. If the Lord should carry it in the present answers of his providence, dence, as if he were willing to reſt, and deſired not to be troubled in this buſineſs; be not you ſo put off: but with a holy boldneſs and confidence come to him and awaken him; take no anſwer, till ye have an anſwer. He is beſt pleaſed, and moſt at eaſe, when (in prayer) we give him no reſt.

Laſtly obſerve, If God do but awake for us, all is preſently well with us.

If the eye of God be upon us for good, that brings us in all good; therefore (Zech. 2. ult.) when the Church was in her return from Babylon, the Prophet concludes with an exultation of ſpirit, Be ſilent, O all fleſh, before the Lord, for he is raiſed up out of his holy habitation; it is this word, He is awaked out of his holy habitation, now be ſilent, O all fleſh, before the Lord: All fleſh, ye that are the wicked of the world, ye that are enemies, be ye ſilent, leave your boaſting, your reproaching and blaſpheming, for the Lord is awaked, now he begins to ſtir for his people, he will ſtop your mouths ſhortly: All fleſh, takes in the Church and People of God too; O be ye ſilent, in regard of your fears and doubtings, murmurings and diſtracted complainings, ſilence all theſe, why? The Lord is awaked, he is raiſed up out of his holy habitation, that is, he that ſeemed before to confine himſelf to thoſe higher regions, and as the Atheiſt ſpeaks in Job, to walk in the circle of the heavens, not intermedling with the earth: This God is now awaked, he is raiſed out of his holy habitation, and now ye ſhall know that he orders all things here below; therefore be ſilent, O all fleſh. When Chriſt was aſleep (Matth. 8. 25.) A grievous tempeſt aroſe (ſaith the Text) in ſo much that the Ship was covered with waves. When ſtorms and tempeſts are upon the Church, God is then aſleep, though even then he directs the ſtorms, and gives law to the proud waves; But what did the Diſciples in this ſtorm? They awoke Chriſt, Maſter, ſave us, we periſh; and as ſoon as ever Chriſt was awakened, he rebuked the ſtorm, and there was a great calm. Thus when we are toſt up and down with contrary winds, and in danger to be ſplit and ſunk, if God once awake, all is calm; How quietly may they ſleep for whom God wakes? I do not ſay they ſhould ſleep careleſly, but confidently they may. God doth not wake for us to the intent we ſhould ſleep in ſecurity; but we may ſleep quietly when He ſhews himſelf awake for us, who (indeed) never ſlumbreth nor ſleepeth. And if God awake not for us, all our watchfulneſs is as uſeleſs to us as our ſleepineſs. The watchman waketh but in vain except the Lord keep the City. Except he awake, our watching can do no good; and if he awake, good will come though we be aſleep. It is our duty to be careful, and it is our comfort that the care of God is enough for us. The eye of divine Providence helps us in many humane improvidences. What their happineſs is for whom God awakes, ſee in the next words.

He will make the habitation of thy righteouſneſs proſperous.

This is the ſecond degree or ſtep of mercy promiſed; when the Lord awakes, he will awake to purpoſe. We ſay of ſome men, Early up, and never the near; they awake, and do little work; but if God awakes, ſee what he doth.

Anima eſt juſtitiæ & omnium virtutum domicilium. Aben Ezr.

He will make the habitation of thy righteouſneſs proſperous.] Some of the Rabbins underſtand theſe words as a deſcription of the ſoul; The habitation of thy righteouſneſs, that is, thy ſoul ſhall proſper, becauſe the ſoul is the proper ſeat of righteouſneſs and holineſs. Righteouſneſs belongeth to the inward man. Righteouſneſs being a ſpiritual thing, is houſed and lodged in the ſpirit, that's the habitation of it.

There are others of the Jews who take this habitation of righteouſneſs for the body, becauſe the body is the habitation of the ſoul, in which righteouſneſs is ſeated, and ſo the habitation of righteouſneſs by a ſecond remove, is the outward man. The Lord ſhall bleſs thy body, which now lieth in a woful plight, diſtempered and diſfigured with ſores and ſickneſſes.

But rather take the word habitation in thoſe two ordinary Scripture-ſences, either ſtrictly for the place where Job dwelt, or more largely, for all that did belong unto him. The habitation of a man is all his eſtate, and all that appertains to his eſtate; He will make thy habitation, that is, thy children, thy ſervants, thy fields, thy cattel, thy ſtock, thy all, to be proſperous.

The Chaldee Paraphraſe readeth, He will make thy beautiful place to be proſperous. The word ſignifies beauty, as well as an habitation, as was ſhewed upon chap. 5. 3. Thither I refer the Reader. Then, habitation is the ſeat of a mans outward eſtate, and his eſtate, the ſhell and the kernel, the outſide and inſide of all he hath.

The habitation of thy righteouſneſs.] That is, the habitation where righteouſneſs doth flouriſh, or wherein thou liveſt righteouſly.

Quaſi nihil aliud quam æquitatem & juſtitiam redoleant bona juſtè acquiſita. Merc.

But what is righteouſneſs?

Righteouſneſs is a very comprehenſive word, The Philoſopher tells us, it takes in all other virtues whatſoever; It is not a part of virtue, but all virtue.

Δικαιοσύνη ἐκ ἔστι μέρος ἀρετῆς, ἀλλὰ ὅλη ἀρετή. Ariſt. Eth. l. 5. c. 1.

When righteouſneſs is ſet as diſtinct from holineſs and piety, then it is reſtrained to our dealings with men. Righteouſneſs relates to men, and holineſs to God, Luke 1. 75. Tit. 2. 12. Goſpel-Grace teaches us to live ſoberly, in oppoſition to the intemperance of our bodies; righteouſly, in oppoſition to wrong in our actions; godly, in oppoſition to all impiety and prophaneneſs of our minds.

But righteouſneſs here takes in our whole duty, whether to God or man; The habitation of thy righteouſneſs, that is, the place where thou exerciſeſt all manner of holy and righteous duties toward God and toward man. Righteouſneſs toward man, firſt, in diſtributive juſtice, giving every one his due in judgment, as thou art a Magiſtrate. Secondly, Righteouſneſs towards man in commutative juſtice, giving every one his due in commerce, as thou art a neighbour.

The habitation of thy righteouſneſs.] It is an elegant expreſſion. The Church is ſometimes called ſo, Jer. 31. 23. Thus ſaith the Lord God of hoſts, the God of Iſrael, as yet they ſhall uſe this ſpeech in the Land of Judah, and in the Cities thereof, when I ſhall bring again their captivity, The Lord bleſs thee, O habitation of righteouſneſs, and mountain of holineſs, This ſpeech they ſhall uſe: It ſeems it had been an ordinary ſalutation thus to beſpeak Judah, O thou habitation of juſtice or righteouſneſs, and mountain of holineſs. Every particular Member of the Church is named A tree of righteouſneſs, Iſa. 61. 3, They ſhall be called trees of righteouſneſs, the plantation of the Lord. Each Saint is a tree of righteouſneſs, and all of them together are an habitation, a plantation of righteouſneſs

God himſelf is ſtiled The habitation of righteouſneſs, becauſe he (in a way of higheſt excellency, or in the moſt moſt ſuperlative degree) is the ſeat of righteouſneſs; all righteouſneſs is (as it were) houſed, and dwelling in him. The Prophet (Jer. 50. 7.) deſcribing the unkind uſage which the true worſhippers ſhould find in the dayes of which he propheſieth, ſpeaks thus, All that found them have devoured them, and their adverſaries ſaid we offend not, becauſe they have ſinned againſt the Lord. They thought their brethren had ſinned againſt the Lord, and that therefore they might trouble them without ſin: They have ſinned againſt the Lord, the habitation of juſtice, even the Lord, the hope of their fathers. It is but juſtice (ſay they) for us to puniſh thoſe who ſin againſt the habitation of juſtice. Men (take it in paſſage) do evil ſometimes out of conſcience, and think they do God good ſervice, while they really wrong their brethren.

שלים Pacificabit, pacatum reddet, i. e. integrum, perfectum, omnibus bonis redundans, qualia affert pax. Συποκατασήσει σε θεὸς Sept.

He ſhall make the habitation of thy righteouſneſs proſperous.] That is, he ſhall make it peaceable and quiet, ſetled and eſtabliſhed. The word ſignifies peace, plenty and proſperity. He ſhall pacifie or quiet the habitation of thy righteouſneſs. The Septuagint thus, He ſhall reſtore it to, or repair it for thee.

There are three things in that word. It may note,

1. The quietneſs of all within his family. There ſhall be peace and a good agreement in thy habitation.

2. The abundance, the fruitfulneſs, the great encreaſe of all within his family, he will make thee thrive.

3. The peaceable holding or enjoyment of all thoſe good things, free from foreign invaſion or oppreſſions. Do thus, and then neither Sabeans nor Chaldeans ſhall any more come upon thee and plunder thee. Thus he will make the habitation of thy righteouſneſs proſperous.

The ſum of all is, as if Bildad had ſaid unto Job, Thy habitation hath heretofore been an habitation of unrighteouſneſs, of impiety, of tyranny, thy houſe hath been filled with ſpoil and oppreſſion, thy Tabernacle hath been a Sanctuary for wickedneſs, a lodging or rendezvouz for all manner of riot and intemperance, of rapine and injuſtice; but now Job, if thou wilt make thy ſelf pure and upright, thou ſhalt ſee the caſe will alter; whereas before troops and armies of miſeries have invaded thee, and ſpoiled all thou hadſt within and without, if in thy houſe, where wickedneſs formerly dwelt, righteouſneſs ſhall enter and dwell, thou ſhalt ſee that with righteouſneſs peace will enter too; troubles will depart when wickedneſs departs, and evils of puniſhment will diſlodge with the evil of ſin; when thoſe gueſts, righteouſneſs and holineſs come into, and are welcomed at thy houſe, then thy houſe ſhall be better; when thy heart and thy life change, thy eſtate ſhall change; and thoſe comforts which have been ſo long ſtrangers from thee, ſhall return; thy baniſhed mercies ſhall come home again, adorn thy walls, and ſtrengthen thy family.

Ubi facta fuerit morum & ſtudiorum, fiet etiam magna fortunæ converſio.

This is the ſum of what he promiſeth in theſe words, He will make the habitation of thy righteouſneſs proſperous. Hence obſerve,

First, Proſperity is in the power of God.

If he awakes, he can make us proſperous and peaceful. If he do but ſpeak the word, our captivity ſhall return. He ſaith to a dry ſtick, flouriſh, and to a green tree, wither; his word is cloathed with power to do good or evil.

Secondly obſerve, A righteous habitation ſhall be a proſperous habitation.

Whether we reſpect perſons, families or Nations, thus it is in the ordinary diſpenſations of God. As in regard of our ſpiritual and eternal eſtate, The work of righteouſneſs is peace (Iſa. 32. 17.) ſo, in regard of our temporal and outward. Chriſt, who is the Prince of righteouſneſs, is alſo the Prince of peace: He brought righteouſneſs into the world, and then peace came into the world. If he had not made an habitation of righteouſneſs in the world, there had never been an habitation of peace in the world; in that work of his the foundation of our proſperity was laid. Jeſus Chriſt, who as a Prieſt, purchaſed our peace, is alſo the King of righteouſneſs. Bleſſings crown the head of a righteous people (Jer. 31. 23.) They ſhall ſay, The Lord bleſs thee, O habitation of righteouſneſs. If thou art a habitation of righteouſneſs, a bleſſing ſhall reſt upon thee: The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteouſneſs and peace, and joy in the holy Ghoſt, Rom. 14. 17. As the ſpiritual Kingdom of God is righteouſneſs, peace and joy in the holy Ghoſt: So the joy and peace of worldly Kingdoms is not meat and drink, but righteouſneſs. When Kingdoms are holy habitations, they will ſoon be quiet habitations. In Iſa. 26. 2. Open ye the gates, that the righteous Nation which keepeth the truth may enter in; thou ſhalt keep him in perfect peace. God will give and preſerve the peace of the righteous. Righteouſneſs is the pillar of a State, and the parent of peace. The mountains (Pſal. 72. 3.) ſhall bring peace to the people, and the little hills by righteouſneſs. Plant righteouſneſs upon barren hills and mountains, and peace will flouriſh there.

I might hence infer a Corollary by the rule of contraries, That, Unrighteouſneſs makes unproſperous and unpeaceful habitations. An habitation of Idolatry and falſe worſhip, an habitation of cruelty and hard dealing ſhall be an habitation for owls and ſhreech-owls, a dwelling-place for every unclean bird and beaſt; theſe ſhall take up their lodgings within ſuch walls, and make their neſts in ſuch chambers.

Whilſt we are fill'd (as the Apoſtle characterizeth the Gentiles, Rom. 1.) with all unrighteouſneſs; it is no marvel if we are filled with all trouble. The Prophet Malachi brings in Edom thus reflecting upon himſelf (chap. 1. 4.) Whereas Edom ſaith, I am impoveriſhed, &c. Edom began to be ſenſible all was not well with him. Hereupon he adviſes upon a way to help himſelf, and concludes thus, We will return and build the deſolate places. This was their reſolve; but what ſaith God to it? Even this, will ye build? ye ſhall build, I will give you leave to build, but I will throw it down again. I will ſpoil your work. Why would the Lord be thus ſevere? The next words give a reaſon; They ſhall call thee the border of wickedneſs, the people againſt whom the Lord hath indignation for ever. Wickedneſs is a large word, and takes in all unrighteouſneſs towards man, as well as impiety towards God. That building cannot ſtand long, where unrighteouſneſs lies between the timber and the ſtones. God will pull down by night what ſuch men build by day. If then we would have buildings ſtand, and our habitations proſperous, let us labour to build with juſtice, and make ours the habitations of rigtheouſneſs. Look upon it in families, that which withers the comfort of a family, in children, in ſervants, is the unrighteouſneſs found in a family; if there be unrighteouſneſs there, no wonder if there be decayes and diſcontents there too. If there be unrighteouſneſs in Cities; If (Pſal. 55. 11.) deceit and guile go not out of our ſtreets, no marvel if complainings go not out of our ſtreets. We call for peace and proſperity, O that peace would come! but if our hearts were ſet upon this, if we laboured every one with himſelf, and every one with his brother, and every one with the publick to the uttermoſt of his line, that we may in our perſons, in our families, in our policies, be an habitation of righteouſneſs; how ſoon ſhould we all be a proſperous habitation, an habitation of peace.

Two things make a Nation an habitation of righteouſneſs.
First, When right is done ſpeedily.
Secondly, When right is done impartially.

Tedious delayes make Courts priſons of righteouſneſs, not habitations of righteouſneſs. Partial diſtributions throw a place to be a market of righteouſneſs (where he ſhall have it that bids moſt for it) not an habitation of righteouſneſs, where every one ought to have it that comes for it; Ye ſhall do no unrighteouſneſs in judgment (ſaith the Law, Lev. 19. 15.) How ſhall they avoid it? The next words give direction, Thou ſhalt not reſpect the perſon of the poor, nor honour the perſon of the mighty. Righteouſneſs takes not notice of the perſons of men, but of their cauſes. we muſt not do unrighteouſly in charity to the poor, as well as not in hopes, or for gifts from the rich.

Again, The Hebrew ſignifies a beautiful habitation. Righteouſneſs loves to dwell in a fair houſe. It is ſo, when firſt ſwept from bribes, theſe are filth in the houſe, and the corrupters of righteouſneſs.

Secondly, A beautiful houſe hath ſtore of lights in it. Juſtice and Truth love, not corners and cloſe cells. Juſtice muſt act clearly; men cannot bear it, that what falls upon their ſenſes, ſhould not be in the light of their underſtandings. God hath ſecret judgments, but man muſt not. One potſherd muſt ſhew another why he forms or breaks him thus in judgment.

Laſtly, The beauty of the houſe of Juſtice ariſes from good Laws, and good men to execute them. Righteouſneſs cannot act without a rule; and rules cannot act themſelves. Good Laws without good Magiſtrates, never make any people a habitation of righteouſneſs. It is not good Laws, but good men which make a Kingdom happy. Now, as unrighteouſneſs makes a ſtrong people weak, a rich people poor, an honourable people baſe, a great eſtate to decreaſe and come to nothing; ſo righteouſneſs makes a weak people ſtrong, a poor people rich, a mean people honourable, a little eſtate encreaſe and come to much. Thus Bildad aſſures Job with this next breath.

Verſe 7. Though thy beginning was ſmall, yet thy latter end ſhould greatly encreaſe.

This is the third gradation. God will not only awake for thee, and make thee proſperous, but he will greatly encreaſe thee. Thou ſhalt not only be ſet in as good a condition as thou waſt, but in a far better.

רשית A quo quid incipit.

Though thy beginning were ſmall.] Though the head of thy eſtate (ſo the Hebrew) though the firſt of thy eſtate were ſmall.

The word ſmall notes a ſmalneſs either in quantity or in quality; and it is oppoſed to a double greatneſs (Gen. 25. 23.) Jacob and Eſau are thus diſtinguiſhed, the one ſhall be great, the other ſmall; which we tranſlate, the elder ſhall ſerve the younger; the greater ſhall ſerve the leſs.

Though thy beginning was ſmall. The City that Lot deſired (Gen. 19.) is called Zoar, from this word, Is it not a little one? Though thy eſtate were but a Zoar, a little one, yet it ſhall be built of a larger compaſs.

The Septuagint raiſes the ſence of the latter clauſe, Though thy beginning was ſmall, yet thy latter end ſhall be ineffable, ſuch as none ſhall be able to tell over or deſcribe. Thy eſtate ſhall be beyond account.

Τὰ ἔσχατα σὺ ἀμύθητα. Sept.

A Queſtion ariſes how we are to make this compariſon between between Job's beginning and later end? Whether we are to refer it to the estate he had before his affliction, compared with what he should have after his affliction; or, whether we are to understand it of the augmentation and encrease of his estate after his affliction, which at the beginning should be but small, but afterwards should receive a mighty augmentation. The sence is good either way.

First, If we understand it of his estate before and after his troubles compared together, Though thy beginning or the first estate which God gave thee were small, yet thy later end, or the estate which God will give thee, when these storms are over-blown, shall wonderfully encrease.

Against this it may be objected, how can the former estate of Job be called small, when as it is said (Chap. 1.) that Job had a very vast estate? We have heard the inventory of his goods, the total sum or apprizement of all, being given in by God himself, That Job was the greatest of all the men in the East. How then can it be said, that his first estate was small? Though thy beginning were small.

I answer, comparatively it may be called small. An exceeding exceſs of greatness, lessens and littles any other greatness. The Moon is a great light, but the light of the Sun makes that light darkness. That which is glorious hath no glory, by reason of the glory that excelleth; he that is rich or great hath no riches or greatness, by reason of riches and greatness which excel. Job had a fair estate before, and was the greatest man of all the men of the East; but his estate is promised to be such as shall obscure the former, and render it inconsiderable. Accordingly, it is said, in the story of his restoring (Chap. 42. 10.) That the Lord turned the captivity of Job; also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. Half is but a little to the whole. And at vers. 12. The Lord blessed the latter end of Job more then his beginning. Which words are a good exposition upon the Text in hand. When Joseph sent for his Father and Brethren to come into Ægypt (Gen. 45. 20.) he saith, but as for your stuff, do not regard that, for the good of all the land of Ægypt is before you. Joseph knew his Father was a rich man. Jacob was no beggar: but let all that go for nothing, leave it to those that will take it up, all the good of Ægypt is before you, what is all you have to the riches of Ægypt? That's the first sence. Observe from it,

That, the Lord is able to repair all our losses with abundant advantages.

We complain of losses; I have lost a great estate, saith one; but the Lord is able to give thee such an estate, as that the greatness of the former shall not be remembred.

Secondly, They who lose much, usually have great repairs.

Job was great above all others in the East, but now he shall be made greater then himself. As in spirituals, they that have, to them more shall be given, and they shall have more abundance; so they that lose much in temporals, to them more is given sometimes then they have lost, and they shall have abundance.

There is a second sence, to which the letter of the original doth rather incline, which makes both parts of the verse look only to his second estate, namely, his restauration: and so the sence is this, Though thou doest not presently thrive and grow up to a great estate, yet afterward thou shalt; Though after this breaking and undoing thou shouldest set up (as it were) but with a little stock, one friend bringing thee a piece of silver, another, a piece of gold, a third, a jewel, all making a purse for thee: and so thou beginnest but upon alms and charity, yet thy later end shall greatly increase. As if Bildad had said, Though God should now begin to comfort, and restore thee but with small matters, yet do not think he will so conclude with thee, he hath enough in store. The letter of the Original is most clear for this, the words being assertive, rather then suppositive, Thy beginning shall be small, and thy later end shall greatly encrease: which refers to the time future, not past, as we and others translate. Hence observe,

Cum dicat, erit satis indicat se loqui de iis bonis, quæ habiturus est, & respuerit, non de iis quæ habuit, ante hanc tempestatem. Drus. Sic solet Deus ditare suos, non uno tempore sinul, sed paulatim & ut Itali dicunt, poco à poco. Galli peu à peu. Idem.

That, the Lord doth usually raise his people by degrees.

They do not receive all at once. It is true of persons, families and Nations. We must not look for all in a day. Outward mercies may come too fast upon us, there may be a glut of them. We may have more then we know how to order and take in, it may do hurt to receive all together. As it is with men that have been long pined with famine and hunger, and are grown out of their ordinary course by reason of their necessitated abstinence. We do not presently give them all manner of good chear, or bring them to a full table, and let them eat as much as they will; but we give them a little and a little at a time, and so by degrees bring their stomachs on, till they be wrought for plenty. So when the Lord brings persons or Nations very low, he doth not bring in a glut of mercies at first, this would be more then they are able to bear, as they may be undone, if they have all at one receipt; but he gives as they are able to take them in, and make a right use of them. As Jacob said to Esau his brother, when he invited him to march with him; no, saith Jacob, I cannot march thy pace, I must consider what my train is, I have flocks here that are great with young, And if I should over-drive them one day, they would all dye: therefore (saith he) I will lead on softly, according as the cattel that are before me, and the Children be able to endure. So it is in this case, the Lord in infinite wisdom gives, as men are able to receive. We may be over-mercy'd, as well as over-afflicted; over-laden with comforts, as well as with sorrows. And therefore as the Lord doth correct in judgment and in measure: So also doth he restore. We have not full tyde in a moment, or in a quarter of an hour: it would be terrible, dangerous, and troublesom: if when it is low water we should have full tide in a moment, but it comes in stealing by degrees, and at last it swells all over the banks. Such a stealing flood of mercies the Lord gives his people.

Therefore be caution'd. In the returns of mercy do not despise small things. Your beginnings may be inconsiderable, this is but a little, and that is but a little, but do not despise the first, or second little. So the Prophet counsels (Zech. 4. 10.) Despise not the day of small things: The beginnings of mercy were scarce discernable, and they looked upon them as nothing, they thought they would never come to any thing. Take heed (saith the Prophet) do not despise small things, there's more a coming. Hast thou but a little? Doth God make but some little repairs of outward comforts? Do not slight these, look upon them as the beginnings of greater things. When Elijah sent his servant to go, and look towards the Sea, whether he saw any sign of rain, he at last brought him word that he saw a little cloud arise out of the Sea as big as a mans hand: would any one think that a prognostick of great rain? Elijah's servant might despise this, and say this is no sign of rain; but Elijah knew better, that little assured him there was a mighty showre at hand, he knew how it would work presently: Go, bid Ahab prepare his Chariot, and get him down, that the rain stop him not. Thus it is, respecting dayly providences; if you see a mercy coming but as big as a mans hand, be perswaded that the Lord sends it as a fore-runner, as that which shall usher in large and extensive mercies. If we see the glimmering light of day break, we are not angry, because it is not presently high noon, or, because we have not full light, we know the light will come by degrees; Thy beginning shall be small, but thy latter end shall greatly encrease.

VERS. 8, 9, 10.

For enquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thy self to the search of their fathers.
(For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing; our dayes upon Earth are a shadow)
Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart?

WE have opened the first Argument, by which Bildad confirms his proposition laid down at vers. 3. that God is just; both from the example of Gods dealing with Job's Children, vers. 4. and from what, God was ready to do for him, in vers. 5, 6, 7.

The context now read contains a second general Argument to prove the former assertion, and it is grounded upon the testimony or Authority of the Ancients; as if Bildad had said thus, I will not press thee with my own bare sentence, and say so, with my own reason and authority, but I wish thee to search the records of former times, to consult the wisest and the holiest men that ever were in the world, and let them judge in this case. Enquire of the former age, and prepare thy self to the search of their Fathers.

It is here observable that Bildad manages his counsel by the same Arguments which Eliphaz had used before him: Eliphaz bid Job (Enquire who ever perished being innocent, (Chap. 4.) and promises him peace upon repentance (Chap. 5. 23, 24.) Bildad runs the same strain, If thou wert pure, &c. and here, Enquire of the former age, &c.

The strength of his Argnment may be cast into this form.

That is true which the holiest and wisest in all antiquity with one mouth and one consent agree in.
But the holiest and wisest in all antiquity agree in this, that God is just.
Therefore this is a truth.

Hereupon he inferreth, that God had dealt justly with Job in consuming his estate, in destroying his Children, and in afflicting his person. That's the Logical meaning or Argument of these three verses.

שאל Significat petere, postulare & quidem cum precibus. Etiam scisciscitari in dubiis.

Enquire I pray thee.] The word notes a very earnest, and a diligent search or enquiry: To enquire with industry, yea, with importunity. The grave hath its name in Hebrew from this word, and so hath Hell: because the grave (as it were) calls for, or enquires after all flesh; and Hell with much earnestness gapes for wicked men, Eccles. 2. 10. Whatsoever mine eyes desired. The eye is a strong asker.

De personâ, sic consulere; de rebus sic petere. Merc.

It is applied sometimes to persons, and then it signifies, to enquire or consult what is to be done. Sometimes it is applied to things, and then it signifies, to ask that a thing may be done. Prayer is an enquiry after God, and the things of God, 1 Sam. 1. 17, 20, 27. This word is used about Hannahs prayer to God for a Child, Hannah conceived and bare a son, and called his name Samuel, saying, Because I have asked him of the Lord.

Further, the word is applied to God when he enquires after or asks somewhat of us, as if he made his request and sute to us (Deut. 10. 12.) And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee? Or, what doth he enquire after in thee? It is this, To fear the Lord thy God, &c.

Here, to enquire, is to use all endeavours and means to find out the best informations and resolutions, which the Fathers in those former ages were able to give Job in the controversie then a foot between him and his friends, Enquire, I pray thee,

Of the former age.] By the former we are not to understand those that were immediately preceding only, or those that were preceding for some few generations past, but as the Septuagint well renders it, by former generations, we may understand the first generation; begin at the first, and so come down all along, begin as high as thou canst. Enquire not only of those who lived since the floud, but of all who have been since God created man upon the Earth; draw the line of thy search thorow all ages, and thou shalt find the pedegree of this truth from age to age, from generation to generation, Enquire I pray thee, of the former γενεὰν πρώτην.

Age.] The word age, is taken three wayes.

דור à radice דור Continuit & successive vixit, duravit; sensu & sono idē quod vox Latina duro.

First, For the whole space of mans life; which, when it is doubled, signifies a very long life, Psal. 61. 7. Thou shalt prolong the Kings life (or, according to the letter of the Hebrew, thou shalt add dayes to the dayes of the King) and his years as many generations; or, as generation and generation, age and age, long and long, that is, very long; Two lives, or two mens ages, being (as it were) laid into one.

Secondly, For some special part of mans life. Mans life is divided into several ages. Some divide it into four, alluding to the four parts of the year. Some, into five, infancy, childhood, youth, mans estate, and old-age; comparing them to the five acts of an interlude, the Prologue whereof is infancy, and the Epilogue, decrepid old-age. Others into seven, in allusion to the seven Planets.

Thirdly, It is taken for an age of men, or the state of the time present. So in the Gospel, Christ calleth the Scribes and Pharisees, A generation of vipers, and an adulterous generation. As if he had said, You of this time and age of the world, are a viperous and an adulterous brood. So Psal. 14. 5. God is in the generation of the righteous: That is, he favours that generation, or sort of men; God is in all generations, but such he delights in most; the wicked have cause enough to fear those, in whom God delights.

Ætatem vocant Hebræi genus hominum simul viventium, sic ætas prava adultera. Apud Græcos γενεὰ, significat intervallum septē annorum, unde medici vetant duas ætates habenti, i.e. annos quatuor decem nato venam incidi, quod sanguine egeat. Suid.

That of the Prophet (which Text hath variety of interpretations) is taken in this sence (Isa. 53. 8.) Who shall declare his generation? It is the word of the Text, Who shall declare his age, or the generation of Christ? Some understand it of his eternal generation. Others, of his temporal generation, when he was incarnate, the mystery whereof was beyond words. A third, of that eternity which followed his passion. As if it were an Antithesis to those words, He was taken from prison, and he was cut off, but who shall declare his generation? You may quickly write up the dayes that Christ lived here upon Earth, they were but few, even his pilgrimage was short on Earth, but who can declare his generation? Those infinite and eternal ages and revolutions, thorow which he shall pass, though now you have quickly cut off his life? Others, by his generation understand the holy seed and issue, the Children of Christ. His Cross was fruitful, and his sufferings productive of an infinite generation, Who can declare it? Though you cut off the Father, yet this Father by dying will give life to an innumerable posterity, Who can declare his generation? So (vers. 10.) He shall see his seed. But besides all these we may with good probability interpret the word generation for the time when Christ sojourned in the flesh, Who can declare this generation? That is, who can describe the time or the age wherein Christ lived? As if he had said, you see here in this glass of prophecy how they will use Christ, how bloodily and cruelly they will deal with him, he shall be imprisoned, he shall be cut off and numbred among transgressors, Who can declare his generation? What pen is able with lively colours to paint out the several wickednesses and Tyrannies of that age, acted against, and inflicted upon that holy and innocent lamb Jesus Christ, who came to dye for the sins of the world? Surely his generation, or the story of his age will be such, as no pen is able to draw out, or fully to delineate, Who shall declare his age?

Quis cogitare aut dicere potest quam perversi fuerint homines, qui tempore ejus victuri sint. Pined.

The age which Bildad calls Job to enquire into, is not a part of mans life, or the whole life of a man, or one age of men, or state of times, but the whole space of time from the very beginning with all things done or suffered, and the persons who have been active or passive, doers or sufferers in those times. Thus enquire of the former age.

The reason why he called him to enquire of the former age, was, because in those times the will of God was not reduced to writing. The divinity of the first ages was traditional; the Scriptures were not composed for more then two thousand years after the creation, but the mind of God was either immediately revealed, or carried from father to son, from generation to generation; being preserved, not in paper and ink, or other formal records, but in the memories and hearts of the faithful, until the giving of the Law. Hence it was that Bildad refers Job to those revelations, or to the experiences of the Fathers concerning the dealings of God in former ages.

Berosus in his eighth book of Antiquities, reports that the Fathers after Adam set up two great pillars, upon which some affirm they inscribed many Divine Truths: but he tells us that those pillars (of which some monuments were seen after the flood) were filled rather with Astronomical observations, Mathematical scheams of the Heavens and figures of the Stars; we cannot put much value upon either of these opinions. The former cannot warrant us that any thing was registred and written by Gods appointment, till the writing of the Law. And therefore Bildad, according to the usage of those times, sends Job for information to the traditions and reports of the Fathers. For after the Law was written, the Prophets, in case of emergent doubts and controversies, sent the people, not to the traditions or experiences of former ages, but, To the Law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there there is no light, or no morning in them, Isa. 8. 20. The word once written was the rule, and though it cannot speak, yet it must teach us how to speak. If we speak not according to this, there is no light in us. But the word not being written, Bildad advises Job well, Enquire of the former age,

And prepare thy self to the search of their Fathers.

Having counsel'd him to enquire of the former age; he addeth, Prepare thy self to the search of their Fathers; as if he had said, though I bid thee enquire, yet I would not have thee rush hand over head upon this enquiry, Prepare thy self. The word signifies to lay a good foundation; Due preparations are the foundation of action. Hence it signifies also to establish; because a matter is established and confirmed by wise preparations, and considerate addresses to it. Those things stand fastest about which we make not too much hast. Further, the word signifies the fixing of the mind, Fix thy heart upon this work: keep thy spirits intent (Psal. 108. 1.) My heart is fixed (saith David, which some render, My heart is prepared) I will sing and give praise. Prepare thy self

To the search of their Fathers.] Before he advised him to enquire of the former age, here, To search their Fathers; as if he had said, Do not confine thy self to the immediately fore-passed times, but go as high as thou canst: The former age (as was touched upon that passage) may include all times past: but here to avoid all mistakes, he gives it in expressly. The Fathers of the former age, are the Fathers of every age. All that have lived before us, come under the relation of our Fathers. The Fathers were dead, but they lived in their monuments and works: these he must search, so far as any mark or remembrance of them could be found. Hence Observe,

First, That as it is a duty in all, so it was a custom, in ancient times, carefully to record the dealings of God with them, for the use of ensuing generations.

To what end should Job search, if nothing were to be found; The Jews were commanded to remember the works of God for their learning, after the word was written, Psal. 78. 5. He established a testimony in Jacob, &c. That they should make them known to their Children. God hath alwayes had a book of his acts and monuments, as well as of his Laws and Institutions. Names given to Children and yearly feasts, to stones and pillars, have been the preservatives and memorials of his wonderful works. The works of God are his holiness, justice, power, mercy, truth made visible. The administrations of God in one age, are for the instruction of all ages. God spake with Jacob only in person at Bethel, yet there the Scripture saith, he spake with all his posterity, Hos. 12. 4. He found him in Bethel, and there he spake with us. It is then a debt to posterity, to shew them what God hath done for us. Observe,

Secondly, That it is our duty to enquire into the dealings of God in all ages.

It was their duty before the word was written, and it is a duty still. The works of God are to be studied and read over as well as his word, Deut. 4. 20. & 32. Ask now of the dayes that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon Earth; and ask from one side of Heaven to another, enquire every way to see whether ever God dealt with a people, as he hath dealt with thee, whether God did ever assay to take to himself a Nation from the midst of an other Nation by temptations, and by signs, and by wonders, &c. Enquire this of all the former times. So Deut. 32. 7. Remember the dayes of old, consider the years of many generations, ask thy Father and he will shew thee, thy Elders and they will tell thee. The Psalmist promises to rehearse what these were enjoyned to record, Psal. 78. 3, 4. I will open my mouth in a parable, I will utter dark sayings of old, which we have heard and known, and our Fathers have told us. Our speaking of, and enquiring into, what God hath done, shews the harmony between his word and works. And the former providences of God are food for our faith, as well as the promises of God.

Thirdly, That which I shall rather insist upon, is this,

True antiquity ever gives a testimony to the truth.

Quod antiquissimum verissimum.

Hence the Prophets send the people back to antiquity, Jer. 6. 16. Enquire for the good old-way. Every old way is not a good way, but in every good old way we may walk safely and see the foot-steps of truth. It is a received rule, That is truest which is ancientest. It is certainly so, for truth is not only ancient, but eternal. Truth is as old as God himself, for truth is nothing else but the mind of God, truth was with God from everlasting. Truth is commonly called the daughter of time, yet (in a sence) it is the mother of time, for it was before time was; and therefore (no question) that which is ancienteſt is truest.

Yet there is a great abuse of this principle. Look back to antiquity and consult with your Fathers (say many) and see what they did, how they believed. But what is the antiquity they call us to consult with? It is not (as Moses spake in that place of Deuteronomy) antiquity, since God created man upon Earth, or since Jesus Christ was upon the Earth, and gave out his Gospel laws: but it is the antiquity of some later ages and editions, an antiquity far short of what is indeed the ancient time. The Apostle (1 Joh. 2. 7.) gives us the definition of an old commandment, This is the old commandment which was from the beginning. Our sinful nature is called the old man, and yet is a corrupt man. It is called the old man, not that it is older then the new man; the new man is not of a younger house, or later date then the old man. Holiness was before corruption. And the image of God upon man, elder then sin, the image of the Devil. There are many corruptions in doctrine, in opinion, in worship, in practice, which go for very old: And there are many doctrines which we call new truths; Is it because those corruptions are older then these new truths? No, new truths are elder then the oldest corruptions. That which we call the new world, was created in the beginning, though discovered but yesterday. So new truths were given from the beginning only they were unknown till of late; and we may well conceive that some goodly regions of truth are still (terra incognita) undiscovered; God having reserved them for the honour and industry of some divine Columbus, who may give us an exacter Sea-card, of divine Mysteries, then the world hath yet seen, though enough hath been seen from the beginning, for the safe steering of our course to Heaven. He that would enquire and make a diligent search for truth, must go to the first institutions, That's the old commandment which was from the beginning. The Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 23. 43.) speaks of some who were grown old in adulteries; that is, old in adulterating and corrupting the truth, and worship of God, That which is old may be old in evil, and fuller of errors then it is of dayes. We find when the good Kings of Judah reformed, they did not search only into what was done in the ages immediately before them, or what their next Fathers had done; but they search'd what was done in the times of their godly Fathers, how many removes soever distant from them. Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29. 6.) tells the Levites that their Fathers were in an error, that they had trespassed, and done that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and had forsaken him; and Chap. 30. 5. speaking of the observation of the Passover, he saith, They had not done it of a long time in such sort as it was written; therefore ver. 7. he dehorteth them saying, Be not ye like your Fathers which trespassed against the Lord God of your Fathers; he doth not mean that they should not be like their first Fathers, who had the truth purely committed to them, and so worshipped God purely; but be not like your immediate fore-fathers, or your corrupt fore-fathers, how many descents and generations so ever, ye can number from them. And this was a thing so strange, that when Hezekiah sent the Posts from City to City thorow the Countries of Ephraim and Manasseh, with this message, that he would have a reformation according to the first institution or pattern, and would not have them stay in what their fore-fathers had done; It is said, vers. 10. That they laughed the messengers to scorn, and they mocked them; what must we now be wiser then our Fathers? Yes, saith he, you have done evil a long time, you and your Fathers, therefore I must bring you back to your first Fathers, in comparison of whom, the Fathers you claim by were but Children, and those degenerate Children. It is said of Josiah's reformation, (2 King.

23. 22.) That there was not the like from the dayes of the Judges, nor in all the dayes of the Kings of Iſrael and Judah; he went to the very beginning of all, there had not been ſuch a thing done before. So that if any ſhould have objected, why may not ſuch a reformation ſerve us as ſerved thoſe Kings and Judges? No, ſaith Joſiah, I will ſearch beyond their times into the remoteſt antiquities. The Church makes humble confeſſion (Pſal. 106. 6.) We have erred with our fathers; let not any turn this into a ſtubborn reſolution, and ſay, We will err with our fathers: if that be an errour which our fathers believed and practiſed, we will erre with them. So thoſe rebellious Jews pleaded (Jer. 44. 17.) We will do as our fathers. They who will do as their fathers, may ſuffer with their fathers; they who will needs err by their fathers copy, may go to hell too by their fathers copy. Jerom once deſired leave of Auſtin to err with ſeven fathers whom he found of his opinion. I ſhould not deſire that leave, nor envy any one the priviledge. The Fathers are but Children when they err, and they who will err with their Fathers, are worſe then Children.

Conſider then to what Antiquity, and to what Fathers you appeal. Many practices are very old, yet very erroneous. Many old ſayings and old doings muſt be unſaid and undone, or we ſhall be undone for ever. How many old ſayings of the Jews doth Chriſt gainſay? (Mat. 5.) Ye have heard that it hath been ſaid by them of old time, thus and thus, But I ſay unto you, &c. And (Mat. 19.) Anſwering the Queſtion about divorce, Moſes indeed for the hardneſs of your hearts, ſuffered you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it was not ſo. Beſides, ſome (like the Gibeonites) feign antiquity, they can put a gray beard upon a green head; and their opinions will be found fennowed and mouldy with errour, not with age. As we muſt take heed of novelties, ſo we muſt be cautious about antiquities. Some antiquities of old men are no better then old wives fables, of which the Apoſtle bids us beware; unlearned old wives fables are as authentick as many learned mens antiquities pleaded for. To have an itch after novelties, and to dote upon antiquities, are alike vain and dangerous. Old fables and young fancies are with me at the ſame rate; No man having drunk old wine (ſaith Chriſt, Luke 5. 35.) ſtraightway calls for new, for he ſaith the old is better. Old is better then new, if it be as good as new. But any new truth is better then the oldeſt error; and every errour, the elder it is, the worſer it is.

Again, Bildad adviſes Job to prepare himſelf to the ſearch of his Fathers, Hence obſerve,

We muſt not preſume to find truth with eaſe, or to come ſlightly by it.

Prepare thy ſelf (Prov. 2. 3.) If thou crieſt after knowledge, and lifteſt up thy voyce for underſtanding; if thou dig for it as ſilver, and ſearch for it as for hid treaſures, then thou ſhalt find; &c. A man that will find ſilver, muſt prepare and fit himſelf to ſearch for ſilver. That lies not upon the ſurface, but in the boſom and bowels of the earth. There are four things wherein this preparation conſiſts.

Firſt, Humility. God doth not teach, but reſiſt the proud, he gives more grace (humility is much grace) to the humble. A lowly minded man ſhall know the mind of the moſt high God.

Secondly, Holineſs. Submitting to, and practiſing the truth we know, prepares us to receive more of truth. He that doth the will of Chriſt, ſhall know his doctrine, Jo. 7. 17.

Thirdly, Prayer. Doth any man want wiſdom? let him ask of God, Jam. 1. 5. Truth is the daughter of God, and he will not beſtow her in marriage upon our minds, unleſs we ask him.

Fourthly, Love unto Truth. Truth is a beauty, and deſerves our love; to love truth, is not a civility, but a duty; to ſearch for truth, without love to truth, is a diſhonour to truth; and as the not receiving the love of the truth, is the cauſe why many apoſtatize and fall from it, ſo it is a reaſon why many are ſtill ignorant and cannot come at it. As God, the Father of truth, muſt be askt his good will before we can have her; ſo truth, the daughter of God ſhall be loved before we have her.

Bildad having thus adviſed Job to ſearch antiquity, giveth him a reaſon of his advice, a modeſt reaſon, reflecting upon himſelf and upon his friends.

Verſe 9. For we are but of yeſterday, and know nothing, our dayes on earth are a ſhadow.

As if he had ſaid, the reaſon why we refer thee to the former ages, is, becauſe we are able to ſay little of our ſelves, and from our own experience, we are but of yeſterday, that is, the time we have lived is very little, our dayes have been few upon earth. Truth is the daughter of time, and we are ſcarce ſons of time, we are but of yeſterday.

Yeſterday.] Taken in our common ſpeech, ſignifies only the day immediately going before. 2. It is put for the time a little before, and is as much as lately, 2 Kings 9. 26. Surely I have ſeen yeſterday the blood of Naboth, and the blood of his ſons, That is, It is not long ſince Naboth and his ſons were ſlain, and their blood is as freſh in my memory, as if it were in my eye. 3. It is put for all time, how long ſoever paſt (Heb. 13. 8.) The Apoſtle Hebraizing, ſaith, Jeſus Chriſt the ſame yeſterday, to day and for ever; yeſterday is not put for the day immediately before, or for many dayes before, but for all dayes before, even from the beginning of the world; yea, not only are all dayes paſt included in yeſterday, but the eternity which is paſt.

Yeſterday and the day before, are often tranſlated before, or heretofore, Gen. 31. 2, 5. Exod. 40. 10. Ruth 2. 11. 2 Sam. 5. 2. Noting time not much paſt the preſent.

In this place by yeſterday, we are not to underſtand all time paſt, nor the time immediately paſt, but ſmall time paſt; We are but of yeſterday, that is, we have lived but a while in the world (yet they were old men) the dayes which we have ſeen are as nothing; he expreſſes their lives by the leaſt compleat time paſt, to ſhew that they had lived but a little time paſt.

So, in Scripture, this phraſe, to morrow (oppoſite to yeſterday) ſignifies not only the day immediately to come, but any time to come indefinitely (1 Sam. 28. 29.) The Devil anſwers Saul, To morrow thou and thy ſons ſhall be with me; he did not know exactly and preciſely, that it ſhould be the very next day, but he uſeth a word which would ſave his credit, if it ſhould have fallen out many dayes, or ſome few years after. To morrow may be any time to come. As then to morrow ſignifies the immediate day coming, or all time to come, ſo yeſterday ſignifies the immediate day paſt, or all time paſt. Thus one of the Ancients ſpeaks of Matthew, Yeſterday a Publican, to day a Preacher, that is, he was heretofore a Publican, and now a Preacher.

For we are but as yeſterday.] Bildad ſtileth himſelf and his friends yeſterday, to ſhew they had been but ſhort-liv'd, though they had lived long. Some have given us the date of their years, or an account how old they were. They reckon Bildad an hundren and forty, Eliphaz an hundred and fifty, and Zophar an hundred and twenty years old. In what Records the years of their nativities were found, I know not; but probable enough it is, that they were ancient men; and (chap. 15. 10.) Eliphaz ſpeaks as much, With us are both the gray-headed and very ancient men, much elder then thy father. Yet Bildad calleth himſelf and them but as of yeſterday, either abſolutely, becauſe the life of man is ſhort, or comparatively to the lives of the fathers in the firſt age of the world, who lived much longer. His meaning then is, we will not bound thee to our experiences, who have lived but a while, but inform thy ſelf from them who lived many years ago, and lived many years, ſome of them nine hundred years and more; enquire of Methuſelah, and his contemporaries, who are able to give thee a better account then we. Therefore he addeth,

And know nothing.] The particle [And] is here cauſal, We are but of yeſterday, therefore we know nothing; in which ſence we read it often. Take an inſtance (Ezek. 13. 31.) Thou haſt walked in the way of thy ſiſter, therefore I will give her cup into thine hand; The Hebrew is, And I will give her cup into thy hand, thou ſhalt pledge her in the ſame cup of affliction. So here, We are but of yeſterday, and know nothing, that is, We are but of yeſterday, therefore we know nothing.

Know nothing.] The negation is not abſolute, but comparative, We know nothing; that is, we Neotericks know but little in compariſon of thoſe who lived long ago, and lived ſo long, even many centuries, gathering knowledge, and making up their obſervations; for (ch. 12. 12.) With the ancient is wiſdom, and in length of days underſtanding. Hence obſerve,

The ſhort life of man is not ſufficient to gain much knowledge.

We

We are but of yesterday, and we know nothing; we cannot know much who live but little. The great Physitian complained long ago, Life is short, and art is long; natural life is not long enough for the journey of natural knowledge, how much less is it for divine knowledge in the mystery of Christ, which is the art of all arts, and science of sciences? Those mysteries are very long, and our lives very short; therefore at our best, we come short in the knowledge of them. Hence the Apostle (1 Cor. 13.) speaking of the most perfect knowledge we have in this life, concludes, we know but in part; there is a vast ocean of truths in the Gospel, but we are straight-necked vessels, we take in truths but by drops; we are long a taking it in, and we have not long to take it in; hence the emptiness of those that are fullest. He that hath much to learn, and but a little to live, cannot learn much. And as our time is little, so we lose a great deal of our time. Our losses of the time we have, hinder more then our having but little time. Our dayes are few, but if we could number them, we should apply our selves to, and gain to our selves a sufficient stock of holy wisdom. The greatest reason why we profit no more in knowledge, is, because we improve our time no more, though that be a reason also, because we have no more time.

Ars longa, vita brevis, Hipp.

Non parum temporis habemus, sed multum perdimus. Sen.

Secondly observe, how modestly Bildad speaks of himself and of his friends, We are but of yesterday, and we know nothing.

It becometh us to have humble thoughts of our own knowledge, how much soever we know.

These were neither children nor fools who had to do with Job, they were the wisest of that age, Oracles of wisdom, yet we know nothing, saith Bildad. The best of our knowledge here, is to know our imperfections, it is as much knowledge as we can reach, to know wherein our knowledge cometh short; the Apostle (1 Cor. 8.2.) is direct, He that thinketh he knoweth any thing knoweth nothing as he ought to know: He would not have us think that we know any thing, though he had said in the former verse, We know that we all have knowledge; the Apostle knew it, but he would not have them think it. His meaning is, I grant there is knowledge abroad in the world, I have some, and you have some. We know that we all have knowledge; which yet some understand, as if he spake in a secret Ironie, against those who bragg'd so much of their knowledge; yea, we know you have knowledge, but let me tell you thus much, you who stand so much upon your knowledge; he that thinketh he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. How can that be? Is not a man to think that he knows what he knows? Must a man think himself ignorant, or otherwise he must be accounted ignorant? Surely no. There are very many that know much, and they may think that they know something, yea, that they know many things; but observe the word there, He that thinketh: the word doth not signifie a simple apprehension of a thing, or a bare and naked knowledge, for so a man may reflect upon his own knowledge, and know that he knows, as well as what he knows; but it imports thinking with a kind of insolency and pride of spirit, with affectation, boasting and vain-glory in that knowledge. He that thinketh he knows any thing, that is, he that vaunts and stands upon his knowledge, who conceits he hath so much knowledge, such a head-piece that he can carry all before him by the strength of his wit and parts, such a knowing man knows nothing. That mans wisdom is but conceit who is wise in his own conceit. In this sence we have the word (Mat. 3.9.) Where the Baptist bespeaks the Pharisees, Think not to say within your selves, we have Abraham to our father; Think not; it was not a sin for them to think that Abraham was their father, and that they were descended from him; but, think not, that is, do not think of this, and so be proud of it. Be not lifted up upon an outward priviledge which will stand you in no stead at all if you stand upon it. Except you be changed and born again of the Spirit, it will not avail you, that you are born of Abraham's flesh; if Abraham's faith be not in your hearts, it shall be no advantage to you that Abraham's blood runs in your veins. The word is so used again (Phil. 3.4.) If any one thinketh he may be confident, I much more. If any one may have an opinion of himself in regard of outward priviledges, surely I may, but I will not. So then an opinion, or a conceitedness of our knowledge, blasts all our knowledge; such a man knoweth nothing as he ought to know; he knoweth somewhat by rote, but he doth not know any thing (as a Christian ought) by heart. By how much we have the more true knowledge of the highest objects, by so much we have the lower thoughts of our knowledge. It is best to know as much as we can of the best things, and to think as little as we can of our selves.

Οὐδὲν ἴσμεν, geminatio negatis particulæ vehementius negat. Bez.

Our dayes upon earth are a shadow.] But were not the dayes of all the fathers a shadow? Yes, the longest life is but a long shadow; he means comparatively, our lives are shorter by much then theirs were, and therefore but a shadow.

There are three sorts of shadows: 1. Natural. 2. Civil. 3. Spiritual.

First, A natural shadow is a dark light caused by the coming of some thick body between us and the Sun. This is a shadow in a proper and strict acception.

Secondly, Besides the natural, there is a civil shadow, Protection is a shadow; and to be under a shadow, is to be protected: We translate (Num. 14.9.) Their defence is departed from them; the Heb. is, Their shadow. So, Isa. 4.5. & 25.4.

Thirdly, A shadow is taken for a dark or imperfect representation of things spiritual; so all the ceremonies of the old Law are called shadows (Heb. 8.5. & 10.1. & 9.9. Col. 2.17.) Ceremonial worship is expressed by a shadow, because it was but an obscure representation of the truth; the ceremonies were interposed between Christ the true light, and us, and so cast a shadow of him. Or, as a Painter, who is to draw the lively figure or shape of a man, at first makes an obscure draught, or some imperfect lines of the body, but afterwards gives it beauty and lustre to the life. The Mosaical rites were such a shadow of heavenly things. Yet further, a shadow (which comes neerest the meaning of this text) notes the least imaginable sign or semblance of a thing. So (Ja. 1.17.) When the Apostle saith, that with God the father of lights, there is not so much as a shadow of turning, he means, there is not the least sign or token of turning with God.

When Bildad saith, Our dayes upon earth are but as a shadow, we may understand it, either of the time past, and so our life is but as a shadow that is gone. Or, it may be meant of the whole life of man taken together. The life of man (take it from the beginning to the ending, from the Alpha to the Omega, from the first to the last of it) is a shadow. The comparison is frequent in Scripture, I shall not need to stay upon it. See two or three particulars of the resemblance.

First, The life of man is a shadow, because it hath little in it that is substantial, a shadow is opposed to a substance; our life rather seems to be then is, it is so quickly gone.

Umbra est quid inane, & nihil habens solidæ substantiæ, Umbra denotat materiam stationem & protectionem fugacem, nunquam sub umbra dormit, proditur statim, atque traditur radiis solis. Pined.

Secondly, A shadow (though sometime put for protection and safety, yet) implies unsetledness and uncertainty; if a man stands or rests under a shadow, the shadow will leave him, it will be gone from him, and betray him to the scorching Sun-beams; a shadow never keeps long in one place, but varies with the motion of the Sun, and when it is high-noon the shadow goes quite up, and is not. There is such an uncertainty in the life of man, it holds not one tenour, it stayes not in any state, there is a deceitfulness in it, changes are upon it. The greatest certainty of our lives is, that they are uncertain.

In general, the life of man being compared to a shadow, teaches us, that it is short, moveable and unconstant, there is no hold or tack in it, Psal. 102.11. My dayes are like a shadow that declineth. The encrease of our dayes hath a declension in it, 1 Chron. 29.15. We are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our Fathers; our dayes on the earth are as the shadow. How doth he explain that? There is no abiding in our dayes, as there is no abiding in a shadow. Many of the Ancients have represented the life of man, not only as a shadow, but less then a shadow; A dream of a shadow, a shadow of a shadow, an Idol of a shadow; which is the lowest expression that can be, as much as to say, a nothing of nothing. An Idol is nothing in the world. God made no such thing in the world. And though our dayes be made by God in world, yet they are no such thing as God made, or as the world makes them. We have met with points about the shortness and transitoriness of mans life often in this book, I shall therefore only add a word here.

Homo vocatur σκίας ὄναρ. Pin. κατὰ σκιᾶς Soph. εἴδωλον σκιᾶς. Æsc.

It is our wisdom, forasmuch as our life on Earth is as a shadow, that we improve this shadow to gain assurance of eternal light: Life here is but a fleeting shadow, that to come is

is an abiding substance. Shall we for the pleasures and comforts of a life, which is no more enduring then a shadow, hazard the pleasures and comforts of a life, which endures for ever. A man hath not a shadow of reason, not a shadow of true wisdom and understanding, who will spend out a shadowish life in those things which are but a shadow, neglecting that which is the true light, and will bring us to eternal light?

Attendat igitur homo in diebus umbræ suæ, ut faciat aliquid dignum desideratæ lucis suæ. Aug. in Psal. 143.

Bildad having put in his parenthesis, as a reason why he sends Job to the Fathers, gives him an encouragement at vers. 10. to make this enquiry, he tells him what he shall get for his pains in consulting with those former ages, and with the Fathers.

Vers. 10. Shall not they teach thée, and tell thée, and utter words out of their heart?

As if he had said, Thou shalt not lose thy labour by enquiring into those ancient times, shall not they teach thee? Certainly, they shall, thou shalt not come away empty, undirected, uncounsell'd.

Shall not they teach thée?] How could they teach? They were dead and gone, they were past many ages before. Bildad may be conceived to answer, Though the Fathers are dead, yet they will speak to thee and counsel thee, as well as if they lived and stood before thee with our selves. They shall teach thee, and they shall instruct thee. And more then that, they will not only teach thee in a complement, and speak words to thee, but they will speak their very hearts to thee: thou shalt find that they will give thee cordial counsel. They will utter words to thee out of their heart.

Utter words out of their heart.] The meaning of that is, either: First, In general, they will give thee the real conceptions of their minds about these points, they will speak sincerely, they will not speak to thee from the teeth outward, but from the heart inward. Secondly, They will speak wisely and judiciously to thee about these things; they will utter, not so much words as oracles to thee out of their heart.

Eloquia ex corde proferre, est sapienter loqui, sapiens cordatus dicitur; stultus excors. Cor loquitur, quæ animus præmeditatus est os loquitur sine meditatione.

The heart is the seat of knowledge and understanding, and a wise man is (homo cordatus) a hearty man, a man with a heart; and the fool in Scripture is said to be a heartless man, a man without a heart; he cannot utter words from his heart, who wants a heart, he utters them from his mouth, or from his tongue. A fools heart is in his mouth, and a wise mans mouth is in his heart; he speaks that which lies in the in-most receses and closets of his spirit: he speaks from meditation, he brings what he speaks to his heart, and from his heart utters what he speaks. Christ assures us, That a good man out of the good treasures of his heart brings forth good things, and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart brings forth evil things. Every heart is a treasury. When a good man speaks evil, he speaks not from his heart (though he hath a stock of sinfulness in him) but from his lips; and when an evil man speaks good, he speaks it not from his heart, but from his lips: for he hath no stock or treasury of good within. An hypocrite speaks good with a heart and a heart, with a double heart. A fool speaks without a heart, yet of the two, it is better to have no heart then two.

Or we may take the meaning of the words, as a secret reproof of Job; If thou wilt look after these Fathers, and search them, they will not speak as thou hast done, rashly, unadvisedly and indiscreetly, but they will speak from their hearts, they will utter things of weight and serious consideration. From hence observe,

First, That old men are presumed to have a great stock of knowledge.

Go to the Fathers, they will certainly teach thee. Every man should labour to have a proportion of knowledge to his proportion of years, we should not be Children in understanding, when we are men in time. The Apostle reproves such as are so (Heb. 5. 2.) When (saith he) for the time you ought to be teachers (look upon the years that are gone over your heads, and you ought to be teachers; you should have much in your hearts for the instruction of others, yet so it is) you have need that one teach you again, which be the first principles of the oracles of God, and you are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.

Secondly, Observe, They who are dead and gone, yet speak to us as if they were living.

Bildad sends Job to the ancient Fathers, go they will teach thee and utter words out of their heart. Whilst we consider what they have spoken and done, it is as if they now spake, Heb. 11. 4. Abel by faith offered a better sacrifice then Cain, and being dead he yet speaketh. They who are dead speak by their works, and they speak by the words which they spake, while they were alive. The records which they have left, give us counsel to this day. When the rich man (it is the scope of the Parable) I say when the rich man (Luke 16. 7.) desired that Lazarus might go from the dead to speak to his brethren, Abraham answers him, They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them, &c. If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be perswaded though one rose from the dead. They have Moses and the Prophets; but Moses and the Prophets were dead and gone; how have they Moses and the Prophets? they have not the men before them, but they had their writings and records: they who read the Prophets writings, hear their speakings. Books are silent voices.

If Moses and the Prophets may be heard when dead and gone, then much more may we hear Christ, since he died and rose, and his Apostles who are dead. And whereas some have an opinion that they do not know the mind of Christ, or that they cannot reform the Church, or their Churches, till Christ himself come from Heaven to do it, or till there be Apostles sent personally to do it (they wanting an Apostle, cannot order the worship and ordinances of God, and therefore conclude against a present Church-state) I say to such, if that be your ground that you must have Christ and his Apostles to settle all for you; you have your desires. Look into the works and word of Christ, into the writings and practices of his Apostles, both for your rule and patern. If Abraham could say, they have Moses and the Prophets, they may hear them: surely, we may say much more, we have Christ and his Apostles, whom we may hear and consult about all the institutions and orders that concern the frame of his Church. We need not stay till Christ come down in person from Heaven, or till new Apostles are sent and furnished with instruction for this work, for we have Christ and his Apostles already, we hear what Christ spake, we read the rules which he gave concerning the wayes of his worship and government of his Church (in all the essential and constitutive parts of either) to the end of the world. Observe, Thirdly, They that teach others should teach their own hearts to speak.

It is best speaking to others with the heart. The heart will teach better then the tongue, yea better then the understanding, The word which comes from the heart of the teacher, goes soonest to the heart of the hearer. Observe, Fourthly, The heart is the true repository or treasury of holy truths.

You may see where the Fathers, the holy men in ancient time laid up truth: they utter words out of their heart, then, truth was lay'd up there. Truth is (as it were) the heart of God, and therefore we must put it into our hearts. David hid the Commandments of God in his heart: Mary laid up the words of Christ there. To have the word only swimming in our brains, is to as little purpose, as to have it only in our Note-books. To have truth only in our brains, or in our books, will do us as little good as water in our shoes. It is a sad thing to consider how many thousand Sermons are written almost word for word in books, and scarce a letter of them written in the heart. The promise of the new Covenant is, that God will write his law in our hearts: Let not any rest satisfied in having the word written in their books. Observe further,

Holy men of old did highly esteem the word and truths of God.

You may know the esteem they had of these by the place where they laid these; the heart is the best place, the fairest room in man. To put a thing into the heart, notes highest esteem and approbation. When we say a thing is in our hearts, we cannot say more to express our esteem of it.

When

When the Apostle (Phil. 1.7.) professes to the Philippians, I have you in my heart; his meaning is, you are most dear and precious to me. When we see a man preparing a special place, a safe place, a convenient place to lay a thing in, we conclude that the thing he would lay up is of value and account with him: when we are preparing and fitting our hearts to put the word and truths of God in, hereby we give a real testimony, that we honour the Word of God. For the most part the truths of God (as we say of things we neglect) are cast at mens heels rather then laid up in their hearts. We may know the esteem a Queen of England had of the City of Calice, when she said, It was in her heart, and there they should find it, if they opened her.

So much concerning these three verses, containing an argument from antiquity, and the testimony of tha first ages, by which Bildad confirms his former position, That God is just.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

Can the rush grow up without mire? Can the flag grow up without water?
Whilst it is yet in his greenness and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.
So are the paths of all that forget God, and the hypocrites hope shall perish.
Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spiders web.
He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.

THis context from the eleventh to the twentieth verse, contains an illustration (for so are similitudes) of the former argument; and it is taken from a three-fold similitude. First, Of a rush, which is explained, vers. 11, 12. and applied in vers. 13. The second is, Of a spiders web, explained and applied, vers. 14, 15. The third, Of a luxuriant flourishing tree, explained, vers. 16, 17, 18. applied, vers. 19. Behold, this is the joy of his way, &c.

The sum of all may be given in this brief;

That it is as equal and ordinary in the course of divine justice to destroy wicked men; as it is in the course of nature, for a rush to wither when it wants water; or, for a spiders web to break when it is leaned upon; or for a tree to be hewen down, when it either under-grows or over-grows its owners house, when casting its roots under the foundation, it loosens the stones, and weakens the ground-work; or, when it spreads its boughs and grows so high that it drops upon the roof, or darkens the windows of it.

Vers. 11. Can the rush grow without mire?

It cannot. The original word for a rush speaks its nature; the root signifying to suck and drink in, or alwayes to be guzling down. The rush lives in liquor, and is alwayes drinking. These abounded near the banks of Nilus in Ægypt. There Moses was put into an Ark or skiff made of bulrushes, Exod. 2. 3. The Prophet (Isa. 18. 1, 2.) tells us of a land, sending Ambassadors by the Sea, even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters.

אחו Elatus eminuit, est mediæ significationis, sumitur pro vitiosa elatione, quæ est superbia, etiam pro magnificentia & decore. Riv. in Hos. 5. 5.

Can the rush grow?] In strength, lustre, and beauty. The word implies growing with a kind of pride, so plants do in a rich or proper soil, they lift up their heads, and carry it highly.

Limosus juncus, palustres junci amphibia.

Can the rush grow [Without mire?] Which is as much as to say, can a man live without food? Mire is the rushes meat and drink. It loves and delights in a moorish soil, and by the rivers side. A rush upon the dry land, is like a fish upon the dry land. At most the rush among vegetables and plants, is like those fowls and beasts among sensitives, which live part upon the water, and part upon the land.

אחו Locus graminis ubi aſcuatur pecora, forsan ab אח frater quod ex una stirpe veluti multi fratres gignantur, quasi herbarum quædam fraternitas.

Can the flag grow without water?] The word signifies any fertile place for grass, a medow, Gen. 41. 2. Pharaoh saw in his dream seven welfavoured kine, and fat-fleshed, and they fed in a medow. Some render it so here, Can the medow grow without water? Both flags and medows are such drinkers, that they quickly wither, if they want water: which Bildad gives us plainly in the next verse.

Vers. 12. Whilst it is in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.

Whilst it is yet in his greenness.] Or, shooting up in stem. Some derive the Hebrew word from Ab, Father; and so it may be rendered from the letter of the Hebrew, though the expression be somewhat uncouth. While it is yet in its paternity, or fatherhood, that is, while it is flourishing and procreative. Others derive it from Abib, which signifies an ear of Corn, or the ear with the stalk. Hence the month Abib among the Jews had its name, because in those climates, corn was then eared and began to be ripe; it was the first moneth to the Israelites, because of their coming out of Ægypt, and answered to part of our March, and part of April, Exod. 13. 4. Chap. 23. 15. This day came ye out in the moneth Abib, this moneth shall be to you the beginning of moneths. So then this greenness of the rush implies the strength and best of it, the goodliness and beauty of it.

אביו Abib est spica maturescens, vel spica cum calamo, inde Ibo virgultum aut lignum virens in eo, sc. tempore quo est parens novarum frugum & frondium. Vel ab אב pater, q.d. in paternitate sua.

And not cut down.] That is before it is cropt and pulled up by the hand, or is fully ripe.

It withereth before any other herb.] That is, sooner or more speedily then any other herb of lesser shew, but better rooting. There are two causes why trees wither, both which are here removed from the rush, and yet it withers.

First, Age, but the rush withers, while it is young in its greenness.

Secondly, Violence, when it is pulled up or cut down by force of hand: but the rush withers, while it is not cut down. Both argue enough, the little subsistency which the rush hath in it self; to seek any further account about it, were but to seek a knot in a rush.

Vers. 13. So are the paths of all that forget God, &c.

Bildad having explained his similitude, now applies it. The comparison may be made out three wayes.

First, That hypocrites are kept in life and lustre, by outward, earthly supplies only, as the rush is by mire and water; and therefore when these fail, they fail also.

Secondly, As the rush dies, because it hath no water; so an hypocrite declines and wastes, because he is not watered by the blessings of God, and hath no rooting in grace. The seed cast on the stony ground (Matth. 13. 6.) withered, because it had no earth. The lack of earth to the one, is the same with the lack of water to the other.

Thirdly, In the general, that as a rush flourishes a while, but quickly withers; so the best estate of an hypocrite, his greenness, is of no long continuance; his seeming graces, like his joyes, are but for a moment. Hence observe,

Natural things are shadows to us of spiritual.

We may learn many lessons from speechless creatures. While we turn the leaves, and peruse the contents of this great volumn, the book of Nature, we may find much of the God of nature. David took instructions from it dayly, (Psal. 8.) When I consider thy Heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the Stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him? I say likewise, when we behold the grass and flowers of the field, the flag, the rush in the water: we may not only put the Question, What is man? But we may resolve the Question, what the man is: when we look upon the meanest creatures, we may see pieces of our selves, they are as we are in many considerations, and we as they; what is man? Man is as grass. What is a wicked man an hypocrite? He is a rush, he is like the chaff which the wind drives away. What is a godly man? He is like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season. The Spirit of God from things sensible and visible, raiseth us up to things spiritual and invisible.

* Præmisit Deus naturam magistram, submisſarius & prophetiam, quo facilius credas prophetiæ discipulus naturæ. Tert.

The Ancients were very frequent in this kind of study, perusing the book of Nature, and taking helps to better the understanding by every object of the eye. It is well observed by one of them; * That God sent us the book of Nature, before before he sent the book of Scripture. The mind of God was written upon the things which he had made, before he made Tables or Books to write his mind in. The Fathers had many revelations from the beginning, but they had not Scripture from the beginning. Some conceive that Isaac going out into the fields to meditate, meditated upon the Text of the creature, and used to raise his heart by those steps of earth to heavenly contemplations. It is said of Solomon, (1*King.* 4. 32, 33.) That he spake three thousand Proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five, and that he spake of trees, from the Cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the Hyssop that springeth out of the wall; which * Josephus expounds thus, Solomon applied his three thousand parables or similitudes unto those trees or plants about which he discoursed, drawing some divine moral from every plant, whose nature as a Philosopher he had described.

Familiare est Syro & maxime Palestinis ad omnem sermonem suum parabolas jungere, ut quod per simplex præceptum teneri non potest, per similitudines teneatur. Hier. in c. 19. Mat.
* Cuilibet speciei plantarum suam adhibuit parabolam. Joseph. in loc.

More distinctly for the spiritualizing of this similitude, consider wherein a wicked man or an hypocrite is like unto a rush; the rush may be of good value to us, being thus improved.

First, The rush is very spungy, hoven, hollow substance, it is not solid or close-grain'd: An hypocrite hath no solidity, we call him a hollow-hearted man.

Secondly, Hypocrites are well compared to a rush or a flag, because in windy weather they sit which way soever the wind sits. They take no harm by a storm, because they yield to every turn: let the wind blow which way it will, the rush breaks neither body nor branch. Let things turn which way they will, hypocrites can shift, and bend, and yield with them. And therefore when storms arise, which pull down and destroy many goodly trees of Gods own planting, these rushes continue. Hypocrites keep their standing, because they never stand. A great man being asked how he kept his honour and preferment in so many changes of wind and weather, of times and Princes, answered, By being a willow and not an oak. He that can sway, seldom breaks. Hypocrites in the Church and State, live by the same principles.

Thirdly, A bulrush or a flag in time of a storm hangs down the head, but when the storm is over, it holds up the head, and stands upright again. This resemblance between the hypocrite and a bulrush is given by the Prophet, (Isa. 58. 5.) Is this the fast that I have chosen, a day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush? &c. The bulrush in a storm seems to be humbled to the very ground, but in fair weather it is as high as ever. Hypocrites in times of publick humiliation, hang down their heads, and seem to lay their mouths in the dust, but when the day is past, they quickly forget their sorrows. If I (saith the Apostle, Gal. 1. 18.) build again the things which I have destroyed, I make my self a transgressor. Hypocrites are the worst sort of transgressors, for they seem to destroy their sins one day, but they indeed build them again the next.

Fourthly, The rush and the flag grow only in miry places, where they may have abundance of water and moisture, which notes a kind of sensuality in them, and therefore they have their names from drinking. So hypocrites seem to be heavenly, but are indeed earthly: they are like the rush, they cannot live without store of water, they are sensual, they must please their appetites, and delight their palates. The Apostle describes them so, They serve not the Lord Jesus, but their own bellies; they must be supported with the affluence of outward things, else they cannot hold out in profession. Whereas the godly and true believers can live, when the water is drain'd or dry'd away, when outward things fail and are gone. So the Prophet Habakuk professes, Chap. 3. ult. Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, though the fields shall yield no meat, and there be no herds in the stall; yet I will rejoyce in the Lord, and will joy in the God of my salvation. A godly man will grow, when all the world decaies to him; he will rejoyce in God, when all outward comforts fail him; hypocrites must have sensual supplies, or they are lost. A feigned love of spiritual things is ever joyned with a true love of worldly things. Christ speaks of some who followed him more for the loaves then for the word. And Judas followed his Masters bag, more then his Master.

Fifthly, Bulrushes or flags yield no fruit at all, they only make a fair shew; hypocrites how green soever they are, what shew or profession soever they make, yield no fruit of holiness.

Sixthly, A bulrush or a flag withers sooner then any other herb, that is, then other herbs that are not seated so near the water. And this agrees well with the hypocrite, for when the hypocrite begins once to wither, he withers quickly. He never had any true life, and he will not long appear to have any. When one that hath made a fair profession begins to decay, he decaies sooner then a meer civil man; a civil man will hold out in honesty and justice a great while, but a hypocrite gives over holiness and godliness presently. Besides, God blasts and withers an hypocrite sooner then any other man, because he hath abused and wronged God more then any other man. When judgments come, they fall first upon hypocrites, The hypocrites in Zion tremble, Isa. 33. Trembling will take hold upon the prophane and openly wicked, but trembling takes hold soonest upon hypocrites; they have most cause to tremble, who were confident without a cause. False hope is the parent of real fear; and they who believe without repenting, shall repent without believing.

Vers. 13. So are the paths of all that forget God, and the hypocrites hope shall perish.

Sic sane illis accidit & usu venit, talis est eorum conditio. Drus.

So are the paths.] So, that is, thus it comes to pass, this is the way, and the end of all those who forget God.

The path of a man is taken two wayes.

First, For his state and condition, Psal. 1. The way of the wicked shall perish; that is, the whole state of a wicked man shall perish.

Secondly, For his course and conversation, Job 33. 11. He putteth my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths, that is, takes notice of the whole course of my life; all my conversation, all my tradings and dealings are before God. This path of mans course and conversation is two-fold. There is an internal, and there is an external path. The internal is that of the mind; the mind hath its course, the heart hath a way, Isa. 57. 17. He went on frowardly in the way of his heart. The external path is that of outward actions; That which we usually do, is our path. Thus the actions and works of God are called the paths of God, Job 40. 19. Behemoth is the chief of the wayes of God, Prov. 8. 22. The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old; Psal. 77. 13. Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary; that is, thy actings and doings are seen there.

Our actions are compared to a path in two respects. 1. Because we are frequent in them, that which is a mans course he treads every day. 2. They are called our paths, because they lead us to some end; every path leads us to some place or other. Some actions lead to life, and some to death, some lead to Heaven, some to Hell, some to Christ, and some to Satan; to one of these ends, we are travelling and journeying all the dayes of our lives.

Of those that forget God.] To forget God imports these four things.

First, Not to think of God, we forget that which we mind not. The first act of remembring is thinking. The thief on the cross prayed, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom; that is, think of me for good. God is not in all the thoughts of a wicked man to obey or honour him, and a wicked man is not in all the thoughts of God (in this sence) to bless or pardon him.

Secondly, To forget God, is to disobey God, or not to do the will of God, Deut. 8. 11. Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God in not keeping his Commandments. As to remember God, is to do the will of God, Eccl. 12. 1. Remember thy Creator in the dayes of thy youth: that is, do the will of thy Creator in the dayes of thy youth: so to forget God, is to disobey God, not to do his will. God is said to forget us when he doth not our will, that is, when we in prayer propose our desires to God to do them for us, the not doing of those things for us, is to forget us. David expostulates, Psal. 77. 9. Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious? He had prayed much at the beginning of the Psalm with success, I cried unto God with my mouth, even unto God with my voice, and he gave ear unto me. He puts up other requests, which finding no present answer, or sensible acceptance, he cries out, Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious? Now, as when the Lord doth not our will, he is said in Scripture to forget us, so when we do not the will of God, we indeed forget him.

Thirdly,

Oblivio aſſert contemptum.

Thirdly, To forget, is lightly to eſteem, to ſlight the Lord. That which a man highly eſteems, he keeps in his memory, and treaſures it up there; and when a man forgets a thing, eſpecially when he wilfully forgets it, he diſreſpects it, he ſlights and contemns it, Jer. 30. 14. All thy Lovers have forgotten thee, that is, thy Lovers care not for thee, they ſlight and eſteem lightly of thee. When a man comes not at one whom he loves, he is ſaid to forget him, Jer. 2. 32. Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a Bride her attire? A Maid hath a great eſteem of her ornaments, eſpecially of her wedding-ornaments; aud therefore ſhe is often thinking of them: it may be ſhe can hardly ſleep the night before, for thinking of the rich garments, yea the Bracelets and Bables ſhe is to wear upon the wedding day? Can the Bride forget her attire? Will ſhe throw theſe by the walls (as we ſpeak) or caſt them at her heels? Yet, ſaith the Lord, My people have forgotten me dayes without number. They have lightly eſteemed me, I am not ſo much to them as new cloathes, who am indeed their life, I am not ſo much remembred as unneceſſary curioſities, from whom they receive all things neceſſary, and whoſe favour is the one thing neceſſary.

Fourthly, To forget God, is to depart from God. We ſtay with God no longer then we remember him; as we cannot have communion with truth, ſo not with the God of truth, without an act of memory (Heb. 12. 5.) Ye have forgotten the exhortation which ſpeaketh unto you as unto children, My ſon, deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Lord, &c. A word forgotten is to us of no more uſe then a word never ſpoken. We are without all the good we forget; and to forget God, is (Epheſ. 2. 12.) to be without God in the world; or to live on earth as if there were no God in heaven, either in regard of mercy to be received, or of duty to be performed. Hypocrites forget God all theſe wayes; though their natural memory may be good, yet ſpiritual memory (and that only holds ſpiritual things) they have none.

Hence obſerve, That, The Hypocrite is a forgetter of God.

Every wicked man is forgetful of God. Hence we find theſe put together, Pſal. 9. 17. The wicked ſhall be turned into hell, and all the Nations that forget God. But this is the ſpecial character of an hypocrite, he is a forgetter of God. Conſider this (ſaith the Pſalmiſt) ye that forget God, that is, ye hypocrites conſider this (Pſal. 50. 22.) for he ſpeaks of ſuch as had taken the Covenant of God in their mouths; What haſt thou to do (verſ. 16.) to take my Covenant in thy mouth? As if he had ſaid, Thou profeſſeſt to be in Covenant with me, to have an intereſt in me; Yet when thou ſaweſt a thief, then thou conſentedſt with him, and haſt been partaker with adulterers, thou giveſt thy mouth to evil, &c. Hypocrites take the Covenant of God in their mouths, but caſt it out of their lives; God is near in their mouths, but far from their reins (Jer. 12. 2.) If the hypocrite did not forget that God is about his bed, and about his path, and eſpieth out all his wayes, he could not be ſo falſe with God, ſo polluted in his wayes, ſo rotten in his inward parts. If an hypocrite did not forget that God being a Spirit, delighteth to be worſhipped in ſpirit, he would never be ſatisfied in worſhipping him with his body. If he did not forget that God is jealous, that he will not hold them guiltleſs who take his name in vain, he durſt not (which is his every dayes work) take the name of God in vain.

Secondly obſerve, That, Forgetfulneſs of God (howſoever it ſeems no great matter, yet) is exceeding ſinful, a wickedneſs of the higheſt ſtature.

Forgetfulneſs of God is therefore a great wickedneſs, becauſe God hath done ſo many things to be remembred by. What could the Lord have done more to make himſelf remembred then he hath done? Have I been a wilderneſs to Iſrael, or a land of darkneſs? (ſaith the Lord, Jer. 2. 31.) The words are an aggravation of their forgetfulneſs. As if the Lord had ſaid, I have been a light to you whereſoever you go, and whereſoever I go, my ſteps drop fatnes for you, and am I forgotten? Where can we ſet a ſtep, but we tread upon a remembrance of God? Every creature holds forth God unto us. He hath left his remembrance upon every Ordinance: Do this in remembrance of me, ſaith Chriſt in that great Ordinance of the Supper; yea, all the works of his providence are remembrancers of him. He leaves an impreſſion of his wiſdom, holineſs, juſtice, power upon all he doth. Now for us to forget God, who hath (as it were) ſtudied ſo many wayes to faſten himſelf in our remembrance, muſt needs be extreamly ſinful. Further, It is very ſinful to forget God, becauſe God doth ſo abundantly remember us. He hath not only done that which may cauſe man to remember him, but he hath man alwayes in his remembrance, eſpecially his own people. He hath graven them upon the palms of his hands, and they are continually before him. They who deſire to preſerve their friends freſh in memory, get their pictures in their houſes, or engrave them upon Rings and Jewels which they wear alwayes about them: But he that cuts the image of his friend in his fleſh, or draws it upon his skin, how zealous is he of his friends remembrance? Pictures and Annulets may be loſt, but our hands cannot fall off. When the Lord would ſhew how mindful he is of his Church, he aſſures her that he carries her picture alwaies about him, not drawn upon a Tablet, or engraven upon the ſignet of his right hand, but upon the palms of his hands: as if he ſhould ſay, I muſt loſe my ſelf before I can loſe the ſight or memory of thee (Iſa. 49. 16.) He remembers her ſo, that he cannot forget her. And becauſe the characters and ſtamps of nature are more abiding and indelible then thoſe of art, therefore he ſaith (ver. 15. Can a woman forget her ſucking child, that ſhe ſhould not have compaſſion on the ſon of her womb? Yea, they may forget, yet will not I forget thee. A woman may break the bonds of nature, but God will never break the bonds of his own free grace. May not all this raiſe us into David's rapture of holy admiration, Pſ. 8. Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the ſon of man, that thou viſiteſt him with ſuch remembrances? What is a wicked man, that God ſhould give him bread to eat, and cloaths to put on? And what is a godly man, that God ſhould give him Chriſt to eat, and cloath himſelf withal? That God ſhould remember us, is a wonder of mercy, but what a wonder of unthankfulneſs is it, that we ſhould not remember God? What, or who is God, that man ſhould be ſo mindles of him? Is not God worthy of all our remembrance? Is it loſs of time to call God into our thoughts? Do we ever, or in any thing remember our ſelves ſo much, as when we remember God moſt? It is a wonderful favour that God ſhould be mindful of us at all; and is it not a wonderful ſin that man ſhould be ſo unmindful of God?

Thirdly obſerve, That, Forgetfulneſs of God is a mother ſin, or the cauſe of all other ſins.

It is the cauſe of this ſin of hypocriſie, Bildad puts it as a fruit of forgetting God. Forgetfulneſs of God is threefold.

Firſt, A forgetfulneſs that there is a God.

Secondly, A forgetfulneſs who, or what manner of God he is; Thou thoughteſt that I was ſuch an one as thy ſelf (Pſal. 50.) Thou forgetteſt what manner of God I am; thou preſumeſt that will ſerve my turn which ſerves thine, or that every thing will pleaſe me which pleaſes thee; thou ſaiſt, becauſe it is no great trouble to thee to ſteal and lie, &c. therefore it is no great trouble unto me neither.

Thirdly, To forget God, is to forget what God requires; this forgetfulneſs of theſe three ſorts is productive of any, of every ſin.

Laſtly obſerve, They that forget God, ſhall quickly wither, how great and flouriſhing ſoever they are.

The reaſon is, becauſe the forgetting of God is a departing from God; and he that departs from God, departs from the fountain of life. If the ruſh go out of the water, it quickly withers, and if men will depart from God, they ſhall quickly decay; neither grace nor comforts can hold out ſeparated from Chriſt. Why is the godly man compared to a tree planted by the river ſide, which brings forth fruit in his ſeaſon, whoſe leaf ſhall not wither, and whatſoever he doth ſhall proſper? Why is the man that truſts in the Lord compared to a tree planted by the waters, that ſpreads out her roots by the river, and ſhall not ſee when heat cometh? Jer. 17. 7, 8. Is it not becauſe the Saints alwayes keep close to God, by Jesus Christ, who is as an ever-living fountain of water to them, refreshing and moistning them so with continual supplies of the Spirit, that they shall not see when heat cometh? that is, they shall not be afflicted with those evil effects of heat, drought and barrenness. They who keep covenant with God, may possibly feel some decayes, but die they shall not, they shall revive and sprout up again; they shall again put forth their leaves as a plant, and their fruit as the garden of Eden; they shall bring forth fruit in old age, they shall be fat and flourishing.

And the hypocrites hope shall perish.

The word which we translate Hypocrite, comes from a root that signifies close and covered, and by a Metaphor, polluted, defiled, contaminated, because an hypocrite, though he be outwardly covered, and beautifully painted over, yet his paint is a spot upon him. All painting is but a spot in comparison of natural beauty. An hypocrite is not so much painted as polluted. Hence he is called a vile person (Isa. 32. 6.) The vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity to practise hypocrisie, and to utter errour against the Lord. We have the character of hypocrites, Isa. 58. 3. They dayly call upon my name, as a people that would know the Lord: As a people; An hypocrite doth but play a part in religion, he doth but personate another; like an Actor upon a Stage, who puts forth the several postures and gestures of a King, when as himself is some mean fellow. An hypocrite is described acting a double part; the one is simulation, he labours to appear what he is not; he would seem to have some good which he hath not. And the other is dissimulation; he labours, not to appear what he is, he would hide and cover the evil that he hath. An hypocrite is one who seems to be what he is not, and would not seem what he is. He is a Jew outwardly, and his Religion Circumcision outward in the flesh, Rom. 1. 18. He seems to be religious (Jam. 1. 26.) He is a whited Sepulcher (Mat. 23. 27.) Stately on the outside, within nothing but rottenness and dead bones. The hypocrite hath a divided heart, Hos. 10. 3. and a double mind, Jam. 1. 8. He is not half enough for God, and too much for himself.

Externa facie internâ sanctitatem mentitur.

Hypocrites are of two sorts, some in a large, others in a strict sence. Most wicked men are hypocrites in a large sence, though some are above hypocrisie, they are arrived at impudence. The Prophet speaks of such (Isa. 3. 9.) The shew of their countenance doth witness against them, and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not. They declare it not as the mourners in Zion declare their sin, who are ashamed of it; but they declare it as Sodom her sin, that they may delight in it. But though there are some such as these, yet the greatest number of wicked men fall under the notion of hypocrisie in a large sence, because they keep their sins close and hide them. Hence the works of sin are called works of darkness. Wicked men usually hide their wickedness, and shew that which hath but a shew, their goodness: But in a strict sence, he is an hypocrite that seems to be very religious, who hath nothing but God, and Christ, and Heaven in his mouth, but in his heart and secret practices nothing but Earth and Hell. The Hypocrite is like the Onyx-stone, of which Naturalists write, that it is clear and bright in the Superficies, but the center is dark and earthy. This generation is pure, not only in their own eyes (Prov. 30. 12.) but in the eyes of many men, possibly in the eyes of all men, yet they are not cleansed from their wickedness.

The hypocrites hope shall perish.] That is, the time shall come when he shall give over the hope which he hath hoped, or the thing shall fail him wherein he hoped. First, The object of his hope shall fail him, that is, those benefits, blessings, accommodations and comforts which he looked for in the profession of Religion, these shall fail him and prove false hopes. Hypocrites (Mat. 7.) plead with Christ for heaven, Lord, we have propheſied in thy name, and in thy name cast out Devils, &c. But their hopes perished; Depart from me (saith Christ) I know you not. His hope perisheth when he cannot have the things he hoped for. Secondly, The act of his hope shall fail, his hope shall be so long deferred, that his hope shall die; he never had any true ground of hope, and at the last he shall not have a shew of hope. His hope shall perish. Observe from the name given hypocrites,

First, That, Hypocrites are filthy and polluted persons.

None are so ugly in the eye of God as they who paint for spiritual beauty. Pretended holiness is more unlovely then professed unholiness to them that can discern it. As it is said of Nabal (1 Sam. 20.) Nabal is his name, and folly is with him: So we may say of an hopocrite, filthiness is his name, and filth is in him. Nabal had his name from folly, and hypocrites have theirs from filthiness.

Secondly observe, Hypocrites may be full of hope for a time.

They have somewhat (though it be unsound) upon which they build, they think what they do and are, will serve the turn, and go for currant with God. This raises up their spirits. Some hypocrites will be full of hope, even while they are descending to the pit of despair. Some hypocrites are not convinced of their hypocrisie to the very last; such die in peace while they are going down to eternal wat; they go (as we use to say) like lambs, when their souls are among lions, and they are tumbling into the place of dragons.

Thirdly observe, The hope of hypocrites will deceive and fail them.

God rejects their confidences, they shall not prosper in them, Jer. 2. 37.

Lastly observe, That, To lose our hope, is the utmost of evils.

Bildad doth not say that the hypocrite is damned, and shall go to hell, and endure the wrath of God for ever: This one expression, Their hope shall perish, amounts to all this and more, if more can be. Do but sit down and imagine in your thoughts, and contrive the utmost of all evils felt by men, yea, the utmost (were it possible) of all the evils of punishment that are in the thoughts of God, and all are wrapped up and comprehended in this one word, Their hope shall perish. Hell, and wrath, and fire, and brimstone, and the worm that never dies, meet in this one word.

Bildad goes on to illustrate this by a further instance.

Verse 14. Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be as a spiders web.

Verse 15. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.

The hypocrite clings about the object of his hope, as a man that is ready to drown, takes hold on any thing, upon a straw or a rotten stick; but though he lean upon his house, it shall not stand, &c.

These words contain the second similitude, which is both a confirmation and a further illustration of the former; for having concluded in ver. 13. with these words, The hypocrites hope shall perish; he (as it were) doubleth and resumeth it here again, Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spiders web.

The Original beareth different interpretations, and from that, several sences have been given of these words.

כסל

The word here used for [hope] is not the same in the Hebrew, which we had in the last clause of the former verse, His hope shall perish. This word was opened at large in the fourth Chapter at the sixth verse, where we translate it confidence; Is not this thy hope, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy wayes? Now, besides that the word signifies hope or confidence, it signifies also folly, inconstancy, frowardness of spirit, vanity and levity of mind. And thus some render it here.

קוט Debilitatus, languefactus fuit, per Metaphorâ, mœstitia, dolore, tædio affectus fuit, propriè tanquam βδέλυγμα, i. e. rem putidam, & quæ nauseam parit, aversari, & eam abhorrere. Non enim placebit ei vecordia ejus. Vulg.

Whose hope shall be cut off.] That word also beareth different interpretations.

First, To be weakned, to languish; and because those things which languish and are weak, either are cut off, or are ready to be cut off, therefore it signifies likewise cutting off.

Secondly, Further the word imports gradually, 1. Displeasing. 2. Loathing and abominating. 3. Chiding or contending.

The words yielding these sences, receive different translations and interpretations. First,

First thus, taking the former for inconstancy or folly, his folly shall displease him, or, his folly shall not please him. So the Vulgar. Hypocrites never please God, and at last they shall not please themselves. The wayes and works of hypocrites are ever displeasing to God, and they shall at last be displeasing to themselves. That's the sence of their translation.

And not only shall the wayes of an hypocrite be displeasing, but a loathing, an abhorring to him; the Lord loaths him now: The prayer of the wicked is an abomination; and he shall loath himself hereafter. There is a double loathing. There is a loathing of repentance, and there is a loathing of despair. The former (though it be unpleasant, yet) it is a happy loathing of our selves. Such loathing of our selves is pleasing to God in the act, and will be pleasant to us in the fruit (Ezek. 6.9.) They shall loath themselves for the evils they have committed. And again, Ezek. 16.47. & 20.43. The word is taken for this loathing of repentance. But the hypocrite shall have another kind of loathing. What? a loathing of despair, seeing himself utterly lost, and his hopes quite cut off, he shall be an abhorring to himself.

Hæc displicentia cum fastidio quodam & tabescentia conjuncta est.

There is yet a third step or degree of sence in this word. He shall not only be displeased with himself, and loath himself, but he shall fall out with himself; his hope shall displease or vex him into self-anger. Some render the word by contending or chiding; as a man that is displeased with another, falleth out with him, wrangleth and contendeth with him; so an hypocrite, at last shall chide, contend and wrangle with himself, he shall contend as much with himself at last, as ever the Word of God contended with him before. An hypocrite never cometh to a Sermon, but God chides him, the word of God contends with him, and the Spirit of God hath a controversie with him; this man will not be warned by the chiding of God, nor take that to heart, he still goes on in his hypocrisie. But when no reproofs nor chidings can prevail upon his heart, he is left to the reproofs and chidings of his own heart; which will read him such a Lecture, and give him such a schooling as he never had in all his life. Conscience may be long silent, and it may long flatter, but when once it begins to speak, and to speak right, it is the most terrible Preacher in the world. There is no Boanerges or son of thunder hath so dreadful a voyce. Mount Sinai it self did not thunder so loud as Conscience will. And as conscience speaks loud, so it speaks long. An hypocrite shall reprove and chide himself for ever, what a fool was I? what a beast was I thus to flatter my self, thus to mask mine own filthiness, and to dawb over the rottenness of my heart with the fair covering of a verbal profession? Why did I wilfully deceive my self into irrecoverable perdition?

Secum ipse litigabit, vexabitur, quæ omnia ad mentis commotionē & animi cruciatum pertinent. Pined.

Again, observe from, Whose folly shall displease him.

That, The whole course of hypocrisie is nothing but foolishness.

Of all fools the hypocrite is the greatest; and the reason is, because he takes a great deal of pains in profession, and hath no good at all by profession; he ventureth himself many times in the world to persecution; he runs the hazard of his credit, of his estate, of liberty and life. What a fool is this to take so much pains, and subject himself to so many dangers in the outward profession of Christ, & yet at last to lose the fruit and benefit of all? This folly must needs displease him: he shall at last see what an extream fool he hath been to trouble himself about that which bringeth him no real good, but will really double and encrease all evil upon him. No man sins at so dear a rate as the hypocrite.

A second translation takes the Noun (as we) for hope, and not for folly, and retains the former sence of the Verb; and so the words are thus, Whose hope shall loath him, that is, the thing which he hoped for shall loath him; how loath him? It shall loath him, not formally, but equivalently; because it shall do that which man doth when he loaths any thing: when we loath a thing, we flee or turn away from it; so, His hope shall loath him, that is, the thing which he hoped for, shall flee far away and quite depart, it will not come near him. Good shall remove from the hypocrite when he expects and makes after it. An hypocrite at once loaths true grace, and hopes for true comfort; but comfort here, and glory hereafter shall loath him, heaven shall shut against him.

Quem fastidit spes sua. Jun.

Eum quasi fastidius fugit id ipsum quod sperat. Jun.

Or take it for the act of hope (as others) he shall loath his hope, that is, the very hope which he hath had shall be grievous and vexatious unto him; nothing shall grieve him more then this, that he hath hoped so much. His hope shall grieve and afflict him as bad as all his afflictions. Raised expectations disappointed, prove our greatest sorrows. That man sinks lowest in grief, whose heart was highest in hope. How extreamly shall the hypocrite be grieved who falls as low as hell, when his hopes were raised up as high as heaven? The hypocrite both in his way and in his end is like the King of Babylon, He saith in his heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God, I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the most high, yet he shall be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit, Isa. 14.13,14.

Spes si molesta erit, quod illa excidat, nec id consequatur quod expectarat. Merc.

Take the words as we translate, so they yield a clear sence, and very agreeable to the original, Whose hope shall be cut off. The word is rendred cut off, by a Metaphor, because when a man is exceedingly displeased and vexed (as the word properly signifies) he many times tears his garments, and even cuts his own flesh, like the idolatrous Priests of Baal, who were so angry because they could not get an answer, that they cut themselves after their manner, with knives and lancers, till the blood gushed out upon them, 1 Kin. 18.28. Grief cuts the heart always, and sometimes causes cutting of the flesh. The Lord complains (Psal. 95. 10.) Forty years long was I grieved with this generation; it is this word, forty years long was I vexed and cut with this generation, with their murmurings, backslidings and unbelief. They did (as it were) cut the Lord to the heart; as in another place, They broke him with their whorish hearts, Ezek. 6.9. God speaks there as a man whose patience is almost spent, or as a husband grieved with the disloyalties of an adulterous wife.

Sumitur Metaphoricè, quod ii quos tædet sese torquēt & vestes, & sese membra, quæ sua dicendant ac lacerant, & velut dissecent. Merc.

And thus we may joyn it with hope, either as hope imports the act of hope, or the object of hope, Whose hope shall be cut off; the expectation which the hypocrite hath had shall come to an end. Or, a time is at hand when an hypocrite shall be past hoping. Hence observe,

Despairing is the cutting off of hope.

And such is the condition of an hypocrite. To have hope cut off, is the greatest cut in the world. Will the hypocrite pray always? No, at last his prayer shall be cut off; Will the hypocrite hope always? No, at last his hope shall be cut off. The Saints in heaven have (in a sence) their hope cut off, because they are above hope; and at last all wicked mens hope shall be cut off, because they are below hope. It is better to have all our professions cut off then our hopes. Better have the thread of our lives cut off then the Anchor-cord of our hope cut off, and so we left to the rage and tempest of despair. Again, Joyn it with the object of hope, thus;

All that an hypocrite hopeth for or expects, shall be utterly taken away, and cut off from him.

His worldly comfort will be gone, and heavenly comforts will never come. He shall find that he hath been in a golden dream, that he hath been as one that is hungry, who dreameth that he is eating, but when he awakes, his soul is empty; or as a thirsty man, that dreams he is drinking, but he awakes and behold he is faint, Isa. 29. 8. When dreams satisfie hunger and thirst, the hypocrites hope shall be satisfied. Hypocrites shall have as good as they bring. They bring God nothing but words and empty professions; and they shall have nothing from God but air and empty expectations; their real hopes, or the thing they hoped for, shall be cut off. When Hypcrites awake out of their sleep, their hopes vanish as a dream. Not only doth the world, but the Christ on whom they hoped, prove a shadow, a fancy, an image, an idol of their own making; their hearts were filled with leaves in stead of gold, as the Devil cozens his greedy votaries; Their hope shall be cut off.

And whose trust shall be a spiders web.

As hope before, so here trust, may be put either for the act or object of trust; and both (by a Synecdoche) for the whole profession of an Hypocrite.

Hope and trust are often taken promiscuously. There is a gradual difference between them, not an essential. Trust is the strength of hope, or the acting of a strong faith. The original word signifies a very quiet, secure, setled trust; when a man trusts upon or about a thing, without casting so much as a jealous thought after it. Thus the Hypocrite trusts, he never suspects himself; his heart saith all is well,

Lev. 25. 18. Ye shall dwell in the Land in safety; the word is, Ye shall dwell in the Land in trust, because an opinion of safety is the companion of trust; when we trust our condition is good, then we think our selves safe.

There are two things noted by this word.

First, Boldness and confidence.

Secondly, Security and peaceableness. The hypocrite feels no trouble, and he fears none: The languishing of his heart is like that of Babylon the mother of whoredoms and hypocrisie, who saith in her heart, I sit a Queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow, Rev. 18. 17.

This trust, where it is true, hath a double effect. The want of which discovers the falseness of it in the Hypocrite.

First, It confirms and strengthens the heart against all oppositions. And,

Secondly, It encourages the heart against all dangers. He that trusts in God, will walk through the valley of the shadow of death, and fear no evil. He dares take a bear by the tooth, or a lion by the beard: In both these the trust of the hypocrite faileth. He will work and go on boldly till he meets with opposition; he will work in a fair day, till he meets with a storm, and dangers threaten; but there he gives over. He that is not acquainted with the assurance-Office of heaven, will seldom, if at all, run hazards here on earth. True trust brings God and the soul together, but the hypocrite never comes near God, and then no marvel if he be afraid to come near danger.

Note from it before we put the words together, thus much.

That, An Hypocrite hath a trust of his own, a trust like himself.

Whose trust.] An Hypocrite doth most things which the upright and sincere hearted do, and he seems to have every thing which the upright and sincere hearted have. Do they pray? so doth he. Do they hear? so doth he. Do they fast? so doth he. Have they faith? he hath a faith too. Have they the fear of God? he also hath a kind of fear. Have they zeal? so hath he; yea, the zeal of hypocrisie burns hotter for a blast, then the zeal of sincerity. He hath Grace proper to his state; false grace for his false heart; he hath trust, such as it is, a trust which belongeth to all of his rank; see the character of it in the next words.

It shall be a spiders web.] The Hebrew is, It shall be the spiders house; the web is the house of the spider. We have the same word, Isa. 59. 5. They weave the spiders web. Isaiah speaks of such pretenders, They trust in vanity, and speak lies. These were the spiders web which they weaved.

But why is the trust of the hypocrite compared unto the spiders web? I shall clear that in four or five particulars, which will be as so many notes upon this text.

First, Because the profession and all the works of an hypocrite are very weak and unstable, as the spiders web is. There is a kind of curiosity in them, but there is no strength or stability in them: The spider works very curiously, But her house will not bear any stress of weather, much less force of battery. The spiders web is no match for a broom or a whisk. Thus is the profession, the trust of hypocrites; you may see a neat spinning, a fine thread of profession, accurate weavings and contrivances, but when it comes to a push, it is not able to stand; if you do but touch it, 'tis gone. Some will stand out longer then others, yet all fall, as Christ assures us (Mat. 7. ult.) it is the hypocrite who buildeth his house upon the sand; to have a house built upon the sand, is no better then to have a house built in the cieling; when the storm comes, that house falls; and when the broom comes, this must down.

Secondly, The trust of an hypocrite is called a spiders web, because he fetches and formes it (as it were) out of his own bowels; that whereunto he trusteth, is wrought out of himself. That's the nature of the spider, she hath no extrinsecal materials to build her house with; she doth not hew her stones out of any quarry, or fetch her timber from any forest (as we may allude) the materials which she hath, she fetcheth out of her bowels. The Bee makes an honse, and fetcheth the materials from this and that flower; so the Bee makes a comb for a house; but the spider sucks no flowers. Thus it is with hypocrites, their trust and hope is as the spiders web, made out of their own substance; they eviscerate themselves, they fetch all out of themselves. The meaning is, all their trust is in their own strength, in their own stock, in their own gifts, upon these they build, these are their house. We find the Pharisees trust thus grounded; such was his house (Luke 18.) I fast twice a week, I give alms, I pay all men their due. He was very exact in righteousness according to the Law, upon this, and out of this he makes his house; this is to make an house like a spider. Though it be our graces we trust upon, our trust will be a spiders web. The Believer is well compared to a Bee; the Bee hath an house and honey, but the Bee fetcheth all from abroad, from herbs and flowers: Believers have their house to dwell in, and their honey to feed upon; but they suck all from the promises of Christ; yea, they suck it from Christ himself: they rest not in the letter of the promises, but they go to Christ, who is the matter promised, and the accomplisher of all the promises. Here they build their house, and hew out the pillars of it.

Thirdly, Their trust shall be a spiders web, in the issue it shall perish like a spiders web. How is that? As soon as the house comes to be cleansed, down go the spiders webs; when the house is swept, the cob-webs are first swept away. Thus it is with the trust of all hypocrites; when God sweeps his house, his Church, he quickly sweeps out these spiders webs (Isa. 14. 23.) The Prophet speaks of the Besom of God; the judgments of God are the besom of God by which he sweepeth his house. God hath a double besom, or a double use of his besom; he hath a besom of destruction, and a besom of purgation. It is a besom of destruction to hypocrites, and it is a besom of purgation to his Saints. When either the besom of destruction, or the besom of purgation is in hand, the trust of hypocrites is swept away. When the Prophet describes the Lord in his great and terrible judgments (Isa. 33. 14.) The Text saith, The sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness surprizeth the hypocrite, who shall dwell with devouring fire? God provoked is a devouring fire. How shall stubble and spiders webs stand before him? When trouble comes, the trust of hypocrites goes to wrack; they tremble then, for their trust is but a spiders web, it cannot stand one stroak, or endure the flaming heat. The hope of a godly man grows strongest in times of trouble, he is purified in the fire; and the hope of an hypocrite weakens till it be none at all, in times of trouble, it is cast out of doors amongst the rubbish, or is consumed with the fire.

Fourthly, Take this parallel between the spiders web, and the profession of hypocrites; the spider makes his web to catch and ensnare others, to catch the poor flies. She hath a double use of her house, to lie in it, and to entrap flies in it. Her house is a snare. The profession of an hypocrite is a spiders web in this notion; he makes it to catch flies with, to ensnare and deceive the simple, that he may prey upon them: He would count godliness a poor thing, did he not make a gain of godliness; that brings him in food and cloathing, he lives upon it. This his deceitful web is so fine spun, and fairly woven, that you cannot easily discern any thing but truth and beauty in it: Hypocrites cannot be distinguished by the outside of what they do; their lewdness is under a covert. Some tell us that the Hebrew word for an hypocrite, may be derived from another, which signifies a cloud; the wickedness of such is wrapt up in a cloud; whence the Latine word for a crafty, dishonest man, imports one who casts a cloud or a mist before his dishonesty; so that it is hard to make this discovery, till effects and issues make it. Only God looks quite through all clouds and coverings, he sees what is in the heart, though man cannot. God sees his contrivances are only to serve his turn, and attain earthly ends.

Nebulo à nebula, qui mendacius suis nebulâ quandam & tenebras objicit.

Fifthly, The hypocrite, like the spider, thinks himself safe and out of harms way, when once lodged in this profession. He is ready to boast that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. So much for the similitude.

Animalculum illud valde imbecillum & malicioſum atque meditabundum, potius quam prudens, domicilium ædificat, in quo ſe tutum exiſtimat. Bold.

Now follows the application of the similitude in the fifteenth verse.

Verse 15. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand; he shall take hold of it, but it shall not endure.

Bildad

Bildad goes on to bring down his similitude to this particular.

Thus the spider doth, and thus the hypocrite: the spider leans upon his house, there he dwels; and so the hypocrite he leans upon his house, there he dwells and rests himself.

שען Nixus, innixus est, reclinatus fuit, incubuit totis viribus, per Metaphorã confidet.

The word which we translate lean, is often used in the Old Testament, to note the vital act of faith, the act of recumbency; Faith in the vital act of it is a resting upon another. Now false faith imitates true faith, that will be resting and leaning. Faith whether true or false cannot stand alone, it must have a lean-to.

He leaneth upon his house.] It noteth leaning upon a staff, or upon any stay (1 Sam. 1. 6.) Saul leaned upon his spear being weary in the battel. And Prov. 3. 5. Lean not to thine own understanding. Wise men, men of deep reach and judgment, lean to their own understandings, their wits are their props (Isa. 10.20.) The remnant of Israel, shall no more stay themselves upon him that smote them, but they shall stay upon the Lord, or, they shall lean upon the Lord, the holy One of Israel in truth (2 Sam. 22. 19.) They prevented me in the day of my calamity, but the Lord was my stay. God prevent his people with mercy, and their enemies prevents them with unkindnesses, but the love of God outruns the malice of man; his love staies up those whom malice would cast down. The Lord was my stay. And hence, the Noun of this Verb in the Hebrew signifies a staff, because we use a staff to lean and rest the body upon (Isa. 3. 1.) Behold, the Lord of hosts doth take away from Jerusalem and from Judah, the stay and the staff, the whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water. The stay of bread, or, the staff of bread; because bread is that upon which the life of man leans or depends, as we depend or lean upon a staff. Bread is elegantly called a staff, because bread supports the life of man, as a staff doth the body. It implies this also, that the power, vertue and strength by which bread doth sustain us, comes from without; The staff of bread; he doth not call the bread it self a staff, but he saith, there is a staff of bread, the bread must have a staff (of blessing from God) or else it cannot be a staff (of strengthning to us) as the bread is the immediate staff of our bodies: so the blessing of God is the immediate staff of the bread: the bread leaneth upon the blessing of God, as we lean upon the bread. As an hungry man leans upon his bread, so an hypocrite leans upon his house, He shall lean upon his house. That's his stay.

Scita est Metaphora, cum fulcimentũ panũ usurpat pro pane fulcimentẽ, significans fortis vim illã panũ accedere. Ut enim gressus senũ reguntur baculo, ita panis dicitur habere baculum. Mol. in Isa. 3. 1.

But, what is his house? He shall lean upon his house.

The house of this hypocrite it is two-fold; or he hath two houses. He hath a worldly house, and he hath a spiritual house. He hath one house made out of earthly materials, and another made out of heavenly materials.

Domũ impii vocat bona & facultates ejus quibus homines se fulciant, juxta illud, opes divitis urbs ejus validæ. Drus.

He hath an house made out of worldly materials, and so some interpret this place, he shall lean upon his house; that is, upon his riches, upon his relations, upon his greatness upon his friends, upon his correspondencies, upon the estimation that he hath abroad in the world, upon his reputation with his neighbours at home.

These framed and put together are a house which the hypocrite builds for himself, upon these he rests: and that's a truth, the world is an hypocrites support, the house upon which he leans. The money in his chest upholds him, not faith in his heart; his goods please him more then goodness. He easily believes that he is in the favour of God, because he hath so much favour among men. That's one house.

Bildad might aim at this, because Job was a man of a full and vast estate, the richest and greatest of all the men in the East; as if he had said, Job, thou hast leaned upon thy outward abundance, upon thy sheep and oxen, upon thy children and servants, and now thou findest all but a spiders web, swept away in a moment. Yet (I conceive) he means rather a house built of heavenly materials. And there are three sorts of heavenly materials, out of which the hypocrite build his house.

First, Gifts; he hath knowledge and understanding in the Word and wayes of God, the gift of prayer, the gift (it may be) of Tongues of Prophecy and Preaching. These are excellent materials, and upon these he builds his trust, that he is in a good estate.

The second sort of materials, are holy Duties, he prayes, he hears, he fasteth, and he gives alms, and the like; These he doth, and out of these materials he builds his house, very strongly he hopes.

Thirdly, He hath finer stuff then all this to build his house of, he buildeth upon supposed graces; he can tell you, he hath faith, he hath love, he hath patience, he hath humility, and he hath sorrow for sin; he can count all these things, and out of these he buildeth himself an house of special confidence, such a house as he doubts not will stand all winds and weathers: he hopes to stand safe in judgment, under the roof and goodly fabrick of this house.

Out of these three sorts of materials, spiritual gifts, spiritual duties, and supposed spiritual graces; upon all these, and out of these he buildeth, and thinks he hath made an house that shall stand for ever.

The point I shall give you, taking in those three sorts of materials, is,

That gifts, duties, and supposed graces are the stay and the staff, the house, and the strength of hypocrites.

Upon these they lean, and in these they secure themselves; they rest upon this bottom for eternity. Hence they even dare to plead with God himself about it (Matth. 7.22.) Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy Name, and in thy Name cast out Devils, and done many great wonders? They trusted upon, Have we not prophesied? Have we not prayed? Have we not done wonders? They thought those sufficient materials to build them a Tower which should reach Heaven it self; who can doubt, but they who do such things as these shall do well? The gift of prophecy, the power to cast out Devils, and work miracles, sound high, and make a great noise. Yet at last, this Tower of their confidence proves but a Castle in the Air, or a spiders web. How confident were they, who could plead thus with God: He hath opened the secrets of Heaven to us, and do you think he will shut the gates of Heaven upon us? We have preached, we have been instruments of saving others, and shall not we be saved our selves? We have cast out Devils, and shall we be cast to the Devil? We have not walked in an ordinary tract of Profession, but we have traded in wonders, and done miracles, we have amazed the world with reports of the great things we have done, is all this nothing? Thus they plead with Christ, as if he were bound to save them by the law of these services: yet Christ tells them, Depart from me, I know you not: Surely, thought they, God will fetch his fewel for those everlasting burnings from among the rude Heathens, or debauched drunkards, adulterers, &c. not from among us. Were it not a wonder greater then any we have wrought, if we who have wrought great wonders should not be admitted? One of the Ancients represents them in such amazements, What means this strange unexpected answer from Christ, Depart, &c. Must we depart who lived so near thee? Must we be damned, whom thou hast thus honoured?

τί βάλλεται τὸ ξένον τῆς παραδόξου τούτου ῥήματος &c. Chrys.

The Apostle Paul (Rom. 2. 17.) speaking of hypocritical Jews, discovers such a confidence, Thou restest in the Law, as a man resteth in his house, there he sleeps and is quiet, so these in the Law, there they were quiet; that is, in the priviledges and outward profession of the Law, or in a litteral and outward obedience to the Law. The Jews built their house upon, or with legal righteousness, Thou restest in the Law; he speaks both by way of narration, and likewise by way of redargution. He tells what they did, and how ill they did in doing so. Paul rejects this as refuse stuff, as hay and straw, as drosse and dung, as confidence in the flesh (Phil. 3. 3. &c.) are flesh. So Prayer is flesh, ordinances are flesh, the righteousness of the Law is flesh; yea, Grace it self trusted to, is flesh. The duties which Christ hath appointed are the house of the hypocrite; but Christ himself is the house of the upright; He would be found in him (Phil. 3. 9.) not in duties or inherent graces. Saints desire that much grace may be found in them, but they dare not be found in grace; they would ever be acting graces, but never trusting to them. Observe, Tibi applaudis quod legem scriptam acceperis, quod frequens es in lectione & auditione legis.

Secondly, An hypocrites hope is high and strong, that his estate is good now, and that he shall receive good at the last.

He leaneth upon this house. Some are without hope in the world, of whom we may speak as the Apostle of an Heretick (Tit. 3. 11.) they are condemned of themselves. Some men have the sentence of condemnation in their own hearts. But there are others, as you see here, who have great and strong confidences in themselves, who live and die with this confidence too; This they do upon the former witness. As the Apostle John speaks concerning the witness which the Saints have for Heaven, There are three which bear witness, &c. and these three are one: So there are three which bear witness to the hypocrite, and these three are one; they agree in one to deceive, as the other to give assurance.

First, The world that giveth many a man a witness and letters testimonial, that his estate is good, his neighbours say so, they flatter him, and cry peace, peace to him.

Secondly, Satan applauds him, the Devil gives him his good word, and tells him that certainly his estate is very good.

Thirdly, His own heart will seal to all, he shall have the witness in himself, as it is spoken of the true believer. So that the hypocrite having such witnesses, a witness within himself, a certificate under the hand of Satan, and letters commendatory from the world, all this must needs give him strength of hope, that his house shall stand for ever.

But see the issue, He leaneth upon his house, what then?

עמד Stetit, subsistit, mansit.

It shall not stand.] The word signifies to stand firmly and strongly, or to continue standing. He thought that the materials which he had brought together, and the hopes which he had raised upon them, would have been as Mount Zion, that cannot be removed, but he leaneth upon it, and it shall not stand. Whence observe,

All that an hypocrite trusteth unto shall deceive him at the last.

It shall not stand. Their webs shall not become garments, Neither shall they cover themselves with their works, Isa. 59. 6. The language is proverbial, importing highest disappointment: Who would weave a web, if he knew he should never have a garment by it? Or work hard, when himself must go naked? Jer. 7. 1, 2. The Lord sends to the people by his Prophet, Say to this people, Trust not to lying words; that is, words which will deceive and fail you, you trust and lean to them, but they will fall away from you: What were those words? Even that they had a goodly house to lean to, they cried, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord: but I hope that's a strong house, as well as a beautiful, a man may lean upon that, upon the Temple of the Lord, and do well. No, The Temple of the Lord leaned upon, will be but a spiders web; God gave the Jews a Temple to worship him in, and many of them worshipped the Temple. We adore every duty we depend upon, and give the Ordinances of God the honour of God. We can stand no more by such trust-to Ordinances, then we shall by the neglect of them.

These, and all the materials before mentioned, will be found too weak, they shall not stand. Gifts cannot commend to God. If a man had the tongue of men and Angels, if all the knowledge that ever was scattered in the world were brought together into one head; this cannot commend him unto God. The Devil is as full of knowledge as he can hold, and yet he is as full of wickedness as he can hold. Duties cannot commend to God.

And there are two special reasons why the hypocrites duties cannot.

First, He is not at all changed in duties. He prayes and sins, hears and sins, professes and continues wicked closely, if not openly.

Secondly, He leans upon his duties. Could we suppose true grace leaned on, that could not stand. Nothing is a sufficient strength for us to stay upon, but the free grace of God, and Jesus Christ: Lean to these houses, for they will stand for ever. Of all other houses you shall say as Adam did of his wife, Gen. 3. 12. (and it is the word here used in the Text) The woman which thou gavest to be with me, to stay by me, to be a helper and a support to me, this woman hath given me, and I did eat, she hath been the cause of my ruine. The same will be said of all the gifts, and duties, and graces, which we stand upon. God hath given them us, and he hath given them us as meet helpers, but they will deceive and ruine us, if we lean on them. We shall fall by them, if we hope to stand by them (Psal. 23. 4.) Thou art with me in trouble (saith David) therefore I shall not fall; it is this word, Thou standest with me. Christ will stand by us at all times, Thou standest with me, or by me: When the world faileth, and when gifts fail, yea, when graces fail, in degree and activity, then Jesus Christ and free grace will stand by us, Isa. 26. 7. Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is staied on thee. Christ is the only lean-to.

עמדי Quasi apud me stans.

There is one clause further,

He shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.

This clause is of the same importance with the former, only the sence is somewhat heightned. It notes, that the hypocrite shall not only lean upon his house, but he shall take strong hold upon his house, He shall fasten on it; so Mr. Broughton. A man may lean to a thing, and have no hold of it; he that takes hold of a thing would make it firm to himself, and himself firm to it. Thus the hypocrite leans upon his house, and takes fast hold of it; if it would fall from him, if any attempt to pull him away from it, or he sticks to it, he will not let it go.

יחזק בו Eam mordicus tenens, se in ea stabilem & firmum semper fore putans. Merc.

The word signifies to hold fast, strongly and prevailingly. Job's wife (Chap. 2.) speaks thus, Doest thou still hold fast thine integrity? And God himself speaks in the same language concerning Job, Doest thou not see, though thou hast moved me to afflict him without cause, how he holdeth fast his integrity? The hypocrite (after his manner, Mordicus tenet) holds his duties, performances, gifts, toughly, or (as it were) with his very teeth; he will hold them to the very death, and not let them go, the hypocrite will not give over, will not be beaten off from trusting to these false and weak props, here he sets up his rest, he will die by his gifts, his duties, his outward profession, and go no further.

It is our glory to hold integrity fast, to hold grace fast, yea, and duties in point of practice and obedience; but it is our sin and danger, to hold them fast in reliance and confidence.

It is a sad use which some make of this truth, when they hear that hypocrites hold fast upon duties, &c. they let go their duties; they let prayer go, repentance, and sorrow for sin go; they say, it is no matter for duties, they need not trouble themselves, Christ doth all. This is to turn the grace of God into wantonness. We must let go both our graces and our duties in point of justification, but hold them we must as our lives, in conversation, and the tenour of our lives. Prayer, hearing, fasting, repenting, must not die, while we live; Do them we must, but glory in them we must not.

He holdeth them fast, but (yet) it shall not endure.] That's the last thing. We see as often as the hypocrite rises to take hold of his hopes, so often his hopes fail him: (before) It shall not stand (now) it shall not endure.

The word signifies, it shall not be established to him, he would establish this house to himself, but it shall not be established, his worldly estate shall not be established, his duties, his graces, his gifts, shall not be established.

The word notes that establishment which is made by a politick Act or Edict. It is the Jews operative word, in which they enact Laws, Esth. 9. The word is used three times (ver. 29, 31, & 32.) for a political establishment of that decree about the deliverance of the Jews from the conspiracy of Haman, they established or made a Law for it. Laws are for continuance, therefore they are established and setled. An hypocrite would do so too, he would enact and establish what he doth, but it shall not endure, it will be null'd and repeal'd quickly.

The word also signifies, that which is substantial (it shall not endure) that is, it shall not be as a substance, it shall appear at last to be a shadow, Gen. 7. 23. Every living substance was destroyed; it is this word, that is, every thing that stood up and subsisted. So, Deut. 11. 6. the word signifies the substance and outward estate which Korah, Dathan, and Abiram had, They and their substance went down into the pit. The hypocrite thinks his estate is a substantial estate, yet both his worldly house, and his spiritual house, builded as was before described, shall moulder away away and rot, they shall not endure, 1 King. 7. 21. Solomon set up two pillars in the Temple, and an hypocrite in his building sets up two pillars, and he calleth them after the name that Solomon called his, the Text saith, The one he called Jachin, and the other Boaz; Jachin, he will establish, and Boaz, strength. Which may note that the people of God, who worship him in his Temple, have two pillars, two everlasting pillars, they have Christ, and the free grace of God to trust upon; these are the two pillars of the Temple, that support our hope, and the one is truly called Jachin, established, and the other Boaz, strength. The hypocrite hath a Temple, an house, and two pillars, upon which he makes these inscriptions, Upon his worldly estate he writes Jachin, Established; Upon his spiritual estate he writes Boaz, Strength; but he will be deceived in both, They shall not endure. When a wicked man begins to fall, nothing shall support him. As it was said of Haman in regard of his outward honour, If these men be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt fall utterly: So, though when an hypocrite sees his house falling, he takes fast hold of it, and endeavours to support it, yet it shall not stand, fall it shall. The righteous falls and rises again, he falls seven times in a day, and yet is raised up again, Prov. 24. 16. but when an hypocrite begins to fall, he falleth down, down for ever. It is said of the righteous (Psal. 37. 24.) Though he fall, he shall not utterly be cast off, for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand; but when the hypocrite falleth, he shall be utterly cast away, for his duties only hold him by the hand, he hath only somewhat of himself to support himself with, therefore though he take hold of it, It shall not endure.

VERS. 16, 17, 18, 19.

He is green before the Sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden.
His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.
If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.
Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

THE Context of these four Verses holds forth to us the third similitude, by which Bildad illustrates the condition of an hypocrite.

The similitude is explained in vers. 16, 17, 18. and applied in v. 19.

The hypocrite was first, compared to a rush, or a flag. Secondly to a spiders web. But now to a goodly tree. This third similitude grants the hypocrite the best of his condition, and puts him in the fairest posture that can be imagined, and yet all proves nought; his root is but rottenness, and his blossom shall go up as the dust; or his branches shall be cut down, and his root stubbed up. It is as if Bildad had said, If you think I have spoken too little and too low, or have debased the hypocrite more then was meet, by comparing him to a poor rush or a flag, and his estate to a spiders web; then take him in his highest notion, let him be looked upon as a green flourishing tree before the Sun, fastning his roots, and spreading out his branches, yet you shall see, at the last, destruction is his end. Behold, this is the joy of the hypocrite.

That's the sum, and the general sence of the words.

Three things are held forth in this similitude concerning the hypocrite.

First, His outward and flourishing estate in vers. 16. He is green before the Sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden.

Secondly, His hurtfulness, or the annoyance which he doth to his neighbours and brethren, shadowed out in vers. 17. His roots are wrapped about the heap, and he seeth the place of stones.

Thirdly, We have his ruine or cutting down, his destruction or pulling up, in vers. 18. If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

His flourishing estate begins in vers. 16.

He is green before the Sun.

The word [Green] signifies moist, juicy, or sappy, proper to trees: So Mr. Broughton translates, He is juiceful before the Sun. And others, He is full of sap. In which sence the word is used, Chap. 24. 8. of this Book, They are wet with the showres of the mountains, or moist, and sappy, receiving many showres from the mountains.

A tree green, juicy and full of sap, is in the height of his strength and beauty: Juice and sap is to the tree, as blood to the veins, and marrow to the bones of a man; and therefore as a young man in the prime and strength of his age is described by having his veins full of blood, and his bones full of marrow; so a tree is described in it's greatest verdure, by having his root and branches full of sap and moisture. The hypocrite may be such a flourishing tree, He is green before the Sun.

Before the Sun.] The Hebrew is, Before the face of the Sun. The word Shemesh (the Sun) signifieth a minister or servant, because the Sun is the great servant of the world, and ministreth those benefits of light, heat, and influence. This (by the way) should have kept the Nations from adoring it as a God, which both in name and nature was their servant. But what means this, Before the Sun?

First, Some take, before the Sun, to be only this, openly, conspicuously, and in the sight of all; for to do a thing before the Sun, is to do it without covert or secrecy, 2 Sam. 12. 12. Thus the Lord threatneth David, after that sin of privacy committed with Bathsheba, Thou didst it secretly, but I will do this before all Israel, and before the Sun: So the hypocrite, is green before the Sun; that is, he flourisheth in the eye, view and sight of all men. He hath fair leaves and branches of outward profession in the Church, and of outward prosperity in the world.

Ante solem, i.e. palam in oculos omnium.

Secondly, Before the Sun, that is, as a tree in Summer, when the Sun returns to us, or turns upon us. In the beginning of the Spring the Sun returns: having travel'd furthest off from us, it comes to the Vertical point and turns about to us again. So that before the Sun, or the Sun looking towards us, is a description of the Spring. And so it is, as if he had said, As a tree when the Sun cometh towards it in the Spring, and shines hot upon it in the Summer, makes a fair shew: So the hypocrite is very green, joyful; full of contentment, whilst he hath the Sun of prosperity shining upon him, whilst those warm rayes of outward comforts, heat and nourish him, so long he is green and flourishing.

Thirdly, Before the Sun, that is, (according to others) before the Sun shines too hot upon him, before the Sun scorches and withers him; as if he had said, the hypocrite is a green tree, till the heat comes upon him, till the Sun ariseth in his strength; but assoon as the heat of the day, or the year comes, this tree withers. An hypocrite cannot abide the extream heat of the Sun, whereas the godly have such an everlasting supply of moisture and sap, that let the Sun shine as hot as it will upon them, they are green still. The ordinary heat of the Sun is put for prosperity: the extream heat of the Sun, is put for persecution. So, the meaning may be this, He is green before the Sun, that is, before the Sun of trouble and persecution ariseth, or (as some render it) before God looks angerly upon him and scorcheth his leaves, till then, He is green and flourishing. Before refers both to time, and presence.

Antequã sol veniat. Bibl. Reg. Ante exortũ & ardorem solis, i. e. antequã sol inardescens eum aduret, q.d. priusquã a Domino puniatur & vastatur. Ardor est ira Domini. Merc.

Fourthly, Others take it as a description of the hypocrites outward flourishing, which may be such sometimes as holds out before the Sun, that is, when the Sun is very hot upon him; and then this clause stands in opposition to the rush, which whilst it is yet in his greenness withereth before any other herb. If the Sun rise hot upon the rush, it withereth presently, where it wants outward moisture. But here Bildad seems to grant, or at least to suppose, that the hypocrite may possibly rise to such a flourishing estate, that he holds his greenness, even before the Sun, in a great deal of heat and trouble. Thus Before notes presence.

Ante solem, i.e. in ardore solis arboris more, quæ pulchre adquandiu succrescens æstum non timet, imo calore solis moderato adjuvatur & alitur. Merc.

Either way the sence is good, He is green before the Sun cometh with his heat, that is, he cannot endure the scorching time of trouble: or he is green before the Sun; that is, before some trouble or scorching, before some heat of persecution, this hypocrite may stand, He is green before the Sun.

יונק Significat lactentem seu infantem ac sugentem per Metaphoram sumitur pro ramusculo aut tenero ramo qui sugit arborem. Similitudines ramusculi lactantibus pueris sunt similes.

And his branch shooteth forth in his garden.

Branch.] The word which we translate Branch, is derived from a root which signifies a little sucking child, or an infant; and the reason is, because branches which come from a tree, draw moisture and sap from the tree, as an infant doth milk from the mothers breast; therefore we elegantly in our language, answering the Hebrew, call such branches Suckers, and we cut them off where we see many sprouting from one fruit-bearing tree, because they draw too much from the tree, and hinder the fruit; that's the meaning of the Hebrew word, His suckers: So Mr. Broughton translates, His suckers sprout out over his orchard. By these branches we may understand either his children, or his honour, his relations, or his reputation, these shoot forth and shew themselves as branches from a tree, His branches shoot forth in his garden.

Hortus נן a radice Ganan, velavit, metaphoricè protexit, quod septo protegi solet.

In his garden.] That is, in that place which he hath fenced or taken in for himself; a garden is a plat separated and inclosed from those places which lie open and in common. So much the Hebrew word imports, coming from a root which signifies to protect or to fence a thing about, because gardens are places fenced, hedged or walled in, Cant. 4.12. A garden enclosed is my beloved, Eccles. 2. 5, 6. I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all (kind of) fruits, I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees.

Per hortum intellige omnes rationes, quibus sua tuetur & augit magnitudinem, Merc.

His branches shoot forth in his garden.] That is, he appears very beautiful and glorious, very green and flourishing in his state or condition, in his dignity and honour. He lives as in a garden or paradise: So the word is translated (Gen. 2. 8.) And the Lord God planted a paradise, or a garden of delight. The hypocrites garden is all that by which he preserves and keeps his worldly comforts, as we do plants and flowers of profit or delight in gardens. Thus the hypocrite grows as a goodly tree, and shooteth forth his branches.

This is the first dart of the description of his flourishing estate. Hence note a point or two.

First, In general (which hath heretofore been observed, therefore I shall but touch it.) viz.

That, A wicked man, an hypocrite may abound exceedingly in outward prosperity.

He is a tree green before the Sun, and shooting forth his branches in his garden.

Secondly Note, That, The thriving of hypocrites, their greenness and flourishing is only outward.

The tree is green before the Sun, but he is withered in his soul. Hypocrites do all before the Sun, to be seen, or in the sight of men. They are of those who rebel against the light, which would keep them from sin, and they say, No eye sees us, while they are sinning. But they love the light which shews any good they do; then they say, O that all eyes did see us. Pharisees pray in the markets, and blow a trumpet when they give alms, that the ears of all, as well as the bellies of the poor, may be filled with their charity. Come see my zeal, saith Jehu. Moses was faithful, but he never said, Come see my fidelity. Joshua was valiant in the battels of the Lord, yet he never said, Come see my fortitude. The upright heart cares not to be thus before the Sun; he delights in secret holiness. His goodness is not less prized, or less pleasing to him, because it is hidden. He takes infinitely more content in being and doing good, then in being known to be or do good.

Thirdly, Taking Before the Sun, to note the extream heat of the Sun, we may observe thus much from it,

That, An hypocrite may endure trouble and persecution for his profession.

He is not like the rush, which presently withereth, but he is sometimes like a tree that standeth out before the Sun a great while. We know that many have not only performed outward acts of holiness, but they have sometimes suffered in a holy cause; they can be passive in obedience, as well as active, and yet have fallen away at the last. Before the Sun of prosperity the hypocrite will continue green very long; and before the Sun of persecution he may continue green a while. It is conceived by most, that Alexander the Coppersmith, spoken of by Paul (2 Tim. 4. 14.) as as a man very grievous to him, Alexander the Coppersmith did me much evil, he opposed the Apostle, yet I say, this Alexander is conceived to be the man of whom we read (Acts 19. 32.) that stood to Paul when he was in that danger at Ephesus; there he had like to have lost his life for appearing on his side; the text saith, They dragged him out of the multitude to the market-place. It is possible for an hypocrite to be green before the Sun of persecution, at least before some scorching beams of that Sun, though he is not able to bear it when it comes to the utmost trial, to the extream heat of the day.

Thus we see the hypocrites greenness in his branches, yet that is not all, for in the next verse we find his roots also, he is seemingly setled below, as well as beautiful above. And when a tree hath flourishing branches and firm roots, what can be desired more? For as when a tree is cut down root and branch, it is then utterly taken away; so when a tree flourisheth root and branch, it is in best estate and highest perfection. Both these meet here; not only doth he shoot forth his branches in his garment, but he wrappeth his roots about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.

His roots are wrapped about the heap.

Radices sunt divitiæ, liberi, amicitiæ, dignitates, honores.

The root of this hypocritical tree is that by which he fastens himself: any accomodation or strength which he hath in this world, credit, riches, friends, whatsoever strengthens a man, that's his root; it is as necessary to fasten a tree, as to moisten and feed a tree. Now (saith Bildad) he spreads his roots, he hath not only excellent branches outwardly, but he layes his matter so, that he hath rooting also in the world; yea, he seems to have rooting in the Church too.

גל à radice גלל. Volvit & summo ad imum.

His roots are wrapped about the heap.] The word in the Hebrew, signifies to roll, or bring things together, to put them up in a heap. Hence the Verb is used for that act of the soul in believing, whereby a Christian gathers himself together, and all that he hath, and layes it upon the Lord, Psal. 22. 8. He trusted in the Lord; the Hebrew is, He rolled himself upon the Lord. Hence it is translated to signifie, First, A tempest wherein the winds roll and are enfolded together. Secondly, A wave of the Sea, which is a rolling water. Thirdly, As here, a heap, because in a heap a great many stones are gathered or rolled together. As, Gen. 31. 47. After that contest and debate of Laban with Jabob, about his departure, Jacob said, Let us gather stones together, or roll stones together, and make an heap; and Laban gave it a a name, he called it Jeger-shahadutha, which is to say, A heap of witness, because these stones were rolled together for a witness.

Lastly (which sence is applied by some interpreters to this Text.) The word signifies a spring or a fountain, Josh. 15. 19. because springs and fountains are as the gathering together of waters: The sea is called the gathering together of waters (Gen. 1.) There waters are rolled and laid as upon a heap; and so proportionably every spring, fountain and river, is a place wherein the waters are rolled or wrapped together. Some translate the word thus, His roots are wrapped about the water, or about the fountain. And that further sets forth the seemingly sure and stedfast estate of the hypocrite; as he hath goodly green branches above, so his roots are wrapped about the fountain, he looks as if he were planted by the waters side, as the flourishing tree described, Psal. 1. A godly man is as a tree planted by the rivers side; so the hypocrite seems to have his roots wrapped about the waters, as if he had an ever-living supply from an everlasting fountain, as if his leaves should not wither, or his fruit fall off from him. That's one sence.

But most go with our translation, His roots are wrapped about the heap, they are intricated and folded about the heap of stones; and so the meaning of it may be given three wayes.

Impius aliquando floret inter varia impedimenta.

First, In that it is said, His roots are wrapped about the heap, the heap of stones, it notes his thriving against all opposition, here shadowed by heaps of stones. Heaps of stones are hinderances to the growing of a tree, to the rooting of it; therefore we set or plant trees in places free from stones: but to shew that he may even overcome, conquer, and subdue those difficulties which hinder his growth, he saith, His roots are wrapped about the stones. The seed that was cast in stonie ground, could not take root, the stones hinder-hindered it from a due depth of earth, Mat. 13. 15. So that Bildad according to this sence magnifies the hypocrite, and speaks high of him; He wrappeth his root about the stones, he grows in places of greatest disadvantage. A wicked man may conquer oppositions, and prevail against the pullbacks which hinder his worldly, yea, his seeming spiritual estate; he may encrease when he wants encouragements and means of increase; yea, he sometimes increases against steps and discouragements, he thrives among stones.

Ita latè radices diffundat ut fundamenti firmem offendat in ædibus Domini sui. Jun. In aliorum damnum propagatio denotatur. Idem.

Secondly, His roots are wrapped about the heap, notes, that he thrives, or will thrive, if he can, though it be to the hinderance and dammage of others; for by the heap some understand the foundation of an house, where stones are artificially heaped or laid together, not a natural or accidental heap. Trees that grow near a house shoot their roots under or about the foundation of the house, and so may be dangerous to the whole structure. Thus the hypocrite will grow if he can, though he inwraps himself about the foundation of another mans house, raising or securing his estate upon his neighbours wrong or ruine.

Hypocrites care not whom they injure, so themselves may thrive, though they undermine the foundation of another mans house, and loosen his estate, to fasten their own.

Thirdly, His roots are wrapped about the heaps, may note the firmness, and the seeming strength of his standing. He is rooted, not in some loose and sandy earth, or in tougher clay, but his roots are wrapped about a heap of stones. As (Matth. 7.) The house founded upon the sand, could not continue when the storms came, but the house founded upon the rock did; so a tree that is rooted only in loose, slight ground, cannot stand against a great tempest, we see such trees blown down; but that which is rooted among the stones, and wrapped about their heaps, that which interweaves and incorporates it self (as it were) with a rock, this hath strength against all storms. Thus hypocrites pretend to Christ, and say they have wrapped themselves about that rock; they will speak great words, and bid defiance to all the world can do, professing they have laid up a good foundation, and that the munition of rocks is their defence.

Domum lapidum cernet, i. e. inter lapides feliciter provenit. Ἐν μέσῳ λίθων ζήσεται. Sept. Inter lapides commorabitur. Vulg. Domum lapidum oculis vidit. Drus.

And seeth the place of stones.] The words may be translated, He dwelleth and he stayeth in the place of stones; or, He plants himself among the stones; and then it carries the same sence with the former clause: So Mr. Broughton, He platteth about the house of stones. And the Chaldee Paraphrast, He shall see with his eyes the place of stones. We are near that sence, And seeth the place of stones; that is (for all these rendrings of the Hebrew will come to a fair agreement, and the result is this) he lives, abides, converses, or dwells even where there seems to be the least probability of his stay, he stayeth in the place of stones.

בירה Domus vel generaliter sedes, vel locus quo aliquid capitur vel continetur. קרן חזות Cornu aspectus est cornu conspicuum & eminens quod supra alia cernatur. Alii cornu perplexitatis, i. e. perplexum & intricatum. Merc.

The Hebrew is, house of stones; and house is taken either for that special place wherein men dwell, or generally for any place; so that, the house of stones is either an house naturally built; Nature useth a kind of art: or an house artifically built; Art is but an imitation of Nature. He seeth, that is, he seems to abide or continue in that house of stones, he is very eminent or glorious in that place. The same word is read (Dan. 8. 5.) Where Daniel speaking of his Vision, saith, The Goat which he saw in the vision had a notable horn. The Chaldee is, a horn of sight; he had a horn of sight, that is, a conspicuous, or a notable horn; or, as others render it, he had a perplexed, enfolded, or enwrapped horn, a wreathed horn. So that the word signifies both the conspicuousness of a thing, and likewise the infoldedness and complication of it.

A learned interpreteter gives yet another sence, He looks into the house of stone, that is, he hinders the light, or darkens the house by perking up so proudly by, or near the windows; as if he had said, he annoyes his Masters house both below and above, at the foundation, and at the windows.

The state of the hypocrite thus setled and made firm among stones, is yet a tottering one, it will not be able to stand; the eighteenth verse shews this.

Verse 18. If he destroy him from his place, it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

There is much difficulty in giving a clear sence of these words.

If he destroy him from his place, &c.

If he] Who is that? Who is the Antecedent to this he? There is no antecedent expresst in the Hebrew. Some understand it thus, If he, that is, if the Lord, if God come to take vengeance of this man who seems to be a tree, so highly grown, and so deeply rooted.

Secondly, We may carry on the similitude thus, If he destroy him, that is, if the Gardener or the husbandman, if the master or owner of that ground or place, seeing a tree thus luxuriant, growing so near the foundation of his house, and so wrapped about the place of stones, hindering the windows of his house; if he come to destroy or cut him down, it shall deny him.

Or, Thirdly, If he destroy him, that is, if the Sun destroy him: So Mr. Broughton translates, If the Sun root him up from his place. But can the Sun root a tree up from his place? Yes, the Sun roots up a tree, when the Sun, before which a tree flourishes a while, casts his beams so hot upon it, that it is scorched. Extream heat draws out all the moisture of a tree, and kills it. In that sence the Sun may be said to root up a tree, the Sun killing the tree, causeth it to be rooted up. Thus we see divers Antecedents answering the he, the agent in the Text.

If he destroy him from his place.

בלע Absorbuit, devoravit; Metaphoricè corrupit destruxit, consumpsit, quia quod deglutitur, perditur, absumitur. Pereleganter qui vini multum deglutiunt, a vino absorberi dicuntur. Pined.

The word which we translate destroy, signifies properly to swallow down as a man swallows down meat and drink; and it signifies to swallow as a man swallows when he is very hungry; a man that is very hungry, eats his meat greedily, he throws it down whole into his throat, rather then chews it. Now, because when meat is swallowed down, the meat is consumed and spent, and is destroyed and comes to nothing, therefore the Hebrews elegantly translate that word, which properly signifies to swallow up, to destroy; to destroy is to swallow up; and in that sence (Isa. 28. 7.) wine is said to swallow up a man, that is, to destroy and consume him. Intemperate men swallow up wine, and at last wine swallows up them: The wine drinks up their estates, their wits, their healths, their lives, their all at last. It is a Metaphor taken also from cruel and savage beasts, who devour men: as Jacob saith of Joseph, Surely a wild beast hath devoured or swallowed him up: And (Psal. 35. 25.) We have that word applied to wicked men conspiring against the Saints, they say, We have swallowed him up, ah! so would we have it; that is, we have utterly destroyed him, this pleases, this goes well on our side.

Then the meaning is, Though the tree be in this state, yet if the husbandman come, he can quickly destroy it from his place; yea, though it be thus fairly grown, and firmly rooted, the Sun is able to kill this tree, and to draw out all its moisture, and so leave it dry and feared, fit only to be stubbed for fewel. Or take it for an hypocrite, to whom the similitude referreth. If God come to destroy him out of his place, to swallow him up, there's an end of him quickly; It shall deny him, saying, I have not seen him.

From this consideration, that the destruction of the tree is spoken of so immediately after the flourishing of it, that word He is gren, &c. is no sooner out, but he adds, If he destroy him, &c. we may note,

That, The destruction of hypocrites and wicked men cometh often upon them, in the height of their prosperity.

Even in the time of his greatness he shall be destroyed, and when his roots are wrapped about the heap. Trees stand so long sometimes that they wither of themselves, and then we cut them down for the fire, but this man shall be cut down like a tree in his prime, in his flourishing, when affliction and withering seem fartherst off, when he thinks least of destruction, then it shall come upon him; when his estate is like Jonah's gourd, a very pleasant plant, and a great rejoycing to him, a worm smites the roots and kills it.

That of Job (chap. 20. 22.) is full to this point; In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straights, A strange thing that a man should be in straights when he is in his greatest enlargement, that a man should be emptied when he is full, that a man should be nothing when he hath all sufficiency about him, yet thus it shall be, In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits. As a godly man hath a sufficiency in his his wants, yea, a fulness of sufficiency in his wants: So on the other side, an hypocrite whose heart is false with God, hath want in his sufficiency, yea, want in the fulness of his sufficiency. Which may be understood two wayes: either that his fulness in the greatest sufficiency of it, is unsatisfying; or that his fulness in the greatest sufficiency of it, is upon decaying and abating. (*Psal.*78.13.) Whilst the meat was in their mouths, the wrath of God fell upon them; while meat is in the mouth, rich clothes upon the back, while store of money is in the purse, while the land brings forth abundance of encrease, even in all these sufficiencies a man may be in straits. As it was with Agag (1 Sam. 15.) Surely (saith he) the bitterness of death is past; he thought himself safe, and that the storm was quite blown over, but then, in that nick of time comes Samuel, and cutteth him in pieces. The Apostle Paul saith (2 Cor. 1.9.) I had the sentence of death in my self; that is, I concluded, I could not survive those sufferings, I thought my self a lost man: yet the Lord delivered him, and fetched him from the grave. But when hypocrites (like Agag) have the sentence, yea, the sweetness of life in themselves; When they say peace and safety, then sudden destruction comes, as pain upon a woman in travel, and they shall not escape: God cuts them off. It follows,

If he destroy him from his place; what then?

It shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

Here is the further aggravation of his misery, when he is destroyed, It shall deny him; What shall deny him? Some read it thus, his place shall deny him. Can a place speak, affirm, or deny? No, it cannot; but it is usual in Scripture, by a Prosopopeia, a fiction of a person, to ascribe speech to beasts, to trees, and places too, things not only without reason, but without life. Such an elegancy is here, It shall deny him; that is, when he is destroyed, if any man shall ask the question, where is the man? Where is this goodly tree that stood here before? The place shall answer. He is not here now.

כחש Mentietur ei ὁ τόπος ἐψεύσατο αὐτόν. Sept. Per prosopopeiam tribuit sermonem & mendacium rei inanimæ; quod insolens non est in his libris. Ita è loco suo excidetur & interibit, ut nullius jam agnoscat ea ibi unquam fuisse. Merc.

The Hebrew is, The place shall lie; the place shall feign and say, we have not seen him; we know not what is become of him: So men use to answer, when they are either afraid or ashamed to own one that is asked for.

Some understand it of a person, Then one may deny him: I see them no more, so Mr. Broughton. Suppose a traveller, who oftentimes past by, and saw this goodly tree, when he cometh to the place again, sees it no more, the tree is down: So he, who hath past by such a mans house, and beheld his goodly seat, when he comes another time, there is no such man there, the man is gone, It, or, he shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

I have not seen thee.] We have near the same words, Psal. 73. 35, 36. where the flourishing estate of a wicked man is shadowed under the notion of a tree, I have seen the wicked flourish like a green bay tree, &c. (yet) he past away, and he was not; as much as to say, if it be asked, what's become of him? A man shall answer, he hath not seen him; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. Such a sence hath been shewed (Job 7.18.) upon those words, The place thereof shall know him no more; A clear riddance shall be made of all men out of the world, especially of wicked men. In that description (Dan. 2.35.) of the four Monarchies, under the similitude of a great Image, whose head was of gold, his brest and arms of silver, his belly and thighs of brass, his legs of iron, and his feet of iron and clay; The Text saith, Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the Summer threshing floors, and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; or, as the Chaldee, They were found in no place: A time will come when all Monarchies and worldly Kingdoms, which have stood up in so much lustre, which have dazled the eyes of all the beholders with their splendor, and kept all their neighbour Nations under by their power (a time shall come) when this clay, and iron, and brass, and silver, and gold shall be all beaten to pieces, so that if a man ask, where are the four Monarchies? What's become of the pomp and state of those great Empires? The places of them shall know them no more; no man can tell where they are. There is such a meaning here, this green tree, this hypocrite shall have his branches so pull'd off, his roots so stubbed up, that it will be hard to give an account what's become of him.

We find the happy and flourishing estate of the Church and people of God described, as if no place were large enough for them to dwell in (Zech. 10.10.) I will bring them again out of the land of Ægypt, and gather them out of Assyria, &c. that is, I will gather my Saints, my Church, together from all parts of the world where they have lived, (while they could not live, but sculking in corners) I will bring them together, so conspicuously, that there shall be no place found for them; that is, no place capacious enough to receive them and their families. We have the same promise of enlargement (Isa. 49.) They shall say, The place is too strait for me, give place to me that I may dwell. Now, as the Saints shall be gathered together so eminently and abundantly, that no place shall be found big enough to hold them; so the hypocrite with all his greenness and verdure shall be so blasted and rooted up, that the place where he was shall not be visible, as his: he shall be so far from filling all places, that he shall fill none, The place where he dwelt shall spue him out, and by any remaining symptom it shall not be known where that man was.

So then, the sum of all may be given thus, taking the comparison from the tree to this wicked man;

That as a tree highly grown and deeply rooted, may be so cut down and stubbed up, that it shall not be known whether ever it grew upon that place or no; so a wicked man, though for a while he flourisheth and overcometh all impediments that hinder him, in the eye of the world, yet at last himself and his family shall be so clean removed and swept away, his name and memory so blotted out, that there shall not be any print or foot-step of his being upon the face of the earth.

Whence note, That the memory of wicked men shall perish for ever, none shall own them.

If they be asked about them, they shall say, We have not seen them. Peter in his temptation denied Christ, Matth. 27. when they asked him, saying, Art not thou one of his Disciples? No, saith he, I know not the man. As the Saints under temptation, and as hypocrites in their dayly conversation deny Christ: so the time will come when hypocrites and wicked men shall be denyed themselves, their places shall say, We know them no more. They shall be remembred only as Pilate is remembred in that, which is called the Apostles Creed, who stands there upon record for his wickedness, cowardize and injustice in condemning Christ, whom he knew to be innocent. Wicked men are either forgotten, or else remembred with a brand of disgrace. They who have been adored and flattered, and crept to like little gods, shall not be owned by the meanest men. Even their parasites who have hung about them, will fall off from them, and say, Who, we know them? We know no such men. It is prophesied (Zech. 8.23.) of the Jews, who are now a despised and scattered people (yet still a people in the heart of Christ) that God will bring them forth at last, and they shall be a people so much honoured, that ten men out of every Nation shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. The despised Saints, such as the world hath cast out, and said, We will not see or take notice of them, shall be honoured or envied of all. Men will be glad to take hold of their skirts, and say, Come, let us go with you; O that we might have a part and a portion with you, for we know that God is with you! O that we had lived the lives, and might die the deaths of the righteous! O that our beginnings had been, and that our latter ends might be like theirs! Likewise a time will come, when hypocrites and wicked men shall be despised by their admirers, and cast out, as not worth the looking on by their grossest flatterers. It was a great honour which the Orator gives Homer, a Heathen Poet, who was a man of such reputation, that many great Cities strove for him. One said, he was born here; another said, he was born there; a third, among us was the place of his birth. All desired to own him, because he was a man highly honoured for his learning in those times: So on the other side, every place shall be ashamed of some men; this place shall say, we have nothing to do with him; and that place shall say, we have nothing to do with him; one shall disclaim him, and another shall disclaim him, all shall refuse him. It shall be the the honour of Saints to be desired of all; and it shall be the shame and punishment of wicked men, to be cast out and disregarded by all. They who despise God, shall at last be lightly esteemed among men.

Bildad having thus enlarged his similitude, in all the parts of it, and at last laid the hypocrite as low as forgetfulness, so low that no man will own him, as he is always so low that God will not own him, he concludes triumphantly against him.

Vers. 19. Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

Here's his conclusion.

משוש "Dicitur quando gaudio gestimus, ut canes solent quando peregre advenienti Domino adulantur. Et hæc est exultatio væ ejus ironicos dictum. Hæc est lætitia qua sibi placebit in magnitudine sua. Viam appellat statum in quo erat, q. d. in quo redeat ejus gaudium dū ita se efferet. Merc.

This is the joy.] The word which we translate joy, signifies the highest joy, a kind of leaping for joy. It is an allusion to dogs or spaniels, who (you know) when their Masters come home, leap about them for joy, and in their language bid them welcom. Such a joy is here meant, a joy lifting up the heart, a leaping, an exulting joy. The word is often applied to the joy of the Saints, they rejoyce, and (as it were) leap about Jesus Christ, they triumph in the favour of God. The leaping, the exulting joy, the best joy, all the joy which an hypocrite hath, is but this, which hath been described; Is it not a desirable joy? A goodly joy sure? The words are ironical, This is the joy of his way.

Of his way.] Way is taken for the course, purpose, and institution of a mans life, for the tenour of his conversation, which he holds in the world, This is the joy of his way: This is it. The particle is demonstrative, This is it which I have told you, as if he had said, cast up all the comfort and happiness of that flourishing tree, of the hypocrite, this is all that it comes to, his end is to be rooted up and not so much as to be owned by those that knew him before.

There are three things which I should observe from this, This is the joy of his way.

First, That an hypocrite may have much joy in his way.

He may rejoyce much in his condition, and thinks all's well. False hopes can produce false joyes. False faith brings forth a comfort like it self, a fading comfort, a shadow of comfort, as that is but a shadow of faith. The fancy of faith is usually fuller of joy then true faith. Satan helps forward this joy, and God for a time will not hinder it. Faith (though feigned) gives the soul a sight of such things as are worth the rejoycing in, and a supposed title to them will move joy, as well as a real title doth. The stony ground received the word with joy. The promises are delicious to the sensitive and rational part, as well as to the spiritual and regenerate part. Hence (*Heb.*6.) they that fall away are said to have had tastes of the joyes of the world to come. An hypocrite may think himself in Heaven sometimes, and then like one in Heaven, he cannot but rejoyce. He may have a glimpse of Heaven upon Earth, all whose Heaven is Earth. This is his joy.

Secondly, This, may be demonstrative, and answers the question; what is his joy? It is this, His worldly comforts, his flourishing outward condition is his chiefest joy. Then note,

The joy of hypocrites is chiefly bottomed upon outward things.

It is not the joy of the Lord, no, not joy in the Lord, Rejoyce in the Lord, and again, I say, rejoyce, is the Gospel-command. An hypocrite cannot rejoyce thus. When he rejoyces in the Lord, somewhat besides the Lord causeth his joy. He rejoyces in his green boughs, in his goodly branches, in his supposed strong root; but to rejoyce in God, as God, he knows not how. David's joy was the opposite of this (*Psal.*4.6.) Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me, and that will put gladness in my heart, more then in the time that their corn and wine encreased. Let me have the Sun-shine of thy love, and then though I have nothing but darkness and clouds from the world, I shall rejoyce. But what saith the hypocrite? Let my corn and wine encrease, let the Sun of outward prosperity shine warm upon me, let me have my greenness of creature-contentments, let me have credit and fair repute among men, these will put gladness in my heart. These glad his heart, when he hath not a dram of grace or goodness there.

Thirdly, The joy of an hypocrite is but for a moment.

It is a perishing joy. This is the joy of his way; you see what it amounts to, how well it lasts. His greenness is turned into withering, his root rots, and his fruit falls off. This is his joy. He is like those spoken of in the Epistle of Jude, (vers. 14.) Trees twice dead, and plucked up by the roots. That's the conclusion of the hypocrite: he hath a name to live, but he is dead, twice dead, naturally dead in sin, and judicially dead under wrath: he was born spiritually dead, and his whole life is a passage to eternal death. He hath rejoyced a while, but he must mourn for ever. The portion of hypocrites is weeping and gnashing of teeth, (*Matth.*24.51.) Their joy is but for a morning, or a day, weeping comes at night, and that night hath no morning after it.

And out of the earth shall others grow.

Some read, Out of the earth shall somewhat else, some other thing grow. We, out of the Earth (when these are removed) other persons shall grow, who shall inherit the place, and possess the dwelling of these prosperous trees. For he follows the similitude of a tree, when, or where one is pulled up, another is planted and grows up in its room. Or, others shall possess what he hath gotten. In which sence Job speaks (Chap. 27. 16, 17.) Though the heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay, he may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver. Which words may be a Comment upon these, Out of the Earth shall others grow; that is, others shall rise up. God will bring a new generation to enjoy his ill-gotten substance, and eat the sweet of all his labours. Solomon (Eccles. 2. 18.) was much afflicted, because he knew not who should grow up after him. I hated (saith he) all my labour which I have taken under the Sun, because I shall leave it to a man, and I know not what he shall be, whether a wise man or a fool. It is a part of the vanity which lies upon man-kind, that after all a mans labour and pains, he must leave all unto some body, he knows not certainly who. But there is a greater and sorer vanity upon the hypocrite; he seldom stayes to take his part, He shall not rost that which he hath taken in hunting (Prov.12.) that is, he shall not have the benefit himself of what he hath, but others (unthought of) shall come out of the ground and grow in his place, This is the upshot or sum of all his misery, he hath laboured for others in temporal things, and he hath got nothing for himself in spiritual things.

Alii, qui alieni erunt ab eo, & quasi è terra alia germinabunt, in bona ipsius succedentes juxta illud, repositæ sunt justo opes peccatoris. Drus.

Further, the words may carry this sence. That,

When wicked men are taken away, the righteous shall grow in their room.

Pull up the bryars and thorns, and then vines and fig-trees, lillies and roses will grow the better. When wicked men are removed, good men will prosper.

Again, Out of the earth shall others grow; they were not worth the ground they went upon, though they were worth a great deal of ground, therefore out of the ground shall others grow. God will raise up a generation which shall be more faithful and serviceable unto him.

There is a fourth sence of this expression, Out of the earth shall others grow; that is out of the meanest and lowest condition others shall grow: and so it carries an opposition between the condition of an hypocrite, and of a godly man. The hypocrite in his flourishing greenness shall be cut down to the ground, but they whose hearts are sincere and upright, though they are as low as the ground, though they are upon the Earth, and are trodden down as mire in the streets, yet they shall grow up, they who were growing high shall be cut down, and they who were below shall grow up; such as they feared not, nor suspected, shall prevail over them. They who are lowest, even as low as the earth, shall be raised, built up, and set on high in the world, when God speaks the word.

There is an Exposition of this whole context, about which (because many close with it) I shall give a brief account. Divers of the learned understand this third similitude, not as describing the state of an hypocrite, but as an instance in opposition to the state of an hypocrite, set forth by the rush and by the spider in the former Verses.

Hence it is that the Italian version begins vers. 6. thus, But the perfect man is green before the Sun, &c. And so the sence may be given to this effect. As if Bildad had said, Though hypocrites wither like a rush, or like a flag, though they are suddenly swept down like a spiders web, yet a godly man is a green tree before the Sun; he is not like a rush without water, but like a tree planted by the rivers side, which is able to endure the heat of the Sun, yea the hottest Sun of persecution: [His branches shoot forth in his garden] he is no wild tree, no tree of the forest, or of the wilderness, he is a tree of the inclosed garden. which if it want the water from the clouds, the Gardener will take care to water it with his hand. Or [his roots are wrapped about the heap, about the fountain] he is strongly set, and he hath water continually to feed and supply his branches; Thus the Church is so described by Balaam (Num. 24. 6.) How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy Tabernacle, O Israel! as the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the rivers sides, as the trees of Lign Aloes, which the Lord hath planted, and as Cedar trees besides the waters. Thus the godly mans roots are wrapped about the fountain, and there he is fruitful; though the Sun shine hot upon him, yet it cannot exhale his moysture faster then the river can supply him with more. And he seeth the place of stones, he will live upon a flint, having a lively root of faith continually sucking in refreshings from Christ, under whose protection and favour he remains strong and abounding in the work of the Lord [But if he destroy him from his place, it shall deny him] that is, if the wicked of the world attempt to root the godly man up: the place, that is, the men of the place shall take part with him, own him, and deny to give him up into the hands of those who would destroy him. But if the place should not secure him, if the power and violence of the enemy destroy and pluck him up, yet this is his joy, a godly man may be destroyed, but none can destroy the joy of a godly man. [This is the joy of his way] he delights in persecution, he is as sorrowful, but alwayes rejoycing, even in death it self. [And out of his earth shall others grow.] He shall have a blessed posterity to stand up in his stead, in whom he shall live, when he is dead. Or, if the power of the adversary root him out of this earth, in which he lived, and drive him from this ground, from house and home, he shall grow in an other Earth (The original may bear that sence.) If he be removed from this place, he shall grow in another place; if you take him from his own Country, he can grow in any Country, and if he be plucked from all Countryes he will grow up too, and in Heaven.

De terra alia germinabunt. Pagn.

Thus the whole Context may be made out as a similitude of a godly man, in opposition to the hypocrite. But I rather acquiesce and settle in the interpretation before, that it is a third description of the condition of an hypocrite. The original and our translation fairly carry it so.

Bildad having thus far prosecuted the point, vindicated the justice of God, and illustrated his former proof by a threefold similitude, shuts up and states the point for God, that He is just, For he will not hurt the innocent, neither will he help the evil doers, &c.

VERS. 20, 21, 22.

Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers.
Till he fill thy mouth with laughing and thy lips with rejoycing.
They that hate thee shall be cloathed with shame, and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

THese three verses are the Epilogue or close of Bildad's discourse with Job: having in the former parts of the Chapters asserted, and with great clearness illustrated the justice of God in his dealings against impenitents and hypocrites; he now concludes in a mollifying language, with the assurance of his favour and goodness unto those who return and humble themselves. Yet this he interweaves with threats of the displeasure of God seen in the effects of it against the wicked, in vers. 20, 22.

It is, as if Bildad had thus said, Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man. Job, thou mayest perceive by what hath now been spoken, that God is no enemy to the righteous, nor no friend to wicked men: Thou seest what the portion of a wicked man is from God, and how just God is in giving him such a portion; yet know, that mercy shall act as gloriously in the hand of God, as justice doth; as God is not unjust to favour hypocrites, so neither will he be unjust to forget the righteous and the perfect man; the hypocrite shall perish, but he will fill the mouth of a godly man with laughing, and his lips with rejoycing.

Or, if we consider his speech more distinctly, we may see two negative acts of justice, one toward the perfect, the other toward the hypocrite, with the effects of both.

His justice acts towards the perfect man, in that, He will not cast him away. The effect whereof is, The filling of his mouth with laughing, and his lips with rejoycing.

His justice acts against the hypocrite, thus, He will not help the evil doers. The effect whereof is, That evil doers shall be cloathed with shame, and that their tabernacles shall not be.

We may cast all into a form of Argument. First, To the general; and then to the particular case of Job.

He that doth not cast away a perfect and a good man, is just and righteous in his dealings and administrations.
But God doth not, will not, cast away a perfect and a good man. Therefore he is just and righteous in his dealings and administrations.

Then to the particular case of Job.

He that doth not cast away any perfect man, will not cast thee away, if thou art perfect.

Therefore, Job, return, make thy way perfect before God, and He will not cast thee away. Or take this inference. God will not cast away a perfect man: therefore surely thou hast a great deal of imperfection or insincerity in thee, because God hath thus cast thee off, and laid thee aside.

The like Arguments may be framed upon the other part of his justice, in his dealings with the wicked.

From the general sence of the Context thus given, I come to open the particulars, as they here lie in order.

Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man.

Behold.] Is here a strong affirmation. This is a certain truth.

God will not.] The strong God, or the puissant, will not cast away a perfect man. God hath infinite power, but he puteth none of it forth, to this purpose: he never layes out himself in opposing those who are perfect and righteous, The powerful God doth not cast away a perfect man.

אל Deus fortis non abutitur potentia sua ad conterendum simplicem. Fined.

Cast away.] The word which we translate, cast away, was opened at vers. 14. of this Chapter, and in Chap. 5. vers. 9. There it was translated by despising, Despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, cast not away, or cast not off the chastening of the Lord. And in vers. 14. of this Chapter, The hypocrites hope shall be cut off, he shall cast away his hope, or his hope should cast away and abhor him, for so the word bears. The Seventy translate it to that sence, He will not cast off; that is, he will not reprobate, or disapprove, he will not reject or discountenance a perfect man. And Mr. Broughton, Loe, the omnipotent will not loath the perfect. Either of the sences are full enough to the Text.

Non Reprobabit innocentem, 70.

Only take notice that in the words there is a figure; for when it is said, That God will not cast away a perfect man; this is not all the meaning, as if God made no other reckoning of perfect men then thus, that he would not cast them away; more is intended then expresst, namely, that the Lord doth highly esteem and prize righteous men, he layes them as it were in his bosom and next his heart: thus the Lord deals with the righteous, His not casting away, is a near imbracing.

Meiosis.

There is a two fold casting away; First, Temporal. Secondly, Eternal: and in neither of these sences doth God cast away a perfect man. Not only shall he not perish eternally, but not temporally. He doth not reject or cast him away for a moment; his love is an everlasting love, and there can be no breaches or gaps made in it, so as to cut off his love to the person, although he often signifies displeasure against his sin.

The

The perfect man.] The word we had in the first Chapter, where it is used to express Job's compleatness in spirituals; a compleatness, not in degrees, but in parts; sincerity filled up his soul, and so perfected all the limbs and members of his inward man. Hence observe,

First, A gracious soul shall never be rejected of God.

Whatsoever God doth in the world, he will never do this, Heb. 13. 5. He hath said, he will never leave thee nor forsake thee. If God doth not leave a perfect man, he will not cast him away. The Apostle puts the question (Rom. 11. 1.) Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. God hath not cast away his people whom he foreknew.

Perfect men are Gods Jewels, not the rubbish or offscowring of the world, though the world count them so. A wise man will not cast away Jewels.

Perfect men are Gods servants, his faithful servants; all the willing service he hath done him in the word (on this side Angels) is done by these men. A wise man will not cast away such as are truly serviceable unto him.

Perfect men are Gods children; they are born of God, and sons of the most high. Natural love will not cast away a child.

Perfect men are Gods portion, the lot of his inheritance, his revenue comes in, he hath his incomes of glory by them, A man will not despise his own glory, he will not reject his own inheritance.

Further, They who are perfect come to him in his Son, and he hath pawned his truth for it (John 6. 37.) He that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out: As if he had said, this thing is furthest from my heart of any thing in the world. God calls after many who go away from him, but he casts away none who come to him. None comes to him till he draws them, therefore he will not drive them away who come.

Again, Perfect men have the Spirit of God, God cannot cast away or stop his ears at the voyce of his own Spirit. They have the earnest of his Spirit; if God should go about to put them off or lay them aside, they will shew God those tokens and pledges of his love, the earnest he hath given them to assure their hearts.

Lastly, He hath tied himself to them in the bond of a Covenant, they are fast to him in the everlasting bonds of his own love; therefore they cannot be cast off. So he promises his people (Lev. 26. 44.) though they should provoke him to afflict them, yet he would not reject them utterly; he might put them into the hands of their enemies, but he would never cease to be their friend; for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away. (Many think when the Saints are cast into trouble, that God had cast them away; no, there is no such matter; when they are in their enemies hand, God holds them still in his hand. yea, in his heart.) I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them to destroy them utterly, and break my Covenant with them, for I am the Lord their God. The Covenant holdeth God and his people so fast together, that they shall never part.

We find the Church complaining grievously, as if she were cast away (Psal. 44. 9.) Thou hast cast us off and put us to shame, and goest not forth with our Armies; and, ver. 23. The Church prayes, Arise, O Lord, cast us not off for ever. So (Psal. 60. 1.) O God, thou hast cast us off; and, ver. 9. Who will bring me into the strong City? Wilt not thou, O God, who hadst cast us off? God (to sense) casts off his own people, when he casteth them into dangers; but even then their faith takes hold of God, and Gods love takes hold of them. Though all this be come upon us, yet have we not forgotten thee, nor dealt falsly in thy Covenant (Psal. 44. 17.) Neither had God forgotten them, or dealt falsly in the Covenant; they were his people still, and as near unto him, as when they were furthest from those troubles.

God casts away some indeed, but they are such as he never had within the bonds of his Covenant. He casts away wicked men as rubbish, as filth and dirt; such the Prophet speaks of (Hos. 9. 15.) My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him. These were imperfect, not perfect men. God cast these away, not from any interest they had in him, but because they never had any. Such as will not hearken unto the word of God, God will cast away; why? They cast God away, when they cast the word of God away. They cast the Covenant behind their backs (Psal. 50.) no wonder God casts them behind his back; he throws them out of doors, when they throw his truth out of their hearts. Perfect men love the truth of God for ever, and the God of truth loves them for ever.

Secondly (For, as we said, these words express less then is meant.) observe,

That, Perfect men are highly esteemed by God.

He prizes them greatly, he delighteth in them, They that honour me, I will honour, saith God; not only will I not cast them away or abhor them, but I will honour them. God esteems and prizes them, though the world disesteem and reject them. There is many a soul which the world tramples under their feet, as the mire in the streets, which at that time God layes in his bosom. Christ embraceth some in his arms, whom the world, yea, whom their brethren hate, and smite with their tongues (Isa. 66. 5.) Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my names sake, said, let the Lord be glorified. (Not only the wicked world may do this, but brethren, even those that are brethren indeed in the main, may possibly hate a perfect man, and cast him out) your brethren that hated you, and cast you out for my Names sake; but the Lord at that time loved them, as it follows, But he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed.

And if God doth not only not cast away perfect ones, but esteem them, then take these three cautions.

First, Ye that are perfect, be sure ye keep close to God, do not cast him off, do not cast away the word, any one truth or command of God. Cast not the wayes of God away, for he will never cast you away.

Secondly, Ye that are perfect, cast not away your confidence, Heb. 10. 35. The Apostle had shewed how close God would stick to his people; now, saith he, if it be so, if he will bring his promises to pass, then cast not away your confidence. There is a great strength of engagement in it, when we read that God will not cast away his people, that they should not cast away their confidence in God, which hath great recompence of reward.

Thirdly, To all, take heed of casting off, or slighting any perfect man; we should act towards men, and think of them as God doth. It is best to love where God loves, and to love most where God loves most. Negative promises and negative threatnings have greatest force in them. God holds them fastest, and loves them dearest, of whom he saith, I will not cast them away. God will not cast away a perfect man. There's a negative promise. Now see the portion of the wicked; that's given out in a negative threatning: God saith not what he will do against them, but what he will not do for them, Neither will he help the evil doers.

He will not help them.] Some read it, He will not put forth his hand to evil doers. So the Letter of the Hebrew imports. And there may be a threefold sence given of that reading. Putting forth the hand, notes, first, our taking men into society, fellowship and familiarity with us; when we would shew a man how we love him at our hearts, we put forth a hand, and take him by the hand. Now (saith he) God will not take an evil doer by the hand, to welcome or entertain him, to countenance and respect him, Exod. 23. 1. Put not thy hand with the wicked, to be an unrighteous witness: Be not of the same side, communion and fellowship with him in giving witness.

Secondly (As the Septuagint gives the sence) He will not put forth his hand, that is, to receive a gift or an offering from wicked men. When a gift or a present is brought, the receiver (if he would testifie his liking and acceptance of it) puts forth his hand and receives it. Now (saith Bildad) God will not put forth his hand to receive any offering or gift from wicked men; the oblations of wicked men are an abomination unto the Lord: The good deeds of evil doers are evil in his sight. He had no respect to Cain and his offering. He did not put forth his hand to receive Cain's offering; but he put forth his hand to receive Abel's offering. This is a profitable sence.

Nec illum munus impii accipiet. Sept. q. d. Non porriget manus, accepturus munus, impiorum dona non sunt Deo grata. Pined.

Thirdly, It rather refers to Gods not assisting wicked men. So Mr. Broughton renders it, He will not maintain, the Denotat fortiter apprehendere, aut potius apprehendendo confortare & roborare, hoc est, præstare auxilium. Improbis nō favet, nec eos juvat. Merc.

יחזיק

the hand of the mischievous. To put forth or stretch out the hand, according to this Hebrew phrase, implies strong holding; or the taking of strong hold upon any thing, so as by taking hold of it to strengthen and confirm it, to give it help and assistance. A man that would give assistance to another in any business or work, puts forth his hand to him. When we want help, we usually bespeak a friend, Pray lend me your hand. Now here, the Lord will not put forth his hand to evil doers; that is, the Lord gives them no assistance or help in their wickedness. If wicked men say, Lord, lend us thy hand; no, saith he, I will not lend you my hand. We find this phrase frequent in Scripture. That (Gen. 19. 16.) illustrates it fully; where Lot being warned to go out of Sodom (verse 16) While he lingred, the men (that is, the Angels) laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters, the Lord being merciful unto him, and they brought him forth, and set him without the City. They laid hold upon their hands: It is the word of the Text. When the Lord sees wicked men in any distress or danger (as Lot was in Sodom) or when they want help or assistance in any business, he will not be merciful to them in taking them by the hand, or in laying his hand strongly upon them, either to pull them out of danger, or to give them help in difficulties. The sin of Jerusalem is charged upon her in this language by the Prophet, in a parity with that of filthy Sodom (Ezek. 16. 49.) Neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy, that is, she did not relieve, comfort or help them. The sin opposite to this, is charged upon the false Prophets, by Jeremy (chap. 23. 14.) They strengthen the hands of evil doers either by counsel, or by countenance, by flatteries or connivance. We read (Nehem. 6.) how often the enemies sent false alarms to Nehemiah and the people that were with him, to terrifie and affright them; Nehemiah shews the enemies, design in it, ver. 9. They all made us afraid, saying, their hands shall be weakned from the work that it be not done; therefore in the close, Nehemiah prayes, Lord, strengthen mine hands (it is this word) as if he had said, Lord, help me, put thine hands to mine. So, Isa. 35. 3. Strengthen the weak hands, put your hands to their hands, Psal. 73. 23. David acknowledging how he had almost fallen at the rising of the wicked, shews yet what kept him up; Nevertheless, I am continually with thee, thou hast holden me by my right hand; the hand of providence is the power of God upholding our being, as the hand of creation was the power of God giving us our being, Isa. 42. 6. I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and I will hold thine hand and help thee. So, Isa. 41. 13. That is, by holding of thine hand I will help thee. The same word in the original is used for hardning the heart (Exod. 9. 12.) because hardness of heart strengthens it to do evil. A hard heart is armed for any sin.

So then we see, when the Lord refuseth to put forth his hand, or to take strong hold (as the word imports) upon the hand of evil men, the meaning lies in one of these three things;

First, That he bears no favour to them, he doth not approve their cause or business.

Secondly, That he gives them no assistance or encouragement in their business.

Thirdly, That he will not deliver or rescue them out of their distresses; when they are sinking or falling, he will not put forth his hand to hold them up, or keep them from sinking. God is not a patron or a protector, an adjutor or aider of evil doers.

מרעים
Evil doers.] We must not take these evil doers for all and every one that doth evil; for then whom would God help? We may then say (with reverence) God help us indeed: What a miserable condition were we then in if God would not put forth his hand to help any that do evil? The evil doer is a man notoriously, professedly, studiously wicked, one that acts and devises evil against God and his wayes. Every one who doth evil, is not to be reckoned an evil doer. A man doth evil in any one act; but one act doth not make him an evil doer. A Magistrate must count him an evil doer who doth evil; and therefore he must take vengeance (in many case) of him that doth evil (though but once) Rom. 13. 4. and though he repent. The Angels were cast as evil doers for one act, and so was man in innocency; but now the evil doer is one who multiplies and continues in evil deeds; to such as these the Lord will not put forth his hand, or give them his help. Observe then,

First, That, God is no friend, no assistant unto men in sinful wayes.

He will not strengthen the hands, or help forward the work of wicked men. God is the punisher and Judge of evil doers, and therefore not their helper.

Evil doers oppose not only Gods Law, but his Nature, therefore he will not help them. He cannot exercise one Attribute against another; his Power will not work against his Holiness, or against his Will.

There is a twofold help which God giveth.

First, A common help.

Secondly, A special help.

We grant that God strengthens the hands even of evil doers in regard of common help; for no man could put forth his hand to any evil, as a sinner, if God did not give him a general assistance as a creature. In this sence the strength by which men rebel and sin against God, comes from God. But he doth not strengthen their hands, or give them help by any special assistance. In the doing of good, we have a common assistance to the act, as there is a natural motion in it, which God gives his people with the rest of the world; but this will not carry them out to do good compleatly. To bring forth any gracious act, they must have a special assistance. Hence Christ saith, without me ye can do nothing; he means it not of that general support which Christ gives to man, by which all live, and move, and have their being in him (in that sence no man is able to do any thing without Christ, for in him all things consist) but when he saith, without me ye can do nothing, he means, without my special assistance and strength ye cannot perform holy and spiritual duties, acceptable unto God. So the Apostle, We have no sufficiency of our selves, so much as to think a good thought. We have no sufficiency to think any thought without some assistance; but to think a good thought, we have not any sufficiency without a special assistance. Wicked men are not able to do evil without a common assistance, but they have no special assistance from God to do evil. He doth neither stir up and excite their lusts to the act, nor supply their lusts while they are acting. Wicked men have assistance enough in both from their own hearts, and from Satan. Though man hath no sufficiency in himself to think one good thought, yet he hath a sufficiency in himself to think all evil thoughts; as he is a creature, he acts, and as he is a corrupt creature, he sins. Man hath full power and free will to do evil, therefore the Lord doth not put forth his hand to help the evil doer.

But it will be necessary for the understanding of this and other like Scriptures, to consider somewhat more distinctly, what God doth in reference to evil acts, or the acts of evil doers. He concurs, but not with such concurrence as amounts to the helping of evil doers, or the strengthening of their hands.

The first help which God gives evil doers is privative or negative, the calling in, or not giving out of that power, by which they might do good, or avoid evil. Thus he departed from Saul, and then Saul went on worse and worse against David. God hath somewhat to do with evil doers when he withdraws that help from them by which they may be kept from doing evil: Or, when he doth not assist them against the evil of their own hearts, and the pollutions of the world. This deserting and leaving them unto themselves, layes them open to sin; yet the sin which a man thus deserted commits, can no more be charged upon God, then the darkness of the night can be charged upon the Sun for going down; sin follows divine desertion, not as the effect doth the cause, but as a consequent doth the antecedent.

Secondly, He delivers or gives them up, first, to Satan; and secondly, to their own counsels, to a reprobate mind and vile affections, Psal. 81. 12. Rom. 1. 24, 26. This tradition is an act beyond desertion; there is a greater spiritual judgment in it, when God makes a mans own wickedness active against him, then when he doth not make his Spirit or Grace active in him. It were better to be put into the hands of all the tyrants in the world, yea, better be put into the hands of the Devil, then into the hands of our own lusts and passions. God doth not give a reprobate mind or vile affections, but he gives up to them.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, Evil doers, in their doing evil, are ordered by God. Wicked men (in every sinful act) run beyond the line of obedience, but they cannot run beyond the line of providence. God limits and circumscribes the acts of wicked men, for otherwise every wicked man would be a monster, a non-such in wickedness, if he could; every one would be a Cain, an Ahab, a Nero, a Caligula, &c. The sinfulness of men would be, not only out of measure sinful intensive, in regard of the quality of it, but out of measure sinful extensive, in regard of the quantity of it, it would break all bounds, carry all down before it, did not the Lord order and direct the disorders and confusions of it. There is a Sea of wickedness in the heart of a wicked man, which is as boysterous and unruly as the natural Sea; and if the Lord did not set bounds to that Sea of wickedness, and say, Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further, it would overwhelm all. Thus far also God hath to do in the sinfulness of men, to limit and stay them, to restrain and keep them in compass, while they sin. Every sin goes without the compass of that law which God hath given, but no sin can get beyond the compass of that leave which God gives.

Fourthly, We may say, God assists the motions of sin, but not the motions to sin, or the sinfulness of the motion. The strength of a wicked mans hand, while he sins, is from the Lord, but the Lord doth not strengthen his hand to sin. A sinner hath natural help from God, but he hath no moral help from God; he hath all that from himself, from his own wicked heart, or from Satan. To eat, was a natural act in our first parent, this was from God; but to eat against the command was a moral act, and that was from man, and the Serpent. As suppose that a Musitian should touch or play upon a Lute that is out of tune, his touching the Lute is an artificial act, but the sounding of it comes from the nature of the instrument: the sounding of the instrument is from the hand of him that playes upon it, but, that it sounds untunably, is, because the instrument is out of tune. So the Lord by natural assistance puts the hearts and hands of wicked men into motion, but that they move irregularly, that they make such harsh musick, that there is so much discord in their actions, that's from the disorder and untuneableness of their own spirits, not from the hand of God. They have not any moral assistance from God in sin, but a natural only.

Or, take it negatively, God doth not help the evil doers.

First, He doth not help the evil doers, by instilling the least motion of evil into them. He casts in, or infuses holy thoughts and motions into the hearts of his own people, to prepare them for holy performances; but he never dropt the least motion of evil into the heart of man, to fit him for wickedness.

Secondly, The Lord doth not excite or stir up that natural inherent corruption that is in wicked men; he doth not provoke or blow up their lusts. He excites the graces of his own people, when they are to do any good: they have a principle of grace in them, and this God breaths upon, moving and acting it by fresh assistances. Neither of these wayes doth the Lord assist evil doers.

Further, Taking the words (as they must) in a figure, when it is said, God doth not help the evil doers; the meaning is, he doth oppose and resist them. Hence observe, Wicked men are resisted and opposed by God in their evil doings.

God is so far from giving them any help, that he sets himself against them. Understand this with a distinction.

There is a two-fold resistance or opposition that God makes against the evil doings of men. There is,

1. A moral
2. A natural

} opposition.

Or there is,

1. A declarative
2. An operative

} resistance.

When it is said, that God doth resist (as this phrase imports or suppoeth) wicked men in doing evil, we are to understand it, that he ever opposes them morally; that is, he ever layes a moral impediment in their way, and he ever opposes them declaratively, he declares his opposition in his Word. He never shews the least liking of wicked men in their wayes. For when he saith, He that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is unjust, let him be unjust still (Rev. 22. 11.) he doth not at all approve, but threatens these sinners. This seeming admission is the highest rebuke of sin. But take it for a natural opposition, which is the bringing out of strength and power to stop men in the wayes of sin: Thus the Lord doth not alwayes resist evil doers. For if he did, it were impossible that any wicked man should move one hairs breadth in doing evil; if God would put forth his power against man, he could not stir to sin against God: but God doth not so, neither is he bound to lay a natural impediment in the wayes of wicked men. It is enough to acquit him in his holiness, that he ever layes a moral impediment in their way. He declareth his Law against, and his dislike of their sins: and in this sence he alwayes resists them. All the sin of man is against the will of God, yet no man sins whether God will or no. The declarative will of God is often resisted, but his operative will cannot be resisted. As (which may illustrate this) in the civil State, the Laws of this Kingdom lay a moral impediment in the way of thievery and robbery, &c. It is perpetually declared by the Law, that no man ought to take another mans estate from him violently; but yet the Kingdom doth not ever set a natural impediment against robbers, &c. That is, we do not place a power of men to guard all high wayes or houses, to see that no passenger shall be robbed, or house broken open: So the Lord layes a moral impediment in the way of wicked men alwayes, but he doth not alwayes set his power against them, whereby he is able (if he please) to disable wicked men from doing evil. Thirdly observe,

When wicked men are going down, down they shall.

Why? God will not put forth his hand to help them; they, whom God will not assist or help, cannot stand long. They in the Psalm thought they had got the godly man at an advantage, Come (say they) let us persecute and take him, for God hath forsaken him, and there is none to deliver him. Now we may have our wills of this man, for God stands by, and doth not own him. If God be a neuter, his friends cannot stand long, how then shall his enemies stand, when he is their opposer? We may conclude against wicked men, that they shall be destroyed, for God hath forsaken them, he will not own them; and as Hamans wife told him sadly, Esth. 6. 13. If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt surely fall before him. When a man is going down, nothing can stay him, if God do not: his hand must support a sinking and tottering person or Nation, or else either falls. When wicked enemies begin to fall, they shall fall and perish, for God will not put forth his hand to help the evil doers.

Now follows the effect of all. The effect first of Gods gracious helping of the righteous, He will not cast away the righteous man; and is that all? Shall a righteous man be only not rejected? As mans duty ought not, so the mercy of God doth not stay in negatives. The Lord hath positive blessings in store for his people; the latter part of the promise affirms this, He will not cast away the righteous man, Vers. 12. Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoycing.

Till he fill thy mouth with laughing.] And is it but just till then? Will the Lord, when he hath set his people a laughing, leave them, and help them no more? Will he, when he hath given them cause of joy, cast them off? His people had better never laugh at all, then laugh upon those terms. No man can laugh long, nor at all (upon any due ground) if God leave him.

Particula donec non significat posteà projiciendum esse à Deo simpliciter, sed quod immutabiliter servabitur à Deo.

We are not to understand this [Till] to be a terminative, or a determinative particle, as if the Lords care and favour towards his people, should be only till he put them in a good estate, and then they must shift for themselves: God puts no such limits to his love. It cannot so much comfort the soul to know God loves us now, as it would trouble the soul, to think a time may come when he will not love us. The [till] here notes a continued act; it is as much as to say, ſay, He will never caſt them off. The word [until] both in the Hebrew and Greek, often notes everlaſtingneſs. God makes a promiſe to Jacob in this form (*Gen.*28.19.) I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have ſpoken to thee of. And would he leave him then? No, the meaning is, I will never leave thee (Pſal. 110.1.) Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy foot-ſtool. Chriſt ſhall not be put from the right hand of God, when his enemies are ſubdued under his feet, Chriſt ſhall ſit there for ever.

Till he fill thy mouth with laughing.

Thy mouth.] Obſerve here the change of the perſon: he ſpake before in the third perſon, The Lord will not caſt away the perfect man. Now he brings it home and applies it unto Job, Till he fill thy mouth with laughing; as if he had ſaid, that which I ſpake in the third perſon, I meant it as appliable unto thy ſelf, that general truth may be made good to thy perſon, Till he fill thy mouth. I do not ſpeak ſpeculations or fleeing notions of things that ſhall never come to paſs; If thou follow my counſel, thy own experience will quickly teach thee, That God will not caſt thee off, till he fill thy mouth with laughing.

Hoc quod dixi in tantũ verũ eſt, ut in te ſentiẽs. Aquin.

Laughter is an act of joy flowing from reaſon. To fill the mouth with laughing notes great joy, ſuch an income of joy, ſo much matter of joy, that the heart cannot hold it, but out it muſt at the mouth: joy begins at the heart, there's the ſeat of it: and when the heart is ſo full of it that it cannot hold, then it runs over at the mouth and lips; that is, we expreſs the inward joy of the heart, by ſome outward ſign or token, ſpeech or geſture. So then to ſay, I will not caſt thee away, till I have filled thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoycing; is as much as to ſay, I will not leave thee, till thou haſt more comfort then thine heart can hold, ſo much, that thou muſt give it vent at thy lips, and be ſpeaking of it.

Os impleri dicitur riſu, cum aliquis tanta animi hilaritate perfruitur, ut illa cordis hilaritas per vociferationem, conclamationem, riſum, aut hujuſmodi exteriora ſigna valde appareat. Bold.

The word for laughter, ſignifies as well inward as outward joy, heart-laughter as well as face-laughter. Beſides there is a two-fold laughter.

Firſt, A laughing of joy. And Secondly, A laughing of ſcorn, called ſubſannation. With both theſe laughters the Lord will fill the mouths of his people.

Firſt, With laughing for joy: for joy at their own comfortable and good eſtate, for joy that the Lord hath glorified himſelf in their deliverance. Theſe things are great matter of joy to them. And then he will fill their mouths with a laughing of deriſion, they ſhall ſcorn their enemies who have ſcorned at them. God laughs at the proud oppoſers of his truth and people, Pſal. 2. He that ſitteth in the Heavens ſhall laugh, the Lord ſhall have them in deriſion. When the Lord hath confounded the plots of his enemies, he laugheth at them; his people alſo ſhall laugh, not inſulting in the ſins and miſeries of men, but in the vengeance and diſappointments which God poureth upon them. The deriſions and ſcorns of the Saints have more holineſs in them, then the devotions and prayers of wicked men. The word in the next clauſe is conſiderable.

תרנעה à radice רוע Perſonavit, vociferatus eſt, vocem magnã edidit. ἀλαλάζειν eſt lætũ clamorẽ tollere, ut ſolent hominis fiducia præditi & ſpe erecti ut milites ante prælĩ. Latini Barritũ vocant; clamor quẽ Barritum vocant, non prius debet attolli quam acies utraq; ſe junxerit. Veget.

And thy lips with rejoycing.] We tranſlate rejoycing, but the word properly ſignifies, a joyful ſound. So it is uſed (Pſal. 89.15.) Bleſſed are the people that know the joyful ſound. And it ſignifies to make a joyful ſound, either with the mouth, which is a natural inſtrument, or with a trumpet, or any other artificial inſtrument. Bleſſed are the people that know the joyful ſound, that live within the ſound of the ſilver trumpet which congregated the people of God, and gave notice of their ſolemn meetings for publick worſhip. This word is applied ſometimes to that rude ſound or confuſed noiſe, which Souldiers make when they come on to charge in battel; they commonly make a great clamor, to ſtrike the adverſary with terror and amazement, and to encourage and raiſe their own ſpirits. The Greeks and Latines have their ſpecial terms to expreſs it by, noted by the learned in the proprieties of thoſe languages.

Again, That word is uſed for the confuſed noiſe of worſted or conquer'd enemies, when they flee and run away. So (Judg. 7.31.) when Gideon had diſcomfited the hoſt of the Amalekites, all the hoſt ran and cryed, they made a doleful ſound: ſo the word bears, as well as a joyful ſound.

Thirdly, The word is chiefly uſed to note the ſound or acclamation of Souldiers after victory is obtained; a prevailing army ſhouts when the adverſe forces are routed and overcome. Thus, in that famous inſtance (Joſh. 6.5.) Joſhua gives command, that when they make a long blaſt with the rams horns, and when they heard the ſound of the trumpet, all the people ſhould ſhout with a great ſhout, which ſhout is expreſſed by the word of the Text: and verſ. 10. he charges that they ſhould not ſhout or make a noiſe with their voice till the ſeventh day, becauſe that was deſigned for the day of victory, the day when the wall ſhould fall: You ſhall not ſhout or make any noiſe with your voice, neither ſhall any word proceed out of your mouths, till the day I bid you ſhout, then ſhall ye ſhout. Baalam (Numb. 23.21.) confeſſes he could not curſe Iſrael, becauſe the ſhout of a King was amongſt them. It is this word. That the ſhout of a King may be underſtood three wayes.

Firſt, That it was ſuch a ſhout as Kings uſed to have in their reception and coronation; Such a ſhout, ſaith he, there is among this people, as if a King were to be received and crowned. Thus when Samuel brought Saul out, whom he had anointed for King, and ſaid, See ye him whom the Lord hath choſen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people ſhouted, and ſaid, God ſave the King, 1 Sam. 10.24.

Or ſecondly, It noteth ſuch a ſhout as is in an Army, where a King in perſon is leader or victor.

Thirdly, The ſhout of a King is amongſt them, becauſe the voice of a King ſhould be as the ſound of a trumpet, or ſome loud inſtrument, to enform and direct his people, as alſo to encourage them.

From all, we ſee this rejoycing is no ordinary joy; It is a high, a triumphant joy, I will fill thy lips with rejoycing, till thou ſhalt ſing VICTORIA over all thine enemies and calamities.

ἐξομολογήσεως, i.e. confeſſione laudis & gratiarum actionis pro accepta reſtitutaque fœlicitate.

Further, This alſo is in it, a rejoycing with praiſe: not a bare rejoycing in the bleſſings and deliverances, but a rejoycing in the praiſes of God, who hath given thoſe bleſſings, and wrought thoſe deliverances. The Septuagint tranſlate it by rendring of thanks, or a confeſſion of praiſe, I will not caſt thee away, till I have filled thy lips with rejoycing; that is, with my praiſes. Thus David prayes (Pſal. 71.8.) Let my mouth be filled with thy praiſe, and with thine honour all the day long. Praiſe filling the heart fills the mouth; joy as well as ſorrow pent up, ſtifles the Spirit. Hence we may obſerve, > Firſt, That as joy is the portion of the people of God, ſo in good time they ſhall receive their portion.

He will not caſt off a perfect man, till he fill his mouth with joy, and his lips with rejoycing. Joy is their due, and joy they ſhall have. Hereafter they ſhall have their Maſters joy; Enter into your Maſters joy, will Chriſt ſay at laſt. Now they ſhall have ſuch a joy as befits them, whilſt they are in their Maſters ſervice. And as rejoycing is the portion, ſo the proper portion, the peculiar of godly men. Though laughing, as it is a natural act, is common to all men, yet in the ſence we ſpeak of, laughter is appropriated unto godly and perfect men: They only can laugh indeed, who have mourned indeed. A wicked man doth but feign a laugh. He laughs to thee, and to me, but he doth not laugh to himſelf: He hath no true laughter, while he laughs. His laughter is madneſs, and proceeds from his ignorance, not from his reaſon. Beſides other marks of difference which ſhall be put between the ſervants of God and their enemies, this is one, My ſervants ſhall rejoyce, and ye ſhall be aſhamed (Iſa. 65.13.) This joy ariſes two wayes.

Tibi videt & mihi, non ſibi.

Firſt, From the greatneſs of the bleſſing, which they receive for themſelves. We muſt rejoyce in the leaſt mercy, how greatly then in the greateſt? Our joyes take their meaſure by our mercies. When Sarah had a Son, ſhe ſaid, God hath made me to laugh, ſo that all that hear me ſhall laugh with me, Gen. 21.6. Her mercy in receiving a ſon was ſo great, that it would ſerve a whole world to make merry with. The man that had found his loſt ſheep, laid it on his ſhoulders, rejoycing (it was a pleaſant burden to him) and when he came home, he called together his friends and neighbours, ſaying, Rejoyce with me (Luke 15.6.) As ſome afflictions are ſo big, that all our own ſorrows are not large enough to weep and mourn over them: so some blessings are so big, that they call out more then our own affections to rejoyce over them.

Secondly, This overflowing joy arises from the greatness of those judgments, which are poured out upon the enemies of the Saints. The overthrow of Pharaoh at the red Sea, of Jabin and Sisera at the brook Kishon, filled all hearts and mouths with laughter, and so shall the overthrow of Babylon, Rev. 15.

Thus, when God doth great things for his people, and great things against his enemies, then it is time to rejoyce greatly (Psal. 126. 1.) The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we rejoyce, say the captive Jews in the morning or first dawnings of their deliverance from Babylon; and more then so, Then was our mouth fill'd with laughter, and our tongue with singing. And there is cause of great rejoycing in those great things, because then God fulfils his promises, and makes his Name glorious in his providences. Then God is greatly honoured, when his people are greatly delivered; then the blasphemies of wicked men are unanswerably confuted, and their mouths for ever stopped. From all these considerations the hearts of the Saints are filled with laughter, and their mouths with rejoycing, in a day when God works great things. At such times joy, and this degree of it, is not only our priviledge, but our duty. When we carry a message of thanks to God, we must not come with unchearful countenances, or sowr faces. It is a comely thing, when our affections keep time and proportion with the dispensations of God: when we cannot sing the songs of Sion, or use our harps by the waters of Babylon; and when we cannot but sing either in the restoring of Sion, or in the ruines of Babylon.

Some may object those Texts, Wo to them that laugh, &c. (Luke 6. 25.) It seems laughter is the portion of wicked men, for wo (we are sure) is their portion. It's true, worldly laughter, a laughter in corn, and wine, and oil, a laughter in riches, and honours, and carnal pleasures, as such, is laughter with a wo annexed. But to laugh in the sence of the goodness of God giving us outward good things, to express our selves joyfully, when God expresses himself graciously, is not only comely, but holy. When Gods heart comes out at his hand, and is seen in his actions, our hearts should come out at our mouths, and be heard in our exultations.

Thus we have seen the effect of the goodness of God upon his own people. See the effect of his justice upon wicked men.

Vers. 22. They that hate thee shall be cloathed with shame, and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

God resists, or will not put forth his hand to evil doers, then follows, They shall be brought to shame. Shame is opposite to laughing: he that rejoyceth, usually holds up his head, and cares not who sees him; but he that is ashamed, holds down his head, and endures not to be seen. Some men laugh in their sleeves (as we say) but all men would be ashamed in their sleeves.

שנא Odio habuit contempsit. Dicitur etiam aliquando per comparationem alterius, quod magis amatur, non quod propriè odio habeatur. Rab. Dav. in l. Rad.

They that hate thee. The word hath a double signification.

First, It imports the putting forth of bitter hatred, when a man sets himself maliciously against his brother.

Secondly, It is taken comparatively for a lesser and more remiss putting forth of love. He may be said to hate, who wants a due heat and height of love. In that sence Jacob was taxed for hating Leah, Gen. 29. 31. When the Lord saw that Leah was hated, &c. Take hatred in the common notion, and then surely Jacob was not a man so forgetful of a Husbands duty, as to hate his Wife: the meaning then is only this, The Lord saw that Leah had a less portion of love then Rachel had, or less then her conjugal relation called for. Jacob did not love her with that strength of affection with which he loved Rachel. Which exposition is clear, (vers. 30.) and he (namely Jacob) loved Rachel more then Leah; then Leah was loved, yet Jacob's loving of Rachel more then Leah, is called, hating of Leah. Not to love another in that degree we ought, is a degree of hatred. And in this sence we may take it here; for though such maliciously and professedly set themselves against the righteous are chiefly intended and fitted for this vesture of shame; yet it is cut out also for them, who do not love and esteem the righteous, who do not prize and rejoyce in them, as the beauty and dignity which Christ hath put upon them, invites them to do. These haters shall be cloathed with shame; according to the degree of their hatred shall be the degree of their shame.

בשת à radice יבוש Puduit aliquem rei vel facti. Our English word abasht is as near in sound as in sence.

They shall be cloathed with shame. To be ashamed at all is a great punishment; what is it then to be cloathed with shame? To be cloathed with shame is a great punishment, and most proper for those who are proud of their cloathing.

Shame is the fruit of sin. When there was no sin in the world, there was no shame in the world, The man and his wife were both naked, and were not ashamed. Innocency knew no shame, and glory shall know none. It is good to be ashamed when we have done evil, but it is best to do no evil whereof to be ashamed. Shame is a perturbation or trouble of mind, expressed outwardly by holding down the head, or by blushing in the face. And it ariseth three wayes.

First, From doing somewhat against common light: though every act of evil hath matter of shame in it, yet a man is not naturally ashamed of it, unless it be done against the light of Nature. Not to be ashamed of such sins, is to put out the light of Nature. Such men are grown down into beasts. The impudence of Jerusalem is set forth in sinning against the light of Scripture without blushing, Isa. 3. 9. Were they at all ashamed? Some are so modest, that they are ashamed to hear of, much more to be praised for the good which they have done; Others are so impudent, that they are not ashamed to hear of, no, nor to be reproved for, the evil which they have done, Were they at all ashamed? As if he had said, what a boldness or impudence is this people come to; they are not ashamed of those things, which are clearly forbidden in the Word. A good man is ashamed of any thing he hath done against the light of Scripture. Every man is ashamed of what he doth against the light of Nature.

Secondly, Shame arises from long delay, or detainments much beyond expectation. When Moses staid long in the Mount, the people were ashamed (Exod. 32. 1.) So Judg. 3. 25. when Eglon staid long in the inner parlour, the Text saith, his servants, who waited without, were ashamed.

Thirdly, Shame ariseth from utter disappointment. If hope deferred causeth shame, then much more hope destroyed. When a man sees his hopes quite cut off, so that he can no way reach the thing he looked for, shame takes hold of him strongly. David prayes (Psal. 119. 116.) Uphold me according to thy word, that I may live, and let me not be ashamed of my hope; that is, let me not lose my hope, for then I shall be ashamed; my enemies will rejoyce and hoot at me, where's the word upon which you trusted to be upholden? Read Isa. 12. 9. Psal. 27. 6. Psal. 119. 116. In all which Scriptures we find shame following the total frustration and disappointment of hope.

Evil doers shall be ashamed upon these three grounds. They have done things against common light. They shall stay waiting and gaping long for what they desire. They shall see themselves totally disappointed and defeated in their desires; hence shame shall fill their faces, and they shall be covered with it as with a garment.

Here is more then bare shame waiting upon them, the Text saith, They shall be cloathed with shame. To be cloathed is applied both to ornament and dishonour. There are three degrees of expression in Scripture about shame.

First, Barely to be ashamed, that's the lowest.

Secondly, To have the face covered with shame; Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake. Because for thy sake I have born reproach, shame hath covered my face, (Psal. 69. 6, 7.) The Prophet complains, that his face was covered with shame; his enemies endeavoured to blot and asperse him, they poured contempt and reproaches upon his face, that is, upon his reputation in the world, (to do so, is to cover the face with shame) therefore he prayes, Let not those that wait on thee be confounded for my ſake. Lord, they have covered me with ſhame, but do thou vindicate my reputation and mine honour; let not them that wait on thee be aſhamed for my ſake, becauſe I have had ſhame upon me for thy ſake: that is, let not any be diſcouraged in thy ſervice, through my ſufferings. The Apoſtle feared ſome would faint, becauſe of his tribulations, Epheſ. 3. 13.

Indui confuſione eſt Hebraiſmus quo exprimitur omnimoda & undiq; confundens verecundia. Bold. Veſtimenta dicuntur abominari, quaſi maculam contrahere timentes.

Thirdly, To be cloathed with ſhame, which implies the whole man under a covering of diſgrace. Some are ſo cloathed with ſin, that their very cloathes are aſhamed of them, being unwilling to touch or hide ſuch ſins. Job ſpeaks that ſence in Chap. 9. (verſ. 31.) concerning his own righteouſneſs in juſtification, If I waſh my ſelf with ſnow water, and make my hands never ſo clean, yet thou wilt plunge me in the ditch, and mine own cloathes ſhall abhor me; that is, if I ſhould ſet my ſelf up in my own righteouſneſs; my own cloaths would be loath to cover ſuch a piece of ſpiritual pride, as that act would witneſs me to be.

To be cloathed with ſhame, notes four things.

First, The extent or abundance of it. To be cloathed with honour, is to have much honour. To be cloathed with humility, is to be very humble (1 Pet. 5. 5.) He that is cloathed is covered all over with his cloathing.

Manifeſte confundentur. Aq.

Secondly, The publickneſs of it, that ſhame cannot be hid. A man cannot go abroad but cloathing is ſeen: the filthineſs which lies underneath may be hid, but his cloathing cannot. Their ſhame ſhall cloath them, they ſhall not put their ſhame under their cloaths, their ſhame ſhall be in ſight.

Eſt quaſi præmium peccati, mercedis enim nomine Syndones olim dabantur.

Thirdly, They ſhall be cloathed with ſhame, may be underſtood thus, Shame ſhall be their reward. They have been doing the buſineſs of Satan, he ſet them a work, now ſee what livery they ſhall have at laſt, into what ſuit the Devil will put them. They ſhall go in a livery of diſhonour. Servants are cloathed by their Maſters; Satan clothes his ſervants, and this is their cloathing, they ſhall be cloathed with ſhame. Sampſon was to give thirty change of garments to the Philiſtines for a reward, if they could declare his riddle (Judg. 14. 12.) Satan gives liveries and garments of ſhame to thoſe who ſtudy out his riddles, and do his drudgery.

Natura pudore tacta ſanguinem ante ſe pro velamento diffundit & obtendit. Macr. l. 7. c. 11.

Fourthly, If we take the letter of the Hebraiſm, to be cloathed with ſhame, implies thus much, that when a man hath done a thing of which he is aſhamed, he (as it were) ſends forth blood into the face, in a buſh, to cover that foul act, he puts out a red garment, or a ſcarlet vail to hide his filthineſs. Thus he is cloathed with ſhame. Modeſty commands nature, and (where it is but honeſtly natur'd) prevails with it to caſt this covering over all uncomlineſs in ſpeech or practice; and though this bluſh appears only in the face, yet the whole body is dipt and dyed with the ſame colour.

Solent qui erubeſcunt manum faciei, quia opprobrium ac dedecus timent, admovere. Bol.

Hence alſo they who are aſhamed, either hold their hands before their faces to cover them, or hold their heads down that they may not be diſcovered. Obſerve,

That which evil men glory in, will be matter of their abaſement.

The Apoſtle ſaith, They glory in their ſhame (Phil. 3. 19.) not formally, but materially. No man can glory in any thing under the notion of ſhame, but many glory in that which is in it ſelf ſhameful, and will be their ſhame. The Hebrew expreſſes an Idol, by a word that ſignifies ſhame, or a ſhameful thing (and it is the root of that in the Text) becauſe Idols, firſt or laſt, make their worſhippers aſhamed, Jer. 11. 13. According to the number of thy Cities were thy gods, O Judah, ye have ſet up altars to that ſhameful thing. Idolaters ſhall ſee at laſt how fooliſh they have been in worſhipping a ſtock or a ſtone, in adoring the invention of their own brains, which can do them no good in an evil day: every Idol is a ſhameful thing, becauſe it deceiveth its worſhippers: ſo every ſinful act will be like an Idol, matter of ſhame, becauſe every ſin is a deceit, Iſa. 26. They ſhall be aſhamed for their envy at my people: They ſhall ſee their envy againſt the people of God was unreaſonable, groundleſs and fruitleſs, therefore they ſhall be aſhamed; and if they ſhall be aſhamed of their envy againſt the people of God, how ſhall they be aſhamed of their oppoſition and injuries, of their oppreſſion and injuſtice, Iſa. 41. 11. Behold all they that were incenſed againſt thee ſhall be aſhamed. The Churches enemies glory in their own ſhame, and the Church ſhall glory in the ſhame of her enemies; therefore ſhe is called to behold it, as a piece of her glory. Obſerve further,

They that hate thee ſhall be clothed with ſhame, then, wicked men are haters of the righteous.

They are haters of God, therefore they muſt be haters of thoſe who have the Image of God upon them. As he that loves, ſo he that hates him that begets, hates him alſo that is begotten. Natural men are ſuch haters of holineſs, that they hate that which is but the Image, the Idol of holineſs, hypocriſie; they cannot endure a man who doth but ſeem religious. It is ſaid of the Panther, that he bears ſuch hatred againſt man, that if he ſee but the picture of a man, he will tear it to pieces. Many men have ſuch an hatred againſt true, real goodneſs, that they cannot abide the ſhadow or appearance of it.

And the dwelling place of the wicked ſhall come to nought.

We have met many paſſages to this purpoſe. Dwelling place, in the Hebrew, is a Tabernacle, becauſe they were wont to dwell in Tabernacles. And when he ſaith, His Tabernacle ſhall be brought to nought, the meaning is, His whole eſtate ſhall be brought to nought, not only the walls of his houſe ſhall be overthrown, but all his goods, his riches, his honours, his titles, his children, his relations, whatſoever is dear to him ſhall be brought to nought; the Hebrew is, It ſhall not be; it ſhall be, as if ſuch a thing had never been in the world. God will at laſt make an utter conſumption of wicked men. None who have Tabernacles in the world, ſhall long have a Tabernacle in the world. But the fall of theſe mens Tabernacles ſhall not be according to the condition of mortality only. As Moſes ſpeaks of Corah, Dathan, &c. Theſe men ſhall not die the common death of all men, a remarkable judgement ſhall overtake them. Some take Tabernacle, to note their religious duties, their worſhip and ſervice of God, and ſo their ſpiritual eſtate. Wicked men will ſerve God outwardly, they have their Tabernacles as well as the Saints, they pray, and hear, &c. But, be it a civil, or be it a religious Tabernacle, down it muſt, all their riches and all their religion ſhall come to nought.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Then Job anſwered, and ſaid,

I know it is ſo of a truth: but how ſhould man be juſt with God?

If he will contend with him, he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand.

He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in ſtrength: who hath hardned himſelf againſt him, and hath proſpered?

IN the former Chapter Bildad gave a threefold advice to Job.

Firſt, To think aright of the juſtice and judgments of God.

Secondly, To humble himſelf, and ſeek unto God.

Thirdly, (which is implied in both the former) To forbear complaining of his own troubled life, or deſiring the end of it by death.

To theſe three heads of Bildad's advice or reproof, Job ſhapes his anſwer in Chap. 9, 10.

Firſt, He opens his thoughts about, and highly magnifies the Juſtice of God, verſ. 21.

Secondly, He renounces his own righteouſneſs, and proves that no man is to be judged by the preſent dealings of God with him, from verſ. 12. to the end of the Chapter.

Thirdly, He renews and juſtifies his complaint againſt his life, and his wiſhes for death, by many arguments, in Chap. 10.

In moſt of theſe points he anſwers exactly, according to the ſtrict laws and rules of diſputation.

Firſt, Repeating his Opponents argument, and then yielding what was true, denying what was falſe, and diſtinguiſhing about what was doubtful. Which he doth with ſo much acuteneſs and vigour, with ſo much ſtrength and clearneſs both of reaſon and judgment, that one of the Ancients cries out upon the whole matter of his anſwer in theſe Chapters, O how much Phyloſophy (I may ſay, how much Logick) hath Job ſhewed in this reply to the argument of Bildad!

Quantum verba hæc præ ſe ferunt philoſophiæ. Chryſ.

Bildad's argument ſpeaks to this effect; God who hath puniſhed thee is juſt, therefore thou art unjuſt. Job in anſwer, grants the antecedent, but denies the conſequent. His grant of the antecedent appears in the two firſt verſes of the Chapter, I know it is ſo of a truth (I yield this) but how ſhould man be juſt with God? He proves and confirms that God is juſt, in verſ. 4. by a double medium.

Firſt, From his wiſdom, He is wiſe in heart. And Secondly, From his power, He is mighty in ſtrength. What force there is in theſe two Attributes to hold up the juſtice of God, we ſhall ſee afterwards.

The fourth verſe is likewiſe a conceſſion unto the ſecond part of Bildad's advice, namely, that Job ſhould humble himſelf. As if Job had ſaid, Thou adviſe me to humble my ſelf, and to ſeek unto God, it is moſt becoming I ſhould do ſo, for, he is wiſe in heart, and mighty in ſtrength; who hath hardned himſelf againſt him, and hath proſpered? There is no ſtanding out againſt God, and therefore I yield, I fall down and abaſe my ſelf before him.

That God is thus powerful and wiſe, he goes on to prove in the following parts of the Chapter to verſ. 22. by the enumeration of many particular acts and effects, both of his power and wiſdom.

The other part of his argument, namely, the conſequent, that therefore Job was unjuſt and wicked, he denies, and more, refutes it ſtrongly. His negation and refutation begin at verſ. 22. This is one thing, therefore I ſaid it, He deſtroyeth the righteous and the wicked. As if he had ſaid, This is no argument that I am a wicked man, becauſe God hath deſtroyed my eſtate, and my children; for God (in this ſence) deſtroyeth both the righteous and the wicked. It cannot be proved that I am wicked, becauſe God hath afflicted me, or, that God hath afflicted me for my wickedneſs: I know another way how to acquit the juſtice of God, and to declare him righteous, though I do not joyn with you in condemning and judging my ſelf (in your notion) unrighteous.

This is the ſum of his anſwer contained in Chap. 9.

In the tenth he renews his complaint, as before in the ſixth, and ſheweth (after he had given God glory under all his ſufferings) what great reaſon he had to be ſenſible under the pain and ſmart of his ſufferings.

Verſ. 1, 2. Then Job anſwered, and ſaid, I know it is ſo of a truth.

Thus he grants the antecedent, [I know it to be ſo of a truth] or, truly I know it to be ſo. The word hath a double force in it. Sometime of a bare, yet ſtrong aſſeveration, and ſometimes of an Oath. I know it to be ſo of a truth, I affirm or aver the thing, or truly and indeed, or verily I know the thing to be ſo. As if Job had ſaid, this is ſo much a truth, that I dare ſwear it is a truth, that God is juſt, I durſt take my oath of it, if I were called to it; I would ſwear for the juſtice of God, above all things in the world. As we ought to ſwear in truth (Pſal. 89. 49.) ſo to affirm a thing to be ſo in truth, is ſwearing.

אמנם Aſſeveratio quædam eſt rei ſibi bene exploratæ. Radix Amen, fidelem, ſtabilẽ, veracẽ eſſe, unde Amen.

Further, the word is taken either in way of affirmation, or in way of confirmation. In way of affirmation, it refers to that which is to be ſpoken; ſo frequently in the New Teſtament, Amen, Amen, verily, verily, is a vehement affirmation of what was afterwards to be ſpoken, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you. But here rather it is a note of confirmation of the truth already ſpoken: The Syriack of the New Teſtament uſes it commonly for an affirmation; the Hebrew in the Old, for a confirmation.

Amen duplicem habet ſenſum, 1. Ut ſit affirmatio eorum quæ dicturi ſumus. 2. Ut ſit confirmatio eorũ quæ jam dicta ſunt. Hebraicè innotare ſolet confirmationem. Syriacè in N. T. affirmationem. Bold.

So then, it is here a ſealing to the former truth delivered, both by Bildad and Eliphaz, about the juſtice of God; Eliphaz, in Chap. 4. verſ. 17. and Bildad, in Chap. 8. v. 3. Doth the Almighty pervert judgment? No (ſaith Job) I know it of a truth, that he doth not. And ſo the ſence runs thus.

Bildad, doeſt thou ſurmiſe, by what I have ſpoken, that I have ill or hard thoughts of the juſtice of God? Did I ever think that juſtice was perverted, becauſe I was afflicted? I acknowledge thou haſt truly ſaid, that God doth not pervert judgment; and I acknowledge thou haſt faithfully counſelled me to ſeek unto God, and make my ſupplication to the Almighty; for alas! who am I that I ſhould contend with God? What am I that I ſhould diſpute it out with him concerning my troubles, and his dealings with me? Or, if I ſhould be ſo raſh, ſo fool-hardy, and adventurous, to attempt ſuch a thing; alas! I could make nothing of it, I could not anſwer him one argument of a thouſand, whereby he might maintain his own juſtice; or to one charge and article of a thouſand, whereby he might impeach mine. I am no match for God. Therefore I yield thee the whole matter, ſo far as concerns the honouring of God in that great attribute of his juſtice, and the duty of weak man in humbling himſelf before that great God. I know it to be ſo of a truth. Note hence, > Firſt, That in all diſputes and controverſies it is a note both of an ingenuous and of an holy heart, to yield as much as without wrong to truth may be yielded unto.

It is good to agree as far as we can, if we cannot agree in all. We ſhould walk with an adverſary one mile (when it lies in our way) though we cannot walk twain. Aſſoon as Job hears a truth, he falleth down before it. He hath not a word to ſpeak againſt the truth of God, though it come from erroneous men. He will be a friend to truth, though brought by them who ſeem'd his enemies. If this law of diſputation were well obſerved, many diſputes would be ſooner ended. As ſome out of love to men, are apt to entertain their very errors; ſo ſome out of hatred to men reject their truths. Errors cannot be really adorned, nor truths ſoiled by thoſe who hold them. Our judgment about both muſt be carried by reaſon, not ſwayed by affection. Willingly to embrace and receive a truth from thoſe, whoſe errors we moſt zealouſly oppoſe, is the due temper of a champion for the truth.

Jobus veritatis fidiſſimus aſſertor, qui omnia ratione, non affectionis ſenſu, metitur; tam ingenuè fatetur & commendat vera quæ ab impugnatoribus promuntur, quam generoſè falſa depellit, quod hoc præſertim capite liquidò demonſtrat, dum verum duorum diſputatorum aſſertum, non admittit modo, verum elegantiſſimè & deſertiſſimè integro ferè capite amplificat & exornat. Pined.

Secondly, I know it to be ſo of a truth, ſaith Job, Obſerve,

A godly man is a knowing man.

He is eſtabliſhed in truths, eſpecially in great and neceſſary truths, in the vitals and fundamentals of religion, Job had been long acquainted with this principle, that God is juſt, and that every man muſt abaſe himſelf before him, how juſt ſoever any man is. Light is the firſt thing which God makes in the new creation of Grace, as it was in the old creation of Nature: He caſts in a beam, a ray into the ſoul, whereby we may diſcern of things that differ. There may be darkneſs in a godly man, but he dwells not in darkneſs: bring a truth to him, and as there is ſomewhat in his heart that anſwers and is a kin to it, ſo that apprehends and makes out his acquaintance with it, often at firſt ſight, alwayes after conſideration, unleſs he be under clouds and temptations. In thoſe caſes we may bring truths to holy men, which they do not know to be ſo of a truth, yea, which they may refuſe for errors. But uſually a good man knows truth, having learnt it before, or as having a likeneſs to other truths he knew before.

Thirdly, I know this to be ſo of a truth (ſaith Job) in the midſt of his pains, in the greateſt troubles of his fleſh, he forgets not to honour God. Hence obſerve,

A gracious heart gives teſtimony to the righteouſneſs of God, though ſeverely chaſtened under the hand of God.

When God deals moſt hardly with the ſoul, or with the body, or with ſoul and body, a holy heart hath not a hard thought of God, I know it to be ſo of a truth; He doth not only acknowledge that God was juſt, when he puniſhed others, but when he afflicted him. The common argument which the friends of Job took up to prove God to be juſt, was this: God is righteous, for he deals with men according to their deſerts: but Job argues thus, God is righteous, however he deals with men, and whatſoever thoſe men are, let men be wicked or upright, holy or prophane. When we ſee God breaking the wicked, and making gall and worm-wood, fire and brimſtone the portion of their cup; this argues his juſtice, becauſe he hath threatned ſuch with his wrath and vengeance. But the Saints go further, they proceed upon purer and ſublimer principles, maintaining that God is juſt, though he afflicts the juſteſt and holieſt man upon Earth. The righteouſneſs of God ſhines forth to them throw the darkeſt ſufferings of righteous men. The righteouſneſs of God is not grounded upon the object about which he dealeth, whether righteous or unrighteous, but upon the act of his own will, yea upon the pleaſure of his own will. His righteouſneſs proceedeth from himſelf, and he is a righteous act, what ever the object be upon which he acts. We need not ſay, God is juſt, becauſe he puniſhes the guilty; for God is juſt, though he afflict the innocent. We may at once maintain our own innocency, and the juſtice of God, while we bleed under his hand, or ſmart under his ſevereſt ſcourges. I know it to be ſo of a truth;

But how ſhall man be juſt with God?

Illud cum Deo vel ante Deum erit aliquid ſecundum & judiciale.

Mr. Broughton reads, And how can man be juſt before the Omnipotent? And ſo the ſence runs more clear, taking the firſt particle for a pure copulative, whereas we read it as a diſcretive, but how ſhall man be juſt before God? Namely, in your ſence, as if he had ſaid, you diſcourſe of juſtice under ſuch a notion as renders it impoſſible for any man to be juſt before God; in one ſence a man may be righteous before God, but in yours no man can. Would you not have a man know himſelf to be juſt, unleſs he know himſelf to be without ſin? If you take juſt, to be the ſame as without in-dwelling ſin, then it is impoſſible for any man to appear juſt before God: but man may be juſt and righteous before God, though he have ſin dwelling in him, and that's my notion of juſtice in this diſpute.

Juſtice is either inherent or imputed. By inherent juſtice no man is juſt before God: according to imputed juſtice, man may be juſt, and is before God. So theſe two propoſitions are reconciled, No man is juſt before God: every believer is juſt before God. Our tranſlation uſing the diſcretive, But, ſeems to carry this intendment, that no man can be juſt before God by inherent juſtice, which the next verſe implies, For if he contend with him, he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand.

The words taken in this ſence are the ſame with Chap. 4. verſ. 17. Shall mortal men be more juſt then God? There Eliphaz ſpeaks comparatively, in a way of exceſs, more juſt, or juſt rather then God: He cannot exceed God in any thing. Here Job ſpeaks comparatively in a way of equality, How ſhould man be juſt with God? He cannot compare with God at all. Yet the ſence is the ſame, and the denial of mans perfect inherent righteouſneſs is the ſubject of both. A juſt man comparing with God deprives himſelf of all his juſtice. He is not ſo much as man may be, by aſpiring to be what God is. But I need not ſtay in any further clearing, how man is not juſt before God, or in any obſervations from it, but ſhall refer the Reader back to Chap. 4.

Quiſquis ſe authori bonorũ comparat, bono ſe quod acceperat privat, ea ipſa ratione, qua quis ſe componit Deo juſtus eſſe deſinit, quãvis juſtus fuerit. Greg.

Only take this from it, How ſhall man be juſt with God? With God; that is looking upon, or comparing himſelf unto God; as if he had ſaid, It will take down all the proud and high thoughts of man, in regard of his own juſtice and righteouſneſs, if he will but caſt his eye upon God, and duly conſider how juſt and righteous God is. Hence obſerve,

The way for us to humble our ſelves for our own ſinfulneſs, is to look up and to conſider the purity and holineſs of God.

If we ſet our ſelves before him, we ſhall ſee how vile and corrupt we are. His fulneſs will convince us abundantly of our emptineſs, his purity will ſhew us our ſpots, and his all-ſufficiency our nothingneſs. If we bring a courſe piece of cloth before a fine, we ſhall ſee what courſe ſtuff it is: if we lay a better in any kind by a worſe, the worſe will appear worſer then before. For the moſt part we who are courſe ſtuff our ſelves, compare our ſelves with thoſe who are as courſe as our ſelves. While ſome men compare themſelves with men, they begin to think they are like God himſelf. A man looking upon his neighbour is juſt before him, or ſees him no better then himſelf, of no purer threed, of no better die in his life then he; I have faults, and ſo have others; I have failings, and ſo have my neighbours; if you charge me with my ſinnings, who is it that is without ſin? As our uſual phraſe is, If the beſt mans faults were written in his fore-head, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes. Thus uſually men compare themſelves with men: but if they would look up to God, O how would the thoughts of their hearts fall, and be abaſed before him. The Phariſee could pride himſelf in his compariſons with men (Luke 18.) God be-thanked I am not as other men are, nor as this Publican. But Phariſee, art thou as God? Pure, and holy, and juſt as he? Look upwards, and pride will down. The holy Apoſtle (2 Cor. 10. 12.) ſpeaking of thoſe falſe Apoſtles, ſaith, They meaſuring themſelves by themſelves, and comparing themſelves amongſt themſelves, are not wiſe. So we may ſay to men in general, while ye take a ſcantling of your own wayes, by your own rules, and meaſure your ſelves by your ſelves, or while ye meaſure man by man, and compare creature with creature, ye are not wiſe; while we go this way to work pride will not down. Man hath ſome reaſon to ſay, I am as good as man, I have ſinned, and ſo hath he, ſuch a man hath as many ſins as I. But if we look up to God, we ſhall quickly find that he hath no ſin at all in him, and that we have no goodneſs at all in us. The beſt of Saints muſt not only confeſs, with Paul, I know that in me (that is, in my fleſh) dwelleth no good thing, Rom. 7. 18. but he muſt confeſs alſo, I know that in me, even in my ſpirit dwells no good thing, in compariſon of the goodneſs of God. Though man in regeneration is made a partaker of the divine nature (2 Pet. 14.) yet his nature cannot bear the perfections fections of the divine nature. How ſhall man be juſt before God?

Verſ. 3. If he will contend with him, he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand.

This is a confirmation of the former grant. I (ſaith he) acknowledge no man can be juſt, by inherent righteouſneſs before God. For, If he would contend with him, he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand.

רפץ Voluit, optavit.

If he would contend.] The word, If he would, is, If he have a mind, or delight to contend, if any man takes pleaſure in contending with God, he ſhall quickly (as we ſpeak) have his hand full, and his belly full of it.

From this word the Church is called Hephzibah, that is, my pleaſure is in her (Iſa. 64. 2. & Pſal. 16. 3.) David profeſſes of the Saints (Hephzibam) my pleaſure, or, my delight is in them. So here, if any one hath a pleaſure, or a delight, or would take upon him to contend with God, or (as the word ſignifies) to chide, to argue and plead with God. The word may be taken either for an angry chiding, or a rational chiding, which is diſputing. The place where the Iſraelites did contend or chide with Moſes, is called Meribah, from this word, Exod. 17. 7. And after Gideon had pull'd down Baal's altar, a great controverſie or contention, a pleading or arguing enſued, therefore he was called Jerubbaal, a contender or pleader with Baal, Judg. 6. 21.

רוב In foro & extra litigavit, diſceptavit, cauſam egit, ſeu dixit, etiam jurgavit, de verbali tantum contentione ſeu actione dicitur. Merc. Contentio hæc, eſt rationibus, objectionibus, reſponſionibus, argumentationibus cum Deo agere. Pined.

Now (ſaith Job) if a man take delight to contend, plead or argue with the Lord, What will be the iſſue of it? He is like to have a cold pull of it, He cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand, poor creature! Before I open that, take this obſervation, Man naturally loves to be contending.

Some cannot live but in this fire, and in troubled waters, 1 Cor. 11. 16. If any man ſeems to be contentious, or as the Greek carries it, lover of victory. Contentious ſpirits love victory more then truth, and to overcome more then to teach or be taught. Beſides the Verb, which we (in the Text of the Apoſtle, tranſlate ſeems, doth rather ſignifie, is to be, deſires, or hath a will to be contentious, yea, boaſts and prides himſelf in it. So the word (δοκῶ) is uſed, Matth. 3. 9. & Gal. 6. 3. If a man think himſelf to be ſomething, &c. That is, if he boaſt and take upon him as if he were ſome great man. Thus ſome glory to be medling and contending in all Queſtions. Yea, though it be upon as unequal terms, as Jehoaſh the King of Iſrael, by his parable, ſuppoſed Amaziah King of Judah would War with him, (2 King. 14. 9.) The thiſtle that was in Lebanon, ſent to the Cedar that was in Lebanon, &c. Thiſtles will ſometimes challenge Cedars; whom we may counſel as he doth, tarry at home, why ſhouldſt thou meddle to thy hurt? It argues folly enough in any man to love contention with man, and pride enough to love contention with men above him. Then how mad are they both with folly and pride, who attempt to contend with God? Whom, as it follows, They cannot anſwer, Vilem hominum conditionem judex contemnet. Polyc. Tantum non eſt homo, ut Deus eũ ſua reſponſione dignetur. Vitabl. Illud non poterit, idem erit quod nolet, vel per tranſpoſitionẽ verborũ, poterit non reſpondere.

One of a thouſand.] A thouſand is a great number, a full number, and therefore it is put for all great numbers. It is a leading number, therefore the word in Hebrew for a thouſand cometh from a root which ſignifies to lead, and the Noun, a Duke or a Captain, who is a chief and a leader of men, Gen. 36. The Dukes of Edom, or the leaders of Edom, As alſo a maſter or teacher, becauſe he goes afore, and is a chief over thoſe he inſtructs. And hence the number thouſand in the Hebrew hath it's name, becauſe a thouſand, is (as it were) a Prince among numbers, a chief number, a Captain number; and is therefore put for all great numbers, or for the greateſt number that can be imagined: to ſay, One of a thouſand, is as much as to ſay, One amongſt all. One is not a number, it is but the ſeed, principle or beginning of number; a unity hath a ſeminal vertue in it; all numbers are made out of ones, but one it ſelf is no number. So that to ſay, one of a thouſand, is to put the greateſt and the leaſt number in oppoſition, it is as much as to ſay, a man cannot anſwer God in any thing that ever he did in the whole courſe of his life (2 Pet. 3, 8.) One day is with the Lord as a thouſand years, and a thouſand years as one day. When he ſaith a thouſand years, he means all years, all time put together, is but as one day to the Lord. A day was the firſt diſtinction of time; the firſt perfect time that was created, was a day: now put a thouſand years together, it is but as one day to the Lord; All times and one time are all one to him who inhabits eternity. In Pſal. 90. 6. it is, a thouſand years are but as yeſterday, which notes all time paſt, as Peter notes, all time to come, is but as one day.

Unitas huic numero oppoſita pro nihilo habetur.

One of a thouſand, referred to a perſon, notes a choice, excellent man, among all men (Job 33. 23.) If there be an interpreter, one among a thouſand, one choiſe man amongſt many, or amongſt all. He that rightly expounds the Text of a troubled conſcience, and interprets the mind of God to ſuch a ſoul, is a chief, the flower of a thouſand, a man of men. Chriſt (Cant. 5. 5.) is called the chiefeſt of ten thouſand, the Hebrew is, a Standard bearer, ſuch are choiſe men, elect of the multitude, Chriſt is the elect of all the multitudes in the whole world; bring all Armies of men together, or an Army of man-kind, choſe amongſt them all, and you cannot find ſuch an other as Chriſt is, he is the choice of ten thouſand, that is, the choiſe of all the thouſands that are in the world.

He cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand.

He cannot anſwer.] Some refer it only to the perſon. He, that is, one man of a thouſand men, is not able to anſwer God.

Secondly, We may refer it to the matter, to the objections or charges, that ſhall be brought againſt him, he cannot anſwer to one thing of a thouſand. So Mr. Broughton, as if he had ſaid, If God brings many charges, or layes many articles againſt him, he is not able to ſatisfie God, or give a good account in one.

Thirdly, Some refer it to God himſelf, If he (that is, man) ſhould contend with him, he would not anſwer him one of a thouſand; that is, God would not anſwer him one of a thouſand: as if he had ſaid, the matters will be ſo trivial and ſo ſleight, the charges that a man can bring againſt God, or the objections he can make, will be ſo eaſie, that the Lord will not vouchſafe to anſwer one word of a thouſand. Some men will plead priviledge to ſome charges, and all their anſwer ſhall be, they may chuſe, or it is at their liberty whether they will anſwer or no. Here He would not (referred to God) is as much as he need not, he is no way obliged to anſwer, he may claim priviledge. Further, when arguments are poor and empty, a man will ſay in diſpute, Theſe things are not worth the anſwering; or of a book, there is not one page that is worth a confutation, it carries its own confutation. Such a ſence may be made out here, God will not diſhonour himſelf by contending with ſo weak an adverſary as man, or by anſwering ſuch ſimple arguments.

Rogatus homo in judicio divino, hæſitabit, æſtuabit obmutescet.

But rather (as before) refer it to man, He cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand; that is, if God come to queſtion man, to lay ſuch and ſuch matters to his charge, or object againſt him, poor creature, he muſt ſhut his mouth, put up his books, he hath nothing to ſay, he muſt hide his face, For he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand. So in verſ. 14. of this Chapter. How much leſs ſhall I anſwer him, and chuſe out my words to plead with him? Hence obſerve,

First, That there is in man a ſpirit ready to contend againſt God himſelf.

If he contend with him, or, if he plead with him, which ſuppoſes that there is ſuch a principle of pride in the heart of man. The heart of man is very full of quarrels and contentions with man, but fuller of quarrels with God himſelf. The great controverſie between God and man, is, whoſe will ſhall ſtand, Gods will or mans. God directs man one way, and man contendeth he will go another way. There is a natural unanſwerableneſs between the heart of man, and every thing that God doth or ſpeaks; hence it is that man calls God ſo often to anſwer. There is a contention, firſt, about that work of God, the foundation-ſtone of all the works of God, his decrees and counſels. While the Apoſtle (Rom. 9. 20.) ſtops ſo much mouths, he ſhews how ready they are to open, O man, Who art thou that replyeſt againſt God? Thou wilt ſay, wherefore doth he complain? Thus man begins to contend. But, O man, who art thou, that thou ſhouldſt dare to reply upon God?

Wilt

Wilt thou be venturing to queſtion the righteous God? Muſt he be accountable to thee for what he did before thou hadſt a being?

Secondly, What contentions are there continually about the rules which God gives man to order his life by? Man thinks this is an unreaſonable rule, that's a hard rule, and a third is an unprofitable rule; how many riſe up againſt the Law, to which they ſhould ſubmit, and would ſhift off obedience to the rule, by complaints againſt it? The carnal mind (or, the minding of the fleſh) is enmity againſt God, it is not ſubject to the Law of God, neither indeed can be (Rom. 8. 7.) Words importing higheſt oppoſition, and that, irreconcilable. It is not, it cannot be ſubject; the mind is never ſubject to the Law, till it be changed into the Law. Chriſt ſaith, that one iota or tittle of the Law ſhall not paſs, till all be fulfilled; it is as true, that not one iota or tittle of the Law can be fulfilled by us, till our carnal minds paſs away. Paul found juſt as much ſtubbornneſs and contrariety againſt the will of God remaining in him, as there was of a carnal mind remaining in him (Rom. 7.) As man deſires not the knowledge of the will of God (Job 21. 14.) and ſecretly wiſhes, that he were ignorant of what he knows, ſo he wiſhes there were no ſuch thing to be known; and that the revealed will of God were leſs by ſo much, as it ſpecially oppoſeth his will.

Thirdly, The conteſt about providence grows as high in the hearts of men, as that about predeſtination to life, or the rule of life. The Saints ſometimes (modeſtly) enter this controverſie, Let me plead with thee, ſaith Jeremy, Chap. 12. 1. He doth it, we ſee, with a great deal of trembling and ſubmiſſion; he ſeems to ask leave before he doth it. Hypocrites contend with God proudly about their own good works (*Iſa.*58.3.) Wherefore have we faſted, and thou ſeeſt not? As if they had done ſo well, that God himſelf could not mend it. Carnal men plead with God profanely about his works; as if he had done ſo ill, that they could mend it. Ye ſay, the way of the Lord is not equal: hear now, O houſe of Iſrael, is not my way equal? Are not your wayes unequal? Ezek. 18. 25. They charged God with ill dealing, becauſe he puniſhed them who did evil. Wherefore will ye plead with me? ye all have tranſgreſſed againſt me, ſaith the Lord (Jer. 2. 29.) they began to plead with God about his diſpenſations, as if he had been unrighteous or rigorous; Wherefore will ye plead with me? I will plead with you, ſaith God, verſ. 9. God may plead and contend with man, but ſhall man plead and contend with God? Ye have all ſinned and tranſgreſſed againſt me; that's enough to ſtop your mouths; I can anſwer you with one word, Ye are a company of ſinners, then plead not with me. Plead with your mother, plead, Hoſ. 2. 2. let man plead with man, man with his neighbour. The wit of one man may compare with the wit of another, and their juſtice may hold plea with one another. But neither the juſtice, nor the wit of man, will ſerve him to plead with God. That is a ſecond obſervation, Man is not able to maintain his cauſe, and hold plea, either againſt the works of God, or for his own.

If he diſpute with God in the Schools, or Fee an advocate to implead him at the bar, he is not able to anſwer him one of a thouſand (Iſa. 45. 9.) Woe be to him that ſtriveth with his maker; it is this word, Woe be to him that contendeth with his maker, for he ſhall not be able to make out one argument, or prove any thing againſt him; ſuch a man is in a ſad condition, wo unto him. David prayes, *Pſal.*143.2. Enter not into judgment with thy ſervant, for in thy ſight ſhall no fleſh living be juſtified; As if he had ſaid, Lord, if the holieſt and pureſt, if the beſt of men ſhould come and ſtand before thee in judgment, or plead with thee, they could not be juſtified: therefore David was ſo far from contending with God, that he deprecates Gods contending with him, enter not into judgment with thy ſervant: ſuch a charge is laid upon Job (Chap. 33. 13.) Why doſt thou ſtrive with him? for he giveth not an account of any of his matters. And if he ſhould condeſcend to give an account, can any man gain by it? The Lord argues ſo convincingly, That every mouth muſt be ſtopped, and all the world become guilty before God, Rom. 3. 19. Every mouth ſhall be ſtopped, when God opens his. When God ſpeaks, man hath nothing to ſay againſt him, Every mouth is ſtopped, with this one word, Man is a ſinner. The Apoſtle points at ſome (Tit. 1. 11.) Whoſe mouths muſt be ſtopped, he means, with reaſon to convince them that they are in an error. By this one argument, That all men are ſinners, God ſtops their mouths for ever.

Thirdly, By way of corollary, we may give you that general truth,

That no man can be juſtified by his works.

If we contend with him, we cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand: He that mixeth but one ſin with a thouſand good actions, cannot be juſtified by his works; how then ſhall he be juſtified by works, who hath not one perfectly good action amongſt a thouſand ſins? Man is not able to anſwer for one thing he doth of a thouſand, no not for one thing he doth of all that he hath done. He that would be juſtified by his works, muſt not have one ill action amongſt all his actions. One flie in the box of ointment corrupts all, one defect makes a ſinner, but many good actions cannot make one righteous: If our hearts condemn us, God is greater then our heart (1 Joh. 3. 20.) Should man contend with his own heart, that will condemn him, his own heart would bring a thouſand witneſſes againſt him ſooner then one for him. Conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes; man cannot anſwer before that tribunal; how much leſs can he anſwer God, Who is greater then all our hearts, and knoweth all things! That's the argument Job goes on with, to prove that man cannot be juſtified before God.

Verſ. 4. He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in ſtrength, who hath hardened himſelf againſt him, and hath proſpered?

Which words are a further illuſtration both of the juſtice of God, and of mans duty to be humbled and abaſed before him.

He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in ſtrength.

Here is a double proof in theſe words.

A proof, firſt of Gods juſtice; why? He is wiſe in heart, therefore he knows how to do right: He is mighty in ſtrength or power, therefore he needs not pervert judgment, or do wrong for fear of man. Fear of a higher power uſually biaſſeth thoſe who are in power. Here are two Attributes which keep the balances of divine judgment in a due poiſe, He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in power, therefore there is no turning of him out of the path of juſtice. Integerrimus judex cui nec ſapientia ad judicandũ, nec potentia ad exequendum deeſt.

Secondly, It is a proof or a confirmation of the other point about which Bildad adviſeth Job, namely, that he ought to ſeek unto God, and humble himſelf before him, it would be dangerous to contend or conteſt with God. Why? He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in power. As if he had ſaid, Shall ignorant, fooliſh man contend with the wiſe God? Shall weak man contend with the mighty God? Alas! man is no match for God, He is wiſe in heart, and mighty in ſtrength, who can enter ſuch a controverſie and proſper in it?

There are two wayes to carry on a controverſie.

Firſt, By wit and policy.

Secondly, By ſtrength and power. If man will take up the former weapon againſt God, if he work by wit, and diſpute againſt God, God will be too hard for him, For he is wiſe in heart. If man will ſet his ſhoulders, or take up weapons againſt God, poor creature, what can he do? The Lord is mighty in ſtrength; from both we ſee there is no dealing with him.

Theſe two attributes render God at once the moſt dreadful adverſary, and the moſt deſirable friend. It is a hard choice whether to have wit or power in an enemy? And who would not have both wit and power in his friend? God is here repreſented under theſe two notions, both meet in him, either of which in an enemy render him dreadful. Will any man enter the liſts, or meddle with an adverſary (who would not rather humble himſelf, and make him his friend?) Who is wiſe in heart, and mighty in power? Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requiret?

He is wiſe in heart.] It is ſpoken after the manner of men; the heart natural is a principal organ or part of the body, it is the ſeat of life, thither the ſpirits have their recourſe, there they have one ſpecial ſeat of reſidence; the Humanitus dictum, cor in Hebræo ſumitur pro judicio & intellectuali potentia, ita homo vel Deus ſapiens corde dicitur, qui præſtat ſapientia. Pined.

heart is chief in man. To say, God is wise in heart, is to say, He is most wise, because the heart is the seat of wisdom. As when we say of a man, he is holy in heart, or he is humble in heart, or upright in heart, or he obeys God from his heart, we report such a man for exceeding humble, holy, upright, and obedient. So when God is said to be wise in heart, it imports that he hath infinite wisdom; his, is not only wisdom in the tongue, or some flashes of wit, but deep, solid, rooted wisdom: He is wise, yea, he is wisdom at heart. A foolish man is without an heart. As an hypocrite hath two hearts, a double heart, an heart and an heart; so a foolish man hath never an heart. Hypocrites will be found at last to have no hearts, they are the greatest fools of all. Ephraim (Hos. 7. 11.) is called, a silly Dove without heart. Silliness is heartlessness. Therefore in Chap. 12. of this Book, vers. 3. the heart is put alone for understanding, I have an heart as well as you (saith Job) we translate it, I have understanding as well as you. Heart alone notes wisdom, but a wise heart notes abundance of wisdom. Hence observe,

God is infinitely wise.

He is wise in heart, wisdom it self. The Lord ingrosses all wisdom, and therefore stiled by the Apostle, God only wise. (1 Tim. 1. 17.) he is only wise, because all wisdom is his; the creature hath none but what he gives out; he hath it all locked up in his own treasury, and as he dispenseth it, so man receives it.

There is a two fold act of wisdom, and both most eminent in God. The first is, knowledge in the nature of of things. The second is, knowledge how to order and dispose of things. The former is properly called Science; and the latter Prudence. Where there is much of the former, and a want of the latter, man in that case is like a ship that hath a very large sail, but wants a rudder to order its course, and ballast to poise it. Both these meet in the Lord: he hath (as we may say) a vast sail, infinitely extending to the knowledge of all things: and hath a most exact rudder, and ballast of prudence, to order and to manage all things. The knowledge of some men is too hard for their wisdom, they are not master of their knowledge, though they may be masters in their art. The Lord knows all, and he rules all his knowledge.

And mighty in strength.] It is much for man, to be stiled strong or mighty; but mighty in strength, is the stile of God. These in construction note the Almightiness, the All-powerfulness, the All-sufficiency of the Lord; he is not only strong or mighty, but mighty in strength.

כוח Differt à חיל quod strenuitatem ad gesta præclara significat, idem quod Gracè δύναμις, quæ se foras exerit in opera. Merc.

The word which we translate strength (referred to man) imports that natural power, and lively vigor which in man is the principle of strength, which nurses and feeds man with continual supplies of activity. The Lord is mighty in this strength, he hath an infinite, an everlasting spring of strength in him, he spends no strength at all, how much soever he uses. His lamp consums not with burning. His strength is ever vigorous, he knows no decayes or faintings, Hast thou not known, hast thou not heard that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary? (Isa. 40. 28.) As if he had said, where hast thou been bred, that thou seemest to be a stranger to this truth? Man cannot do much, and he faints in doing a little. God who can do all things, never faints, how much soever he doth.

Strength may be considered two wayes. There is Civil strength, and there is Natural strength. Civil strength is authority and power to command. A man is armed and strengthened by Laws and Commissions. These put authority into his hands. The Lord is mighty in his strength, he hath all authority, all command in his hand, not by commission from others, but original from himself. Natural strength executes and exercises the former; a man may have much Civil strength, but if he want Natural strength, to put it in act, he can do little or nothing. As God by his Soveraignty is above all creatures; so by his power he is able to bring all creatures under him, and subdue them to his command. Thus God is mighty in strength. He hath a right of authority, by which he may, and an arm of power, by which he can make all stoop to him.

Nexus Stoic.

Hence observe: The power of God is an infinite power.

There is nothing too hard for the Lord. If he will work who shall let it? Isa. 43. 13. No creature can supersedeat or stay the works of God, God can supersedeat all creatures; when creatures are in their full carreer, he can let them: The power of God is as large as his will; yea, he can do more then he wills. If the power of men were as large as their wills, what work would they quickly make in the world? If infinite strength were not mannaged by infinite wisdom, what a woful condition were we in? Both these are joyned in God. Therefore we can fear no hurt from his power: he can do what he will, but he will do nothing which is hurtful to his people; he will not wrong any creature, much less his servants. The Lord (if I may so speak) is only weak about those things, which proceed from weakness. There are some things which he hath no strength to do, because to do them argues a want of strength: he cannot deny himself, he cannot lie, he cannot do any evil, he cannot sin. These things import impotency, therefore the Lord cannot do them. But whatsoever is for the good of his people, for the glory of his Name, for the executing of justice, for the fulfilling of his counsels, whatsoever is for the making good of promises, for all these the Lord is mighty in strength. Never fear either a defect of power in God, or a defect in mannaging that power. Sometimes power overthrows it self by its own bulk and greatness; but mighty strength ordered with equal wisdom, is dreadful to enemies, and comfortable to friends. A rude rout, an undigested Chaos of men, though very great, never did any great thing. But suppose a very numerous Army of men, and every man in that Army having as much wisdom as would fit a General to lead and command them all, what could stand before them? Thus it is with God (and how admirable is the union and marriage of these two together!) he hath all power and all wisdom. Every degree of power in God is acted with a sutable degree of wisdom; therefore there can be no miscariage.

Vis consilii expers mole ruit sua.

Note further, how this Attribute runs through all the Attributes of God, He is mighty in strength; he is mighty also in truth, mighty in love, mighty in mercy, mighty in faithfulness; a mighty strength is in whatsoever God is.

Again, Take this general concerning all the Attributes of God, when it is said, He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength, &c. These are not qualities in God, they are in men. Wisdom is to them an accident, and so is strength, whether civil strength or natural, it may be severed from them, and they still keep their being; but the wisdom of God is the wise God, and the power of God is the powerful God, and the knowledge of God is the knowing God. These Attributes are not accidents, but his essence; not qualities, but his nature.

From both these Attributes laid together, Job draws down his great conclusion, which he puts by way of question,

Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?

Shew me the man: Having described the Lord in his wisdom and power, he chalengeth all the world, and sends defiance to all creatures in heaven and in earth, to meet with this God. As if he had said, Friends, Do ye think I have any thought to contend with God? No, I know not one who hath accepted this chalenge, or hardened himself against God and prospered. If my own conscience would not, yet their harms who have attempted it, might warn me from such presumption.

Hardened himself.] Hardening, under a natural consideration, comes by withdrawing the moisture out of any substance, whence the parts of it are condensed, grow stiff and unyielding to the touch: So Philosophers define it. That is hard which doth not easily submit to impressions from without.

קשה Indurare aut obdurescere. Metaphorice à tactu ad alios sensus transfertur, & denotat crudum, difficile, quod durat difficile.

In a moral sence, to harden, is to settle the spirit, or immoveably to resolve upon the doing or not doing of a thing; when a man doth purposely resolve and resolvedly purpose to carry on a design, he hardeneth himself to do it. The word is used both in a good sence, and in an ill sence. In a good sence, when a man is resolute to do the will of God, that is, when he grows so resolved, that he will not be removed by hopes, or fears, by promises, or by threats; When a man hath not a soft, sequacious spirit, to be swayed this way and that way, but stands fixed and firm like a rock, such a resolute spirit in goodness, is a spirit hardened to do good.

When the Lord had told Ezekiel that he should find the ears of Israel lock'd against his messages, and their hearts hardened; he gives him assurance of a sutable ability to deal even with such (Ezek. 3. 8, 9.) Behold, I have made thy face strong against their faces, and thy fore-head strong against their fore-heads, as an adamant harder then flint have I made thy fore-head. The words seem to carry an allusion to Bulls or Rams, who use to run head against head, when they are enraged against one another. And so the sence is, as if the Lord had said, I know this people will be mad at thee, and run upon thee like furious beasts; but trouble not thy self, I will (through my grace) make thee as strong in declaring my will, as they (through pride and unbelief) are strong in opposing it. Thou needest not fear to encounter these Bulls and Rams: holiness shall make thy fore-head, that is, thy purpose to perform my command, harder, then wickedness shall make their fore-heads, that is, their purposes to disobey what I command. As to be hardened in sin is worse then sinning, so to be hardened in doing good, is better then doing good. Sin and grace act most like themselves, when they act against all opposition. As an adamant have I made thy face. The adamant is insuperable, as the notation of the word imports. A heart thus hardened in holiness overcomes all the fears and terrors which the world can raise against it. Heroical Luther was thus hardened, when he said, he would go to Worms, though the tiles upon every house in that City were match'd with a like number of Devils, ready to resist him and the truth of Christ. But usually hardening is taken in an ill sence: and so to harden the spirit, noteth, Adamas ejus creditur esse naturæ, ut domet omnia neq; ipse ab ulla vi sive arte domari possit. Unde nomen traxit; ἄδαμας, sonat indomitũ. Sanct. in Ezek. 3.

Obdurare cor est Deũ loquentem nolle audire, contemnere, pervicaciter resistere, nec se ejus verbo subjicere velle. Par. in Heb. 3. v. 8.

First, A resolving to sin, whatsoever God saith or doth. To sin against the word and works of God, that's hardening of the heart against God: when a man will go on in his way, though a threat be sounding in his ears, and a judgment appear terribly before his eyes; such a man is hardened indeed, he is grown valiant and couragious in wickedness.

Secondly, A man hardens himself against God, when he speaks stoutly against God: the hardness of the heart appears in the tongue (Mal. 3. 13.) Your words have been stout against me. Stout words are a sign of stout spirits. Our language is usually the image of our minds. So the word of the Text is used (2 Sam. 19. 43.) The words of the men of Judah were fiercer then the words of the men of Israel: Their words were harder then the words of the men of Israel; they spake more resolutely and manly. When a man sets himself to speak boldly against God, the wayes or the works of God, he hardens himself against God fearfully.

Thirdly, We harden our selves against God, when we are displeased with what God doth; that man makes a bold adventure, who dares pass but an unpleasing thought against the wayes or works of God.

Fourthly, Not to be satisfied with what God doth is a degree of hardening our selves against God: discontents and unquietnesses upon our spirits are oppositions.

Fifthly, Not to give God glory in what he doth, hath somewhat in it of hardening of our selves against God.

And lastly, He that will not give God glory in what he commands, is in a degree hardened against God. We may see what it is to harden our selves against God by the opposite of it (Prov. 28. 14.) Blessed is the man that feareth always, but he that hardeneth himself shall fall into mischief. Hardness is contrary to holy fear; holy fear is a disposition of heart, ready to yield to God in every thing: A man thus fearing, quickly takes impressions of the word, will, and works of God; and therefore whosoever doth not comply with God in holy submission to his will, hardens himself in part against God.

That which is here chiefly meant is, the grosser act of hardness, when men either speak or go on in their way acting against God; let him say what he will, his word stops them not; or do what he will, his works stop them not. They are like the adamant, the hammer of the Word makes no impression upon hard hearts, but recoyls back again upon him that strikes with it. More distinctly; this is either a sensible hardness of heart, of which the Church complains (Isa. 63. 15.) Wherefore hast thou hardened our hearts? &c. Or an insensible hardness, which in some arises from ignorance, in others from malice and obstinacy.

Further, We read of Gods hardening mans heart, and sometimes of mans hardening his own heart. There is a three-fold hardness of heart.

First, Natural, which is the common stock of all men; we receive the stone of a hard heart by descent; every man comes into the world hardened against God.

Secondly, There is an acquired hardness of heart. Men harden themselves, and add to their former hardness. He stretcheth out his hand against God, and strengtheneth himself against the Almighty, Job 15. 25. There is a growth in sin, as well as a growth in grace; many acts make hardness more habitual (2 Chron. 36. 13.) He stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart from turning unto the Lord. I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck, Deut. 31. 27.

Thirdly, There is a judiciary hardness of heart, an hard heart inflicted by God, as a judge, When men will harden their hearts against God, he agrees it, their hearts shall be hard, he will take away all the means which should soften and moisten them, he will not give them any help to make them pliable to his will, or he will not bless it to them. He will speak to his Prophets, and they shall make their hearts fat (that is, senseless) and their ears heavy, that is, heedless under all they speak, Isa. 6. 10. Thus also God hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and of the Ægyptians, by the ministery of Moses and Aaron.

So then we having hardness of heart by nature, do by custom acquire a farther hardness, and the Lord in wrath inflicteth hardness, then the sinner is pertinacious in sinning. All these put together make him irrecoverably sinful, His neck is an iron sinew, and his brow brass, Isa. 48. 4. Observe,

First, There is an active hardness of heart, or man hardens his own heart.

Exod. 5. We read of Pharaoh hardening his heart, before the Lord hardened it; Who is the Lord (saith he) that I should let Israel go? Here was Pharaoh hardening his heart, and steeling his spirit against the command of God; God sent him a command to let Israel go; he replies, Who is the Lord? I know not the Lord; who is this that takes upon him to command me? Am not I King of Ægypt? I know no Peer, much less Superior Lord. It was true indeed, poor creature! he did not know the Lord; Pharaoh spake right in that, I know not the Lord; if he had, he would never have said, I will not let Israel go, he would have let all go at his command, had he known who the Lord was that commanded. Thus Sennacherib (2 Chron. 32. 14.) blasphemes by his messengers, Who was there among all the gods of those Nations that my fathers utterly destroyed, that could deliver his people out of my hand, that your God should be able to deliver you out of mine hand? These are hard words against God, and hardening words to man.

Every act of sin hardens the heart of man, but the heat of blasphemy at once shews and puts it into the extremity of hardness. Man hardens himself against God, four wayes especially.

First, Upon presumption of mercy; many do evil, because they hear God is good; they turn his grace into wantonness, and are without all fear of the Lord, because there is mercy so much with the Lord.

Secondly, The patience of God, or his delayes of judgement, harden others; because God is slow to strike, they are swift to sin. If the sound of judgment be not at the heels of sin, they conclude, there is no such danger in sin; Solomon observed this (Eccl. 8. 11.) Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil, or, it is full in them to do evil. They have not some velleities and propensions, some motions and inclinations, some queries and debates about it, but the matter (upon this ground) is fully stated and determined, they are so full of it, that they have no room in their hearts for better thoughts or counsels: the sum of all is, they are hardned and resolved to do evil.

Thirdly, Gross ignorance hardens many. First, Ignorance of themselves. And secondly, Ignorance of God: he that knows not what he ought to do, cares not much what he doth. None are so venturous as they, who know know not their danger. Pharaoh said, I know not the Lord; he knew not the Lord, nor himself, therefore he ran on blind-fold, and desperately hardened himself against the Lord.

Fourthly, Hardness of heart in sinning is contracted from the multitude of those who sin. They think none shall suffer for that which so many do. The Law of Moses said, Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil (Exod. 23. 2.) There is a special restraint upon it, because man is so easily led by many. The heart is ready to flatter it self into an opinion, that God will not be very angry when a practice is grown common; this is the course of the world, this is the way of most men; therefore surely no great danger in it. And examples harden chiefly upon three considerations.

Ego hominem non facerem. Ter.

First, If great ones go that way; the Heathen brings in a young man, who hearing of the adulteries and wickednesses of the gods, said, what! Do they so, and shall I stick at it?

Secondly, If some wise and learned men go that way, ignorant and unlearned men conclude they may.

Thirdly, If any godly men, such as make more then ordinary profession, do such things, then who may not? The failings of the Saints are a countenance to wicked men in their follies. They are apt to follow the dark side of the cloud, and to approve those in what they do ill, whom they scorn in what they do well. They imitate their falls and sins, whose repentance they never think of imitating.

How many harden their hearts by their doing what is evil, whose hearts have been broken because they did evil; from the sin which a holy man commits against his purpose and resolution, many purpose and resolve to commit it.

Upon these, and the like grounds, the heart of man is hardened against God. Take a brief of the degrees of this hardness; see by what steps the heart rises so high in sinning. Man doth not grow hard at once, much less hardest; but when once he begins to harden himself, where he shall make an end he knows not.

The first step is, the taking time and leave to meditate upon sin, and roll it up and down in the thoughts. A hard heart lets vain thoughts dwell in it. A holy heart would not let them lodge with it.

A second step is, some tastes of pleasure and delight in sin. It proves a sweet morsel under his tongue. As the heart grows more delighted in sin, so more hardened in sin. Nothing should be so bitter as sin in the act; for nothing would be so bitter as sin in the issue: but when the act is pleasant, the issue is seldom suspected.

Improbè Neptunum accusat, qui iterum naufragium facit.

The third step is, custom in sinning. It argues great boldness to venture often. One said of him that had escaped danger at sea, if you go again, you have no reason to complain, though you be wrack'd. Mariners are fearful of storms at first, but through custom they play with them. When a man comes off once safe from sin, he will venture again, and so often, till at last he thinks there is scarce any venture at all in sin. He grows bold and hardy.

By the fourth step of hardness he comes to defend and maintain his sin. He hath spoken so long in his heart against the word, which forbiddeth him to sin, that now he can speak against it with his tongue. He hath a plea ot an argument to make the evil he doth, good. He appears a Patron, an Advocate for sin, who was before but a practiser of it.

Fifthly, The hard heart grows angry and passionate with those who give advice against sin; he is resolved; and a man that is resolved in his way, is angry if he be desired to remove out of his way. He that is resolved to sleep, loves not to be awakened; A touch or a jog from him that sits by, provokes him, he prayes to be let alone. We should love the man, while we hate and reprove his sin. But he that loves his sin, will hate his reprovers.

Sixthly, Hard hearts grow too hard for the Word, they are Sermon-proof; they can sit under the Preacher, and hear from day to day, but nothing touches them. A man in armour fee's not the stroak of a sword, much less the smart of a rod. This hardness of heart is a steel armour to the heart; it makes the man past feeling, till he be past healing. Some being often reproved, harden their hearts (Prov. 29. 1.) till their hearts are too hard for all reproofs.

And then seventhly, The heart is so hard, that the sword of affliction doth not pierce it; the man is judgment-proof: let God strike him in his person or estate, let God set the world afire about his ears, yet on he goes. He is like the man of whom Solomon speaks (Prov. 23. 34.) who lies sleeping in a storm upon the top of the Mast.

Eighthly, The hard heart sits down in the chair of the scorner; he derides the Word, and mocks at the Judgments of God. When Lot spake to his Sons-in-Law about fire and brimstone ready to fall upon Sodom and consume it, the Text saith, He seemed as one that mocked unto his Sons-in-Law. What, tell us of judgments? of fire descending from Heaven? When the Skie falls, we shall have Larks.

Lastly, The hard heart gets up to the Tribunal of the persecutor, and from scorner, commences opposer of good men, and of the good wayes of God; he will do them the uttermost mischief he can, who would do him all the good they can. Get thee from me (saith Pharaoh to Moses, Exod. 10. 28.) Take heed to thy self; see my face no more; for in the day that thou seest my face, thou shalt die. Pharaoh's hard heart spake hard words, and was preparing to give hard blows; he had only so much of honour and ingenuity left, as to warn the Prophet to avoid the blow: Which yet is more then hardness of heart leaves to all. Many an hard heart uses the hand before the tongue; and instead of saying to his reprover, See my face no more lest thou die, calls him before his face that he may die, or seek his death behind his back, and lies in wait for revenge. And here hardness of heart is at hardest: It is now a fit cushion for Satan; he sits softest upon this stone. The Devil is never so much pleased, as when man is most hardened; the seed of his temptations takes root and prospers best in this stonie ground.

But shall man prosper too? Shall any man thrive or make gain by hardening himself against God? Shall he come off with honour or with profit? Job answereth, Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered? Which may be resolved into this negative proposition, No man ever hardened himself against God, and prospered.

The Hebrew thus, Hath any man hardened himself against God, and had peace? Mr. Broughton renders near it; Hath any man hardened himself against God, and found quietness? To have peace or quietness, and to prosper, are the same in the language of the Jews, and in a hundred Texts of the Old Testament.

שָׁלֵם Et pacatus fuit, vel in pace abiit (i. e.) feliciter & bene cesserit. Merc.

We may understand Job either of these three wayes.

First, No pertinacious hard-hearted man could ever glory that he got the better or the day of God, and so prospered into a peace by war; that's a way of prosperity in which he shall never tread. Gideon told the men of Pennel, When I come again in peace, that is, when I have conquered, and return prosperous, then, &c. No man ever conquered God, and so returned in peace. Peace was never the Trophy of a war with him.

Nemo pertinax gloriari potest quod post consecutam victoriam pace potitus fuerit. Pin.

Secondly, Who ever hardened himself against God, and prospered? That is, Did ever any man so weary out God by lengthening this war, that God was (as it were) forced at last to offer him terms of peace? So it happens sometimes with men, with Nations and Kingdoms: They not getting peace by victory, but being spent and tired out with war, begin to think of treating. Did ever any one put the Lord to offer a treaty with articles of peace, to save himself from further trouble? They who have not strength enough to overcome, may yet have power enough to vex and weary their adversary. But God can neither be vanquished by force, nor vext with our policies into a peace with man.

Nemo cum Deo pugnas, sic eum assidua pugna fatigavit, ut pacem accipiat ultro à Deo oblatã. Idem.

Thirdly, Others give this sence, Who ever held out, or was able to persist in a war against the Lord? The wicked shall not stand before God in the day of judgment, much less in the day of battel; Who would set the briars and thorns against me in battel? I would go through them, I would burn them together (Isa. 27. 4.) The most steely and flinty spirits in the world can no more stand before God, then briars and thorns can before a flaming fire. The Lord soon breaks and destroyes all opposing power. And so there is a figure in the words; for man doth not only not prosper, but he is undone and crusht for ever, by contending with God. Shall man prosper in a war with God? No, it shall end in his own ruine and utter destruction.

Ab æquipollente pacem aliquis pugnando obtinere potest, licet enim eum superare non possit, tamen assiduitate pugnæ eum fatigat, ut ad pacem reducatur. Aquin.

Quis permansit aut perstitit, unquam? Sep.

Hence

Hence observe, That, Nothing can be got but blows by contending with God.

Hoc est signum evidēs, quod fortitudo Dei omnem humanam fortitudinem excedit, quia nullus cum eo pacem habere potest resistendo, sed solum humiliter obediendo. Aqr. Virtus Galilæe.

The greatest Monarchs in the world have at one time or other found their matches, but the great God never found his match. Pharaoh contended with him, but did he prosper in it? You see what became of him at last, he was drowned in the Red Sea. Julian contended with Christ, he scoffed at him (he came up to the highest degrees, he sate in the chair of the scorner, and in the tribunal of the persecutor) but what got he at last? When he was wounded, and threw up his blood toward heaven, said he not, O Galilean, thou hast overcome; I acknowledge thy power, whose name and truth I have opposed. Christ, whom he had derided, and against whom he hardned himself into scorns and scoffs, was too hard for him. All that harden themselves against God shall be worsted. Gather your selves together, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces (Isa. 8. 9.) Gather your selves together; against whom? Gather your selves together against the people of God, and ye shall be broken in pieces; why? Emanuel, the Lord is with us. If no man can prosper by hardning himself against the people of God, because the Lord is with them, how shall any man prosper by hardning himself immediately against God? If Emanuel will not let any prosper against his people, certainly he will not let any prosper against himself. Therefore (Prov. 28. 24.) Solomon layes it down directly; He that hardneth his heart, shall fall into mischief; & (Prov. 29. 1.) He shall be destroyed, and that without remedie; there is no help for it, all the world cannot save him. A hard heart is it self the sorest of all judgments, and it brings all judgments upon us. A hard heart treasureth up wrath against the day of wrath (Rom. 2. 5.) As a hard heart is Satans treasury for sin, so it is Gods treasury for wrath. The walls of that fiery Tophet are built up with these stones, with their hard hearts who turn themselves into stones against the Lord.

Then take heed of hardning your selves against God. You know the counsel which Gamaliel gave, Acts 5. 39. Refrain from these men, and let them alone, &c. (See how tremblingly he speaks) lest you be found even to fight against God; as if he had said, take heed what you do, it is the most dreadful thing in the world to contend with God; he speaks as of a thing he would not have them come near, or be in the remotest tendency to. Man will not meddle with a mortal man if he be too hard for him; how should we tremble to meddle or contend with the immortal God? Christ, Luke 14. warning his Disciples to consider aforehand what it is to be his Disciples, gives them an instance of a King: What King (saith he) going to make war against another King, sitteth not down first and consulteth, whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Now I say to you (if any such be here) that have hearts steeled or hardned against God, who challenge God the field, and send defiance to heaven, O sit down, sit down, consider whether you with ten thousand are able to meet God with his twenty thousand, that's great odds, half in half; but consider whether one single, simple man can stand against his twenty thousand; whether a man of no strength can stand against infinite strength; whether you who have no wisdom, are able to stand against him who is of infinite wisdom. Can ignorance contend with knowledge, folly with wisdom, weakness with strength, an earthen vessel with an iron rod? O the boldness and madness of men, who will hazard themselves upon such disadvantages. He is wise in heart, and mighty in power: who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?

And as God is so powerful, that no wicked man in the world can mend himself by contending with him; so neither can any of his own people. If they harden themselves against God, they shall not prosper. To harden the heart against God, is not only the sin of a Pharaoh, of a Senacherib, and of a Julian, but possibly it may be the sin of a Believer, the sin of a Saint. And therefore the Apostle, Heb. 3. gives them caution, Take heed lest any of your hearts be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin; and whose heart soever is hardned against God, that man, good or bad, shall not prosper, or have peace in it. It is mercy that God will not give his own peace, or let them thrive in sin. Grace prospers not, when the heart is hardned; joy prospers not, nor comfort, nor strength, when the heart is hardned; the whole state and stock of a Believer is impaired, when his heart is hardned.

And if Saints harden their heart against God, God (in a sence) will harden his heart against them, that is, he will not appear tender-hearted and compassionate towards them in reference to present comforts; he will harden himself to afflict and chasten, when they harden themselves to sin and provoke.

When God afflicts his people, he hardens his heart against them; and it is seldom that he hardneth his heart against them, till they harden their hearts against him. And the truth is, if they who are dearest to him, do harden their hearts against him, if they quarrel and contend with him, if they rise up against his commands, or neglect his will, he will make their hearts submit, or he will make their hearts ake, and break their bones. If they harden their hearts against his fear, they shall feel his rod upon their backs and spirits too. Which of the Saints ever hardened himself against God, and hath prospered? No man, whether holy or prophane, righteous or wicked, could ever glory of a conquest over God, or triumph after a war with him?

VERS. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

Which removeth the mountains, and they know not; which overturneth them in his anger.
Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble.
Which commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the Stars.
Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the Sea.
Which maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South.
Which doth great things past finding out, yea, and wonders without number.

JOB having in general asserted the power and wisdom of God (he must have infinite power and wisdom against whom no man ever prospered by contending.) Having, I say, asserted this in general, he descends to make a particular proof of it; as if he had said, I will not only give you this argument, that God is mighty in strength, because no man could ever harden his heart against him, and prosper; he hath foyl'd all that ever medled with him; but besides, I will give you particular instances of it, and you shall see that the Lord hath done such things, as speak him mighty in strength, and prove him as powerful as I have reported. These particulars are reported in vers. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. all closed with a triumphant Elogie in the tenth, Which doth great things past finding out; yea, wonders without number.

Subjicit Job confirmationem proximè præcedentis. Syllogismi ab effectis potentiæ & sapientiæ Dei, quæ amplissima oratione describit. Mer.

The Argument may be thus formed,

He is infinite in power and wisdom who removeth mountains, and shakes the earth, who commands the Sun, who spreads out the heavens, and disposeth of the stars in the firmament.

But the Lord doth all these things, he removeth mountains, he shakes the earth, he commandeth the Sun, &c.

Therefore he is mighty in power, and infinite in wisdom.

The first part of this argument is here implied. The Assumption, or the Minor is proved in vers. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. by so many instances. Here then is an evident demonstration of the power of God, from visible things, from acts apparent to the eye; as if he had said, If you have not faith to believe that God is infinite in power, let your senses teach it you; for he removeth mountains, and they know it not; he overturneth them in his anger, &c.

He removeth mountains.

That's the first instance. The word which we translate to remove, signifies to wax old and strong, because things as they grow in age, grow in strength. There is a declining age, and an encreasing age. Things very old impair, and things growing older, encrease in strength; we have the word in that sence (Job 21. 2.) Wherefore do the wicked become old? yea, they are mighty in power; he putteth these two together, growing old and mighty in power. The Septuagint render, Who maketh the mountains wax old, because that which waxeth old is ready to vanish away (Heb. 8. 13.) or to be removed and taken away, as the Ceremonial Law was, of which the Apostle speaks in that place.

Ὁ παλαιῶν beg. Sept.

And because growing old implies a kind of motion, therefore the word also signifies motion, even local motion, a moving from, or out of a place, Gen. 12. 4. Abraham departed; removed from the place where he was. This local motion is either natural, or violent; of this latter understand the Text, Which removeth the mountains.

The mountains.

There are Natural mountains, and Metaphorical or Figurative mountains; it is an act of the mighty power of God to remove either.

Some understand this of Metaphorical or Figurative mountains, and so mountains are great men, men of eminency, or of pre-eminency, the Kings and Princes of the world. The Chaldee is expres for this sence, He removeth Kings who are as strong and high as mountains. For as God hath ordered the superficies of the earth, and made some parts of it plain, others mountains, some vallies, and some hills; so he hath disposed of men; some men stand as upon level ground, men of an ordinary condition; other are as the low vallies, men of a poor condition; others are as high mountains, over-topping and over-looking the rest. The word is used in this Metaphorical sence, Isa. 41. 15. I will make thee (saith the Lord to the Prophet) a new threshing instrument having teeth: And what shall this new threshing instrument do? Thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff. Here is a Prophet sent with a flail or threshing instrument, and his business is to thresh the mountains, and to beat the hills; the meaning is, thou shalt destroy the great ones of the world, the hills, the mountains, those that think themselves impregnable or inaccessible. But how could the Prophet thresh these mountains, and what was his flail? Gideon (Judg. 8. 7.) threatens the men of Succoth, that he will tear or thresh their flesh with the thorns of the wilderness, and with briars. And Damascus is threatned, because they threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron, Amos 1. 3. That is, they put them to extreamest tortures. Our Prophet could not thus torture men. His threshing instrument having iron teeth, was only his tongue, the instrument of speech; with this he beat those proud mountains to dust, that is, he declared they should be beaten and destroyed. Of such a mountain, the Lord by his Prophet speaks (Jer. 51. 25.) Behold, I am against thee, O destroying mountain, saith the Lord, which destroyest all the earth. Behold, I will stretch out mine hand upon thee, and will roll thee down from the rocks, and make thee a burnt mountain. This mountain was the proud state of Babylon, which was opposite to the Church of God, this devouring mountain shall at last be a devoured mountain, devoured by fire, therefore he calls it a burnt mountain. Thus (Zech. 4. 7.) Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain. The Prophet is assured that all the power and strength which opposed it self against the reformation and re-edification of Jerusalem, should be laid level with the ground. So we may interpret (Psal. 144. 5.) He toucheth the mountains, and they smoke; the meaning is, when God doth but lay his hand upon great men, upon the mightiest of the world, he makes them smoke or fume, which some understand of their anger, they are presently in a passion, if God do but touch them. Or we may understand it of their consumption. A smoaking mountain will soon be a burnt mountain. In our Language, to make a man smoke, is a proverbial, for destroying or subduing.

Chaldeus per montes intelligit reges; Qui loco movet reges fortes, ut mōtes. Targ.

Per montes intelligit reges, qui sicut montes firmitate & robore persistant. Rab. Dav. in Ps. 144. 5.

And besides, there are mountains (in this figurative sence) within us, as well as without us. The soul hath a mountain in it self, and it is an act of the great power of God, yea, of an higher and greater power of God, to remove inward, then it is to remove outward mountains, Isa. 40. 4. The Prophet fore-shewing the coming of Christ, and the sending of the Baptist to prepare his way, tells us, Every mountain and hill shall be made low. Christ did not throw down the outward power of men, who withstood him; he let Herod and Pilate prevail: but mountains and hills of sin and unbelief in the soul, which made his passage into them impassible, he overthrew. These mountains of high, proud thoughts, the Apostle describes (2 Cor. 10. 14.) Casting down imaginations, and every high thing, and bringing into captivity every thought (every mountainous thought) to the obedience of Christ.

These are Metaphorical mountains, the power of sinful men without us, and the power of sin, the pride of our own hearts within us. It is a mighty work of God to remove these mountains.

But these are not proper to the Text, for the instances which follow, being all given in natural things, shew, that those here intended, are natural mountains.

Taking mountains for earthly, material mountains, it is doubted how the Lord removes them.

There are different opinions about the point. Some understand it of a natural motion. Philosophers disputing about mountains and hills, conclude, that they are subject to generation and corruption; by the addition of many parts they are generated, that is, kneaded or gathered together, and become one huge heap of earth; and by the detraction, falling and crumbling off, or taking away of these parts, they are removed again. Thus we may expound that (Job 14. 18.) And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought.

Montes natura sua generabiles sunt & corruptibiles, additione partium generantur, & detractione partium corrumpuntur. Aq. & Cajet.

Minime mirandum est, si quas terræ partes quæ nunc habitantur, olim mare occupabat, & quæ nunc pelagus sunt, olim habitabantur, sic campos & montes par est invicem commutari. Strab. l. 17.

Yet this cannot be the meaning of Job here. For though we grant that Doctrine of the Philosophers, that there is a generation of mountains, and so a corruption of them; yet that corruption is so insensible, that it cannot be put among those works of God which raise up the name of his glorious power. That which falls not under observation, cannot cause admiration. Slow and imperceptible motions make small impressions, either upon the fancy or understanding.

Divina potentia in tā longa & segni montium remotiones non se præbet valde mirabilē, cum removere sit qui eam rem videat. Pined.

That here spoken of, is quick and violent, and by its easie representation to the eye, causeth wonder and astonishment in the beholders.

And so it imports a removing them by some violent motion.

Thus the Lord is able to remove, and hath removed mountains, sometimes by earthquakes; sometimes by storms and tempests; sometime those mighty bulwarks are battered with thunder-balls discharged from the clouds (Psal. 97. 5.) The hills melted like wax at the presence of the Lord. Hills melt down when he appears as a consuming fire (Psal. 104. 32.) He looks upon the earth, and it trembleth, and he toucheth the hills, and they smoke. Those rockie mountains are as ready to take fire, as tinder or touch-wood, if but a spark of Gods anger fall upon them. God by a cast of his eye (as we may speak) can cast the earth into an ague-fit, he makes it shake, and more, tremble with a look; he by a touch of his mighty arm, hurls mountains which way he pleaseth, as a man doth a Tennis-ball. We read (Isa. 64. 1.) how earnestly the Prophet prayes, O that thou wouldest rent the heavens and come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence; where he is conceived to allude to Gods coming down upon Mount Sinai at the giving of the Law, Exod. 19. which is said to melt from before the Lord God of Israel, Judg. 5. 3. Some understand it of that day of Christ, when he shall come to judge the world; others, of that day when Christ came in the flesh to save the world; then the mountains were levelled according to the preaching of the Baptist; but rather the Prophet being affected with the calamitous condition, which he foresaw the Jews falling into, intreats the Lord to put forth himself in some notable works of his providence, which should as clearly manifest his presence as if they saw the heavens (speaking as of solid bodies) renting, and God visibly coming down; then, those difficulties which lay in the way of their deliverance, and looked like huge mountains of Iron or of Adamant, would presently dissolve like wax, or ice before the Sun or fire. The Prophet

Micah describes the effects of Gods power in the same stile (chap. 1. 3, 4.) Behold, the Lord cometh forth out of his place, and will come down and tread upon the high places of the earth, and the mountains shall be molten under him, and the valleys shall be cleft, as wax before the fire, and as the waters which are powred down a steep place. So, to remove mountains, is used proverbially, Job 18. 4. Shall the earth be forsaken for thee, or shall the rock be removed out of his place? that is, shall God work wonders for thee? or, God will alter the course of nature as soon as the course of his providence. To say God can remove mountains, is as much as to say, he hath power to do what he will; and the reason is, because mountains are exceeding great and weighty bodies; mountains are firmly setled: now, to remove a thing which is mighty in bulk, and strongly founded, is an argument of greatest strength. The stability of the Church is compared to the stability of mountains, Psal. 125. 1. They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but standeth fast for ever. The righteousnes of God is compared to a great mountain (Psal. 36. 6.) because his righteousnes is firm and unmoveable; Thy righteousnes is like the great mountains, or the mountains of God. And (Ps. 46. 2.) the doing of the greatest things, and the making of the greatest changes that possibly can happen in any Nation, or in the whole world, are expresst by the removing of mountains; Though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the Sea, yet will we not fear, &c. That is, things which carry the greatest impossibility to be done, or which are seldomest done, shall be done before we will do this. As men when they would shew how far they are from submitting to such a thing, say, We will die first, &c. So here, Who! we fear? No, mountains shall be removed first. He breaths out the highest confidence of the Church, in the lowest, not only of her present, but possible dangers. As faith can represent to us better things then any we enjoy, to raise our joy; so it can represent to us worse things (and put us harder cases) then any we feel, and yet carry us above fear. A faith removing mountains, is put for the strongest faith; Though I had all faith, so that I could remove mountains (1 Cor. 13. 2.) that is, though I had the strongest faith, the faith of miracles. When Christ (Mat. 21. 21.) would shew to the utmost what faith can do, he saith, If ye have faith and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree, but also, if ye shall say to this mountain, be thou removed, and be thou cast into the Sea, and it shall be done. As if he had said, if you have faith, you may do the greatest things imaginable or desirable; ye shall remove mountains. A mountain is immoveable by the meer power of a creature. Faith takes that in hand, because faith acts the power of the Creator. And as the faith of man removing mountains, notes a faith of miracles; so the power of God removing mountains, notes a miraculous power.

Ex quo & hoc loco nō absurdè colligitur fuisse proverbiū ad significādum maximam soliq; Deo convenientem potentiam. Bold.

Isa. 54. 10. The mountains.

So then, taking this speech either for the removing of natural mountains, or taking it proverbially, as it noteth the doing of the greatest things, and putting forth of the greatest power, it proveth the point which Job hath here in hand, viz. That God is mighty in strength; why? He is able to remove mountains. Hence observe,

> First, That, The Lord, if he pleaseth, can alter and remove the parts of the earth, and change the frame and fabrick of nature.

He that made the mountains unmoveable to us, can himself remove them. The Histories and Records of former times tell us how God hath miraculously tossed mountains out of their places. Josephus in his ninth Book of Antiquities, cap. 11. mentions the removing of a mountain; and Pliny in the eighth Book of his Natural History, cap. 30. A latter writer reports, that in Burgundy, in the year 1230. There were mountains seen moving, which overthrew many houses, to the great terrour of all the Inhabitants of those Countries. Josephus also reports the like done by an Earthquake. And another tells us of Mount Ossa joyned to Olympus by an earthquake. So that take it in the letter, the Lord is able to remove mountains.

Mons in Burgundia à proximo monte dehiscens, valleſque proximas coactas multa agricularū millia oppressit, &c. Uvern. in fasciculo. Josephus, Ant. l. 9. c. 12 Vide Senec. l. 5. c. 15. & l. 6. c. 15. Nat. Quest. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 8. c. 38. Cum in agro Mutinensi montes duo inter se concurrebant crepitu maximo assultantes, &c. Eo concursu villæ omnes illisæ sunt, &c.

It should make us fear before the Lord, and give him glory, while we remember that even the outward frame of the world is subject to sudden changes; there is no mountain, no rock, but the little finger of God can remove or pull it down. As David spake of his Metaphorical mountain, his great outward estate, Lord, thou hast made it stand strong, yet thou didst hide away thy face, and I was troubled, Psal. 30. 6. His mountain began to shake, and became a very molehil, useless to him, when God was displeased. If the Lord withdraw himself from our civil mountains, we are troubled, and if he touch the natural mountains, they are froubled. Our mountains will skip like rams, and the little hills like lambs (Psal. 104. 4.) when he is displeased.

> Secondly observe, That, The power of God is made visible to us in the changes which he works in the creature, as well as in the constitution of the creature.

The power of God made the mountains and created the hills; the same power removes mountains, and turns them upside down. It argues as great a power to destroy the world, as to settle the world. As the Apostle shews what divinity the Gentiles might have learned in that great Book of the worlds creation (Rom. 1. 20.) The invisible things of him from the Creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made, even his eternal power and Godhead. So we may say on the other side, The invisible things of him from the confusions which are in the world, are clearly seen; or, they may be understood by the things which are removed and changed: in these you may read his eternal power and Godhead. When God breaks the Laws and course of nature, he shews his power as well as when he setled the laws and course of nature. He shews his power when he lets the Sea out of his place to overflow the earth, as well as when he bounded the Sea that it shall not overflow the earth. Some things are with far less power destroyed then made, removed then setled; but no power can destroy the world, but that which made it, or suddenly remove a mountain, but that which setled it. The power of God must be acknowledged in altering, as well as in ordering the natural course or constitution of the creature.

And if we look to the change of Metaphorical Mountains, it is a truth, an illustrious truth, that the Lord displayes his mighty power in removing and overturning the great estates and establishments of Men and Kingdoms. When God removes the Mountain of our peace, of our riches, the Mountain of outward prosperity, and of civil power, it becomes us to say, He is mighty in power who doth all these things.

God hath given great tokens and testimonies of his power in this. How many Mountains, great Mountains, men who were Mountains, and things which stood like Mountains; how many (I say) of these hath the Lord removed? The power of God and the faith of his people have wrought such Miracles, He removeth the Mountains.

And they know it not.

They.] Who? Who or what is the antecedent to this They? Are the Mountains? So some understand it; and then the word [know,] or the act of knowing is by a figure ascribed (as many times in Scripture, to creatures without reason, so) to creatures without life, Psal. 58. 1. Before your pots can feel the thorns; the Hebrew is, Before your pots can understand or know the thorns, that is, before they are sensible of the heat of the fire to make them boil, &c. An act of sense, and is ascribed to pots, which are things insensible.

Nec sciunt, sc. montes, tribuitur res inanimatæ sensus. Merc.

Puto esse modum loquendi indeterminatum, cui supplendum est subjectum homines. Bol. Vatablus suppositum verbi ne scierent, ita supp et, nec agnoscunt (sc. homines imperiti) quis subvertit eos furore suo.

But others take the antecedent to be man; He removeth the mountains, and they know it not, that is, men know it not. So Mr. Broughton translates, He removeth the mountains, that men cannot mark how he hath removed them out of their place, in his anger.

Supposing men to be the antecedent, there is yet a difference about the interpretation. Men, that is, say some, unskilful men, ignorant men, they know not the meaning of this, they cannot give a reason why or how mountains are removed; if God doth it, they know it not. Others restrain it to men inhabiting the mountains, they were secure, and thought their dwellings so safe, that God removed their mountain before they dreamed of, much less feared any such thing; they had no thought that God would remove move their mountain. Places strongly fortified, either by Art or Nature, make men secure, and dangers unsuspected. The deluge in Noah's time, prevailed over the highest mountains; but his sinful posterity hoped to make an artificial mountain, wherein they might even dare a second deluge. Come, let us build us a City and a Tower, whose top may reach to heaven, Gen. 11.4. And then (except the stars and firmament be flouded) we shall be dry, how much or how long soever it rains. Such towring thoughts as these, were (surely) laid in the foundation of that intended Tower.

Take the Text either of natural or of figurative mountains; and to remove them, so, that man knows it not, may have a double meaning.

First, That it is done with great speed.

Secondly, That it is done with great secrecy.

God is able to do great things in a little time, in so little time, that men shall not know he is doing them, till they are done. He can do great things secretly, so secretly, that the way of their dispatch shall not be visible to the eye, or open to the understanding of man, till they are dispatch'd.

Again, this clause [And they know it not.] notes not only the security of men before the hand of God is upon them, but their stupidity, while it is upon them. So Prov. 23.35. They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not; the Hebrew is, and I knew it not. Hence observe,

The works and judgments of God, are often unsuspected and unobserved by men.

He removeth mountains, even their mountains, and they know it not.

'Tis true in reference to natural, but especially to civil mountains. The rich, the mighty are cast down from their seats, or their seats are cast down before they saw any hand touching them. The whore of Babylon, and mother of fornications, who sits upon seven mountains (Rev. 17.9.) saith in her heart, I sit a Queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow (Revel. 18.7.) Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, &c. (*ver.*8.) If her plagues come in one day, she (doubtless) thought not of them a day before. Babylons seven mountains shall be removed, she not knowing it; and as Babylons mountains shall be removed, when she shall not know, that is, suspect it; so, which is more strange, Jerusalems mountain was removed, and she did not know, that is, perceive it. The Prophets are express (Isa. 42.25.) Therefore he hath poured upon him (namely, Jacob or Israel) the fury of his anger, and the strength of battel, and it hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew it not; and it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart. They were unobservant of those terrible things the Lord did among them. Some little anger passes often without notice, but here was the fury of anger; some sleight skirmishes make no great noise, but here was the strength of battel; and not some few drops of both these, but either of them poured upon him, by whole bucket fulls, and these buckets of burning fury set him on fire, and that not in some one corner or out-house, but round about, yet he knew it not. Which is expounded in the next words, It burned him, yet he laid it not to heart.

The Prophet Hosea (Chap. 7.9.) speaks as much of Jerusalem, under the name of Ephraim; Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not; gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth it not. Strangers devour his strength, that is, according to the language of Job, the mountains wherein his strength did consist, were devoured and overthrown by strangers, and yet he knew it not, he did not observe the hand of God in the hand of man against him. Gray hairs are here and there upon him; gray hairs are a great change; gray hairs note the most discernable change of a mans life. There are two states of a man, easily distinguished, youth, and old-age, and gray hairs make the most visible distinction between these two; so that to say, Gray hairs are upon him, is to say there is such a change upon his estate, as is between a young man and an old man, and yet he knows, he observes it not. Of all things a man is most apt to take notice of his own natural gray hairs; and many are so troubled at the first sight of them (because they tell us we begin to be old) that they will pick them out: but such is the sensleſness of many about the dealings of God with them, that when great changes are upon them, changes like that of youth into old-age, they are not affected with it; providential or judiciary gray hairs, are not often known.

Surely many of these gray hairs are upon us at this day: it will be sad, if England be like Ephraim, and know it not. It is worse, not to know we have gray hairs, then to have them. The one is but our affliction, the other is our sin. Gray hairs are upon us, strangers have devoured our strength: If we know not what God hath done, he can quickly do enough to make himself known. They who will not see the hand of God, when it is lifted up (that they may be humbled) shall see it and be ashamed, Isa. 26.11. If the removing and shaking of our mountains do not awaken us, the overturning shall: That's the next act of divine power in this noble description.

And overturneth them in his anger.

The word signifies to overturn a thing, so, as to change the form and fashion of it, yea, to bring it to nothing; not only to remove a thing out of its place, but to take away the very being of it, and to remove it out of the world. He not only turns mountains into mole-hils, but into plains, yea, into pits, they shall not be mountains any longer, nor any thing like a mountain.

הפך Vertit, subvertit, significat versionem, vel in nihilum, vel in formam, aut qualitatem alium, vel in locū alium.

It is much to remove a mountain, and set it in another place: but more to crumble it in a moment all to dust, that you shall not find a piece or a clod of it. The Prophet threatens the obstinate Jews in such a language, Isa. 30.13, 14. Therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh suddainly at an instant, and he shall break it as the breaking of the potters vessel, &c. So that there shall not be found in the bursting of it, a sheard to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit.

He overturneth them in his anger.] Anger in man is a mixt affection made up chiefly of these two ingredients; sorrow and revenge. Some call anger the boiling of the blood about the heart, or the boiling of the heart in blood; the fumes whereof rise so fast into the brain, that anger sometimes dislodges reason, and is therefore called by others a short madness.

Ira furor brevis.

The word in the Text signifies the Nostrils; and the Scripture frequently applies that to anger, because anger is seen and made visible in the nostrils. Quick breathing is a sign of anger. God is without parts and passions, he is not angry as man: but is said to be angry when he doth like man in his anger. The Lord is not moved or stirred by anger; but he is angry, when he makes motions and stirrings in the creature; he lets out the effects of anger, but himself hath not the affections, much less the perturbation of anger. Hence observe, אף Ira, inde transfertur ad nasum, qui est instrumentum iræ, & in quo ira præcipuè apparet. Fames & mordacitas in nasum coniciant. Plaut.

That the troubles and confusions which are in the creature, are tokens and effects of the anger of God.

As the setling and establishment of the creature, is an effect or sign of his goodness, or, as these tell us, that God is pleased; so when the Lord hurls the creature this way and that way, when he tosses it up and down, as if he cared not how, this is an argument of his anger; when Moses came down from the Mount, and saw what the people of Israel had done, how they had made a golden calf and poluted themselves with idols, such a passion of anger came upon him, that he threw the Tables of the Law out of his hand, and brake them. So, when the Lord would signifie his displeasure, he throws the creature out of his hand, and breaks man against man, Nation against Nation (as a potters vessel) one against another. The comfort and well-being of the creature, consists in this, that God holds it in his hand; if he do but let it go out of his hand, it perishes, much more when he casts it with violence out of his hand. The Prophet (Hab. 3.8.) describing the great confusions which God made in the world, questions thus, Was thine anger against the Rivers? Was thy wrath against the Sea, that that thou didst ride upon thine horses, and thy chariots of salvation? God being angry with the enemies of his people, made strange work amongst them; Rather then his people shall not be delivered, the world shall be confounded. Was the Lord angry with the Sea? When he compelled the Rivers to change their courſes, and diſcover the bottom of their channels, as in the paſſage of his Iſrael through the red Sea? No, God was not angry with the Sea, but with Pharaoh and his hoſt, with the oppreſſors and troublers of his Iſrael; and when he was thus angry, he check'd the courſe of nature and turned things upſide-down. When David was in a diſtreſs, and his enemies encompaſt him round about: what then? Then the earth ſhook and trembled, the foundations of the hills were moved and were ſhaken, becauſe he was wroth (Pſal. 18.7.) That, God might reſcue David out of the hand of trouble, he troubled the foundations of the earth; he made the world ſhake, and Kingdoms tremble, that his David might be ſetled upon his throne. The Lord threatneth (Hag. 2.6.) that he will ſhake the heaven and the earth, the ſea and the dry land; he will move all creatures, why ſo? He ſhakes them for the ſetling of his Zion (verſ. 7.) I will ſhake all Nations, and the deſire of all Nations ſhall come, and I will fill this houſe with glory, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. When the Lord comes againſt the ſuperſtition, and idolatry, and profaneneſs, and wickedneſſes of the world in anger, no wonder if Kingdoms ſhake: yea, he therefore ſhakes Kingdoms, that he may eſtabliſh Jeruſalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that ſhall not be taken down, not one of the ſtakes thereof ſhall ever be removed, neither ſhall any of the cords thereof be broken, Iſa. 33.20. We are waiting when God will ſhake Babylon, and in his anger overturn the ſeven mountains thereof; Babylon is built upon mountains, upon ſeven mountains, to note the ſtrength and power of it, yet the Lord will remove Babylon out of her place, and overturn thoſe mountains in the fierceneſs of his anger, and in jealouſie poured out, Then every Iſland ſhall flee away, and the mountains ſhall not be found, Rev. 16.20. That is, the remoteſt and ſtrongeſt places which owned and maintained Babylon, ſhall either be converted or confounded; they ſhall appear no more under that ſpiritual notion, though in a natural and civil they do remain. That which is not as it was, is ſpoken of, as if it were not: A great change in our condition, is called a change of our very being. The anger of God overturns things, as if it did annihilate them. Job goes on.

Tanta extitit divinæ iræ vis pro Davide contra hoſtes defendendo, ut videbatur orbem invertere, omnia miſcere, &c. Pined.

Verſ. 6. Which ſhakes the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble.

This is a ſecond inſtance, but in higher expreſſions of the ſame power of God.

Which ſhakes the earth out of her place.

He had ſaid before, God removes mountains. Mountains are great bulky bodies, but no mountain ſo great as the Globe of the whole earth. Now (ſaith he) the Lord doth not only ſhake mountains, ſome great parts of the earth, but if he pleaſeth he can take up the whole earth, and throw it out of its place, as a man would take up a little ball, and throw it into the air, He ſhakes the earth out of her place.

ὁ σείων τὴν ὑπερκειμένην ἐν σεισμοῖς, i.e. terrâ univerſâ. Sept.

The word which we tranſlate to Shake, ſignifies a violent motion of the mind, cauſed either by fear (Deut. 2.25.) or grief (2 Sam. 18.33.) We read of a trembling heart from both (Deut. 28.25.) It is alſo applied to civil ſhakings and commotions by the troubleſom ſpirits of men, (Prov. 30.21.) For three things the earth is diſquieted. And to unnatural ſhakings of the earth by the power of God, (2 Sam. 22.8, &c.) So in the Text.

רגז Non ſignificat motum naturalem, ſed commotionẽ quandã ex metu, trepidationẽ, tremorem.

Some expound this of a natural motion. Thoſe men have (ſurely) a motion and turning in their brains, who tell us that there is a continued motion of the earth, that it turns and never ſtands ſtill; they would ground the motion of the earth upon this Scripture, tranſlating thus, Which moveth the earth in her place. But the Text tells us, that the earth hath pillars, and not wheels. Pillars are made for reſt, not for motion.

Didacus aſtunica putat hunc locũ illuſtrari poſſe ex ſententia Pythagoricorũ exiſtimantiũ terram moveri naturâ ſua. Copern.

Further, This Text ſpeaks of it, as of an act of Gods anger, therefore no ordinary act appointed in nature; and the word notes a violent motion, not a natural. But we need not ſtand to refute this motion. As when ſome denied all motion, a Philoſopher to prove it, roſe up and walked: So when any affirm or give reaſon for this motion, we may ſhew their ſenſes that the earth ſtands.

This ſhaking then is extraordinary, the Lord who made the earth firm upon pillars, can make the earth move, as if it went on wheels.

This he doth, firſt, by earth-quakes, theſe ſhake the earth (as it were) out of her place, and make it tremble. Hiſtories are full, and many mens experiences can give inſtances of ſuch terrible ſhakings of the earth. This earth-quake is not meant here, for there is a reaſon in nature, for that Philoſophers diſpute much about it, and tell us, when there is a ſtrong vapour included or impriſoned in the bowels of the earth, that vapour ſeeking vent maketh a combuſtion there, and ſo the earth ſhakes. This, indeed, ſhews the mighty power of God, but it is in a natural way; whereas the Text ſeems to imply ſomewhat more, ſomewhat beyond the learning of Philoſophers and Naturaliſts.

Beſides, the Text ſaith, He ſhaketh the earth [out] of her place.

Whereas an earthquake ſhakes the earth in her place, and cauſes it to tremble upon the pillars thereof.

But did God ever ſhake the earth out of her place? We muſt underſtand the Text conditionally. We have not any inſtance that the Lord hath actually done ſo, but this ſuppoſition may be put. The Lord can remove mountains and ſhake the earth, not only in, but out of her place. We find ſuch conditional expreſſions often put in Scripture, not as if the things ever had been, or ever ſhould be done, but if the Lord will, he is able to do them (Amos 9.5.) The Lord God of hoſts is he that toucheth the land, and it ſhall melt; that is, if the Lord do but touch the land, he can melt it. As the three children caſt into a fiery fornace, had not ſo much as a garment, or a thread about them touched with it, becauſe the Lord forbad the fire to burn: So, if the Lord bid a ſpark but touch us, it ſhall melt and conſume us, as if we were caſt into, and continued in a fiery fornace. As a word made, ſo a touch ſhall mar the world, when God will; yet he hath not done thus unto this day. So in the Text, He ſhakes the earth out of her place, imports what God can, not what he hath or will do. Note from it, Terrificam capitis concuſſit terque quaterq; Cæſariem cũ qua terram mare ſidera movit. Ovid. Met.

That the Lord is able to do greater things, then ever he actually hath done.

He hath not put the earth out of her place, the earth is where it was, but he can diſplace it. God hath never acted any of his attributes to the height, for they are infinite; he never acted power ſo high, but he is able to act it higher: He hath never acted mercy in pardoning ſo far, but he is able to act it further; a greater ſinner then ever yet was pardoned, may be pardoned. A greater enemy then ever was overcome, may be overcome. He hath run with foot-men, and they have not wearied him, and he is able to contend with horſes: in a land of peace he was never wearied, and he knows how to wade through the ſwelling of Jordan. It is comfortable to conſider, that the Lord cannot only do the ſame things again, which he hath done, but he hath never done to the utmoſt of what he is able to do: he can out-do all that he hath done, as much as the ſhaking of the whole earth out of her place, is more then to remove a mountain, yea, or a mole-hill of earth.

And the pillars thereof tremble.

We have the pillars of Heaven, Chap. 26.11. here of the Earth.

עמדי Columnæ erectæ à ſtando dictæ.

The word in the original ſignifies to ſtand upright, to be erect, becauſe pillars do ſo. There are two ſorts of pillars, upon which there is a different interpretation of the word.

There are, firſt, Supporting pillars. And Secondly, Supported pillars. Or, there are pillars for ornament; and pillars for ſtrength. We ſet up pillars or pinacles upon the tops of great buildings for ornament, and they are ſupported pillars. We may call mountains ſuch pillars: for as when ſome ſtately Palace is built, great pillars or pinacles are ſet upon the towers and battlements: ſo the Lord having framed the earth, hath ſet up mountains, as great pillars for the adorning of it. He ſhaketh the earth, and the pillars thereof tremble; it is true of theſe upper pillars, the mountains they tremble. But I take it rather to be meant of ſupporting pillars, under-pillars, which bear the frame above, and are as the baſes or under-props of the earth (Pſal. 105.) Who laid the foundation of the earth? the earth hath a foundation: the Hebrew is, He hath founded the earth upon her baſis, alluding to a building. Moſt buildings have their foundations in the earth; but ſome upon it, being raiſed upon pillars. So Hannah (1 Sam. 2.8.) in her Song, The pillars of the earth are the Lords, and he hath ſet the world upon them.

What are theſe pillars that the Lord hath ſet the world upon? Or where ſhall we find them?

David ſhews us (Pſal. 24.1,2.) The earth is the Lords, and the fulneſs thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein: for he hath founded it upon the Seas, and eſtabliſhed it upon the floods. It is ſtrange that pillars of liquid water ſhould bear up the maſſie earth; the earth ſeems rather to be the pillar and foundation of the waters. Some interpret (ſuper) which ſignifies upon, by prope or juxta, near; he hath founded it upon the ſeas, that is, he hath founded it by or near the ſeas. But take it in the letter, and it is a truth; for the Sea is as much the pillar of the earth, as the earth is the pillar of the Sea; earth and ſea being a globe and round, the ſea is as much under the earth, as the earth is under the ſea. Thus the pillars of the earth are waters; And the earth is eſtabliſhed upon the floods.

Further, If you would know what theſe pillars are, hear what Job ſaith (chap. 26.7.) Where he aſſures us that God hangeth the earth upon nothing. We are not to think that the Lord in framing and building the earth, did firſt ſet up pillars, and then ſet the earth upon them; for the earth hangeth as a ball in the midſt of the air, without any pillars under it. Hence Job's Philoſophy teaches us, That he hangeth the earth upon nothing; there are no material or viſible pillars to ſuſtain it.

What is then the pillar of the earth? What is it that ſupports and bears it up? The real pillar of the earth it is the power of God. But the power of God cannot tremble, how then doth he ſay, When he ſhaketh the earth, the pillars thereof tremble?

Terræ columnæ infimas terræ partes ſignificant, quæ reliquam terræ molem impoſitam ſuſtinent; hæc ſunt veluti fundamenta & fulcra terræ.

In this place therefore we may expound the pillars of the earth for the lower parts of the earth, and ſo, though the whole globe of the earth taken together, be neither higher nor lower, yet in the parts of it from any point, ſome are higher, and ſome are lower, ſome above, and ſome beneath; upon what ſuperficies ſoever we are, the under parts thereof are (to us) the pillars of the earth. So the meaning is, He ſhaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble; that is, he ſhaketh it ſo terribly, that if it had any outward viſible pillars, thoſe pillars muſt need tremble.

Quo pacto terra firma & immota conſiſtit? quidnã pro vehiculo habet? cujus rei adminiculo ſulcitur? rationi nihil occurrit cui innitatur, ſi divinam voluntatem exceperis. Greg. Naz. Orat. 34. Suis librata ponderibus fixa manet.

In this we may obſerve the great power of God in upholding the earth. We ſee what the pillars of the earth are; the ſuppoſed pillars are no other then the lower parts of the earth, and the true pillar of the earth is no other then the power of God: There are no other buttreſſes or pillars upon which the earth is ſet, or by which it is ſuſtained: This huge weight of the whole earth and ſeas is born up by the thin air. Is not this an argument of the mighty power of God, that the air which is a body ſo weak, that if you throw a feather up into it, it will not ſtay there, but deſcend, yet the whole maſs or globe of earth and waters hang there? God poyſeth it meerly by its own weight; for he weighed the mountains in ſcales, and the hills in balances, Iſa. 40.12. He upholds all things by the word of his power; and hath built this great Caſtle in the Air. Could we enter into the ſecrets of nature, and ſet our faith awork by our ſenſes, about theſe things, we ſhould be raiſed above all fears in the greateſt difficulties. If we ſaw but a bullet, or a piece of lead of a pound, yea, of a penny weight, lifted up and hang in the air without any thing to ſupport it, we would conclude it a miracle. What think you, when all the lead and iron, and braſs, and ſtone that is in the world, hang in the air without any viſible ſtay?

I find ſome interpreting this clauſe as the former, in a figurative ſence, He ſhaketh the earth, that is, States, Kingdoms and Common-wealths; And the pillars thereof tremble, that is, they who ſeemed to be their ſtrongeſt ſupporters tremble and ſhake. This is a truth, and a profitable one for our meditation. To clear this;

First, We find the earth in Scripture often put for States and Kingdoms (Iſa. 24.20.) The earth ſhall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and ſhall be removed like a cottage, and the tranſgreſſion thereof ſhall be heavy upon it, and it ſhall fall, and not riſe again. The earth ſhall do this: what earth? He doth not mean the natural earth upon which men tread, but the people who tread upon the earth, or that Common-wealth wherein people are united and governed, theſe ſhall reel to and fro, and be removed like a cottage: As if he had ſaid, you thought your ſtate and Kingdom was ſetled like a ſtrong Caſtle, but I will take it down as a man takes down a little cottage, raddled only with a few ſticks and reeds. Or the meaning of it is, your Commonwealth that hath been founded by the wiſdom of ſo many Lawgivers, and is eſtabliſhed in ſo much riches and power, ſhall be removed as a poor cottage, through which every puff of wind finds a paſſage. The ſtrongeſt Kingdoms and Bulwarks of the earth are but as thatcht cottages when God takes them in hand. Fundavit legibus urbes.

Secondly, Pillars are often taken in a political ſence, Pſal. 75.3. The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are diſſolved. How comes it then to paſs that they are not utterly deſtroyed? It follows, I bear up the pillars of it, that is, I maintain Governors and Magiſtrates, ſome in places of power and authority, by whom ſhaking, tottering Kingdoms are upheld.

Further, There are Church-pillars as well as State-pillars; men of eminency in knowledge and learning, in parts and piety; theſe are pillars of the Church of God. So the Apoſtle calls James and Peter, Gal. 2.9. As the Church it ſelf is the pillar of truth, ſo ſome particular members are pillars of truth, bearing it up and holding it forth, as pillars do the Laws or Edicts of Princes and Commonwealths. As theſe pillars are of Gods ſetting up, ſo of Gods bearing up. In great ſhakings of the earth, Common-wealth-pillars tremble, and Church-pillars tremble; yea, they would fall, did not the Lord ſuſtain them with his hand. Οἱ δοκοῦντες στῦλοι εἶναι

From all, learn the inſtability of the creature. If that which is the baſis or foundation of all outward comforts be ſo eaſily ſhaken and toſt up and down, what are the comforts themſelves? If Kingdoms and Commonwealths totter, who can ſtand faſt? When the Saints feel the world ſhake and tremble under them, their comfort is; They have received a Kingdom that cannot be ſhaken. Neither men nor devils have any power to ſhake it, and God will not ſhake it; nay, with reverence we may ſpeak it, the Lord cannot ſhake that Kingdom, for it is his own: he cannot do any thing to his own wrong or diſhonour. Earth may, but heaven ſhakes not, neither ſhall any of the pillars thereof tremble for ever.

We have ſeen two acts of the mighty power of God; firſt, In removing thoſe mountains, thoſe great maſſie parts of the earth. Secondly, In ſhaking the whole maſs of the earth.

Now the thoughts of Job grow higher, and he aſcends from earth to heaven, and brings an inſtance of the power of God there, in the ſeventh verſe.

Verſe 7. Which commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not; and ſealeth up the Stars.

Sicut de ſ tura terr eſt immo litas & qnies, it natura ut ſempe moveatu Aquin.

And the inſtance which he makes in the heaven, ſtands (as heaven doth to earth) in a direct line of oppoſition to that which he gave about the earth. The earth in all the parts of it, is a fetled, fixed body, and therefore the power of God is clearly ſeen in cauſing it to move; but the Sun is a moveable body, a creature in continual motion; and therefore the power of God is clearly ſeen in checking and ſtopping the motion of it. It calls for as ſtrong a hand to make the Sun ſtand ſtill, as to ſhake and remove the earth. The ſtaying of that which naturally cannot but move, and the moving of that which naturally cannot but ſtand ſtill, require a like power; and that which ſtands as the earth doth, or moves as the Sun doth, requires an Almighty power to move or ſtay it.

Which commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not.

Which commandeth the Sun.] He deſcribes God in the poſture and language of a King, giving out commands. He commandeth. God is the Soveraign of the Sun. Yet the word in the Hebrew is no more, but, he ſaith, or, he ſpeaks to the Sun; ſo Mr. Broughton tranſlates, He ſpeaks to the Sun, that it riſeth not: We, clearly to the ſence, He commandeth the Sun, becauſe the word of God to the Creature, is a Law or a Command upon the Creature. אמר Dixit, i dicere e poteſtat perandi.

He commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not.

The phrase implies an ordinary or a common event. But when was there such a thing as this? How rare are such events? I may ask, Did the Lord ever command the Sun that it should not rise? Or did ever any day appear when the Sun did not appear? we may answer four or five wayes.

Non ad factum, sed ad Dei potentiã refertur, qui si velit, possit vicissitudinem ortus & occasus solis tollere. Olymp.

First, Some conceive Job speaks only of what God can do (as in the former instance) not what he ever did: He never actually gave out his command to the Sun that it should not rise; but he hath power to do it if he pleaseth. Many things are spoken of the power of God, as presently done, which only are things possible for him to do. That's a good interpretation of the place.

Non oritur sol, tantum est non appareat, nam & ortus solis apparitio quædam est. Bold.

Secondly, We may carry it further; for when he saith, It riseth not, we need not take it strictly, as if the Sun were staid from making day at all; but, it may note any stop or sudden disappearing of the Sun. The Suns rising is the Suns appearing; and when it disappeareth, or is hidden, it is to us as if the Sun were not risen. Thus God hath actually, more then once, given out a command to the Sun not to rise. Lavater (in his comment upon this place) reports, that in the year 1585. March 12. such a darkness fell upon the earth, that the fowls went to roost at noon, as if it had been Sun-setting, and all the common people thought the day of Judgment was come. That of the Prophet is true in the letter, as well as in the figure (Amos 4. 13.) He maketh the morning darkness. And (chap. 5. 8.) He turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night. The holy story records one famous act of God commanding the Sun to stand still (Josh. 10.12.) When Joshua was in pursuit of his enemies, he prayed that the day might not hasten down; Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou Moon in the valley of Ajalon; and the Sun stood still, &c. Joshua speaks as if himself could command the Sun. Sun, stand thou still; he talks to the Sun, as to his servant or child, stand still. It was indeed at the voyce of Joshua, but by the word and power of God, that the Sun stood still. So the Text resolves; There was no day like that before it or after it (no day so long as that) that the Lord hearkened to the voyce of a man. So then, the Lord hearkened to the voyce of a man, and then the Sun hearkened to the voyce of a man. First, the Lord hearkned, and then the Sun hearkened, that is, by a command from God at the request of a man the Sun stood still.

Thirdly, It may be understood of ordinary Eclipses, which are disappearings of the Sun; and though they come in a course of nature, and are by natural light foreseen many years before they come, yet there is somewhat in them which should fill us with high thoughts of the power of God. And though an eclipse of the Sun be no miracle, yet God once made, and can again make a miraculous eclipse. When Christ the Sun of Righteousness was shamefully crucified, the Sun in the heavens (as ashamed to look upon that act (as from man) of prodigious cruelty and injustice) hid his face; and from the sixth hour (that is, from high-noon) there was darkness over all the Land unto the ninth hour; that is, till three in the afternoon, Mat. 27.45. This eclipse was miraculous; first, because it was the full of the Moon. Which (as we receive from Antiquity) caused a great Philosopher (not knowing what was doing, or who was suffering at Jerusalem) to cry out, Either the God of Nature suffers, or the frame of Nature dissolves.

Dionysius Areopagita.

Secondly, Because it was universal (as some affirm) over all the world; or as others (which makes it more strange) that it was only in the Land of Judæa, all the world besides enjoying the light of the Sun at that time. Which Miracle stands opposite to that in Egypt, which was plagued with darkness, when the Israelites in Goshen enjoyed light; whereas then Judæa, where the Israelites dwelt, was covered with darkness, the rest of the world enjoying light.

Fourthly, Some refer this speech of Job's to that particular plague of darkness for three dayes in Egypt (last mentioned) which they conceive was then fresh in memory; and so Job had reference especially unto that, when he saith, He commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not. For though God at that time did not give a command to stop the Sun from rising upon all parts of the earth, yet he commanded the Sun not to arise upon that part; when his own people had light in Goshen, the Lord commanded the Sun not to rise upon the Egyptians. This is a more distinct act of the power of God. For, as he speaks, Amos 4. 7. (to note the accurateness as well as the power of God in his judgments) concerning the rain, I commanded the clouds (saith he) and I caused it to rain upon one City, and caused it not to rain upon another City: So the Lord can cause the Sun, if he please, to rise upon one Countrey, and not upon another; upon one Nation, and not upon another: upon one City, and not upon another. Thus we may understand it, He commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not upon one people, though it shineth upon others, according to the manner of that Egyptian plague.

Lastly, We may interpret it of an extraordinary tempestuous time, He commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not; that is, he makes such storms and tempests, and causeth such vapors and clouds in the air, that the Sun is muffled up, and is as if it did not rise. Such a day (he means of any troubles and afflictions) we have described in the Prophet Joel (chap. 2. 2.) A day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, as the morning upon the mountains. But how is a day of darkness as the morning? &c. The speech intends thus much, that this darkness shall spread it self as suddenly as the morning-light spreads it self upon the mountains, which being highest, are blest and gilded with the first issuing rayes of the rising Sun. God is said to command the Sun not to rise, when he vails and makes the face of the Sun with sudden clouds, as if there were no Sun at all but clouds. Paul, in his voyage to Rome, was under such a tempest, and the Text saith, That neither Sun nor Stars for many dayes appeared (Acts 27. 20.) They were as if the Sun had not risen for many dayes. Such stormy, gloomy weather God can make (Ezek. 32. 7.) When I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark, I will cover the Sun with a cloud, that is, I will put a black vail or cloak upon the heavens, that the Sun shall not put out any light, when I put them out; when I extinguish thee, I will (for a time) extinguish the Sun also. The constellations of heaven are often expressed sympathizing with the dispensations of God on earth, Isa. 13. 10. Joel 2. 31. Mat. 24. 29. He commandeth or speaketh to the Sun.

Hence observe, First, The bare word of God is a command.

Os in Scriptura pro voluntate sæpe accipitur, significat enim locutionem, locutione enim homines quid volunt manifestat. ἐπος.

He speaks to the Sun, and it riseth not. The Apostle useth that word about the creation of light, 2 Cor. 4. 6. The Lord who commandeth light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts. The Greek is, The Lord who spake light out of darkness, which we translate, The Lord who commanded the light out of darkness. The words of God are Laws, and therefore the ten Commandments, that part of the word which carries the name of commands from all the rest, is yet called The ten words of God. The Greeks call the ten Commandments the Decalogue, or the ten words; so many words, so many commands. The Devil seems to acknowledge this great power of God (only that he might abuse it) in Christ, that his word was a command. If thou be the Son of God (Mat. 4. 3.) command that these stones be made bread. The Greek is, If thou be the Son of God, speak to these stones that they become bread; or, speak these stones into bread; he would take that as a proof of his Divinity; If thou be the Son of God, do this: God can do this, his word is a command to all creatures; for whatsoever he imposeth upon them, they must submit to it, therefore do thou so likewise, speak to these stones, or command these stones to become bread.

It should be matter of comfort to us, while we remember that every word of God is a command upon all creatures; He hath made a decree which shall not pass (Psal. 148. 6.) The Hebrew is only, A word which shall not pass; his word is a decree which none shall reverse.

Secondly, As from the former clause [He commandeth the Sun.] we learn, That every word of God is a command; so, from that which followeth [And it riseth not] we may learn,

That, Every creature obeys the command, and submits to the will of God.

Men

Men often ſpeak, and ſpeak in the higheſt language of commanding, and yet the thing is not done; but whatſoever the Lord ſpeaks, is done. Every thing hath an ear to hear his voyce, who made both voyce and ear, Pſal. 148.8. Fire and hail, ſnow and vapour, ſtormy wind fulfilling his word. Senſleſs creatures act at Gods command, and go upon his errand; They fulfil his word. The Lord ſent a meſſage unto Hezekiah, to aſſure him that his ſickneſs was at his command, becauſe the Sun was, 2 King. 20.9, 10. Shall the ſhadow go forward ten degrees, or go backward ten degrees in the dial of Ahaz? Either way (ſaith the Lord) I can do it; either way, as thou ſhalt aſk a ſign, it ſhall be done. And Hezekiah anſwered, It is a light thing for the ſhadow to go down ten degrees, but let the ſhadow return backward ten degrees. Yet he knew the Lord did not offer him a light thing in either, when he ſaid, Shall the Sun go forward or backward? The Suns going forward was within a degree as great a matter as its going backward; but Hezekiah calls it a light matter, in regard of common apprehenſion and obſervation. The Suns motion is naturally forward, and though it ſhould mend its pace, many would not much regard it; but all would ſtand and wonder at a retrograde motion, or at the Sun going backward. Hence Hezekiah calls it a light matter for the Sun to go forward, comparatively to its going backward. And from either the Lord doth teach Hezekiah that his creatures will do what he bids them; even the Sun will move miraculouſly at his word. How great a rebuke will it be to man, if he move not at the command of God, and as God commands? Shall the Lord ſay to the Sun, riſe not, and it riſeth not; and ſhall he ſay to man, ſwear not, and he will ſwear; pray, and he will not pray? Shall the Lord have better obedience from his creatures without life, then from man, who hath not only life, but reaſon? or from Saints, who have not only reaſon, but grace? They who have grace, give not ſuch univerſal obedience as things without life; for though there be a part in them active to obey, yet there is a part backward to all obedience. Let it ſhame us that there ſhould be any thing in us (who have life, reaſon and grace) reſiſting, or not readily complying with all the commands of God, when the Sun, which hath not ſo much as life, obeys his voyce; He commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not.

Thirdly, Obſerve from the manner of this ſpeech,

That, The Lord hath a negative voyce upon the motion of all creatures.

He commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not. It is a Royal Prerogative that the Lord commands the Sun to riſe, but that the Lord hath a power to ſtay the Sun from riſing, lifts up his Prerogative to the higheſt. In all diſputes about power, his is reſolved to be greateſt, who hath the negative voyce, which checks and ſuperſedeates all others. This is the Prerogative of God, he can ſtay the motion of the Sun and of man. The Sun dares not do his office to the day, nor the Stars to the night, if the Lord ſay no. The Sun is deſcribed, Pſal. 19.5. like a Bridegroom coming out of his chamber, dreſt and prepared; and as a Giant rejoycing to run his race: but though the Sun be thus prepared and dreſt, and ready, yet if the Lord ſend a writ, and a prohibition to the Sun to keep within his chamber, he cannot come forth, his journey is ſtopt. Thus alſo he ſtops man in his neareſt preparations for any action. If the Lord will work, who ſhall let it? Iſa.43.13. That is, there is no power in heaven or earth which can hinder him. But if the Lord will let, who ſhall work? Neither Sun, nor Stars, nor Men, nor Devils can work, if he forbid them. The point is full of comfort. God tells Abimelech in the caſe of Sarah, Abraham's wife, whom he took into his houſe, I know thou didſt it in the integrity of thy heart, but I with-held thee, and I ſuffered thee not to touch her, Gen. 20. 6. And when Laban purſued Jacob with hard thoughts againſt him, and ſtrong reſolutions to deal harſhly with him; the Lord gave a negative voyce (Gen. 31.24.) Take heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good or bad. Laban had not the uſe of his own tongue; He could not ſpeak either good or bad. Not good or bad! Was there any hurt for Laban to ſpeak good to Jacob? And the ſtory tells us, That Laban ſpake many words, and ſome bad enough to Jacob, charging him with a double theft; Firſt, for ſtealing himſelf away, verſe 26. Wherefore didſt thou ſteal away from me? Secondly, For ſtealing his Idols, verſe 30. And now though thou wouldſt needs be gone, becauſe thou longeſt ſore after thy fathers houſe, yet wherefore haſt thou ſtoln away my gods? Foul language all, though God charged him not to ſpeak a bad word to Jacob. For anſwer, know, We muſt reſtrain that reſtraint to the point of bringing Jacob back again, Thou ſhalt not ſpeak either good or bad to him, to ſtop or turn him from his way, thou ſhalt uſe no threatnings to bring him back to thee; no, nor any promiſes or allurements; thou ſhalt make no offers of better entertainment to win him to thy ſervice, which was the thing he ſo much deſired. Good and bad are the two terms of all that can be ſpoken; and where the utmoſt extreams of ſpeaking are forbidden, all ſpeaking to that purpoſe, is forbidden. When the ancient people of God were few in number, yea, very few, and ſtrangers in the Land, when they went from one Nation to another, from one Kingdom to another people, one would think, that all the world would have been upon them; but here was their protection, God had a negative voyce, Pſal. 105.15. He ſuffered no man to do them wrong. Many had (as we ſay) an aking tooth at the people of God, their fingers itcht to be dealing with them, and the text ſhews four advantages the world had againſt them. Firſt, They were few. Secondly, Very few. Thirdly. Strangers. Fourthly, Unſetled. What hindered their enemies? It was the Lords negative voyce. He reproved Kings for their ſake, ſaying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my Prophets no harm. We ſee an inſtance of this, Gen. 35.5. When Jacob and his family journeyed, the terror of God was upon the Cities that were round about them, and they did not purſue after the ſons of Jacob. They had a mind to purſue after them, to revenge the ſlaughter of the Sichemites, but God ſaid, Purſue not: and then they could not purſue, they muſt ſtay at home. And when his people the Jews were ſafe in Canaan, he encourages them to come up freely to worſhip at Jeruſalem, by this aſſurance, No man ſhall deſire the Land, when thou ſhalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God thrice in the year, Exod. 24.34. God can ſtop not only hands from ſpoiling, but hearts from deſiring. Our appetite, whether concupiſcible, or iraſcible, is under his command, as well as our actions. The Prophet aſſerts this by way of queſtion (Lam. 3.37.) Who is he that ſaith, and it cometh to paſs, when the Lord commandeth it not? That is, if the Lord doth not concur, if the Lord vote againſt the ſaying or command of any man in the world, what he ſaith, ſhall never come to paſs.

We ſhould conſider this to help our faith in theſe times. God hath a negative voice upon thoſe counſels and concluſions which are carried with one conſent of men; And the wrath of man ſhall either turn to his praiſe, or all that is beyond that, he will ſtop, the remainder of wrath (namely, ſo much as remaines over and above what turns to the praiſe of God) ſhalt thou reſtrain, Pſal. 76.6. The ſword is in motion againſt us, even as the Sun; and the ſword ſeemeth to have received a charge to paſs from one end of the Land to the other; yet a countermand from God, will ſtop this ſword from going on. If he ſpeak to the ſword, the ſword ſhall wound no more. We may intreat the ſword to wound no more, as they (Jer. 47.6.) cried out, O thou ſword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put thy ſelf into thy ſcabbard, reſt and be ſtill. The anſwer was, How can it be quiet, ſeeing the Lord hath given it a charge againſt Askelon? &c. Our anſwer might be (changing place) the ſame, How can it be quiet, ſeeing the Lord hath given it a charge againſt England? A word from God draws, and a word from God ſheaths the ſword. He that commands the Sun, and it riſeth not, can command the ſword, and it ſmiteth not; the fire, and it burns not; the water, and it drowns not; the Lions, and they devour not. How happy are they who ſerve the Lord over all!

Fourthly obſerve, Seeing He commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not,

That, The dayly riſing of the Sun is an act of grace and favour to the world.

The Sun doth not riſe alone of it ſelf; it is the Lord (as we may ſay) that helps us every morning. Therefore it is ſaid (Mat. 5.45.) He makes his Sun to riſe: His Sun, Mark how Chriſt ſpeaks of the Sun, as Gods own, that

Sun

Sun which he can either cause to rise or not to rise, cause to rise upon one people, and not upon another; He maketh his Sun to rise; there is an act of common grace in making it to rise upon all, upon the evil, and upon the good, Mat. 5. 53. That God makes the Sun to rise to give them light, who use their eyes only to rebel against the light, how admirable is it?

Lastly, As to the special aim of Job, we see what a proof we have of the omnipotency of God, He is great in power, and mighty in strength; Why? Because he can stop the Sun. He that can stay the Sun, what can he not do? We say to men that attempt impossibilities, Climb up to the Moon; it is more to stay the Sun, then to climb the Moon. And if the Lord be able to overcome this difficulty, what difficulty can he not overcome? Here's a clear proof of the infinite power and wisdom of God, He speaks to the Sun, and it riseth not. And,

He sealeth up the Stars.

Qui effecit noctem & diem, nam donec ortus sol est, nox & adveniente die, quasi obsignatæ occultantur stellæ Jun.

The Sun is the light of the day, the Stars the light of the night; He sealeth up the Stars. Some take it to be a Periphrasis, or a description of night and day, because till the Sun riseth, it is night, and when the day appears, the Stars are sealed up, or disappear: The Sun riseth, and the Stars are obscured, we see them not. So the former clause, He commandeth the Sun, and it riseth not, is a description of the night; and this latter, He sealeth up the Stars, is a description of the day. The plain sence of both being this, He maketh both night and day.

Pro stellis signavit (sc. solem) signaculo, quasi in favorem stellarum Deus continet solis splendorem in altero Hemisphærio. Cajet.

Secondly (say others) this seal is set upon the Sun, in behalf of the stars, He sealeth up the Sun for the stars, that is, in favour of the stars; that the stars might sometime appear in their lustre and glory to the world, he keepeth the Sun from appearing.

But (as we translate) we may better keep the seal upon the stars, He sealeth up the stars.

Annulos nō tam ornatus quam custodiæ gratia olim inventos dicit. Macrob. l. 7 Satur. c. 3. Clausa videntur, cum non videntur.

And so, sealing may import either of these two things.

First, The safe custody of the stars, He sealeth up the stars, that is, he preserveth the stars in their Orbs, in the places where he hath set them, they shall never drop out. Sealing is often used for assurance and safe keeping. Darius, Dan. 6. sealed the stone upon the Den of Lions, that so Daniel might not be rescued or fetcht out from the danger. The Jews, that they might keep Christ fast enough, sealed the stone of the Sepulcher wherein his body was laid, Mat. 27. And in a spiritual sence, the sealing of the Spirit is to make the soul safe in the love and favour of God. A soul that is sealed by the Spirit of God, is secured of the love of God, and shall never drop out of his heart. So, He sealeth up the stars, is, He makes the stars firm and fast in their spheares. But rather,

Stellæ & omnia cœli lumina, velut characteres quidā efficiunt librum. Pin.

Secondly, Sealing is for secresie, or for the hiding of a thing from the sight of others: So in the sealing of Letters, that they may not be seen, and of treasures, that they be not stoln or taken away, Deut. 32. 34. Job 14. 17. Thus the Lord seals up the stars, when he clouds or obscures the stars, and will not let them be seen. Some make it an allusion to a Book. The Heavens are a great volume, wherein many Truths of God are written, his Name is there, and the stars are so many Characters or Letters of his Name. He often seals up this great volume, and so blots these Letters, that no man can read or distinguish them.

Thirdly, The meaning of He sealeth up the stars, may be taken thus, He keeps in, and closes up the virtue and influences of the stars; he stops those treasures which usually come down from the stars upon the earth. Natural Philosophy teaches us, that all the fatness and fruitfulness of the earth is conveyed from the heavens. Heaven nurses and suckles the earth; and if the Lord please, he can dry up those breasts, seal up those influences, stop those secret workings which the heavenly bodies have upon the earth.

Hence observe, That, The influences of the Heavens are in the hand of God, to let them out, or stay them when he pleaseth.

As he can seal up the spiritual treasures of heaven, that the soul shall receive no light, comfort or refreshing from them in Ordinances, so he seals up the natural influences of the heavens, that the earth and the fruits of it here below, shall receive no quickning, no refreshing from them. And the earth languishes when the Lord suspendeth and sealeth up the natural influences of heaven; as the soul languisheth, when the Lord stops up the spiritual influences of heaven, when he seals up the Star of Jacob, that day-star from on high, Jesus Christ,

What we hear of God in natural things, should keep us in continual dependance upon him for spirituals; he seals with the comforts of his own Spirit, and he seals up all comforts from our spirits.

Verse 8. Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the Sea.

This verse gives us a further argument of the mighty power of God. See how Job's discourse moves from earth to heaven, and from the heavens down to the sea. He searches for the wonders of Gods power and wisdom, in heaven, and earth, and in the waters. Before he shews God stopping the course of the Sun, and sealing up the stars; now spreading out of the heavens, and treading upon the Sea.

He spreadeth out the heavens.

The heavens in reference to the earth, are the upper part of the world. The heavens are (as it were) the roof of the great house which God made, or as a spangled canopy over our heads. He spreadeth out the heavens: The word is of the Dual Number in the Hebrew, and hath divers derivations, which are considerable to enlighten us in this point.

שמאיים a שם Nomen, gloria, decus, quia cœlum est ornatissima pars mundi. Mar. in Lex Philos. Anshi Hashem.

He spreadeth out the heavens.] Some derive it from Shem, which signifies a name, a name of honour and dignity; Men of name are men of renown, Gen. 6. 4. The heavens are the most glorious, beautiful and renowned part of the Creation, their name is above every name of inanimate creatures.

Others, because there are waters above in these heavens, derive the word from (Sham) which is an adverb of place, and (Majim) which signifies waters; as much as to say, there are waters, or there is the place where God hath fountains and stores of water. All his waters are not upon the earth, he hath Waters and Springs in heaven.

Paulus Fagius in Gen. 1.

A third takes it from a simple, not a compound word, being near the Ishmaelitish word Shama, noting only superiority in place, high or above.

שמאיים a שמם Obstupuit, propter insignem vastitatē ipsius corporis, quæ ipsa nos aspicientes, in stuporem rapit. Pisc. in Gen. 1.

A fourth opinion derives it from Schamem, which signifies, to be amazed, or to make one at a stand with wonder: And the reason is given, because the heavens are such a vast stupendious body, that if a man look upon them exactly, they will amaze him. Who can observe the Sun, Moon and Stars, and not wonder and be transported at their vastness and beauty, at the swiftness and regularity of their motions; it is above the reach and apprehension of natural reason, how the Lord should fashion and spread out such heavens.

But, What are these Heavens which he spreadeth forth? Heaven is sometimes expressed with an addition, The highest heavens, the third heavens, in 2 Cor. 12. 12. The heaven of heavens, 1 Kings 8. 27. Paul was rapt up to the third heavens, that is, in visions and revelations he was brought as near to God himself as a creature possibly can. Of this heaven we are to understand that, Gen. 1. 1. Where Moses saith, In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth was without form and void. He doth not say, the heavens which God created at first, was without form and void, but the earth was without form and void; for that heaven was a perfect creature. We read further, of the creating of those heavens which we see, of the visible heavens, which are the continent of the Sun, Moon and Stars. But, In the beginning God created the heaven, that heaven, which by way of eminency is called, The habitation of his holiness and of his glory, Isa. 63. 15. This was created in the beginning, and then, it is conceived the Angels were likewise created; but the earth which was then made, was an imperfect creature, and all other corporeal creatures with their several forms and fulness, were extracted out of the earth, which was without form and void. The very heavens (which we see) were made out of that first earth; the Sun, Moon and the Stars,

Stars, yea, the very light it ſelf was made out of that earth, that general heap of matter which the Lord created at firſt, and is ſaid to have been without form and void. But the heaven which we call the heaven of heavens, the third heaven, or the higheſt heaven, was a perfect creature the firſt day, made without any pre-exiſtent matter whatſoever by the power of God. This heaven is the largeſt of all the heavens which God ſpread out.

Secondly, Take heavens for the viſible heavens. I intend not to ſtay upon Philoſophical conſiderations, only what the Scripture holds forth; we find heavens put, firſt for the ſtarry heavens, or the firmament where the ſtars have their motion, that's the heaven meant (Gen. 1.17. Pſal. 8. 7. Pſal. 19. 1.). This, according to the doctrine of Aſtronomers, is diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral orbs and ſpheres, in ſeven of which ſeven ſpecial ſtars are ſaid to move, and all the reſt to be fixed in the eighth.

The Apoſtle Jude ſeems to give a hint of thoſe planetical orbs (Jude, verſ. 13.) where he juſtly reproacheth unſetled ſpirits by the name of wandering Stars or Planets, to whom is reſerved the blackneſs of darkneſs for ever.

Thirdly, Heaven is taken in Scripture for a nearer heaven, for all that which is below the Moon, for the air and the clouds. Hence the birds are ſaid to fly in the heavens; and (Gen. 8. 2.) the rain from heaven was reſtrained, that is, the rain from the clouds, for there is no rain in that heaven above the clouds.

Triplex eſt cœlum aerium ſidereum, ac aliud hiſuperius inviſibile & divinũ. Dam. l. 2. de orthodox. fide.

Heaven is a building of three ſtories. The firſt ſtory, is the air and clouds, up to the Moon. The ſecond ſtory reaches all the Planets and Stars. The third story is alſo called, the third heaven, or the heaven of heavens, the place of his moſt glorious reſidence, who filleth heaven and earth.

All theſe heavens the Lord ſpreadeth out.

There is a threefold ſpreading forth of a thing.

Firſt, By contuſion or beating with hammers, as a maſs of Gold or Silver, &c. is ſpread into thin plates and leaves.

Secondly, By way of rarefaction or attenuation; water is rarified by fire, and ſo are metals, when they are melted or cauſed to run with extream heat. In alluſion to which Elihu ſpeaks in his challenge to Job (Chap. 37. 18.) haſt thou with him ſpread out the ſky which is ſtrong, and as a molten looking-glaſs. The ſky is of a weak, ſleight matter, not hard, maſſie, or elemental, yet it is ſtrong; the nature of it being incorruptible, the figure of it round and indiſſoluble. And it is compared to a looking glaſs, for the clearneſs of it; thoſe inſtruments were made, ſome of glaſs, ſome of ſteel or braſs, molten and poliſht for that purpoſe.

Thirdly, A thing is ſpread forth by unfolding the parts, as a tent or a curtain is ſpread, and thus the ſpreading of the heavens is deſcribed, Pſal. 104. 1, 2. O Lord, thou art cloathed with honour and majeſty, thou ſtretcheſt out the heavens like a curtain. God took the vaſt matter folded together, and ſpread it as a curtain, Tabernacle or Tent. And the Latine word which carries the interpretation of this in the Hebrew, is frequently applied by ancient Authors, to the pitching of Tents in War. In this third ſence we are ſpecially to underſtand the Text, Alone ſpreadeth out the Heavens.

Hîc Dolapũ manum, hîc ſævus tendebat Achilles Virg. 2. Æneiad. Juxta horros tendebat. Suet. in Galb. c. 12. de Germanorum cohorte. Et milites tendere omnes extra vallum juſſit. Pac. l. 13.

And ſo this ſpreading is either an expoſition of the nature of the heavens (Gen. 1. 8.) The Lord ſaid, Let there be a firmament; the Hebrew is, Let there be an expanſion, or a ſtretching forth. Theſe heavens are ſo much ſpread forth, that they are called, a thing ſpread forth; and ſo the Text is a deſcription of the heavens in their firſt Creation. Or, it may refer to the words going before, and ſo theſe are a reaſon to ſhew that God can command the Sun, and ſeal up the Stars, why? He ſpreadeth forth the heavens; that is, the heavens are all of his making, and at his diſpoſing; he ſet the Sun there, and put the Stars there, he faſhioned the orbs in which they are placed, and therefore he can ſtay the Sun, and ſeal up the Stars.

Cœlum ſive firmamentũ vocatur רקיע eo quod eſt expanſum & extenſum ſuper terrã.

And as he thus ſpreadeth out the heavens, ſo, which is more obſervable, He ſpreadeth them out alone. When a piece of hangings, or the like of a large extent is to be ſpread forth, one man cannot do it, many hands are put to that work. It is an axiom in Divinity, That no creature can be an inſtrument in Creation: this ſtretching forth of the heavens is an act of Creation, therefore he alone doth it, there is none to help him.

Inſtrumentũ creationis creatura eſſe non poteſt.

Yet we find that God had ſome other with him, when he ſtretched out the heavens, though it be here attributed to him alone: and though Elihu expoſtulates with Job in this point (Chap. 37. 18.) Haſt thou with him ſpread out the ſky which is ſtrong, and as a molten looking-glaſs? Elihu would bring down the thoughts of Job, which he conceived were too much lifted up, by ſhewing that God did this alone; Job (ſaith he) didſt thou hold one part of this great Curtain or Canopy of heaven in thy hand, and God another; and was it ſo ſpread out between you? No, neither man nor Angel was his helper; who then was with God in this work? Solomon tells us (Prov. 8. 27.) When he prepared the heavens I was there, when he ſet a compaſs upon the face of the depth. Who was that? I wiſdom was there. Jeſus Chriſt was there. Chriſt was he by whom God prepared and ſtretched forth the heavens. No creature was there, only the uncreated creating Son of God. God created alone, that is, without the help of any creature; but he created all things by the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made, that was made. Obſerve from hence, Solus, qui nemo extra ipſum cum ipſo, ſed unum cum ipſo ille qui in ipſo per identitatem ſubſtantiæ ſunt verbo enim Domini firmati ſunt cœli & ſpiritu oris ejus omnis virtus eorum. Solum enim divinitas facit, quæ una ita ſola.

First, The heavens are as the royal tent and pavilion of the Lord.

He ſpreadeth them out.] The Lord is often expreſt coming out of the heavens with warlike preparations: There his tent is pitcht, and he ſitteth there, as a great Commander in his pavilion, to give out orders to his Armies. He hath an hoſt in heaven, and therefore he hath a tent in heaven; or rather heaven is his tent. The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind, and in the ſtorm, and the clouds are the duſt of his feet, Nah. 1. 3. God pitches his battel in heaven; The ſtars in their courſes fought againſt Siſera. He fought from heaven; from thence he diſcharged his great Artilery, his Cannons thundered and lightened againſt the enemies of his people. He hath alſo his ſtore houſes for ammunition, his Magazines there (Job 38.22.) Haſt thou (ſaith God to Job) entred into the treaſures of the ſnow? Or haſt thou ſeen the treaſures of the hail, which I have reſerved againſt the time of trouble, the day of battel and war? He ſpeaks of heaven as of a great ſtore-houſe, where he hath his arms, his powder and ball, all his warlike proviſion laid up againſt the day of battel. Heathens have ſpoken ſuch language, calling ſtorms and tempeſt, hail and thunder, The weapons and engines of the Armory of heaven.

Eſt alluſio ad armamentaria publica ubi armorum machinarum & tormentorũ ingens apparatus reconditus Bol. Quiſquis habent telorum armamentaria cœli. Juv. Sat. 13.

Secondly, In that he ſaith, He ſtretcheth out the heavens alone, Obſerve,

That the Lord needs not the help of any creature to do his greateſt works.

He hath power, and he hath power in himſelf to do what he hath a will ſhould be done; let all the creatures in the world ſtand ſtill, yet God can carry his work forward. What work is like this, the ſtretching forth the heavens: There cannot be a work of ſo much difficulty under heaven, as the ſpreading forth of the heavens. He who did that alone, what can he not do alone? Though men will not, though men cannot help, the Lord can and will alone. Iſa. 59. 16. He ſaw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no interceſſor; no man to do, no man to ſpeak in that buſineſs, not a man appeared: what then? Doth the Lord ſay, Well, ſeeing there is no man to do, I alſo will let it lie? No, Therefore his arm brought ſalvation unto him, and his power ſuſtained him; he did it alone. Paul ſpeaks of himſelf, that at his firſt appearing before Nero, all men forſook him, not a man would own him, but (ſaith he) The Lord ſtood by me (2 Tim. 4. 15.) This is a great encouragement to us in great affairs and buſineſſes, in the greateſt ſtraits and difficulties of the times; if men forſake and deſert, the Lord alone can do all for us; if men have not power to do what they have will to do, nor will to do what they have power; then remember, He that ſtretcheth out the heavens alone, can order our works alone, alone, compoſe our differences alone, conquer our enemies alone. God alone is infinite, greater, ſtronger, wiſer, then all creatures together. God can be now as he will be hereafter, all in all unto us. God is enough for us without any creature; yea, God and all that he hath made cannot do more then God without any thing that he hath made.

Solus ſine cujuſquam auxilio.

And treadeth upon the waves of the Sea.

The Sea is a fluid body; to ſail or ſwim in the waters is ordinary, but to tread upon the waters, that's another act of wonder, He treadeth upon the waves of the Sea; or he walks on them as upon a pavement.

Verbū Darac aliquando eſt ducis præliantis & debellantis hoſtes. Quaſi jure belli ſubjicere.

To tread upon the waves.] Imports, that God hath a command over the Sea, and the waves of it. To tread upon a thing is to have it under our power, or in ſubjection to us (Pſal. 91. 13.) the promiſe is, Thou ſhalt tread upon the Lion, and upon the Aſp; that is, thou ſhalt prevail and triumph over the greateſt evils, over enemies as ſtrong and fierce as Lions, as poiſonous and ſtinging as the Aſp, Pſal. 108. 9. Over Edom will I caſt out my ſhoe. Which notes either contempt of them; as if he had ſaid, I look upon them as worthy only to ſcrape and make clean my ſhoes. Or ſecondly, Conqueſt over them; I will walk thorow Edom and ſubdue it. Deut. 11. 24. Every place whereon the ſole of your feet ſhall tread ſhall be yours; that is, yours ſhall be conquering feet, you ſhall tread as Lords upon all lands. Yours ſhall be all the ground you go on, that is, it ſhall be ſubject to you. Judg. 5. 21. O my ſoul, thou haſt troden down ſtrength; and Mic. 1. 3. The Lord ſhall tread upon the high places of the earth; that is, the Lord ſhall ſubject the higheſt things that are upon the earth to his power. That place is very obſervable, Numb. 24. 17. Where Balaam propheſying of Chriſt, ſaith (as we tranſlate) A Star ſhall come out of Jacob; the Hebrew is, A Star ſhall tread out of Jacob, noting Chriſt a victorious, a triumphing Star, who ſhould come treading and trampling upon the world as conqueror; though the world, in regard of his out-ſide, trod and trampled upon him: So it is explained in the latter words of the verſe, He ſhall ſmite the corners of Moab, and deſtroy all the children of Sheth. A Star ſhall tread out of Jacob. A treading Star is a triumphing Star.

Calcabit ſtella è Jacob.

The Hebrew is, He treadeth upon the high places of the Sea; the word (Bamoth) is uſed frequently for the places where idolatrous worſhip was ſet up, their high places. Mr. Broughton tranſlates, the high waves of the Sea; becauſe Sea-waves riſe high, ſo high, that the Pſalmiſt deſcribes them, mounting up to the heaven (Pſal. 107. 26.) When theſe high waves threaten to ſwallow all, then the Lord treads upon them, that is, his power is above them, and he makes them ſubmit to his command. As to ride upon the high places of the earth (Deut. 32. 13. Iſa. 58. 14.) is to have higheſt command, and to be a chief upon the earth, or to dwell ſafely and free from annoyance upon the earth: So to tread upon the high places or high waves of the Sea, implies Gods Empire or Soveraignty over the Sea. Hence obſerve,

First, That the Sea in its higheſt rage is at the beck, and under the treadings of God.

When the waves are moſt ſtirring and raging, he ſpeaks them quiet, Pſal. 89. 9. Thou ruleſt the raging of the Sea, when the waves thereof ariſe, thou ſtilleſt them. As to walk upon the Sea, is an argument of a divine power; ſo to command the Sea. When Chriſt (Matth. 8. 26.) rebuked the Sea, and ſaid, as another Goſpel hath it (Mark 4. 38.) Peace and be ſtill, as if one ſhould huſh a child; The men marvelled, ſaying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the Sea obey him? Winds and waves ſeem the moſt diſobedient, ſtubborn and unteachable creatures in the world; yet a word from God calms the one, and ſmooths the other. When the old Egyptians would by their Hieroglyphicks expreſs an impoſſibility, they did it by the picture of a man treading upon the waves; as if they ſhould ſay, this is as impoſſible as for a man to walk upon the waves. The Heathen Poets deſcribe Neptune their Sea-god, ſwimming, not walking upon, or treading the waters. To tread upon the waters is ſo much above man, that meer Naturaliſts thought it too much for God. Man ſhews his pride and arrogancy to the height, when he pretends to Lord it over the waves of the Sea. When the Helleſpont, a Streight of the Sea, by a ſudden ſtorm riſing upon it, broke the bridge of Boats, which Xerxes had made to paſs into Greece, and ſo oppoſed the project of that Perſian Monarch; he caſt fetters into it, as if he would teach it to know it's Lord, and cauſed it to be beaten with three hundred ſtripes, to chaſten it's former diſobedience. It is recorded in the Hiſtory of this Nation, concerning Canute an ancient Daniſh King, that when a mighty ſtorm of flattery roſe upon him, he appeaſed it by ſhewing he could not appeaſe the ſtorms of the Sea. One of his Courtiers told him in his progreſs, as he rode near the Sea ſide, that he was Lord not only of the Land, but of the Sea, and that all thoſe Seas which he ſaw, were at his command. Well, ſaith he, we ſhall ſee that by and by, and ſo walketh down to the ſhore, and pulling off his upper garment, wraps it together, and ſits upon it near the flowing of the waves, and with a loud voice ſpeaks thus, O ye Seas and Waves come no further, Touch not my feet, &c. But the Sea came up, notwithſtanding his charge, and confuted that flattery. God only hath this Prerogative, He treadeth upon the high waves of the Sea.

There are alſo myſtical waves, which the Lord treadeth upon: people and Nations are called waters, and many waters, in the Book of the Revelation. The waves of the Sea cannot be in a greater rage, then the Nations of the earth ſometimes are. And the ſame Hebrew word by which the rage of the Sea is properly expreſt, expreſſes alſo the rage of men (Pſal. 2. 1.) Why do the Heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? Why are the Gentiles, the great waters up, as high waves, threatning a deluge to the throne of Chriſt? The power of Chriſt is as eminent in ſtilling the rage of the myſtical, as of the literal waters; yea, we find theſe two matcht together (Pſal. 65. 7.) He ſtilleth the noiſe of the Seas, the noiſe of their waters, and the tumult of the people. Hence the Apoſtle Jude (verſ. 13.) calls wicked men, raging waves of the Sea, foaming out their own ſhame. The Lord ſitteth upon theſe floods; yea, the Lord ſitteth King for ever, Pſal. 29. 10.

There are other myſtical waves, even waves within us, which will not be trodden upon by any foot, but Gods. There is a Sea of wickedneſs in every mans heart by nature. Every wicked man is nothing but a Sea, he is a Sea of wickedneſs. The wicked (Iſa. 57. 20.) are like the troubled Sea, when it cannot reſt. And as the winds blow from all quarters of the heavens, and ſtrive upon the Seas: So there are divers luſts, which as winds ſtrive upon the face of mans heart; the luſt of pride, the luſt of covetouſneſs, the luſts of ambition, of envy, of malice, theſe enrage and ſwell the waters. The Lord treads upon the high waves of this Sea alſo, he reſtrains and keeps luſt down by his power, it would drown all elſe. Theſe raging waves ſwell too high in his own people; it is the work of his Spirit to tread theſe down; and when the winds of ſeveral temptations raiſe thoſe waves, he it is that commands them down. Who amongſt us is there, that one time or other finds not corruption raging, as the high waves of the Sea? How mighty and powerful is the Lord in that great work of his effectual grace, treading upon the waves of this Sea, remaining corruption in his ſervants and children!

Verſ. 9. Which maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South.

In aſtrorum pulchritudine, ſitu, ordine, vi, ſtupendiſq; in hac inferiora operationibus, admirabilis prorſus creatoris magnificentia & magnitudo plurimum elucet. Bold.

In the verſe immediately before, we heard of the power of God in ſtretching out the heavens; and in this we have his excellent skill, and infinite wiſdom diſplayed in adorning, decking and beautifying thoſe heavens which he had ſtretched forth. He hath not only drawn out a vaſt piece of work, like a large Canopy (ſuch are the heavens) but he hath embroidered this Canopy, and ſet it with rich ſparkling ſtones; he hath made ſeveral engravings, images, figures and repreſentations upon it.

Or we may make the connexion with the latter clauſe of the former verſe. Job having ſaid that the Lord treadeth upon the high waves of the Sea; that when the Seas are moſt most stormy and tempestuous, they are at his command, and that their confusions are under his empire and order; he adds this verse by way of answer to a possible objection. For some might say, the motion of the seas is from the power and influences of the stars, from the rising and setting of the Moon, with other Planets and Constellations. True, saith Job, yet the Lord is he that treadeth upon the waves of the sea, it is the Lord that orders them, and not the stars: Though the stars and constellations have a dominion over the seas in their ebbings and flowings, motions and revolutions, yet there is a Lord who hath power, not only over the seas, but over that which overpowers the seas, even over the stars of heaven. He maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South; which stars, according to the doctrine of Astronomy, have a special power upon the seas.

Cum multa sint astra hominibus & fluctibus infensa, eorũ præcipuè meminit, quorum vis ad ciendas tempestates hominibus magis est explorata. Sanct.

Either of these wayes we may make the connexion.

First; That Job would express the adorning of the heavens, after he had spoken of their making and stretching forth.

Or secondly, He would teach us, that though the heavens work upon the seas, yet God works upon the heavens. He maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South.

I shall endeavour to speak of these distinctly: The holy Ghost giving us such a Text, it is not lightly to be passed by; and though here are strange words and uncouth expressions, yet we may (I hope) bring them down to an easie meaning, and fit them to the understanding of the simplest.

I shall touch a little in the general, before I come to every one in particular.

Stella est densior pars orbis; ideo lucent astra, non cœli; quia hi diaphani sunt, & rari, astra autem densa, eoq; lucem retinentia & reflectentia. Magir. Phys.

Job under these names couches many of the stars of heaven. A Star (according to Philosophy) is the thicker part of his Orb or Sphear; it is thicker then other parts of the heavens; for otherwise as it could not hold the light, so it could not reflect and send forth the light; it could not be a vessel for light, or a conveyance for light. Light was created the first day (Gen. 1. 3.) but the Lights were created the fourth day (Gen. 1. 14.) that is, certain vessels were created to hold the light. And God said, Let there be Lights in the firmament of heaven, that is, let the light which is now scattered through all, be gathered in certain receptacles, fit to keep, and yet fitted to transmit and disperse it into all parts of the world; Let them be for lights in the firmament of heaven to give light, vers. 15.

Of these Lights or Stars, some are called moving, and others fixed. That's the doctrine of Astronomers, and it is the doctrine of the Scripture. The Apostle Jude (verse 13.) calling some wandring stars, seems to admit of that distinction of the stars, into wandring and fixed. The unfixt or wandring stars are seven, known by their names and motions. These in the Text are none of them, these are placed above them.

The seat of these Asterismes is in the eighth spear (to take that doctrine for granted, though many dispute it) or story of the heavens (so the Prophet Amos speaks, chap. 9. 2. He buildeth his stories in the heavens; we put in the Margin, spheares; He buildeth his spheares in the heavens, which being one above another, are elegantly called the stories of heaven.) And in the eighth sphear innumerable stars are fixed; some of which fall under special observation and numeration. Astronomers give us a Catalogue of a thousand three and twenty stars, which they exactly distinguish; which is the ancient account. And since that, we have had many more discoveries by those noble Navigators, who have made thorow-lights to the world, that the East might look into the West, and the South into the North: The travel, study and experiments of these Masters in Navigation, have brought us in an additional number of three hundred stars more. And so we reckon a thousand three hundred and twenty three fixed stars, known by name; of which, these in the Text are a part.

The other stars are both innumerable and un-nameable, beyond number, and without name. Hence, when the Lord shewed Abraham how great his seed should be, he carries him out, and bids him look towards heaven, and tell the stars, if he were able to number them, Gen. 15. 5.

The stars (to come a little nearer to the text) observed and numbred by Students in this great volume of the heavens, are distinguished into forty and one images or representations, whereof some (for Learnings sake) are fancied the images of men and women, others the images of Beasts and Fishes, others the images of things without life. Of these images, twelve are in the Zodiack, commonly called the twelve Signes. In the Southern part of the Sphear eleven of those Signes are placed, and in the Northern eighteen, which added to twelve in the Zodiack, make up the number of forty one.

Omnes hæ stellarum [illegible] magines nõ tantum ordine & situ rum etiã certis nomi nibus inter se distincti sunt.

Now, when it is said in the Text, That God maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South. We are not to take them for so many distinct and particular stars, but for constellations or configurations, because they stand in such a form or figure; and so for the better knowledge of them, they are called by the names of such creatures as they seem to represent.

We have three of those special figures here in the Text, and one more general. Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades are three figures or starry representations in the eighth sphear, I will open their Hebrew names; as also the Latine and Greek names used commonly in translations, by which we shall get a clearer understanding in the nature of the things themselves.

Which maketh Arcturus.

The word Gnesh in Hebrew, signifies a meeting or congregating of many things together; because in that one, many stars are joyned. Arcturus in Greek, is as much as to say, The tail of the Bear, because the stars called Arcturus, stand in a figure like the tail of a Bear.

quod est, commeat, vel undiquaq; convenire. Arcturus stella est in cauda minoris Ursæ, & Septentrio dicitur, παρὰ τὴν τῆς ἀρκτου ὄψιν, ab ursinæ caudæ similitudine.

The second Asterisme, which we translate Orion, is called in Hebrew (Cheſil) and that signifies either constancy or inconstancy (the sence runs both wayes) setledness or variableness. And it is applied to this star or constellation in either sence.

כסיל
Constantiæ robur, vel inconstantiæ significat, quod ejus ortu tempestates orbem varie turbat. Bol.

First, For constancy or setlednes, because there is much strength in the influences of that constellation.

Or secondly, For inconstancy and unsetledness, because it is observed, that upon the rising of this star, there is much variety, changeableness and unsetledness in the weather. Hence the Jews call that Moneth which answers to our November, of the ninth Moneth, Chisiu (Zech. 7. 1.) because that Moneth was usually very stormy, and the weather changeable, Orion then arising in their Hemisphere. The Arabick word (Algeuse) by which this Asterisme is named, signifies a Warrior; and the Chaldee (Algebar) a Giant, all aiming at the furious, boisterous winds which usually attend the appearing of this constellation. And so the Greek word from which Orion cometh, signifies, to trouble or to disturb. And its usual Epithetes are bold, vehement, impetuous Orion, all betraying its unquiet and various temper.

Algebar; i. e. Gigas: Ὠρίων, Audax, vehemens, ardens Orion. Pro l. 18. c. 25. Ὠρίων, Græcis est turbo, concito. Pagn. in Thes. Dum pelago desæ hyems & aquosus Orion.

The third starry association we call Pleiades; the Hebrews, Chimah. This is a very cold constellation. The Greeks express winter by this word, because it brings in frost and cold with it. The derivation of the Hebrew name is very obscure. Some professedly acknowledge their ignorance, that they cannot tell how to derive it; yet some dig the root of it in Chaldee, signifying firm: Others, in the Hebrew, signifying to desire, or earnestly to wish for a thing and the reason of it is (say they) because these stars (the Pleiades) the seven stars we often speak of, are much desired by Sea-men; for seeing them, they have a perfect rule to guide and steer their course by. And it is an observation among some of the Rabbins, that Noah had a little window in the top of his Ark, that from thence he might (when the waters began to assuage, and the stress of the deluge was over) look up to the heavens, and know by those stars what course his Ark made. Thus much we Quæ quia ad Polum Arcticum spectant (qui velut inferior subest Horizonti nostro) penetralium Austri sidera vocantur quæ sit in penetralibus mundi à nobis abscondita.*

The fourth title of the stars is, The Chambers of the South. And why The Chambers of the South? The Continent is put for the things contained. The word which we translate Chambers, signifies any thing that is very inward or retired, and therefore translated a chamber, Judg. 15.1. & Cant. 3.4. Mans spirit is thus expressed, because it lies so far inward (Prov. 24.4.) By knowledge shall the chambers be filled; that is the most secret parts of the soul shall be filled by knowledge, Prov. 18.8. The inward part of the belly. Prov. 7.27. They go down to the chambers of death, that is, to the inmost and most retired wayes of death, the grave. Here, The chambers of the South, are the most remote, hidden and secret parts of the South. And the reason why after he had exprest the other constellations by special names, he gives us these only in general [The chambers of the South] is, because the stars which are under the southern pole, are hidden from us, and are enclosed and lodged as in a chamber: God locks them up in his treasury, and they are secrets to this part of the world; the Southern Pole being under or below our Horizon. In the artificial Sphears of heaven we find few Asterisms or descriptions of the stars about those parts; there are many, but we perceive them not. And the virtue and operation of these chambered, hidden stars, is as strong as of those which appear in greatest lustre and beauty.

Again, When he saith, Which maketh Arcturus, &c. His meaning is, Which makes them appear, or do their office. These stars were made when the heavens were made, and Job's discourse is not about creation, but providence. So that to make Arcturus, &c. in the sence of this Text, is only this, to order the times of their rising and setting, to distinguish the seasons of the year, and to produce their several effects in every season, which providential acts are here especially aimed at. Thus he maketh Arcturus to rise, about the middle of September, which is the time of the Equinox, when the civil day and night are even, and share the hours of the natural day equally between them. Or, as others account, this star rises about eleven dayes before the Equinox. So, by Arcturus, we may understand that season of the year. And he maketh Arcturus, is, he orders and disposeth of the season, commonly called Autumn. Orion shines forth in our Hemisphear about the moneth of December, and by that winter is designed. The Pleiades begin at the Spring, therefore called Vergiliæ, because they arise (vere) in the Spring, and disappear or go down toward Winter. The chambers of the South are fiery stars, which have their chief influence upon us in heat of Summer.

And so we may put the Text into these plain expressions, He maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South, that is,

First, He makes and orders Summer and Winter, Spring, and Harvest, because these stars divide the four seasons of the year.

Or secondly, thus, He makes hot and cold, wet and dry, storm and calm.

Or thirdly, As these four constellations are assigned to the four chief points of heaven. Arcturus is known by all who know any things in the heavens, to be seated about the Northern Pole, whose opposites are those stars in the Chambers of the South. Orion dwells in the East, and the Pleiades in the West.

So the plain English of the words is this, That the Lord by his mighty power and wisdom ordereth and appointeth the motions of heaven, from East to West, from North to South.

Lastly, To clear up the sence of this Text, we must understand these four constellations Synecdochically, these being put for all the rest; for as God orders these, so every star in the firmament; the least are under his eye, and at his dispose, as well as the greatest. But because these are the most eminent, useful and efficacious in their appearances, motions and influences, therefore these are named; He maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades, and the Chambers of the South.

We may observe from the words thus opened, divers profitable instructions.

First, All the stars are placed in the heavens by the special designment of God for the use and good of men.

Moses (Deut. 4.19.) gives a caution to Israel from the Lord, that they should take heed of imitating the Heathens in their abominations, and this is one particular, Lest thou lift up thine eyes to heaven, and when thou seest the Sun, and the Moon, and the Stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them, which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all Nations under the whole heaven. Observe that, The Lord thy God hath divided them unto all Nations under heaven; therefore take heed that thou do not worship them.

They are the work of God, they are creatures; and worship, which is proper to the Creator, must not be given to them. It is a remarkable Text, Lest (saith he) thou shouldest be driven to worship them. How driven? Not by external force and power, but driven by the strong inclination of thine heart, ravished with such beautiful objects. The excellency that is in the works of God, hath power to draw, yea, to drive the heart of man to commit Idolatry. Job shews this, while he acquits himself so industriously from it (Chap. 31.26,27.) If I beheld the Sun when it shined, or the Moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth had kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the Judg, &c. Some translate that (Deut. 4.) in this language of Job, Lest thou be deceived to worship the Sun, Moon and Stars, and host of heaven. This is very considerable; but the thing I chiefly note in that Scripture, to the point in hand, is this, That the Lord hath made and appointed the stars to the several parts of the heavens, he hath divided them to all Nations under the whole heaven. Some stars are the portion of one people, others of another. As the earth is an inheritance divided among the children of men, so also are the stars and heavens. We seldom consider what riches we receive from that part of our inheritance; most think they live by the earth only: No, saith Moses, The Lord hath divided the heavens, the Sun, Moon and Stars unto all Nations under heaven. He hath setled it, what star such a Land should have, and in what seasons, as also, what proportions of the Sun and Moon, for light, heat and influence. He hath made them for the children of men. Man is fed and cloathed, warmed and cherished from heaven more then from earth; and the lot and divisions which we have of the earth are naturally and usually good or bad, rich or barren, pleasant or unpleasant, healthy or unwholesome, according as the Aspects of the heaven and stars are more or less benign or favourable unto them. Moses (Deut. 29.26.) reproves the ingratitude of the Jews by this argument, Because they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given to them. So we translate. But the Letter of the Hebrew gives it thus; Who had not given to them, or divided among them any portion. As if Moses had said, The Lord divided and gave the heavens and the stars among you, and these base dunghil-gods never gave you so much as a clod of earth, and will ye depart from Jehovah to serve them?

Per hanc divisionem intelligit ordinem & motum Planetarum, qui in suis orbibus ita disponuntur, ut unaquæq; regio suo tempore eorum gaudeat influxibus. Pined.

Secondly observe, God knoweth the number, the names and the nature of all the stars.

He gives them special names. These in the translation, are names of mans imposition. Yet the holy Ghost uses Heathenish names in the New Testament (Acts 28.11.) We read of a Ship in which Paul sailed to Rome, whose sign was Castor and Pollux, two Pagan Sea-gods. It is said, that God brought all the beasts of the earth to Adam, that he should give them names; but he brought not the host of heaven to Adam, that he should give them names; he named them himself, Psal. 147.4. He telleth the number of the stars, he calleth them all by their names. Men are not able to tell the number of the stars; they tell distinctly but to a thousand three hundred, or a few more, and they are not able to tell all these by distinct names, but they are constrained to reckon them by constellations, where a whole family of stars are called by one name. The Lord hath made it his special priviledge to tell the number of the stars, and to call them all by their names. And these are named in the Text for all the rest. Hence observe,

Thirdly,

Thirdly, Some stars are more excellent, of greater virtue and name then others.

When these are named, it is for special reason. The Lord nameth these as stars of more then ordinary dignity. These are in degree next to the Sun and Moon: when a few are named for many, we usually name the chiefest; as the whole people of the Jews are set forth by the Heads of their Tribes, by the Chiefs; and when a Nation is spoken of, it is by those greater names, the Magistrates and the Ministers. These are named, because they have most to do, and the greatest business in a Nation. So these stars are here named, because they are of special use and influence. The Apostle gives us this clearly (1 Cor. 15. 41.) There is one glory of the Sun, another of the Moon, and another glory of the Stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. One star hath a more honourable name then another. Some stars God doth not vouchsafe to name particularly to us, when others, which are of greater glory, are. As in building, some parts of it are chief, The foundation, the top-stone, the corner-stone; the strength and beauty of the whole building are comprehended under these. God hath made differences and degrees in all creatures, in the heavenly as well as the earthly. The name of most stars are concealed, as being of a lower degree. And we find that whensoever in Scripture stars are spoken of, scarce any are named but these, and these are often named, which implies their superiority and dignity. The Prophet urges this as an argument of humblest addresses unto, and dependance upon God (Amos 5. 8.) Seek him that maketh the seven stars (that is, Pleiades) and Orion, and turneth the shadow of death into the morning, &c. He doth not say, Seek him that maketh all the stars; the Lord made all. But because he hath given so much virtue and excellency to these, these only are reported as of his making. Here, Which maketh Arcturus; there, Seek him which maketh the seven stars; as if he had said, In those stars God hath laid out much of himself, and made his power and wisdom most visible: How much hath God in himself, who hath communicated so much to one senseless creature?

And though stars differ thus one from another, yet they envy not one another. Which lessons us to be content, though God make our names less named in the world, then the names of many of our brethren; though he trust more talents to, or put more light into others, then into our selves. One star differs from another star in glory, but no star envies anothers glory.

Fourthly, Job being about to declare the power and wisdom of God, gives instance (among other things) in this, He maketh Arcturus, Orion, &c. Hence observe,

The power and wisdom of God shine eminently in the stars.

The power and wisdom of God shine in every grass that grows out of the ground, yea, in every clod of earth; much more then in the stars of heaven. Much of God is seen in those works of God; yea, so much, that many have been drawn to make them gods. There is so much of God seen in the heavens, that not only Heathens, who had not the true knowledge of God; but his Covenant-people, who knew him, and whom he knew above all the families of the earth, have been drawn away to worship the Host of Heaven. That place before-cited (Deut. 4.) hinteth as much, Take heed lest when thou lifteſt up thine eyes to heaven, and seeſt the Sun, and the Moon, and the Stars, even all the host of heaven, thou shouldeſt be driven to worship them and serve them. If thou lift up thine eyes to the stars, and not higher, even to God who made the stars, thou wilt quickly mistake the stars for God, or make the stars thy god; the heart of man is mad upon Idolatry. Read how often the Jews are taxed with this sin, 2 King. 21. 3. & in 2 King. 17. 16. & in Amos 5. 26. Which clears this truth, that much of the power and wisdom of God is stamped upon the stars; if God did not much appear in the stars, so many had not taken the stars for God, or given them, which is proper and peculiar to God, religious Worship.

There are five or six things which shew the power of God, and his wisdom in making of the stars.

First, The greatness of the Stars; such vast bodies shew an infinite power in their constitution. It is incredible to ordinary reason (unless men have skill and learning to make it out, and to lay the course of Nature together) that the stars are so great. The Sun is reckoned by Astronomers to be one hundred sixty six times bigger then the earth: the Moon indeed, which is called a great Light, is thirty nine times less then the earth, yet that magnitude is far beyond common apprehension. Some other of the Planets are almost an hundred times bigger then the earth. And whereas the fixed stars are distinguished into six magnitudes or differences of greatness; those of the first magnitude (which are many) are conceived to be one hundred and seven times bigger then the whole earth. We look upon a star, as if it were no bigger then the blaze of a Candle, and the Countrey-man wonders if the Moon be bigger then his Bushel, or broader then his Cart-wheel. If the most judicious enter the consideration of these things, they may soon come to amazement, that so many stars in heaven should be more then an hundred times bigger then all the earth. And if there are such vast bodies in heaven, what a vast body is heaven? That Continent must needs be exceedingly exceeding vast, which contains so many exceeding vast bodies in it. If we get but a nook or a corner of the earth for our portion, we presently think our selves great men; yet what is all the earth to the heavens? And what are the heavens we see, to that heaven which is unseen, to which these are but a Pavement? The heavens which are to us a roof, are but a floor to the highest heavens.

A second thing which shews the mighty power and wisdom of God in the stars, is the multitude of them; they are innumerable: Man cannot tell them (only God can) they are like the sand of the sea for number. A multitude of little sands make a huge body; then how great a body do a multitude of great bodies make?

Thirdly, The swiftness of their motion. That these mighty vast bodies should be carried about every day, so long a journey, and never tire or wear, shews infinite power and wisdom.

Fourthly, this is more admirable, the exact order of their motion. That innumerable stars should move continually in the heavens, and yet not one of them move out of course: this regularity of their motion is setled by an Ordinance of heaven (Jer. 31. 35.) Where the Lord, to assure his people that he would be steady and stedfast in the wayes of his love to them, and that he would not cast them off, tells them that he would be as firm to them in his Covenant, as he is in the Ordinances of heaven: Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the Sun for a light by day, and the Ordinances of the Moon and of the Stars, for a light by night, &c. As if he had said, I have made a statute and a decree which is irrepealable and irrevocable concerning the the motion of the stars. There is an ordinance of heaven for it; so that as the celestial bodies cannot but continue the course I have assigned them for the enlightning of these inferior parts, while the world lasts: So the Covenant which I have made with you, shall not fail to give you light. Thus he infers in the next verse, If these Ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then shall the seed of Israel also cease from being a Nation before me for ever; but that cannot be, I have established these stars by a firm and perpetual decree, therefore you are much more established.

And such is the exactness of their order and motion, that the stars of heaven are frequently in Scripture called an host or an army: Now an army, as it consists of many persons (which is one reason why the stars are called an host) so an army rightly marshalled, is cast into an exact form, and so regular for motion, that it is one of the goodliest sights in the world. Now the stars are the host of heaven, they stand (as it were) in Battalia, they keep rank and file; there is not so much as one of that great multitude out of place; therefore, Judg. 5. 20. Where they are said to fight against Sisera, they are described fighting in courses; The stars in their courses fought against Sisera; as if the stars had been drawn up, now one Regiment, then another Regiment of them, to charge upon Sisera and his host: the heavens fought, and the stars fought, that is, the Lord by an heavenly power and influence of the stars confounded Sisera, and all the enemies of Israel.

Fifthly, There is a most efficacious virtue in the Stars.

It is a ſecret virtue, and it is a ſtrong irreſiſtible virtue, no power in the creature can ſtop it: Therefore God challenges Job, in chap. 38. 31. Canſt thou bind the ſweet influences of Pleiades, or looſe the bands of Orion? There are influences in the ſtars, and canſt thou bind them? ? Is it in the power of any creature to ſtop the iſſues and out-flowings of the ſtars? Their influences are ſo effeacious, that none can bind them, but he that looſeth them; none can bind them but the hand and power which made them; there is ſo much efficacy in them, that if God let them go on in their natural vigor, their effects are wonderful. I (ſaith the Lord, Hoſ. 2. 21, 22.) will hear the heavens, and they ſhall hear the earth, and the earth ſhall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oyl, and they ſhall hear Jezreel: As if he had ſaid, the heavens are next in power to me, they are ſecond to my ſelf in working; therefore I will hear the heavens: the heavens cannot do it unleſs I give them a commiſſion; but I will hear the heavens: I will leave a power in the heavens, and the heavens ſhall hear the earth, and the earth ſhall hear the corn, &c. There is a gradation, a deſcent from God to us, and the heavens are the next receptacle, the immediate veſſel, receiving and taking in power and virtue from God to diffuſe and ſend down upon the creatures here below; I will hear the heavens, and they ſhall hear the earth.

πρῶτον δεκτικον.

Sixthly obſerve, That, The ſtars and conſtellations of heaven can do nothing of themſelves, but as they receive order and commiſſion from the Lord.

עשׂה He maketh Arcturus and Orion, &c. They have great power, but it is the Lord that maketh them. That word [he maketh] doth not ſo much ſignifie the Creation, as the providential diſpoſition of the ſtars, as was noted in the Expoſition of it. He maketh them, that is, he orders and diſpoſeth them, or he acts the ſtars, he trims up thoſe lamps of heaven; the word is ſo uſed (2 Sam. 19. 24.) Mephiboſheth, while David was in trouble, had not dreſſed his feet; the Hebrew is, He had not made his feet, that is, he had neglected his body; now (ſaith Job) the Lord is he that makes, dreſſes, or trims up thoſe lamps of heaven; though they have a natural virtue, yet that virtue is quickned by providence. Providence is a continued creation. He maketh Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades.

Non tantum facere, ſed etiam aptare, diſponere, dirigere, & præparare ſignificat.

The ſtars are the ſervants of God, they receive orders and directions from him for all they do. And the reaſon why the Lord did ſo often call his people off from gazing upon the ſtars, and reproved ſtar-gazers, was, becauſe they looked no further then the ſtars; they thought the ſtars did all, they did not eye God that made Arcturus, Orion, &c. but they only eyed Arcturus, &c. Therefore he threatens the Star-gazers and monthly Prognoſticators, who took upon them to reſolve future events by the conjunction of Planets and Planetary Aſpects; placing an uncontroulable power in the hands of the heavens and ſtars, whereas I (ſaith the Lord) make Arcturus: I made him, and I make him do what I command, not what you foretel. Therefore (Iſa. 44. 24, 25.) the Prophet ſpeaking of Gods work in making the heavens and the ſtars, preſently adds, how he befools men that will propheſie from the ſtars, as if they could tell infallibly what ſhall come to paſs. I am the Lord that maketh all things, that ſtretcheth forth the heavens alone, that ſpreadeth abroad the earth by my ſelf. What follows? That fruſtrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad. I ſtretch out the heavens: ſome will needs propheſie out of the heavens. I have ſet the ſtars in the heavens, and they are for ſignes (Gen. 1. 14.) but I have not ſet them for Prophets: If any preſume to declare or reſolve what ſhall be done, I reſolve to puniſh their preſumption. I take delight to fruſtrate men who delight in this, and to befool them who would be thus wiſe. This is my name. The God that ſtretcheth out the heavens alone, and that maketh Diviners mad. Great diſappointments enrage; and ſome men loſe their reaſon, when they loſe the credit of doing things above reaſon. Becauſe they cannot be as Gods to foretel good or evil, they will not be ſo much as men; He makes the Diviners mad. The Law was peremptory and ſevere againſt them (Deut. 18. 9.) There ſhall not be found amongſt you any one that uſeth divination, or is an obſerver of times. Why not an obſerver of times? May we not obſerve times and ſeaſons? May we not look up to the heavens and conſider their motions? Yes, we may obſerve times holily, but not ſuperſtitiouſly, as if ſome times were good, others bad, ſome lucky, others unlucky; as if the power of God were ſhut up in, or over-rul'd by his own inſtruments and inferior cauſes, this is diſhonourable unto God, and thus the Jews were forbidden to uſe any divination or to obſerve times.

The Heavens and Stars are for ſignes, but they are not infallible ſignes. They are ordinary ſignes of the change of weather, Mat. 16. 2, 3. They are ordinary ſignes of the ſeaſons of the year, Spring and Summer, and Harveſt and Winter; they are ordinary ſignes of a fit time to till and manure the ground, to plow, ſow and reap. The earth is fitted and prepared for culture by the motion of the heavens. The heavens are at once the Alphabet of the power and wiſdom of God, and of our works: We may read there when to do many buſineſſes, Gen. 8. 22. While the earth remaineth, ſeed-time and harveſt, and cold and heat, and ſummer and winter, and day and night ſhall not ceaſe. Thoſe ſeaſons ſhall continually return according to the time of the year, meaſured by the Sun, Moon and Stars. Thus, they are ſignes of ordinary events. And God ſometimes puts the ſign of an extraordinary event in them, Mat. 24. 29. Immediately after the tribulation of thoſe dayes ſhall the Sun be darkened, and the Moon ſhall not give her light, and the ſtars ſhall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens ſhall be ſhaken; which ſome underſtand allegorically, others literally, of ſtrange apparitions and impreſſions in heaven, either before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, or the day of Judgment. So Acts 2. 19, 20, &c. Thus God puts a ſign in them of extraordinary events.

But ſhall man from them prognoſticate and foretel extraordinary events? as when there ſhall be famine and peſtilence, war and trouble in Nations: This the Lord abhorreth. The counſels of God about theſe things are written in his own heart; what is man that he ſhould tranſcribe them from the heavens? But if men will ſay, they are written there, God will blot out what they ſay, and prove theirs to be but humane divinations, yea, that they were received from hell, not written in heaven (Iſa. 47. 13.) I will deſtroy the ſignes of them that divine; Let now the Aſtrologers, the Star-gazers, the monthly Prognoſticators ſtand up and ſave thee from theſe things that ſhall come upon thee; Behold, they ſhall be as ſtubble, they ſhall not be able to deliver themſelves. It is good to be a Star-beholder, but a wicked thing to be a Star-gazer; that is, to look upon the ſtars ſo, as if we could ſpell out the ſecret providences of God, and read future events in the Book of thoſe Creatures. It is our duty to look upon the heavens, as they declare the glory of God; but it is a ſin to look upon the heavens, as if they could declare the deſtinies, fates and fortunes of men. All which vanities are largely and learnedly confuted by Mr. Perkins, in his Book, called The reſolution of the Countrey-man about Prognoſtication.

Now that the ſucceſs of every creature is in God, not in the Stars, we may ſee, firſt, In the order of the Creation; God created the earth, and commanded it to bring forth fruit upon the third day, but the Lights in the firmament were made the fourth day: The earth can bring forth without the Midwifry or help of the heavens. God himſelf made the earth fruitful without, yea, before the Stars were made. Upon which, one of the Ancients gives this obſervation, Surely (ſaith he) the Lord in his providence made the earth fruitful in all its Glory, before he put the ſtars in the heavens, to the intent to make men ſee, that the fruitfulneſs of the earth doth not depend upon the heavens or ſtars. God needs neither the rain of the clouds, nor the warmth of the Sun, to produce theſe effects. He that made all ſecond cauſes to work in their ranks, can work without the intervention of any ſecond cauſe. And becauſe the Lord foreſaw men would doat much upon ſecond cauſes, and venture to prognoſticate by the heavens the fates of men, and the fruitfulneſs of the earth, therefore he made the earth fruitful before he made Arcturus, or placed thoſe Conſtellations in the heavens.

Secondly, The providence of God works under the decree of God. His providence is the execution of his Decree. Therefore we muſt not bring the decrees down to providence, but we muſt raiſe providence up to the Decrees.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, The heavens, and thoſe heavenly bodies, Arcturus, &c. are but general cauſes, there are ſpecial cauſes beſides of the earths barrenneſs or fruitfulneſs, of tempeſts at Sea and troubles at Land; and the Lord is able to invert all cauſes, to work beyond cauſes, without cauſes, and againſt cauſes: So that nothing can be infallibly fore-told from the poſitions, conjunctions or revolutions of thoſe heavenly bodies. Obſerve, Laſtly, That it is our duty to ſtudy the heavens, and be acquainted with the ſtars.

In them the wonderful works of God are ſeen, and a ſober knowledge in nature may be an advantage unto grace. Holy David was ſuch a ſtudent (Pſal. 8. 3.) When I conſider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the Moon and Stars which thou haſt ordained. Conſideration is not a tranſient or accidental, but a reſolved and a deliberate act. Shall we think that God hath made thoſe mighty bodies, the Stars, to be paſt by without conſideration? Shall men only pore upon a lump of earth, and not have their hearts lifted up to conſider thoſe lamps of light? Shall man make no more uſe of the Stars then the beaſts of the earth do, namely, to ſee by them? When I conſider thy heavens, ſaith David. Heaven is the moſt conſiderable of all inanimate creatures, and more conſiderable then moſt of the animate: and, David's when, when I conſider the heavens, notes not only a certainty, that he did it, but frequency in doing it. Some of the Rabbins tell us, that when Iſaac went out into the field to meditate (Gen. 24. 63.) The ſubject of his meditation was the Stars, or the heavens. It is good to take field-room ſometimes to view and contemplate the works of God round about. Only take heed of the former folly, of Aſtrological curioſities, confining the providence of God to ſecondary cauſes; avoid that, and the heart may have admirable elevations unto God, from the meditation of the works of God. (Pſal. 19. 1.) The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament ſheweth his handy work; if the heavens declare the glory of God, we ſhould obſerve what that glory is which they declare. The heavens preach to us every day. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world, Pſal. 19. 4. Sun Moon and Stars are Preachers, they are univerſal Preachers, they are natural Apoſtles; the world is their charge, their words, ſaith the Pſalm, go to the ends of the earth. We may have good doctrine from them, eſpecially this doctrine in the Text, of the wiſdom and power of God. And it is very obſervable that the Apoſtle alludes to this Text in the Pſalm, for a proof of Goſpel-preaching to the whole world, Rom. 10. 18. So then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. But I ſay, have they not heard? Yes verily, their ſound went into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world. The Goſpel like the Sun caſts his beams over, and ſheds his light into all the world. David in the Pſalm ſaith, Their line is gone out, &c. By which word he ſhews, that the heavens being ſo curious a fabrick, made (as it were) by line and level, do clearly, though ſilently, preach the skill and perfections of God: Or, that we may read divine truths in them, as in a line formed by a pen into words and ſentences (the original ſignifies both a meaſuring line, and a written line.) Letters and words in writing being nothing but lines drawn into ſeveral forms or figures. But the Septuagint, whoſe tranſlation the Apoſtle citeth, for (Kavam) their line, read (Kolam) their ſound; either miſ-reading the word, or ſtudiouſly mollifying the ſence into a nearer compliance with the latter clauſe of the verſe, And their words into the ends of the world.

קו Significat lineam, non modo extenſam, hoc eſt, funiculum, ſed etiam ſcriptam, hoc eſt ſcripturâ Par. in Rom. 10. Pro קולם קום

Thus I have endeavoured to make thoſe things plain, which are here repreſented (to vulgar ears) under ſtrange, unuſual, and hidden expreſſions.

Job is full of Philoſophy and Aſtronomy, he was a great ſtudent in the heavens, doubtleſs, and a holy ſtudent. Job having given theſe ſeveral inſtances, gathers them all into a general concluſion in verſ. 10.

Verſ. 10. Which doth great things paſt finding out, yea, and wonders without number.

Theſe words are repeated from the diſcourſe of Eliphaz in Chap. 5. v. 9. I would ſeek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cauſe, which doth great things and unſearchable, marvellous things without number. I will not ſtay in a particular diſcuſſion of them, but refer the Reader to the place before cited, where the Text is opened at large, and particular obſervations given from it. Take only this obſervation in general.

That, A godly man labours to exalt God, both in his thoughts and in his words, with heart and tongue, when God depreſſes and humbles him moſt.

Mark in what a condition Job was, when he ſpeaks thus honorably of the name and power of God; one would think Job had little reaſon to extol the power of God, which he felt to his own ſmart. Job was ſtript of all he had, his outward comforts were taken from him, and the Arrows of the Almighty wounded his very ſpirit. Now when he had wounded Job thorow and thorow, thorow fleſh and thorow ſpirit, even at this time, when God appeared, making no uſe of his power but to undo Job, Job is in his Encomium, all in the praiſe and commendation of God. He indites a Chapter on purpoſe to ſet forth the power and wiſdom of God, while he employed both to make his afflictions both great and accurate. This ſhews the admirable frame of his ſpirit; in all his diſtempers his heart ſtood right, and he would ſpeak good of God, what evil ſoever befel him from Gods hand. Let God afflict with his power, yet a gracious heart rejoyces in it. A gracious heart will lift up that power which weakens and throws it down. Let the Lord imploy his wiſdom to undo, to impoveriſh ſuch a man, to bring him into ſuch ſtraights that he cannot get out; yet he hath enlarged thoughts of that wiſdom, He ſees God is as wiſe in troubling us, as he is in delivering. That language of Spira, is the right language of Hell (I judge not his perſon, but his ſpeech) who in a great temptation ſpake thus, I would I had more power then God, or, O that I were above God. He was angry that God had ſo much power, becauſe God uſed his power againſt him. A carnal man would be above God: eſpecially, if God at any time puts forth his power againſt him. When he is hard beſtead and hungry, he frets himſelf, and curſes his King and his God, looking upward (Iſa. 8. 21.) to murmur at God, not to pray unto him, or ſpeak good of him. It is obſerved by one of the Ancients concerning the Heathen, That if God did not pleaſe them, he ſhould be no longer God. Such are our hearts by nature, if God do not uſe his power, wiſdom, mercy for us, we preſently wiſh he had no power, wiſdom, nor mercy for any in the world; we would be above God, unleſs God will ſerve us: but an holy heart ſaith thus, Let God improve his power and wiſdom which way he pleaſeth, if to afflict and chaſten me, yea to deſtroy and caſt me to Hell, his be the power for ever, I extol his power. Nature can only praiſe God, and ſpeak good of him, when he is doing of us good: But grace prompts the heart to indite a good matter, and bids the tongue be as the pen of a ready writer to advance God, when ſenſe feels nothing but ſmart, and ſees nothing but ſorrow round about. Then grace is in her heights, when ſhe can lift up God higheſt, while he is caſting us down, and laying us loweſt: When we can honour God frowning, as well as ſmiling upon us; ſmiting and wounding, as well as kiſſing and imbracing us, then we have learned to honour God indeed.

VERS. 11, 12, 13.

Lo, he goeth by me, and I ſee him not; he paſſeth on alſo, but I perceive him not.
Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him? who ſhall ſay unto him, what doeſt thou?
If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do ſtoop under him.

JOB having in the former context exalted the power and wiſdom of God in many inſtances, and cloſed all with an admiring ſentence, He doth great things and unſearchable, marvellous things without number. He, in theſe words ſeems to give a proof of thoſe attributes of Gods works, that they are innumerable and unſearchable, &c.

Verſ. 11. For lo, he goeth by me, and I ſee him not; he paſſeth on alſo, but I perceive him not.

As if he had ſaid, I am not able to reckon how often he worketh, for I cannot alwayes perceive him when he worketh, I am not able to search out all his great and wonderful actings, for I cannot see him in many of his actings.

He goeth by me, and I see him not.

The Lord is said to go by us, not in regard of any local motion: for, he that filleth all places, moves to none, Do not I fill heaven and earth? Is the Lords query of himself to those who thought to play least in sight with him. And he convinces them that they could not be hid from him in secret places, because he fills all places. There is no place to be found beyond the line of heaven and earth, both which God fills (Jer. 23. 24.) Then his motion is not local, but providential; God doth not move to act, but his acting is his moving. He goeth by us, doing marvellous things for us, and we see not when he is doing, or what he is doing.

חלף Mutavit, variavit, rē vel locum, denotat mutationē conditionis vel loci. Mol. in Psal. 90. 6.

The other word here used [He passeth on] is of the same sence, yet more peculiar and proper to the motion of spirits: we had it in Chap. 4. 15. A spirit passed before me, saith Eliphaz, when he speaks of the vision that appeared. It signifies to change and vary, either place or condition. The transitory changeableness of the creature, is expressed by it (Psal. 102. 27.) Thou doest change them, and they shall be changed; the creatures pass on, as from place to place, so from condition to condition, The fashion of them passeth away (1 Cor. 7. 31.) They have not only a perfective change, but a corruptive change; but of the Lord he saith, Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. The word is used for changing by oppressive destruction, (Prov. 31. 8.) Open thy mouth for the dumb, in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction, or death. Such as are appointed to that great change, are called, The Sons of change or destruction: Thus the Original. So that the word signifieth any change or motion, whether perfective or corruptive. The Lord (saith Job) passeth on, he maketh changes, he worketh sometimes to perfect, sometimes to destroy, but I perceive him not, I am not able to make out what he doth.

Here are two words, one referring to sense, the other to understanding, He goeth by me, and I see him not; that is, my senses cannot find him: He passeth on also, and I perceive him not; that is, he destroyeth, he buildeth, he planteth, he rooteth up, but I am not able to apprehend him, or unriddle the meaning of his wonderful works, He doth great things, and things unsearchable.

Non est una interpretatio hujus divini accessus & recessus. Pined

There is much variety of opinion about the meaning of these words. Though I think the meaning is clear in that general I have now given, yet I will touch a little.

Multa sunt naturalia quorū supremū auctorem Deum, vel opus inchoantem, vel ab opere cessantē non observamus, atq; ita præcedenti sententiæ hæc innectitur, tanquā illius subjecta ratio. Id. Quemadmodum sit in omnibus extra omnia sciri non potest. Olymp.

First, Some interpret Job's discourse conversing still, in and about the natural works of God, the earth, the heavens, the waters and the air (of which he had spoken before) as also about the body of man (Act. 17. 28.) In him we live, and move, and have our being. God is about us, he is ever with us, and yet we observe not, either when he begins to work, or resteth from working. How he is in all things, without all things, and above all things, is not known.

Secondly, Others take his going and passing for the acts of his favour or dis-favour, He goeth by me in bestowing favours, and He passeth on, in taking them away: his accesses or recesses in mercy or judgment, his love and his wrath are often indiscernable, He goeth by me, he passeth on, he varieth his workings, and I perceive him not. To pass by is taken sometimes for sparing, pardoning, or shewing mercy. The Lord by his Prophet (Amos 7. 8.) reports several judgments, from a full execution of which he was taken off, yet at last he resolves, I will not pass by them any more (it is the word here) that is, I will not have mercy on them any more, I will not spare them any more, the next time I come with my drawn sword in my hand, I will be sure to smite and wound before I put it up, I will not pass by them any more. So [He passeth by me] may note the sparing mercy of God. The Lord spareth man many times, and pardons him, not suffering his whole displeasure to arise, when man takes no notice, but is insensible of it. The word is used in this sence (Prov. 19. 11.) It is the glory of man to pass by an offence; that is, to spare a man that hath offended, not to punish him or take revenge: and it is ordinary in our phrase of speech to say, I will pass you by for this time, that is, I will not take any severe notice, or strict account of what you have done. And we find in the same prophecy of Amos, that to pass thorow, notes judgment and wrath, in the opposite sence; In Chap. 5. 17. In all vineyards shall be wailing; Why? For I will pass thorow thee, or I will pass into thy bowels or inwards: So the letter of the original; that is, I will come to judge thee, I will pass thorow thee as a revenger, and wound thee deeply, insomuch that in all vineyards there shall be wailing; why in all vineyards? When he saith, There shall be wailing in all vineyards, it implies there should be wailing every where: for if there were joy in any place, it would be in the vineyards; vineyards are places of mirth and refreshing; grapes make the wine, which makes glad the heart of man. Therefore when he threatens, That in all vineyards there shall be wailing; it is as much as if he had said, There shall be sorrow in those places where usually the greatest joy was found, or there shall be sorrow in every place. Joy shall dislodge and give place to sorrow, for, I will pass thorow thee, saith the Lord. So that as the work of providence in sparing, and the work of providence in punishing, may be understood by this word, with a little varying of the construction. He passeth by me in the wayes of mercy, and I see him not; and he passeth thorow me in the wayes of judgment, and I see him not. I cannot see or understand him as I ought, either in wayes of judgment, or of mercy.

Thirdly, We may take the words, as they are an argument to prove the power and wisdom of God, to be such, as man is no way able to match or to deal withal, which is the subject Job is upon. He would set the Lord infinitely above all that is in the creature, and he doth it here by an argument drawn from his nature. What is his nature? Why, he is most simple, he is a spirit without any mixture, without any composition, without any materiality, he is invisible, bodily eyes cannot behold him, therefore certainly bodies are not able to overcome him. Man being a material substance, is not able to see the Lord, then surely he is not able to contend with, much less to conquer the Lord; What then doth he medling with him? It was said at vers. 4. of this Chapter, Who ever hardned himself against him, and hath prospered? is flesh and blood any match for a spirit? If man would strive with God, where should he have him? He goeth by me, and I see him not; he passeth on also, and I perceive him not; I know not where to meet him, he can come upon me on every side, he may take me at all advantages, and destroy me, for I know not how to guard or defend my self. If a man were to fight with an enemy, whom he could not see, and yet his enemy saw him; what an advantage had his enemy against him? Doth any man harden himself against God? He goeth by, and we see him not; How then can we deal with him, or stand against him? Thus (I say) it may be an argument to make good that great assertion, That there is no contending with God; flesh and blood are too weak for a spirit. It is the argument which the Apostle uses, to shew that the Devil is too hard for man, We wrestle not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers, with spiritual wickednesses, &c. Ephes. 6. They pass by us, and we understand it not, they are now here amongst us, and we take no notice of it. We are no matches for evil spirits, much less are we able to match the most holy Spirit. Spiritual wickednesses are strong, but spiritual holinesses are stronger. This third interpretation renders the words a description of an invincible enemy.

Est invicti hostis descriptio.

Significatur hic summa distantia inter Deum homines: Deus omnia videt, & rebus omnibus præsentia & efficacia sua intervenit, homo suo affixus loco Deum non videt nisi in effectis. Coc.

Fourthly, It may be understood in the general, to note the infinite distance which is between God and man, or the dignity of God above man. The Lord is omnipresent, he is going by, and he is passing on, he is in all places, and he acts his power and wisdom where he pleases. Poor man is confined to a place, to a spot of earth; when he is here, he cannot be there; but God is every where: And though God be every where, yet he cannot be seen any where, where he is. God sees all, himself being unseen, and fills all places, his presence being unperceived; nothing is hid from him, yet he is hid to every thing, but the faith of his own people. Thus He goeth, and we see him not; he passeth on, and we perceive him not.

And so the whole is a confirmation or proof of the general

ral assertion, that the Lord is infinite in power and wisdom, and that man is an ignorant narrow-room'd and narrow-hearted weak creature compared unto him. We may form up the Argument thus:

He is weak and ignorant in comparison of God, who cannot see or comprehend where God is, or what God doth.

But man is not able to comprehend or see where God is, or what God doth.

Therefore man is weak and ignorant in comparison of God.

Si quod documentū potentiæ & sapientiæ suæ edat Deus ob oculos meos, non sum is qui id pervestigare possim, adeo inscrutabilia sunt judicia ejus Jun. Transeundi & transmeandi verbis concinnè significat ea documenta sapientiæ quæ Deus exhibet, quasi, præsens præsentes erudiret. Ita significat, ex operibus Dei vix centissimum quodq; ut par est ab hominibus expendi. Pined. Nemo potest scire an Deū habeat in se habitantem & in se monentem. Jac. Janson. in loc. Alienissimè hunc locum citat Bellarminus ut probet nullum fidelem scire an justificatus sit. Coc.

The ground is this, He that cannot comprehend or see what another doth, is not able to hinder or match him in what he doth: But such is the state and condition of man, he is so far from being able to equal God in dignity, or hinder what he doth, that he cannot find out or know what God doth.

Yet this is not to be taken strictly, as if man did not at all perceive or understand what God doth. Job in the former context gave us a large account of the works of God, what wonders he had done. The Saints find out some of Gods doings in the world, though the blind world see not any thing he doth. But he speaks comparatively; The Lord passeth on, and we perceive it not; that is, it is little of God that we perceive; it is little of the workings of God that we see at the best. * There are many persons who do not see him at all, and many works that are not seen at all by any person. And they, the eyes of whose understandings are annointed to see most clearly, are not able to see all that God doth. None can see all, some will not see what they may (Isa. 26. 10.) Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see it; and in the former verse, In the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the Majesty of the Lord. That which good men see is but little, and evil men see nothing. So that, as the Lord goeth altogether invisibly in his essence, so mostly in his actions; man sees but few things of the many, and little of the great things which God doth.

I meet with a gross exposition of this Text given by some Papists. No man (saith one of them) can know whether God dwell or abide in him or no. And Bellarmine in his Book 5. and Chap. 5. concerning Justification, citeth it to prove, That a believer cannot know that he is justified, but must believe blind-fold, or take the work of justification by grace, in the dark, For (saith he) God goeth by us, and we see him not; he passeth on, and we perceive him not: That is (as his gloss speaks) God cometh in favour to justifie, or he leaveth under wrath, and yet man remains ignorant both of the one, and of the other state. Surely he was at a great pinch to find a proof for his point, when he was forced to repair to this Scripture to seek one. Providence toward man-kind (not the justification of a sinner) is the proper subject of this Text. And as there is nothing for a blind-fold justification here, so many other Scriptures are expresly against it. To say that a man cannot know when God loveth him, or shineth upon him, is to contradict what our Saviour asserts, John 14. 17. I will send the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. Ye know him, saith Christ to his people; the Saints see God in a spiritual sence, or in his workings upon their spirits. And though God works much upon our spirits, which we know not, yet we have a promise of the Spirit, by whom we know God in his workings. Few know when God is nigh, or when he is afar off, what his goings-away mean, or what his comings. But when he cometh to the Saints, they know he cometh; and when he hideth or departeth from them, they know his hidings and departures. Hence their joyes and over-flowings of comfort, when he manifests his presence; and hence their bitter complainings and cryings after him, where he seems to absent himself and hide his face: yet this Text hath a truth in it, in reference to the inward and spiritual, as well as the outward and providential dealings of God, that sometimes, He goeth by us, and we see him not; he passeth on also, and we perceive him not. Hence learn,

First, That, God is invisible in his essence, and incomprehensible in many of his actions.

Mans eye cannot see him: Mans understanding cannot comprehend what he doth.

But why speaks Job this, as a matter of wonder, if it be the common condition of man-kind? Behold, he passeth by, and I see him not; who can see him? Who can perceive or comprehend him? When Moses (Exod. 33. 20.) desired to see his face, the Lord answers, No man can see my face and live; God spake to Moses face to face, that is, familiarly, as a man speaketh to his friend, yet Moses did not, could not see the face of God. No man can see God in his essence or nature: A sight of God would astonish, yea, swallow up the creature, It is death to see the living God; and man must die before he can see God so fully as he may, and know as he is known. But (though the face of God be invisible) yet his back-parts may be seen. Behold (saith the Lord to Moses) there is a place by me, stand thou there upon a rock, and thou shalt see my back-parts; thou shalt see much of my glory shining forth, as much as thou canst bear, as much as will satisfie thy desire (were it a thousand times larger then it is) though not so much as thou hast (not knowing what thou askest) desired of me. My Name shall be proclaimed, Gracious and merciful, &c. the back-parts of God may be seen; the invisible God discovereth much of himself to man; and shews us a shadow of that substance which cannot be seen.

Some may object that of the Prophet Isaias, crying out; Wo unto me, for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts, Chap. 6. 5. Seen him? could Isaias see him, whom Job and Moses could not? Isaias did not see him in his essence and nature, but in the manifestations and breakings forth of his glory. His train filled the Temple, saith the Text (vers. 1.) or his skirts. It is an allusion to great Kings, who when they walk in State, have their trains, or the skirt of their royal robe held up. 'Twas this train, which Isaias saw. He saw not God who was present, but he saw the manifest signs of his presence. That speech of Isaiah seemed to savour of, and border upon highest blasphemy, and was therefore charged as an article of accusation against him; he was indited of blasphemy for speaking those words, I have seen the Lord; his enemies taking or wresting it, as if he had made the Lord corporeal and visible with the eye of the body. And it is conceived he was put to death upon that, and one other passage in his prophecy, Chap. 1. 10. calling the Princes of Judah, Princes of Sodom, and the people thereof, the people of Gomorrah.

But though God be thus invisible in his essence, yet there is a way by which the essence of God may be seen. And of that Moses, to whom the Lord said, Thou canst not see my face, the Author to the Hebrews saith (Heb. 11. 24.) That he saw him who was invisible; the letter of the Text carries a contradiction in the adjunct, it is as much as if one should say, He saw that which could not be seen. The meaning is, He saw him by the eye of faith, who could not be seen by the eye of sense; faith sees not only the back-parts, but the face of Jehovah: the essence of God is as clear to that eye, as any of his attributes, yea his essence is as plain to faith, as any of his works are to sense. Thus he is seen, Whom no man hath seen nor can see (1 Tim. 6. 16.) not the Saints in Heaven: they are not able to see the Lord in his essence, He passeth by them there, and they see him not; in Heaven we are promised a sight of him, yet not that sight; Blessed are the poor in spirit, for they shall see God: and without holiness no man shall see the Lord, then holy men shall see him: the state of the Saints in glory is vision, as here it is faith (2 Cor. 14. 12.) We shall see him face to face, and as he is (1 Joh. 3. 2.). These Scriptures which speak of the estate of the Saints, beholding God in glory, are not to be understood, as if the nature and essence of God could be seen, for no man hath seen that, nor ever shall; but they are meant of a more full and glorious manifestation of God; We shall see then face to face; that is, more plainly, for it is opposed to seeing him in a glass; we see him now in a glass, that is, darkly, in ordinances, in duties, in his word, and in his works, but there shall be no need of these glasses in Heaven. We shall have so direct and full manifestation of God, that these glasses which reflect him shall be out of use. The Saints on earth have sometimes a sight of God without a glass, that is, out of all ordinances, promises and works either wrought in them or for them. God comes near to their spirits, and lifts them above means, and shews them his love, and their interest in him by an immediate witness of the Spirit (1 Joh. 5. 8.) For although the water and the blood (justification and sanctification) never witness without the Spirit; and though the Spirit never witnesses against them, or where they are not, yet the Spirit doth often witness above them and without them, that is, they not being called forth to give their witness. This is next door to heaven; only, the vision in heaven will be exceedingly heightned and raised, not only above our vision by ordinances, but above our vision by immediate revelation or witness.

Further consider, The sight we have of God is in Christ. God is seen in every creature (Rom. 1.) much more in Ordinances; but Christ is the express image of his person, and the brightness of his glory, Heb. 1. 3. He is the Medium by which we see God now, and some have thought we shall see him only in Christ for ever. But it is out of doubt that in this life God is seen only in Christ savingly. We of our selves are so far off from God, that we cannot see him. There must be a due distance between the organ and the object; we are afar off from God, until Christ bring us near; we come to, and see the Father through the Son. And how near soever we are to any object, we cannot see it without an eye. We are naturally blind, the eyes of our mind must be enlightened before we see him; Christ cleareth our understandings, and cures our blindness, He is made to us of God wisdom (to see our need of him to be made) righteousness to us, and sanctification and redemption, 1 Cor. 1. 30. Again, the Medium must be light; if the eye be clear, yet while the air is dark, we cannot see. There must be an outward light, as well as an inward light to see by; that Jesus Christ makes also: for, He is the light of the world, as well as the enlightner of every one that cometh into the world. He sends the means of knowledge, as well as gives an ability to know. He sends light to the eyes of our mind, and he is light in the eyes of our mind. What we ought to know comes from him; and how to know as we ought, comes from him. Without him, God goeth by us in the Gospel, and we see him not; he may pass on for ever, and we never perceive him.

Secondly observe, That, As the Lord in his nature cannot be seen at all; so (such is the weakness of man, that) we cannot see him fully in his word or works.

How little is it that we see, that we know of God in either? What admirable alterations are there in the course of natural things, in the Sun, Moon and Stars, in the growth of herbs & plants, and in our own bodies, which we see not? What admirable administrations are there in the course of civil things? The beginnings, growths and declinings of Common-wealths, the transplantations of people from Countrey to Countrey, their oppressions by injustice, their confusions by war, their establishments by peace, their consumptions by plague and famine, their encrease by health and abundance, are little minded by the most of men. How doth God turn Nations upside down, and hurl Kingdoms together, and we perceive him not? Some take no notice at all of God, as doing such things; none taking such notice as they ought. We observe creatures, what this man did, and what the other, such men were malicious and unfaithful, such were valiant and wise, such were self-seekers, such self-deniers, such constant Patriots, and such were Apostates. Thus we see men, but we seldom see God in the great transactions and motions of Kingdoms. And we see him least of all in the course of spiritual things, in his working upon our hearts; God works wonders in us, and we perceive him not. We regard not his comings or goings, his comfortings or withdrawings, when our spirits are heated, or when they are cold; when we are strong, or when we are weak: There are continual varieties and changes in our spirits, had we a clearness to make observation. The work of God in the heart of a Believer, moving it, ordering it, preserving it, comforting it, purging it, is as wonderful, and more, then any of his works in the whole world.

Thirdly note, Man is not fit to sit as a Judge upon the works and dealings of God.

Shall we judge God in what he doth, when we cannot apprehend what he doth? A Judge must have the full cognizance of the matter before him, how else can he pass sentence about it? Shall man be so bold as to get up into the Throne, and pass sentence upon what God doth, when he cannot apprehend or take in evidence of what he doth? He goeth by thee, and thou seest him not; he passeth on also, and thou perceivest him not; and wilt thou censure what thou canst not perceive?

Fourthly, Which is Job's scope,

It should be matter of great humiliation to us, that we see so little of God.

God works round about us and in us, and yet we know little of him. Our blindness should abase us in our own eyes: God is all eye and all hand, and we so blind that we cannot see what God doth. It must lay man low in his own sight to consider how little he sees of God.

Verse 12. Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him? who shall say unto him, what dost thou?

This and the next verse contain a proof of mans weakness, as the former doth of mans ignorance and blindness; He passeth by, and I see him not. There is mans blindness. He taketh away, and who can hinder him? There is mans weakness. Suppose a man should see God in his works, and apprehend what he is about, yet though he hath so much light as to see God, he hath not so much strength as to hinder God: Is not this an argument of mans weakness? What, contend with God! God doth many things, and thou canst not see him; or if thou seest him, yet it is not in thy power to stop him; Behold, he taketh away, and who can hinder him? Yea, man is so far from being able to stop or hinder God in what he is about to do, that man hath not right to question God, or to ask him what he is about to do. Man is neither strong enough to stop him from what he will do, nor righteous enough to question him for what he doth. This is the total denying of any possibility in man to deal with God. How can he stop God in what he doth, who cannot so much as ask him what he doth? Who shall say unto him, what dost thou?

Behold, he taketh away?

The word signifies to take away by violence and force, to take away as a robber takes, to steal away. As if he had said, suppose the Lord comes by open violence to take a thing from thee, or secretly, and as it were by stealth, to bereave thee of thy estate, or of thy life, if he take all from thee, and strip thee naked, what canst thou do? So the word is used (Prov. 23. 28.) Speaking of a wicked woman, of an harlot, She lieth in wait as for a prey; the Hebrew is, She lieth in wait as a robber, to take away the estate, yea, and the life of those whom she shall entangle. Some understand this more specially of taking away life. If he will stop thy breath, and deliver thee up to death; so Augustine upon the place: or as the Chaldee, If he take one out of the world, who can hinder him? As if Job had said, The Lord may not only take away so much as he hath taken from me, but more, without wrong to me. He hath taken away my goods, and my estate, my children and friends, he hath fetched away my health and strength, my beauty and outward comforts; if he come and take away my life also at next bout, I cannot hinder him; I can neither compel him to restore, nor call him to an account; I can neither urge him to restitution, nor charge him with oppression. He plainly intimates the rapine of his goods by the Chaldeans, &c. Of which he spake positively (Chap. 1. 21.) The Lord hath taken; and here by way of general supposition, If he take away, חתף Rapuit more latronum. Significat velocitatem rapinæ. Rab. Mord. Raptim auferre. Tigur.

Si rapuerit hominem è mundo. Tar. Si morti tradiderit. August. Quoties ipse ejum fuerit (ut mihi nunc evenit) quempiam vel bonis ipsis spoliare, quis illum ut raptorem ad restitutionem coget? imò quis illum jure in disquisitionem vocarit? voluntas enim ipsius est justitia norma. Bez.

Who shall hinder him?

Mr. Broughton translates, Who shall make him restore? So he carries it in allusion to men, who violently take away the goods and estates of another. If a man come with force and take away my goods, I may make him restore them again by a greater force; but if the Lord take away and ask me no leave, I cannot make him restore. The word signifies to stop or turn a thing, and because in recovering of a prey, or in making a man restore, we stop and stay his course, therefore the word is indifferently applied to both.

ישיבנו à radice שוב Vertere aut reducere, quis restituere eum faciet, quis recuperabit aut reducet prædam?

Others

Others understand it in this sence, If he taketh away, who shall hinder him? That is, who can turn him from his purpose? who can stop him in the thing he hath a mind to do? The vulgar translation varies much; If he suddenly ask a man a question, who shall be able to answer him? The Hebrew word which signifies to return, signifies to answer; answering is the return of a word (Prov. 8. 13.) He that answereth (or returneth a word) before he heareth a matter. But I shall lay that by, though the abettors of the Vulgar make great store of it; interpreting their meaning thus, If the Lord cite a man to judgment, and bring him to trial, man is not able to answer him, or to plead his own cause. Man cannot stand before the Lord. Hence observe,

Quidam nō de prada, sed de ipso Deo intelligunt. Quis revocabit eū à proposito? Si repentè interroget, quis respondebit ei? Vulg. Vel quòd respondens cōvertit se ad interrogantem; vel quod responsum regeratur, restituaturq; tanquam debitum interroganti.

First, That, All our comforts are in the power of God.

If he taketh away,] supposeth he can take away, and he can take all away, and do us no wrong. It is no robbery if God rob us; his robbery is no wrong: Why? Because he comes not as a thief, but as a Lord and Master of our Estates; he may come and take them away as he pleaseth, and when he pleaseth.

Secondly, Note this from it, He taketh away.

That which God doth by the hand of the creature, is to be reckoned as his own act.

He taketh away when creatures take away. It is seldom that God dealeth immediately with us in these outward providences; he sends men, stirs instruments to do what is done. But that which man doth, the Lord doth (Isa. 42. 24.) Who gave Jacob to the spoilers, and Israel to the robbers? Did not I the Lord? Men spoiled and robbed them, yet it was the Lords act to send those spoilers; Did not I the Lord? As that which man doth in spirituals, is the Lords act; when man converteth and saveth, it is the Lord that saveth and converteth; when man comforteth and refresheth by applying the promises, it is the Lord that comforteth and refresheth; when man gives resolution in doubts, it is the Lord that resolveth doubts; mans act is the Lords. So here when man robbeth and spoileth us, the act is from the Lord, though the wickedness of the act is from the man. The Lord suffers men to spoil and undo us; yea, the Lord orders them to spoil us: It is done not only by his permission, but by his commission; not only with his leave, but by his appointment; I will send them against an hypocritical Nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give them a charge, to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets, Isa. 10.

Thirdly observe, What the Lord will do either by himself, or by instruments, no man can stop or prevent.

If he taketh away, who shall hinder him? The Lord hath absolute power; if he will overthrow men or families, or whole Kingdoms, none can stay him. There have been four great Monarchies in the world, and the Lord coming in judgment against them, hath taken all away. The united strength of all creatures cannot stand before him when he is angry and resolved. The Babylonian could not say and perform it, I will keep my Throne. The Persian could not say and do it, I will keep my State: The Grecian could not say and maintain it, I will keep my glory: The Roman could not say and make it good, I will keep my Empire. When the Lord had a mind to it, he came and fetcht away the power and glory, the crown and dignity of those Monarchs, he threw down their thrones, brake their states, darkened their glory, dissipated their Empires, no man could hinder him. How are ye fallen from heaven, O Lucifers, sons of the morning? how are ye cut down to the ground, which did weaken the Nations? Though ye said in your hearts, we will ascend into heaven, we will exalt our thrones above the stars of God; We will ascend above the heights of the clouds, we will be like the most high; yet how are ye brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit? All that look upon you, say, Are these the men that made the earth to tremble, that did shake Kingdoms? Thus the Lord hath taken away the Thrones of Princes, and none could hinder; he hath also removed the Candlesticks of Churches, and none could hinder. Christ threatned the seven Churches in Asia, that he would come and take away their Candlesticks; which of these hindered him? Both Crowns and Candlesticks must down, if he speak the word. It is said, when David kept his Fathers sheep, there came a Lion and a Bear, and took a Lamb and a sheep out of the Flock; but he arose and went out after them, and rescued both Lamb and Sheep, taking the prey out of their teeth: When the Lord Christ, the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, will come and tear and take away, no David can rescue out of his hand. The five Kings that came against Sodom, took away Lot; Abraham went with his Army and made them restore, made them bring back again; it is ordinary with man, when one hath robbed another, for a stronger to make him restore and vomit up the sweet morsels which he hath swallowed. It is not thus with God.

First, Power cannot do it; though the instruments which he useth to take away from us, be weak, yet the strong shall not be able to make the weak restore. A weak Nation may destroy a strong Nation, and the stronger shall not be able to make the weaker restore, if the Lord send them. When the Babylonians encamped about Jerusalem, he warns them by his Prophet, Do not think you shall deliver your selves by your great strength, I have sent them to take your City and your State. And though they were all wounded men, yet they shall rise up and take your City (Isa. 43. 13.) I will work (saith the Lord) and who shall let it? Who shall let it? Why, they might say, We will have some that shall let it: No (saith the Lord) none shall let it; Behold, I have sent to Babylon, and destroyed all their Princes: those that sought to hinder me in my work, by their power and counsel, are broken, though they seemed as strong as iron bars (so the word is) these bars of iron cannot keep me from entring, I will break all opposition raised against my work.

Secondly, As power cannot hinder him, so policy cannot; no counsel shall stop him: They (Isa. 7. 6.) took counsel and resolved strongly, We will go up against Judah, and destroy it, and set a King in the midst of it, even the Son of Tabeal; the Lord answereth in the next words, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. You resolve to do it; you make it out in your counsels, how to hinder mine, but it shall not be, it shall not come to pass. As no counsel against us shall stand, if the Lord be with us (Isa. 8. 10.) so no counsel for us shall stand, if the Lord be against us.

Thirdly, When the Lord is resolved to take away the peace and glory of a Nation, or of a Church, he will do it; and no spiritual means shall hinder him, prayer it self shall not hinder him. If any thing in the world can move the Lord to restore, when he taketh away the peace of a people, it is prayer, and the cry of his people. Prayer hath often met the Lord, as Abigail did David (1 Sam. 25.) and prevailed with him to put up his sword, which was ready to destroy. At the voyce of prayer the Lord hath restored that which he took away, and hath stayed from doing that which he seemed fully resolved to do, Psal. 106. 23. The Lord would have destroyed them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach. Did Moses out-power the Lord? did he out-wit or out-policy the Lord? No, but Moses prayed, and prayed so strongly, that the Lord was hindered, that is, he, as if he had been hindered, did not effect the thing; he restored their comforts again, when he had arrested but some of them, and seemed to come armed with resolution to take all away. Yet sometimes we find the Lord will come and take away, and prayer it self, prayer and fasting, cries and tears shall not hinder, God will trample upon all these. God was resolved to take away the glory of Israel; and to assure them that he would, he takes away that wherein their chief assurance lay, that he would not (Jer. 15. 1.) Thus saith the Lord, though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people, &c. As if he had said, Ye think to hinder me now, ye will stop me, ye will send out prayer, your old friend, which hath helped you heretofore at many a dead lift. And if you cannot pray enough your selves, you will procure prayers, and pray in the aid of prayer from all the Favourites that I have in the world, ye will get Moseses and Samuels, such as they, to pray for you; ye may do so if ye will, but it shall not profit you; they and ye shall lose your labour, even these labours will not quit cost, or be worth the while to the end ye aim at; for, though Moses and Samuel

Samuel stood before me, and intreated for this people, yet my mind could not be toward them: cast them out of my sight, and let them go forth, such as are for the sword, to the sword; and such as are for death, to death; and such as are for captivity, to captivity. Thus, I say, sometimes the Lord is resolved to take away life, riches, glory, peace, the all both of persons and Nations, that nothing shall help us, or hinder him; no, not the prayers and cries, not the supplications and tears of his own people, which are the strongest stops of all in the way of provoked justice. If prayer cannot stay destruction, and obtain a reprieve from death; if the prayers of a Moses and a Samuel cannot, nothing can; it is, as if God had said, The best means shall fail you, therefore all means shall fail you: if when prayer cannot hinder God, we resort to other means; it is as if we should think to fasten an Anchor with a twined threed, which hath broken a cable; or to conquer an enemy with a pot-gun and a bull-rush, whom we could not with Sword and Cannon. And as God will not sometimes be entreated, so he ought not at any time to be questioned; which is the next point.

Supremus judex est à quo non potest esse provocatio.

Who shall say unto him, What doest thou?

That's further considerable; man is not only not able to stop the Lord from what he would do, but he hath no right to put in a plea against what he hath done, no nor to ask him what he hath been doing, or why he did it. The superior may ask the inferior, and call him to an account: Every inferior Judge and Court, is accountable to those above; that is the highest Court, and he the highest Judge, to whom no man can say, What doest thou? The Parliament of England is therefore the highest Judicatory in this Kingdom, because their actions are not questionable in any other Court; one Parliament may say to another, What hast thou done? This Parliament hath said to Parliaments that have gone before, What have ye done in making such and such Laws? No power of man besides their own can question some men, much less can any man question God, and say to him, What doest thou? He is supreme, there is no appeal to any other higher Judge, or higher Court. Hence observe,

Whatsoever God resolveth and determineth concerning us, we must bear it, and quietly submit.

Quicquid de nobis Deus statuit libenter ferendum est.

No man may say unto him, What doest thou? Why do ye sit still (saith the Prophet, Jer. 8.14.) Assemble your selves, and let us enter into the defenced Cities, and let us be silent there, for the Lord hath put us to silence, and given us waters of gall to drink, because we have sinned against him. The Lord hath put us to silence; that is, the Lord hath done these things, and we are not to question him about them, or to ask him what he hath done, or why he hath done thus? Therefore let us be silent, say they. Let us not murmur at, and complain over our own sufferings, much less tax and charge God for his doings. It becomes us to obey Gods suspension; to be silent, when he puts us to silence. The Lord never silences any (unless in wrath to those who would not hear) from speaking in his Name, and publishing his word. But he hath silenced all from speaking against his works; and it will be ill with us, if our passions (how much soever God seems to act against us) shall take off this suspension. The Lord is uncontrollable in all his works. When Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 4. 35.) came to himself, and began to think and speak like a man, after he had been among the beasts, see what an humble acknowledgment he makes concerning God: All the inhabitants of the earth (saith he) are reputed as nothing, and he doth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? Here, we have both parts of Job's speech; none can stay his hand, which is the former; and none can say unto him, What doest thou? which is the later. That great Monarch acknowledged he had no power to question God, though he at that time had power to question all the men upon the earth. Nebuchadnezzar speaks like Job. A wicked man may make a true report of God. Many speak right of the Lord, whose hearts are not right with him. Nebuchadnezzar was converted from beastliness, but I find not that he was converted to holiness. He came home to his own Court, but I see no proof that he came home to the Church of God; yet, see how divinely he speaks, and how humbly he walks, not so much as offering to ask God (who had chang'd him from a Commander of men, to a companion of beasts) What doest thou?

We may ask the Lord (in one sence) what he doth? Yea, the Lord doth nothing in the world, but his Saints and servants are enquiring of him about it. He invites them to petition for what they would have, Ask of me things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands command ye me (Isa. 45. 11.) Though man cannot order or enjoyn the least thing upon God, yet at the entreaty of his people, he is as ready to do, as if he were at their command. And as we are thus invited to ask things to come, so we are not totally denied to ask about things already done. We may ask him in an humble way for information, not in a bold way of contradiction. We may in zeal to his glory, not in discontent with our own condition, expostulate with him about what he hath done. So Joshua (Chap. 7. 7, 8.) Alas O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites to destroy us? Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan, &c. but how durst Joshua speak thus? What if God would destroy them, was it not his duty to bear it, and let God alone? Yes doubtless, and such I doubt not was the frame of Joshua's spirit. If Israel only had been to suffer, Joshua had held his peace, at least from such language; but he saw a further matter in it; the glory of God was like to suffer in their sufferings: the close of his prayer betrayes this holy disposition of his heart, vers. 9. And what wilt thou do unto thy great name? As if he had said, Lord, the matter were not much, though the name of Israel were blotted out from under Heaven, so thy Name were written in fairer characters. But I fear a blow to Israel will be a blot to thy Name, and therefore I have taken upon me to pray this prayer unto thee, and I have prayed rather for thee, then to thee. All prayers are made to God, and yet some are made for him. Not that he hath any want, or is in any the remotest possibility of any danger, but only for the promoting of his glory; and that the world may not have occasion of a dishonourable thought of him, whose honour never abates in it self, or in the eyes of his own people. Thus we may ask him what he hath done, and why he hath brought such desolations upon his people. But we may not ask him what he hath done, either to question his right to do it, or to question his righteousness in doing of it. No creature may put the question upon either of these terms, What hast thou done? much less conclude, Thou hast done that which thou hast no right to do, or, thou hast been unrighteous in doing it. Either of these is highest blasphemy: for, whatsoever the Lord doth, he hath right to do, and whatsoever the Lord doth, he is righteous in doing it.

Hence it followeth by way of Corollary,

That, The Lord is of absolute power.

He is the Sovereign Lord, Lord over all; there is no appeal from him, no questioning of him. Solomon speaketh of the power of a King, in this language (Eccles. 8. 4.) Where the word of a King is, there is power, and who may say unto him, What doest thou? But is there nothing which a King doth, about which it may be said unto him, What doest thou? And what is this word of a King? The word of a King, is the Law of his Kingdom: all that a King doth or speaks besides the Law, he speaks as a man, not as a King; and that's the meaning of Solomon's Text; which Court-flatterers have corrupted with their unsound glosses, as if every word of a King were of absolute power, and must have peremptory obedience. A King is for his Kingdom; and while he commands according to the rules and Laws of his Kingdom, no Subject may question him, or say unto him, What doest thou? There is no power above his power, as he is armed with the power of his Laws. And because whersoever the Word of God is, there is his Law; therefore whersoever the Word of God is, there is power; and no man may say unto him, What doest thou? Every word of direction, spoken by God, is a Law; because his will is the Law of all things and persons. As the will of man by nature is not subject (by obeying) to the righteous Law of God, neither indeed can he; so the will of God by nature is the subject, containing all righteous Laws, neither indeed can it not be: for though God be voluntarily, and with highest freeness righteous, yet he is righteous necessarily, and with greatest undeclinableness; as he is freely what he is, so it is impossible for him not to be what he is. And therefore no man ought to say to God, What doest thou? Seeing God can do nothing, but what he ought. In vain then is God either attempted by power, or sollicited by prayer against his own mind; For,

Vers. 13. If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stop under him.

Though, If God taketh away, none can hinder him; though none ought to say unto him, What doest thou? whatsoever he doth: yet possibly some will be venturing upon this hard task, and undertake this impossible adventure, attempting to recover Gods booty, and his prisoners out of his hand: but see the issue, If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoop under him. Suppose any should come to help, protect and patronize those whom God hath a mind to take away and destroy, shall they prosper or speed? No, not only they themselves whom the Lord hath taken away, but their assistants, and their second, all that appear for them (except God call in his anger) shall fall before him.

If God will not withdraw his anger.] The letter of the Hebrew is, If the Lord will not turn away his nostrils, or his face. Nostrils or face are taken here, as in many other Scriptures, for anger, because there is such an appearance of anger in the face and nostrils; acted passion is seated there, as was noted (Chap. 4.9.) Therefore to turn away the face or nostril, is to turn away from anger, *Psal.*78.38. Many a time turned he away his anger; it is this word. When the Lord is angry, the turning of his face towards a man sheweth he is reconciled; and when he is angry, the not turning away of his face, shews that he is unreconciled, or resolved to continue angry. And while God is so resolved, man is in a sad case, his helpers must stoop. The strength of Israel will not lie or repent (1 Sam.15.29.) The Hebrew is, The victory of Israel. The Lords strength is victory. Victorious persons can hardly be overcome, but victory cannot; therefore except himself will withdraw, except himself overcome himself, it is not in the power of all creatures to overcome him (Job 23.13.) He is in one mind, and who can turn him? As if he had said, except the Lord will turn himself, and alter what he himself hath determined, it is not in men to cause him to alter, He is in one mind, and who can turn him? And what his soul desireth, even that he doth; which is the highest expression of power imaginable. How many things do our souls desire which we cannot do? We are desiring and desiring, yet our hands are not able to bring it to pass, The desires of the slothful (alwayes) slay them, because (saith Solomon, Prov.21.25.) their hands refuse to labour; and the desires of the diligent slay them, sometimes, because they cannot compass the thing desired, with all their labour; but as for the Lord, What his soul desireth, even that he doth. And as his desires are irresistible, so is his anger, his irascible appetite is as victorious as his concupiscible, unless God withdraw his anger.

The proud helpers do stop under him.] The word is, Helpers of pride, that is, such as think themselves most powerful and able to help, The helpers of pride, or the strong helpers. The same word (note that by the way) signifies strength and pride, because we are so apt to be proud of our strength. If a man have a little strength in the world, strength of friends, or of riches, strength of body or of mind, strength of understanding, strength of memory, strong parts, he is under a strong temptation to pride. Pride is one of the greatest weaknesses of man, but it is alwayes grounded upon supposed strength.

But who are these proud, these strong helpers?

Some understand it of the good Angels, who are the strongest, the highest of created helpers; Angels stoop under the power of God as well as men.

Others expound these strong helpers to be Devils, who are evil Angels, to whom evil men seek sometimes for help. If the Lord will not turn away his anger, though men seek to the Devil for help (as Saul did) that helper shall stoop under him. Saul consulted with a witch (the Devils oracle) yet he could not be delivered by a witch.

Others understand by these strong helpers, godly men; if the Lord will not turn away his anger, the righteous shall stoop under him, that is, they shall not be able to rescue a person or a Nation from the anger of God by prayer, or by the utmost improvements of their interest with God. Some places have fallen, because they wanted godly men to support them; and some places have fallen, though they had godly men to support them. The Vulgar Latine translation renders, They that bear up the pillars of the world, shall fall. Godly men bear up the pillars of the world. Though the Hebrew will not bear their translation, yet the sence is good. Godly men are the worlds supporters. It is said (Revel. 12.16.) That the earth helped the woman; that is, worldly men for carnal ends helped the Church, when a flood of persecution, cast out of the mouth of the Dragon, was ready to swallow her up. But the Church continually helps the world, and swallows up many of those floods of Gods displeasure, which else would drown the world. And because the Church was so thin, and there were so few godly men in the old world, therefore it was drowned, *Gen.*7. And because ten righteous persons were not found in Sodom, fire from heaven consumed it (Gen. 18.) God seeks for Saints many times to stand in the gap, and save a Kingdom, (Ezek. 22.30. Jer. 5.1.) and yet sometimes Kingdoms are not saved, though many such stand in the gap. Except the Lord turn away his anger, these Porters of the world shall not support it, these spiritual Atlasses shall faint and fall under him. The Heathens had a fiction of a mighty Gigantine man, whom they called Atlas, him they fancied bearing up the frame of nature: it is most true in a spiritual sence, the Saints bear up the world; yet if the Lord turn not away his anger, the world must totter and fall too, notwithstanding these helpers. For the Saints do not bear up the world, or save Kingdoms from wrath, by giving the least satisfaction to the justice of God (that's the sole Prerogative of Jesus Christ) but only by imploring the mercy of God. Or they are therefore said to turn away the wrath of God from a people, because God will not pour out his wrath upon that people, while his Saints are mingled with them. The tares are let grow, least in pulling them up, the wheat should be pulled up also. It is good for the worst to have the neighbourhood of those who are good.

Qui portant orbẽ. Vulg.

Further, More generally these proud helpers are supposed to be Kings and Common-wealths, joyned in strongest confederacies; and then the sence is, If God come against a Nation, though it joyn with other Nations, though hand joyn in hand, the hand of one King in the hand of another, yet it shall not escape or go unpunished.

The proud helpers shall stop under him.

There is yet another interpretation, which restrains and limits the word Rahab particularly to Egypt, Unless the Lord turn away his anger, helpers out of Egypt shall stoop under him, or Egypt helping shall stoop under him. We find frequently in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, that Egypt is called Rahab. And that name did well suite with Egypt, which was both a strong and a proud Kingdom, *Psal.*87.4. We will remember Rahab and Babylon, that is, Egypt and Babylon. Egypt and Babylon are matcht together for pride, and for oppression, persecuting the people of God. And *Isa.*51.9. Art not thou it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the Dragon? That is, art not thou (O Lord) he that didst cut Egypt in pieces, when they opposed thy people, and woundedst Pharaoh in the midst of the Red Sea. In Job 26.vers. 12. some translate Rahab, Egypt: we render the Text thus, He divideth the Sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth thorow the proud; so we, By his understanding he strikes thorow Rahab, that is, thorow Egypt, say others. And so they make that Text and this an argument, that the book of Job was penned after the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt, and that in these passages Job had reference to the mighty work of God, in destroying the Egyptians at the Red Sea. Taking the word thus, the Text is, Unless the Lord turn away his anger, Egypt shall stoop under him; as if he had said, Do you not remember a late instance of Gods power? Egypt thought to contend with God, to hold his people in bondage whether

whether he would or no, when he had a mind to bring them forth; but you know Egypt stooped: God brought down the pride, and abated the strength of it.

Loquitur prophetice. Bold. Adjutores Ægypti, i. e. angeli ejus gentis. Ut in prophetia Danielis, princeps Persiæ. Drus.

And that other place (Chap. 26. 12.) may be glossed thus, He divided the Sea by his power, that is, the Red Sea, and by his understanding he struck thorow Rahab; that is, when the Egyptians pursued his people, he destroyed them. Which interpretation carries a very clear proof that Job alludes to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and therefore lived after the time of that deliverance; though others who grant the exposition, deny the inference, maintain that Job spake this prophetically, not historically. This we know, that Egypt was a place much sought to for help, and therefore it is elegantly said, If the Lord turn not away his anger, Egypt shall stoop; that Nation which hath been so often called out to help and relieve other Nations, that Nation which hath so often helped and relieved other Nations, shall not be able to help, Isa. 31. 1. They go down to Egypt for help, as if Egypt had been as a City of refuge, or the place of common resort for help. And Isa. 30. 7. The Egyptians shall help in vain; the Text is very appliable to this point; we read it thus, The Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose, therefore have I cried concerning this, their strength is to sit still. Their strength shall not deliver you, they shall help in vain, therefore I have warned you (saith the Prophet) to sit still, to be quiet with your own strength, and it is better to do so then to go down thither for help. But the word which we translate strength, is that in the Text, Rahab; and we may render the whole thus, The Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose; therefore I cryed to them in this thing, They are proud, or only pride, Therefore sit still. As if he had said, Will ye go to Egypt for help? Ye go but to a proud people for help, and ye had better have no helpers, then proud helpers; ye had better be quiet and sit still at home, for they shall help you in vain. So it is an elegant allusion to their nature and disposition. The truth is, proud helpers are very unsafe helpers, for the Lord resisteth the proud; and I wonder how they can help us to resist our enemies, who are resisted by the Lord himself? They will prove but ill friends to us, who have the Lord for their enemy.

Superbia tantum est, quiesce: fortasse vult dicere, nihil aliud esse in ea quam superbiam.

They shall stoop under him.] The word is often used for worshipping, it imports likewise any casting down or abasement, because we in the worship of God ought to be exceedingly abased and humbled before him, Psal. 38. 6. I am troubled, I am bowed down greatly. So Habak. 3. 6. The perpetual hills did bow, that is, the power (for it is conceived to be a continued Allegory) of the great Monarchs, who were as the mountains and hills of the world, bowed under the Lord. The word is used to the same sence (Isa 49. 23.) where the Lord promiseth his people, That Kings shall be their nursing Fathers, and Queens their nursing Mothers, they shall bow down to thee with their face toward the earth, and lick the dust of thy feet. The Church shall have the honour to be honoured by the Kings and Princes of the world, they being converted shall bow down so low to the Scepter of Jesus Christ, held forth by the Church, as if they would lick up the very dust, and shall employ their power and authority for the good and protection of the Church. The speech of Israel (Gen. 27. 29.) in his prophetick blessing upon Jacob, Let thy mothers sons bow down to thee; and of Jacib, in his, upon Judah (Gen. 49. 8.) Thy fathers children shall bow down before thee, note greatest honour and subjection to them both.

The meaning of all is plainly this, That except the Lord himself suspend his own act, and restrain his anger, no power in heaven or earth, how strong, how proud, how confident of success soever, is able to force him, or to alter him. Helpers shall not help themselves, much less those to whose help they come, against the mind and purpose of God. Observe here,

First, Those passions which are ascribed to God, are fully under the command of God.

The passion of anger is ascribed to God, yet the anger which we say is in God, hath no power over God: Mans anger usually masters him; but God is always master of his anger; that is, he can turn and withdraw his anger when he pleaseth. There is no perturbation in God; when he is offended, he is not moved; his motions are all without upon the creatures, he hath none in his own bosom. The passions of the Lord are his most serious counsels and determinations; and we therefore say, he is angry, because those counsels of his acted, look like the effects of anger. Observe,

Secondly, That, It is not in the power of man tō turn away the anger of God.

He doth not say, except men by prayer or other means stop the anger of God, but, Except the Lord withdraw his anger, all help is vain. Prayer is said to appease the wrath of God, and to stay his anger; Moses stood in the gap, and Aaron came out with incense to turn away his wrath; yet it is an act of Gods will, which turns away his anger, not the force of our prayer; prayer therefore prevails with God, because he hath said, it shall. He is infinitely free when himself acknowledges that we lay the powerfullest restraint upon him: when the Lord is turned by prayer, it is his will to be turned; it was his counsel, and is his command that prayer should be made as a means to turn him; and it is his promise, that he will turn to us when we pray. Then it appears to us that the Lord hath decreed to do a thing, when he stirs up the hearts of his people to pray for the doing of it; and that he is purposed to withdraw his anger, when he draws out their hearts strongly to entreat his favour. Observe,

Thirdly, That, until God be appeased towards a person or a people, there is no remedy for them in the world.

The proud helpers shall stoop under him. If the helpers themselves fall, who can rise by these helpers? If they are cast down, how shall we be upheld by them? What if the people of a provoking Nation associate themselves together, or associate themselves with other Nations, or call in help and aid from all that are round about them, shall they therefore escape in their wickedness? they shall not escape. Unless God help our helpers, they are helpless to us. When many companies, and great Commanders repaired to David at Ziklag, David went out to meet them, (1 Chron. 12. 17.) and said, If ye be come peaceably to help me, mine heart shall be knit to you; but if ye be come to betray me, &c. Amasai who was chief of the Captains, answers (v. 18.) Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thy helpers, for thy God helpeth thee. Our helpers cannot give us peace, unless God give them peace; our helpers must be helped by God, before they can give us help. The anger of God breaks all the staves we lean on, and makes them as reeds, which wound rather then support; till God is quiet all is unquiet, and when he is unpacified, men shall be unpacified, or their peace shall be to our loss. As, if he withdraw his anger, enemies shall oppose in vain: so except he withdraw his anger, friends shall help in vain.

Lastly, They who strive to deliver those whom God will destroy, shall fall themselves before God.

If God be resolved upon the thing, not only they that are helped, but the helpers also shall stoop under him: helpers cannot help themselves when he is angry; they shall be like Idols, which have eyes and see not, hands and cannot act, either to save themselves, or those that trust upon them. The greatest strength in the world without God, it is no better then an Idol, which is nothing in the world. Strength cannot be strong for it self, and help cannot help it self. Our help stands in the Name of the Lord, which made heaven and earth, and not in the name of any creature under any part of heaven, or upon the face of the whole earth.

VERS. 14, 15.

How much less shall I answer him, and chuse out my words to reason with him?
Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, I would make supplication to my Judge.

JOB having in the former passages of this Chapter lifted up the glory and majesty of God, in his power and justice, and shewed the utter insufficiency of creatures to implead his his Justice, or to rescue themselves out of the hand of his power; he now draws his speech nearer home, and calling his thoughts from those remoter journeyes up to the heavens, and among the stars, over the mountains and hills, down to the depths of the sea, and foundations of the earth, about all which he had discourse; I say, calling his thoughts from these remoter travels, he comes now closer to the matter, and from all those premises, deduces a conclusion in the words of the Text, to vindicate himself from that charge which his friends laid upon him, as if he were a contender with the power, or an accuser of the wisdom and justice of God. From the folly and blasphemy of both which imputations, he disaspersseth himself in these two verses, by an argument taken from the greater to the less; and we may form it up thus.

He who is so strong, wise and just, that all the powers in heaven and earth are not able to oppose or stay him; surely I alone, or single I, a poor, weak creature, am not able to oppose or stay him.

But (as I have cleared by those former instances) God is so strong, wise and just, that all the powers of heaven, the sea, the mountains, and the pillars of the earth, the Sun, Moon and Stars, together with the greatest and mightiest of all the children of men, are not able to resist him.

Therefore I, a poor, weak creature, lying here in this sad condition, am not able (nor have I any design) to do it.

Cum robustissimæ illæ creaturæ, montes, mare, cœli, ei cedant; & quæcunque robore efferuntur & præstant, quàto minus ego? Merl.

Only the conclusion of this Syllogism is expresst, in the fourteenth and fifteenth verses, the premises are couched in the foregoing context.

Here take notice in general, that Job falls in the conclusion somewhat below the premises. There the intendment was to demonstrate the strongest creature unable to resist the power of God; but Job speaks lower of himself, I am so far from being able to set my strength against the strength of God, that I acknowledge I am not able to hold discourse with him, or speak with him about these things; I have not only no power to oppose, but I have no words to oppose him.

Verse 14. How much less shall I answer him, and chuse out my words to reason with him?

Si robusti nihil valent contra illum quanto minus ego debilis & infirmus homuncio? Drus. Nunquam animo finxi quod vos de me fingitis, me posse aut velle illi ex æquo respõdere. Pined.

How much less.] The word is used in the fourth Chapter; How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay? Both Texts bear the same sence. If he charge his Angels with folly, and put no trust in those his servants, then, how much less in them who dwell in houses of clay? So the argument lies here, If those mighty and powerful creatures, and the mightiest of the children of men are not able to contend with God, how much less shall I answer him, and chuse out my words to reason with him? As if he had said, It never so much as came into my thoughts to contend with God; I confess I have complained grievously about my troubles, and have spoken some things unadvisedly, but it never entred into my heart to quarrel with God, or stand in battel array against him, no not so much as in a battel of words.

How much less shall I answer?

Shall I answer.] There is a twofold answering, both appliable to this Text.

First, There is an answering by way of fact, a real answer, or answering to a condition. Thus one man answers another that is of equal power and strength, of the same measure in abilities and gifts with him. Thus also, as Solomon speaks (Prov. 27. 19.) Face answers face in the water, that is, the face seen in the water, is of the same feature and complexion with that which looks upon the water. Thus bodies and buildings answer one another, when they carry the same dimensions; and thus money answers all things, because it bears value with every thing.

Secondly, There is answering by words, which is twofold. First, Contradictory. Secondly, Satisfactory. The former is that which the Apostle forbids servants to use (Tit. 2. 9.) Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things, not answering again. Servants cannot please their masters unless they answer to what they are demanded; and they cannot please their masters if they oppose what is duly commanded; this answering again is unseemly in servants.

The latter kind of answering is that which the Apostle Peter charges upon all Christians (1 Pet. 3. 15.) Be alwayes ready to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear. To answer thus is every mans duty, both to God and man. To answer by contradicting the command of God, is rebellion. To answer by satisfying the demands of God, is a duty. To answer by a proportion to the power or wisdom of God, is infinitely beyond mans ability. Job abhorred the first, he was ready (as well as he could) to perform the second; and therefore Job is chiefly to be understood of the third; How much less shall I answer him? That is, I do not look upon my self as a match for God, as if I had strength proportionable to his strength, or wisdom suitable to his, as if I could thunder like him. I do not think that I am able to answer his reason by my reason; no, I am so far from an ability to answer him with reason, that I know not how to chuse out words to reason with him; How much less shall I answer him? &c.

From the whole observe, before I come to particulars,

A godly mans thoughts are lowest of himself.

Job had gone through the several series of the Creatures; and finding them unable to contend with God, concludes himself more unable then they. Doubtless he might have answered God as well as any. If any are able to contend with God, godly men are, they have the greatest strength; such of them especially as Job, a man of that height and elevation of spirit in holiness, of whom God hath given his word, That there was none like him in the earth. What creature (except an Angel) came so nigh the Creator as Job? and yet when he had looked over them all, he saith, How much less shall I? He thought any one might enter the lists, and contend with the Lord better then he. Man (having reason) is more able then all the irrational creatures; and amongst men, godly men; and among godly men, they who reach the highest degrees of godliness, are most able, and yet Job, a man set upon the top and pinacle of all perfection attainable in this life, saith, How much less shall I?

They of whom God hath the highest thoughts, have the meanest thoughts of, and put the lowest rates upon themselves.

No man ever received a fairer or more valuable Certificate from God then Job did, and yet no man could speak more undervaluingly of himself then Job did.

Secondly observe, The more we know God, the more humble we are before him.

Job having much knowledge of God, quickly found out his own utter insufficiency to deal with God; How much less shall I answer him? Not that he had less ability to answer God then others, but being more acquainted with God, and living nearer God then others, he saw his own insufficiency more then others. The more communion we have with God, the more knowledge we have of God, the less and the lower we are in our own eyes. The reason why men are so full of pride, is, because they are strangers from God, they know nothing of him as they ought. And proportionably, as any one is further distant from, or more ignorant of God, the more doth pride prevail upon him, even as humility grows more humble in proportion to his nearer approaches. When Job was yet brought nearer to God, he was more humbled, chap. 42. 5, 6. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; that is, I have a clearer and more glorious manifestation of thee to my soul then ever, I now perceive thy power, thy holiness, thy wisdom, thy faithfulness, thy goodness, as if they were corporeal objects, as if I saw them with mine eye; Wherefore I abhor my self in dust and ashes: he could not go lower in his thoughts of himself then this expression laid him. Abhorrence is a perturbation of the mind, arising from vehement dislike, or extreamest disesteem. Abhorrence, strictly taken, is hatred wound up to the height. As exulting is the highest act of joy, and delighting the highest act of love, so abhorring is the deepest act of hatred; and to abhor, repenting in dust and ashes, is the deepest act of abhorrence. Thus low Job goes, not only to a dislike, but to the furthest degree of it, abhorrence of himself, when he saw the Lord. So Isaiah

(in

(in the sixth of his Prophesie) when God came near him, and he saw so much of God, cries out, I am undone, for I am a man of polluted lips; but did not Isaiah know he was a sinful man, a man of polluted lips till then? Yes, but he was never so sensible of it, as then. He saw his own pollution more then ever by the light of the glory of God that shone round about him. He never saw himself so clearly, as when the Majesty of God dazel'd his eyes. When the Sun shines bright into a room, we may see the least mote in the air; so when the glory of God irradiates the soul, we see all the motes and atomes of sin, the least spot and uncevenness of our hearts or lives; this brings the soul low, and will keep it so: The more we know of God, the more we honour him, and our selves the less. These two are eminent effects of knowing God. As God rises in our thoughts, so we fall. Paul, who had been rapt up into the third heavens, and had a multitude of divine revelations, calls himself The least of the Apostles (1 Cor. 15. 9.) and less then the least of all Saints (Eph. 3. 8.) Not that any thing can be less then the least. The Apostles holy Rhetorick doth not cross Aristotle's Philosophy. But (the original being a double diminutive) his meaning is, he was as little as could be, therefore he puts himself down so little as could not be, less then the least. Job speaks near him, How much less shall I answer him?

The Question imports an inability in him for resolution. He thought himself so much less able to answer then they, that he could not tell how much less; and therefore leaves others to cast it up, and take the account how short he was of that business; he knew it was much, but how much it was, he knew not: How much less shall I answer him?

And choose out my words to reason with him?

The word signifies choice upon exact trial; it is used in that sence, Exod. 17. 9. Moses biddeth Joshua choose out men to go and fight with Amalek; he did not take them as they came to hand, or lay his hand violently upon them to press them, but he advisedly took his choice; he had pickt men for that service. David gathered all the Children of Israel; he had a select company to fetch up the Ark (2 Sam. 6. 1.) And when he undertook the Duel with Goliah, the Text saith, he went to the brook, and chose him out five smooth stones; they were choice stones, fittest for his sling. As it is among persons and things, so among words; there are choice words: Some are but rubbish, refuse words; others are precious, wise, suitable words: How should I choose out my words to reason with him? Shall I think by setting words in a curious frame, to prevail with God? or shall I by speaking rhetorically and elegantly, overcome him? There is much power in Oratory, in choice of words, and therefore the holy Ghost forbids the Ministers of the Gospel to speak with choice words, in that sence, namely, with rhetorical and artificial strained eloquence, which naturally pleaseth the ear, and takes the heart; which kind of speech is called wisdom of words (1 Cor. 2. 17.) and the enticing words of mans wisdom (chap. 2. 4.) They, having an aptness in them to entice or perswade, are called enticing or perswasive words. And because he would have little or nothing of the creature seen in winning souls, therefore the Apostle professes he used not such eloquence of words. Great Orators have carried whole Assemblies by the ears. And lest it should be thought that the Ministers of the Gospel convert men with Oratory, therefore they must not use such choice words. It becomes them not, like Rhetoritians and Orators, to polish their stile with an affected curiosity and exactness of Language. But as affected language is sinful, so neglect or rudeness of speech is not without blame. We should labour to speak properly and weightily; so it becomes us to choose our words, and not to speak till we have heard what our selves would say. And thus Job knew he ought to choose his words, when he spake to God; but he knew also he could not make any such choice, either of rhetorical and perswasive words, or of logical and argumentative words, as might fit him to answer God, or reason with him. He was assured that neither the eloquence of his stile could perswade him, nor the strength of his arguments convince him; How shall I choose out words to reason with God?

In the Original, the word [reason] is not found; only thus, Shall I choose out words with him? To choose out words with another, bears this elegancy, as if Job had said; If I should set my self to chuse words with God, he would chuse better words then I, more forcible words then I; he is more able infinitely to make choice of words and matter to convince me, then I to convince him: For the word which we translate [words] may signifie not only words with which matter is cloathed, but the matter it self cloathed with those words. The sum of all is, I can neither choose matter nor words to discourse and argue with God, his invention and judgment about both, infinitely exceeds mine.

Mr. Broughton refers the word [chusing] to Job, and not to words, thus; Shall I choose to word it with God? to plead and debate the business with God? Surely of all elections, I would not make that; I will not choose to make any words with God: silence and submission becomes me better. That's a good sence.

But here a doubt may arise from a passage (chap. 13. 3.) Where Job speaks thus, Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and desire to reason with God; how then doth he here say, Shall I choose out words to reason with God? As if he had said, by no means, I will not do this thing; and yet there he seems very ambitious of the attempt, and confident of the success; I desire to reason with God.

I answer, There is a twofold reasoning with God. There is a reasoning of declaration, and a reasoning of contestation. When Job saith, I desire to reason with God, his meaning is only this, I desire to declare and set forth my case and condition before him. We may reason with God by way of narrative; he allows us to tell him how it is with us.

Further, Job speaks in chap. 13. comparatively, shewing how much he had rather declare his case to God, then to his friends: God was a better friend to unbosom himself to, then any of, or all his three friends; for he saith of them in the very next words, Ye are forgers of lies, ye are all Physitians of no value; to what purpose would it be for me longer to make known my case, and shew my grief to you? I had rather reason with God then man. But as for that other reasoning by way of contestation and quarrelling with the providence and works of God, Job professeth in this place, he had no mind to it; he would never choose that task, or set himself to choose out words for that end; it was too high for him. He saw it was neither wisdom nor duty to deal with and undertake God, either with an open, or a closed hand; either with Logical subtilties, or Rhetorical flourishes.

Again, Whereas Job saith, he would not reason with God; it will be queried, May we not reason with God at all? The Lord himself saith (Isa. 1. 18.) Come, let us reason together. If the Lord calleth us to reason with him, may we not then reason with him? Is it not sinful modesty to refuse what God offers? To clear that,

I answer, There are two wayes wherein we may not reason with God.

First, We must not reason with him in our own strength.

Secondly, We must not reason with him upon our own worth.

And that is the full meaning of Job, I would not choose to reason with God, that is, to reason with God in my own strength, as if I had power to deal with him. Or secondly, I would not reason with God upon my own worth, as if there were any thing in me upon which I were able to make it out that God ought not to deal thus with me; and that's clear by the words which follow, Though I were righteous, yet would I not answer; that is, I would not at all speak with God standing upon this bottom, or under the title of my own worthiness. In either of these wayes it is sinful to reason with God: But we may reason with God in the way of declaration, before spoken of.

In prayer there is a reasoning with God; and the reasonings and pleadings that are in prayer, are the life and strength of prayer. Prayer is not only a bare manifestation of our mind to God, by such a suit or petition; but in prayer there is, or ought to be a holy arguing with God about the matter which we declare, which is a bringing out and urging of reasons and motives, whereby the Lord may be moved to grant what we pray for. The prayers of the Saints recorded in Scripture, are full of arguments.

I shall shew it in one example, as a taste for the rest; Jacob cob in his distress at the approach of his brother Esau, flees to God in prayer (Gen. 32.) And he doth more then speak in prayer, he argues, yea, he wrestles with God in prayer. The sum of it is set down (v. 11.) Deliver me, I pray thee: To the undertaking of this deliverance, he urgeth the Lord by no fewer then seven arguments. First, From Gods Covenant with his Ancestors, O God of my Father Abraham, &c. As if he had said, remember those names with whom thou madest solemn Covenant of protection, both to them and their posterity. The second is from Gods particular command for this journey; Thou saidest unto me, return: I departed not on my own head, but by thy direction; and therefore thou canst not for thy honour, but free me from danger, seeing at thy word I am fallen into it. Thou O Lord, art even engaged to give me defence, while I yield thee obedience. Thirdly, He puts him in mind of his promises; Thou saidest, I will deal well with thee; and that includes all other promises made unto him: these he makes as a Bulwark to defend him, or as his Anchor in the storm. This Anchor must fail, and this Bulwark be broken down before the danger comes to me. If thy promise stand, I cannot fall. The fourth is the confession of his own unworthiness. Faith is alwayes humble, and while we are most confident in Gods word, we are most distrustful of our own desert; I am not worthy of the least of thy mercies. Though I am thus bold to urge thy Covenant, yet I am as ready to acknowledge my own undesert: Thou art a debtor by the promise thou hast made to me, not by any performance of mine to thee. Fifthly, He seeks to continue the current of Gods favour, by shewing how plentifully it had already streamed unto him, which he doth by way of Antithesis, setting his former poverty in opposition to his present riches; With my staff I passed this Jordan, and now I am become two bands; that is, thou hast blessed me abundantly, and shall my Brothers malice blast all? Am I encreased only to make him abound? The sixth Argument is, the greatness and eminence of his peril, v. 11. I fear lest he will come and slay the mother upon the children; a proverbial speech in the holy Language, like that of cutting off branch and root in one day, both denoting total excision, or an utter overthrow. Seventhly, He shuts up by renforcing the mention of the promise, which he urgeth more strongly then before; there it was only, Thou saidst, I will deal well with thee; but here it is, Thou saidst, in doing good, I will do thee good, that is, as it is rendred in our translation, I will surely do thee good; and therefore let not my Brother do me evil. We see Jacob's praying was reasoning with God, and himself in the issue got not only a new blessing, but a new name, Israel, a Prince with God, a prevailer both with God and men.

And thus we may reason with God in the strength, and for the sake of Christ in all our prayers. For as when God calls for our obedience, he usually adds perswasion to his precept, and reasons with us, as well as directs us; his commands are not alwayes barely authoritative, and the resolves of his prerogative: so when we call upon God for audience, we should add perswasions to our petitions, and reason with him, as well as intreat him. Only we should be careful to reason from right Topicks and heads of argument, such as these;

First, From the freeness of the Grace of God.

Secondly, From the firmness of his Promise.

Thirdly, From the greatness of our need, or of the Churches misery.

Fourthly, From all the concernments of his own Glory, &c. Thus we may reason with God for the doing of any thing we ask according to his will; and in these reasonings, the spirit, life and strength of prayer consists.

So then, the only thing which Job declineth as sinful and unbecoming, is, to reason with God as a contender; he might humbly reason with him as a petitioner, or as a remembrancer; Put me in remembrance (saith the Lord, Isa. 43.26.) Let us plead together; declare thou that thou maist be justified. We may declare our cause, and we need not fear to declare our sins, that God may justifie us; but we must not presume to declare our righteousness, that we may justifie our selves; this Job disclaims.

How much less shall I answer him, and chuse out words to reason with him?

Towards the further clearing of these words, we may take notice that Job puts himself under a double relation. In the former part of the verse he puts himself in the Respondents place; How much less shall I answer him? And in the latter part of the verse he puts himself in the Opponents place; And chuse out words to reason with him? His meaning is, If the Lord will object against me, I am not the man who dares, or is able to answer him. And if I should take upon me to object against the Lord, the Lord may, and can easily answer me. From which notion of the words, two points may be observed.

First, No man can answer what God hath to object against him.

The Lord hath a thousand arguments which we are not able to give him satisfaction in (as was touched in the beginning of this Chapter, vers. 3.) We cannot answer him one of a thousand. If God should cast a man to hell, what hath he to say for himself, as from himself, when God objects, Thou hast sinned. If God afflict a man, and lay him low, giving him this argument for what he doth, I am thy Creator, I formed and made thee; if I break thee to pieces; what canst thou say against me? If the Lord should say, I am thy Sovereign, I have supream power over thee, may I not do with thee what I will? what hath man to answer? Man must be silent, and lay his hand upon his mouth; he hath not a word of reason or holiness to reason against God in any of his dispensations.

Let man (on the other side) gather as many arguments as he can to object against God, he is able to wipe them all off presently, to blow them away with a breath. All the shifts and apologies, the excuses and arguings which any make for their sins, or which they make for themselves against the justice and wisdom of God, are answered with a word; so that, put man in the Opponents, or in the Respondents place, he can make no work of it.

Secondly, Observe from this phrase, Shall I chuse out words to reason with him?

God is not taken with words.

Fine phrases and eloquent speeches will not carry it with him; If we would prevail with God, we must speak our hearts to him rather then our words: yet we ought to chuse out words (as was touched before) when we speak to God. As we must take heed how we hear, while he speaks; so we have need to take heed what we speak in his hearing. That's Solomon's advice, Eccles. 5. 2. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God. That is, speak not vainly and unadvisedly, thy tongue running before thy wit. Let wisdom guide thy tongue, and let thy heart shew thee wisdom; Let not thy heart be hasty to utter, when its office is to conceive, not to utter. But how can the heart be hasty to utter? Utterance is the business of the tongue. The heart is then hasty to utter, when it suffers the tongue to utter what it self hath not throughly concocted by meditation, and made its own. As in the body, so in the mind, the third concoction is that which nourishes and assimilates. So then Solomon's meaning is, Let not raw, unboiled, undigested thoughts pass out into discourses, or be stampt into words before the Lord. As there is a sin of curiosity, so there may be a sin of neglect. Extreams are equally dangerous. The distance that is between God and us, proclaims this duty of our most reverent addresses to him. He is in heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few; and yet the fewness of words pleases God no more then the multitude of them doth. We say, In many words there can hardly be a scarcity of errors; and in a few words there may be not a few errors, possibly more errors then words. Fewness, simply taken, is not the grace of words: But because they who speak but little, do usuall think the more, and so their words are steep'd long in their hearts, therefore few words are usually choice words. It is a sin, if we are well conceited of our words; and it is a sin, if our words be not our best conceptions. How shall I chuse out words to reason with him?

Verse 15. Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer; but I would make supplication to my Judge.

אם־ צדקתי

This brings the matter to the height; Who, I reason and plead with God? I answer him? No, Though I were righteous, yet would I not answer him. The strength of the argument lies thus; as if Job had said, I am so far from entring a contest with God, that I profess I would not do it, though I had the greatest advantage and fitness to do it of any man in the world; though I were righteous, I would not do it. I do not say, that the reason why I would not plead with God, is because I am wicked, sinful and abominable, more guilty and unrighteous then my neighbours, or then you, my friends; but how righteous soever I were, I would not do it. Job speaks as a man who would shew how much he dreads the power and strength of another; What, I fight with such a man? I contend with such a man? No, I profess I would not fight with him, though I were as well weapon'd, arm'd and prepar'd as any man in the world, I would not come near him. If there be any armour or weapon, any furniture or preparations which may enable man to contend with God, it is the armour of righteousness, and the furnitures of Grace. Now, saith Job, though I had that armour, though I were righteous, I would not contend with him. The Apostle argues much after this rate, 1 Cor. 13. about that great point of Gospel-charity; where he telleth us, that all things are as nothing without charity; and he instanceth in those things which stand highest in the thoughts of man, to commend him to the acceptation both of God and man, vers. 2, 3. Though I have the gift of prophesie, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains; and though I should give my body to be burned, and have not Love, what would it advantage me? Though I should give all my goods to the poor, and have not Love, &c. It is possible for a man to give abundance to the poor, and yet have a dearth of love, both to them and to God, in his heart; all the love that moveth him, may be love to himself: therefore (saith he) Though I give my goods to the poor, it profits me nothing; he puts all these suppositions, which are the greatest advantages for heaven (except Christ) imaginable, and yet concludes all but as sounding brass or a tinckling Cymbal, nothing but noise without Charity. So here, to shew how impossible a thing it is for creatures, in their own strength, to contend with God, he puts a supposition upon that which is most probable to carry us thorow it, Righteousness; Though I were righteous, I were not able to answer him, no not I.

Though I were righteous.

It is, as if Job had further expresst himself to this sence; I am so far from justifying my self in all my complainings (which was the thing his friends taxed him with) as if God could find nothing amiss in what I have spoken, that I freely confess there is not the most considerate, righteous or holy action that ever I did in my life, which I durst bring to the touch-stone, to the balance, to justifie my self before God by; no, but instead of that, I would fall down and abase my self, as knowing that I am before him whose eyes (being ten thousand times brighter then the Sun) are able to see unrighteousness, where I see nothing but righteousness: Do not think I am justifying my self as a righteous man, in what I have spoken or done; for though I were righteous, yet I would not (upon that ground) go about to plead my cause, or stand it out with God. Or thus, I know I am unrighteous and unclean, but if I were righteous, I would not answer him.

Here a Question or two must be resolved: As,

First, Was not Job righteous? He puts the Question, Whom, though I were righteous: Was Job an unrighteous man? Doth not he himself say (chap. 29. 14.) I put on righteousness, and it cloathed me. Why then doth he here only make a supposition of it? Whom, though I were righteous; when as there he makes it a position, that he was cloathed with righteousness.

I answer (to clear this Scripture) Man is righteous in a double opposition: Righteous, First, In opposition to the wicked; and these may be taken in three ranks; either, First, The abominable and prophane: Or secondly, Hypocrites and unsincere: Or thirdly, Oppressors, and such as are unjust in their dealings toward men. As righteous is opposed to wicked in these three, Prophane, Hypocrites or Oppressors, so Job was a righteous man. Job was not prophane, he feared God; Job was not an hypocrite, he was perfect and upright; Job was not an oppressor, the loins of the poor blessed him. And that's the peculiar sence of chap. 29. I put on righteousness, that is, righteousness in all my dealings with men.

Secondly, Righteous is opposed to imperfect, or that which hath any failing or want in it. And in this sence Job was not righteous; and that's his meaning here, Though I were righteous, that is, though I had the uttermost perfections which a creature is capable of, yet I would not stand upon them, and plead it out with God. The testimony which the Lord gave concerning Job (chap. 1. 1.) is in words of an inferiour sence; this in the text is above them both. The Lord there certifies, that Job was perfect and upright. But though he was perfect and upright, yet he was not righteous. He was perfect in opposition to insincerity, and he was upright in opposition to injustice; but he was not righteous in opposition to imperfection, If I were righteous; as I know I am not.

Justus in judicio opponitur improbo reo, qui causa cadit. Drus.

Further, Righteousness is twofold. There is a righteousness of the person, and a righteousness of the cause, Though I were righteous: Job doth not forsake the righteousness of his cause, he only disclaimeth the righteousness of his person. I acknowledge I am not righteous in my self, and I will not yield that my afflictions and sufferings argue me unrighteous.

Here another question arises, if we take Job's supposition of a man righteous, it will be demanded, May not a righteous person answer God?

Cum hic justitiam sibi tribuit, non de ea agit quæ ad legis normam posset subsistere: Solum enim Dei tribunal severissimum Christi justitia non reformidat, sed agit de de justitia inchoata, quæ quantumvis Deo grata sit, non tamen ad amussim respondet perfectioni illæ quam lex requirit. Merl.

I answer, There is no created righteousness can answer God. God chargeth his Angels with folly; he saw evil in them, compared to himself. A righteous Angel cannot stand it out with God, much less the most righteous man. God indeed would have accepted man in the righteousness of works, had he continued in innocency; and yet he might have seen folly in man abiding in innocency, as he doth in those Angels which continue innocent. No created righteousness can answer God.

But there is a righteousness in which we may answer God; Job's supposition excludes not that; namely, the righteousness of faith which we have by Christ. Man righteous by faith, or by imputed righteousness, may answer God; but man righteous by works, or inherent righteousness, cannot. He that is righteous by the righteousness of faith, hath to answer God, because hath somewhat of God to answer God with; Faith doth not bring man to answer God, but God to answer God; Christ answers God for every Believer: and Christ can answer God fully to all the demands of justice, without abatement. Christ hath not compounded with our Creditor for our debts, but paid them to the utmost farthing. A believer is able to answer God, and doth answer him every day; when he asks the pardon of sin, he offers the righteousness of Jesus Christ. And that which he offereth by faith, he will stand to, and plead with God upon; God hath what he can desire, or his Justice expect; the believer bids him try to the uttermost, if there be any imperfection or flaw in it, he will venture his soul upon it. In this sence man answers God. But Job speaks about inherent personal righteousness, the righteousness of his wayes. Upon this he will not venture a hair of his head, much less his soul and everlasting peace.

Though I were righteous, I would not answer him.

There is somewhat further considerable, for as [righteous] is a judiciary word, so likewise is [answer.] And it implies, that Job would not only not answer God objecting or reasoning, but that he would not answer him accusing or charging him, judging or sentencing him. I must acknowledge my self to be what God judgeth me to be, and that I am worthy to suffer what he judges me to suffer.

audebo illi respondere aliquid objicienti, aut in me pronuncianti; me enim rationibus obruet, & sua opprimet Majestate. Merc.

Si ille me arguet, aut in me sententiã feret, etsi causa mea justa sit, non audebo illi respondere aliquid objicienti, aut in me pronuncianti; me enim rationibus obruet, & sua opprimet Majestate. Merc.

Hence observe, First, Job having shewed the weakness and ignorance of the creature in his former discourse, here you see whither it tended; namely, to prove man to be sinful and unrighteous. This teaches us,

That, All the failings, infirmities and weaknesses which are in man, are the issues and effects of the sin of man.

Man

Ex effectis causam declarat, unde enim tanta in mentibus hominum caligo & insciti, unde tanta infirmitas corporum & animorum, nisi ex peccato? Merl.

Man is an unrighteous creature, therefore a weak creature. Job argues from the effect to the cause, from the fruit to the root: man hath infirmities upon him, therefore he hath sin in him. Where there is no sin, there is strength; and where there is no sin, there is knowledge. Perfect holiness scatters all the clouds of darkness and ignorance.

Secondly, Though I were righteous, I would not answer him; then it follows,

Unrighteous men cannot answer God.

If a righteous man cannot, can an unrighteous? No marvel if David saith in Psal. 1. The wicked shall not stand in judgement, for (in a sence) the righteous cannot stand in judgement, that is, they cannot plead their own righteousness before God. Wicked men have nothing to help them, no help without, and none within, they have nothing but sin in them, and they have no Saviour without them. Hence the Apostle Peter argues (1 Pet. 4. 18.) If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinners appear? If Abel be not able to answer God, how shall Cain? If David cannot, how shall Saul? They who have not the righteousness of Christ, have nothing but unrighteousness of their own. Observe,

Thirdly, The vast difference that is between the spirit and temper of a godly man, and of a wicked man.

O the humility of Job's spirit! Job will not justifie his own righteousness, or justifie himself in his righteousness. A wicked man will justifie his sin, or justifie himself in his sin. A Saul will justifie his disobedience, but a Job will not justifie his obedience. Job will not take upon him to be a righteous man; though God had told him he was perfect and upright. A wicked man will take upon him to be righteous, though God tell him to his face a thousand times, that he is vile and filthy. How do wicked men seek for pleas and covers to make themselves appear righteous! How do they gild the base metal of their hearts, and paint over those rotten posts to make them appear beautiful! Christ tells the Pharisees that they were like filthy sepulchres, full of dead mens bones, yet they would be painted over with the notion of a righteous generation. Job who had much righteousness and faithfulness in him, would not own them, and modestly blushes at the praise of God, Though I were righteous, yet I would not answer. Observe, Fourthly, The righteousness of man is not pleadable before the righteous God.

Though I were righteous, yet I would not answer him. The Apostle (1 Cor. 4. 4.) gives a parallel testimony, Though I know nothing by my self, yet am I not hereby justified. Paul knew nothing by himself, that is, he had not any guilt upon him that he knew of; he did not allow himself in any sin, but kept his conscience void of offence, both toward God and toward man; yet (though it was thus with him) he disclaims all opinion of himself, I am not hereby justified, this is not the plea I have to make before God; he is able to find out failings where I find none, he knows better then I, what I am. Observe, Fifthly, A godly man looks upon his own righteousness as no righteousness.

Whom though I were righteous, I would not answer. His supposition hath a negation in it, I am not righteous. Job did not deny the work of the Spirit, or the grace of God in him; but he would not own them in his pleadings with God. He could stand upon his terms with men, and let them know who he was, and what he had done (and it was reason he should) but before God he had nothing to mention but Christ: In reference to the higher degree of grace, for sanctification we must forget all that is behind, and press on to that which is before: And in reference to the whole grace of justification, we must forget all our sanctification. The less we remember our own righteousness, the more righteous we are in Christ. As we abate in our selves, we encrease in him. Christ draws the picture of an hypocrite to the life (Luk. 18.) in that Parable of a Pharisee and a Publican, going up to the Temple to pray; and the design of Christ in that Parable, is held forth at vers. 9. to be the conviction of such as trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. Now what did this Pharisee? He thanks God he was not as other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or as that Publican; and then he minds God that he gave tithes, and kept fasts twice a week; and so makes a goodly report of himself, both in the negative and in the affirmative, what he was, and what he was not. Never did any good man tell God such a story of his own life, as the Pharisee told. The Saints love to do well, more then to hear well from others, much more then to hear well from themselves; they love to do good, more then to receive good, much more, then to speak good of themselves. When Christ is represented sitting in judgment (Matth. 25. 35.) he tells the faithful of all their good deeds, or acts of charity, I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye cloathed me, &c. Hear how the Saints answer, as if they had done no such thing; When was this Lord? When saw we thee hungry, and fed thee, &c. We have forgot the time. They did so little mind the good they had done, that they remembred not they ever did it. The Lord keeps a faithful record of what his people do, but themselves do not. It is our duty to remember to do good, but let God alone to remember the good we have done. The Lord is not unrighteous to forget our labour of love (Heb. 6. 10.) but we lose our righteousness, unless we forget it. If we much remember what we do, God will remember it but little: The servants of God know well enough when they do good (to do good ignorantly, is a degree of doing evil.) They know when they do good, and they know what good they do; but when 'tis done, 'tis to them as unknown.

Hezekiah (Isa. 38. 3.) put God in mind of his good deeds, Lord (saith he) remember how I walked before thee with an upright heart, &c. Hezekiah desired the Lord to remember his uprightness. So Nehemiah in divers passages of that book (Chap. 13. 14, 22, 29, 31.) puts the Lord in remembrance of his righteousness. But it is one thing to put the Lord in remembrance of what we have done historically; and another thing to plead what we have done legally. It's one thing to shew to the Lord the work of his own grace in us; and another thing to mind the Lord of our works to obtain his grace. Hezekiah would have God to take notice of what he was, to pity him in his sickness, Lord, I am thus, remember the work of thy hands, as I am thy creature; remember the work of thy Spirit, as I am a new creature, as I am thy servant. And Nehemiah puts all upon the score of mercy: He did not say, Lord, remember me for what I have done, answer me according to what I have done, but, Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy (Chap. 13. 22.) If Saints at any time remember God of their works, it is not to ground an argument of merit upon their works, but to shew God the workings of his grace and spirit.

Though I were righteous, I would not answer him; What then? What will Job do? What course will he take for himself, if he will not answer the Lord? What? This course he takes, and it is the best.

I would make supplication to my Judge.

The Septuagint render it thus, I would deprecate his judgment; that is, I would sue for mercy. As if he had said, I am not without hope, because I have none in my self: I am not lost, because I am lost to my self: I have a sure way yet left, I will make supplication to my Judge; or as Master Broughton reads it, I would crave pity of my Judge: As if he had said, Though justice cast me, yet mercy will relieve me. Mercy will help me as well, and honour God more.

The word notes humblest submission, as when a man begs for his life. Jacob (Hos. 12. 4.) wept and made supplication. The brethren of Joseph (Gen. 42. 21.) were exceedingly afflicted at the remembrance of their hard usage toward him their brother, when they sold him to the Egyptians, We would not hearken when he besought us; it is this word, Think with how much submission Joseph being ready to be sold unto strangers, supplicated his brethren for pity; Or how a man will lie begging at an enemies feet, who is ready to kill him. With such submissive language Job resolved to crave pardon and pity at the hands of God.

Thus he obeyes the counſel of Bildad in Chap. 8. If thou ſeek unto God, and make thy ſupplication unto him betimes. Job ſeems to anſwer, Your counſel is good, friend Bildad, Though I were righteous, I would not anſwer him; but (according to your advice) I would make ſupplication to my Judge. The prayers of the Church in greateſt ſtraights and and diſtreſſes, are uſually expreſſed by this word [ſupplications.] All petitionary Prayer is ſupplication; but becauſe we are much abaſed, and laid very low at ſuch times, therefore prayer then put up, is ſpecially called ſupplication. Hence Solomon at the dedication of the Temple, putting caſes and ſuppoſitions of many afflictions incident to that people, ſtill concludes, At what time they ſhall confeſs their ſins, and pray, and make ſupplication, then, &c. (1 King. 8.) And (Eſth. 4. 8.) Mordecai ſends to Eſther, charging her to go in to the King, What to do? To make ſupplication unto him. The lives of the Jews being given away to ſatisfie the malice of Haman, it was time for her to ſupplicate in the lowlieſt poſture. Thus Job had it in the thoughts of his heart to make ſupplication to his Judge; as if he had ſaid, If I were to ſtand at the tribunal of an earthly Judge, I would not ſupplicate, but plead; I would not petition his favour, but ſtand upon my right; I would not crave his pity, but expect his juſtice; I would bring forth my reaſons and arguments, my proofs and witneſſes, this courſe would I run with an earthly Judge: but my cauſe being with God, I will only put a petition into the Court, and ſubmit unto him, let him do with me what he pleaſeth. Hence we may obſerve, Firſt, That there is no weapon can prevail with God, but only prayer and ſupplication.

Eſt opus virtutis exercere ad vitam, non ex meritis, ſed ad veniam convaleſco. Precitaq; intendũ eſt cũ recta agimus, ut omne quod juſtè vivimus, humilitate condiamus. Greg.

Job's thoughts had travel'd thorow all the creatures, and found not one of them could ſtand before God; therefore he reſolves to fall down before him: I will make ſupplication. Prayer overcometh when nothing elſe can. Chriſt conquered by dying, and we conquer by ſubmitting. And yet it is not ſupplication as an act of ours, but ſupplication as it is an ordinance of Gods that prevails with him: he looks upon prayer as having the ſtamp of his own inſtitution; otherwiſe our greateſt humblings could prevail no more then our proudeſt contendings. The Word preached prevails upon the heart, not as it is the act of a man, who diſpenſeth it (there is no ſtrength in that) but as it is an ordinance of God, who hath appointed it: So humble ſupplication obtains much with God, becauſe he hath ſaid it ſhall.

Secondly, To make ſupplication is to crave pitty.

As prayer prevails, ſo no plea in prayer can prevail, unleſs we plead pity, pity, mercy, mercy; a ſuppliant looks for all good at the hand of Free grace. We at any time have ſin enough to procure us evil (Jer. 4. 18.) Thy ſins have procured theſe things unto thee; But we never have goodneſs enough to procure us any mercy. Mercy comes for mercy's ſake.

Thirdly, In that he ſaith, I would make ſupplication to my Judge. Obſerve,

God is the Judge of all our actions and intentions.

Job was in a great conteſt with men, but (ſaith he) men are not my Judges, God is my Judge, It is a comfort to the Saints to remember that God is their Judge. Job was not afraid of God in that relation: no, it was a rich conſolation to think that God was his Judge. He is a righteous Judge, a merciful Judge, a pitiful Judge; we need not be afraid to ſpeak to him under that notion. Job ſaith not, I will make ſupplications to my father (which is a ſweet relation) but (which is moſt dreadful to wicked men) he conſiders God as a Judge: The Saints are enabled by faith to look upon God as a Judge, with aſſurances of mercy.

Laſtly obſerve, The whole world ſtands guilty before God.

Rom. 3. 19. Every mouth muſt be ſtopped: Job will only make ſupplication, he had nothing elſe to do or ſay. We do not preſent our ſupplications unto thee for our righteouſneſs, but for thy great mercy (Dan. 9. 8.) We can get nothing from God by opening our mouths in any other ſtile, or upon any other title then this, of an humble acknowledgment of our unworthineſs: the lower we go in our own thoughts, the higher we are in the thoughts of God; and we find the more acceptance with him, by how much the leſs acceptance we think we deſerve. Nothing is gained from God, either by diſputing or by boaſting. All our victory is humility.

VERS. 16, 17, 18.

If I had called, and he had anſwered me, yet would I not believe that he had hearkned unto my voice.
For he breaketh me with a tempeſt, and multiplieth my wounds without cauſe.
He will not ſuffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterneſs.

THis holy man having abaſed himſelf in the ſenſe of his own inability and unrighteouſneſs before the Lord, and diſclaimed the leaſt intendment of contending or diſputing with him (as was ſeen in the former context) now confirms it by a further ſuppoſition, in verſ. 16, 17, 18. and ſo forward. As if he had ſaid, Ye ſhall find I am ſo far from wording it with God, or ſtanding upon mine own juſtification with him (though I have pleaded mine integrity before you my friends) that I here make this hypotheſis or ſuppoſition, If I had called, and he had anſwered, yet would I not believe that he had hearkned unto my voice.

There is much variety in making out the ſence of theſe words. The Septuagint read it negatively, If I had called, and he had not anſwered me, I would not believe, &c. Moſt of the Hebrew writers fall very foul upon Job, and tax him harſhly for this ſpeech. What? Would he not believe that God hearkned unto him, when he had anſwered him? Is not this unbelief a plain denial of providence, or at leaſt of ſpecial providence? I would not believe that he had hearkned unto my voice, is (in their ſence) as if he had ſaid, I think God takes no care, or makes no account of particulars, he looks not after this or that man, what he ſpeaks, or for what he prayes. I can ſcarce believe that my condition is under the care of God, or that he will take notice of me; if I ſhould call upon him, or if I plead before him, what ſhall I get by it? Do ye think he will deſcend to the relief of ſuch a one as I am? Why then do ye move me to call upon him? &c. If I ſhould pray, and if he ſhould anſwer me, I can hardly be perſwaded that he will pity me, and do me good.

But all theſe aſperſions are unworthily caſt upon Job, a man full of humility and ſubmiſſion to the will of God: his frequent prayers and applications of himſelf to God do abundantly confute all ſuch unſavoury conjectures. But the Jewiſh Commentators carry on their former ſtrain, being all along very rigid towards this holy man, very apt to put the worſt conſtructions upon doubtful paſſages, and ſometimes ill ones upon thoſe which are plainly good.

Judaicum commentum, atq; Jobi ſanctitate indigniſſimũ Pined.

More diſtinctly.

There is a difficulty about the Grammatical meaning of one word in the Text, which carries the ſence two wayes.

If I had called, and he had anſwered me.

The Hebrew word, which we tranſlate [Call] ſignifies ſometimes to pray, and ſometimes to plead or challenge: An act of invocation, or an act of provocation: it is rendred both wayes here. By moſt, as we, If I had called upon him; that is, If I had prayed or made my ſute unto him. By ſome, If I had ſent in my plea (as to begin a ſuit of Law with him) or my challenge, as to enter the combate with him, &c.

קרא Alii invocare, alii provocare vertunt.

As it is taken for a challenge, ſo the ſence lies thus, If I ſhould ſtand upon terms with God, and call him to an account to make good what he hath done; And he had anſwered me; that is, if he had condeſcended to give me an account of his wayes; yet I would not believe that he had hearkned unto my voice, that is, that he had yielded to me, or acknowledged that he had done me wrong. Shall I, who am but duſt and aſhes, prevail in my ſuit, and get the day by pleading and contending with the great God of Heaven and Earth?

Take

Take the word as it signifies invocation, or calling by way of petition (Psal. 50. 15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee. And so two or three interpretations are offered.

Tam infirma est caro, ut etiam propositis divinis promissionibus nolit credere. Isidor. Clar.

First, Some in favour of Job conceive that he speaks this only through the infirmity of his flesh, that it was sin within him that spake, and not Job; according to that of the Apostle, Rom. 7. Not I, but sin that dwelleth in me: So Job speaks, as if he did not believe that God would hear him when he prayed; but whose voice was this? Not Job's, but his sins; the corruption, the infirmity of Job gave out such language, not he. As we may say in reference to an action, I did it not, but sin that dwelleth in me, so to a word, I spake it not, but sin and corruption that dwelleth in me, gave out such language.

Plerique Latini ad eas conditiones referunt quas oratio efficax requirit; quarum defectu non exaudimur, atque ea ratione sibi timere Jobū

Secondly, I would not believe that God had hearkned to me, though he had answered me; may refer to the manner of his prayer or invocation, as not coming up to the height and measure of the duty, as not fulfilling that Law of prayer which the Lord requireth; and so, because his prayers were imperfect and weak, therefore he would not believe that ever God had taken notice of him, or hearkned to his voice: As if he had said, You bid me make my supplication; if I do, yet I will not believe that God takes notice of my prayers. Why? because mine are but cold and unbelieving prayers, weak and distracted prayers, the prayers of a distemper'd heart, the prayers of a confused spirit, such I confess mine are; therefore I cannot believe God will hearken to my voice.

Videtur hoc esse animi mirabiliter demissi, atq; sibi suæq; orationi diffidentis, fidentis vero de sola divina bonitate. Pined.

But rather in the last place, take the sence thus, that Job in these words, breaths out the humility of his spirit; as if he had said, I am so far from standing upon my terms with God (as was shewed before) as if I had hopes to carry it with him by contending, that though I come in the humblest manner to invocate and call upon his Name, and I find him so gracious and merciful to me, as that he doth answer me in my requests, and grant the thing I desire; yet I will not believe that he hath hearkned to my voice, that is, that he hath done this for any worthiness in me, in my services, or prayers, I will not believe that the answer I receive from heaven is obtained by any value which my person hath with God.

Such is the coldness and deadness, the languishment and unbelief of my heart in prayer, such are my prayers, that the truth is, I cannot believe I am heard, when I am heard, I cannot think my petition granted, when I see it is granted.

Non ex diffidentia hoc dicit, sed ex timore, Dei reverituis judicium. Drus.

Thus it sets forth the exceeding humility and lowliness of his spirit, he would give all the glory unto God in granting his petitions, and take nothing at all to himself in making those petitions, I would not believe that he hath hearkned to my voice.

What voice was it then that he believ'd God hearkned unto? He hearkned to the voice of the Mediator, to the voice of Christ: He hearkned to the voice of his own free grace: He hearkned to the sounding of his own bowels. He hearkned to the motions and intercessions of his Spirit in me; to the motions and intercessions of his Son for me. It is not my voice that hath got the answer; he alone that hath granted it of his good pleasure in Christ.

I would not believe that he had hearkned to my voice.

אמן Credere, stabile esse.

The word signifies both believing and establishing, or to believe and establish; and the reason of it is, because faith settles the heart, Faith is the establishment of the soul. An unbeliever hath no bottom, he is built without a foundation, his spirit is unfixed.

And that act of believing [I would not believe] is the general act of Faith, namely, a firm assent to the truth of what another speaketh. An assent to the truth of it two wayes. To the truth of it, First, Historically, that such a thing was spoken or for done; and then Logically, that the thing is true which is spoken. When he saith, I would not believe that God hath done this, his meaning is, I would not assent to it, as done for my sake, or for my voice; not that he would not believe the thing was done at all. He assented to the word and answers of God, when he did receive it; but in that restriction, he would not believe it, namely, in reference to himself, that he hath hearkned to his voice.

האזין Crassè ενω ἐδω. Auscultare,

To hearken] Is more then to hear; it notes the inclination of the mind rather then the attention of the ear. As to stop the ear notes the shutting of the heart against obedience, rather then of the ear against audience. To tell a tale to a deaf man, is to speak to one hears, but will not grant.

inclinationem animi denotat ad alterius dicta. Cujus oppositū est, aures claudere & obturare ad alicujus sermonem. Hinc proverbium, Surdo narras fabulā. Hæc verba exactam demissi animi significationem continent. Tunc cum arriserit gratia, time, cum abierit, time Bernard. Providentiā Dei sæpe nobis benevola est, cū nulla benevolentiæ externa præbet argumenta, imo aliquādo quem exandet turbine conterit malorum.

From all it appears,

First, That, Job speaks very highly of the goodness of God, namely, that God answers prayer, though he hath not respect to the voice of him that prayeth; Though he had answered me, yet would I not believe that he had hearkned to my voice.

Secondly, That, he speaks exceeding humbly and submissively of himself, my voice; what am I, a poor creature, that I should think I had carried the matter with God?

Thirdly, That, he speaks very wisely and understandingly concerning the nature and efficacy of prayer, and the means procuring answers of prayer. When man prayes, God answers; but he doth not answer because man prayes.

Fourthly, That, he speaks very highly and gloriously of the providence of God, though providence act darkly towards man. We pray, God answers, and doth us good, yet things may go quite contrary in appearance, If I had called, and he had answered me, yet would I not believe that he had hearkned unto my voice; Why? He breaketh me with a tempest. God was breaking him, and hearing him at the same time. God may be doing us good, when the signs he gives speak evil; he hears and answers us praying to him, when we think we hear him thundring terribly against us. Hence we learn,

First, That, Prayer is calling upon God.

Then the heart should be very attentive upon God in prayer. How can we expect God should hear us, when we do not hear our selves! In prayer we call upon God, therefore we should call upon our selves to consider how and what we pray.

Secondly note, Prayer granted, is prayer answered.

If I had called, he had answered me. The Lord from heaven speaks to us in every act of his providence; his speaking to us, is in doing for us. The works of God are answers to man. God doth not answer audibly or sensibly; there is a voice in his dispensations. As men, (Prov. 6. 13.) So the Lord speaks to us with his feet, and answers our prayers with his fingers, that is, his works and wayes are demonstrations of his will in answer to our prayers.

Thirdly, In that Job tells us, He would not believe, &c. we are taught,

That faith is a necessary ingredient in prayer.

This negation of his faith in prayer, implies the need of faith in prayer. When I pray I should believe, but as my case stands I cannot believe, clouds and darkness are upon me. Faith is the strength of prayer, What soever you ask in prayer believing, you shall receive, Matth. 21. 22. Prayer without faith, is like a Gun discharged without a bullet, which makes a noise, but doth no execution. We may put out a voice in speaking, but except we put out faith in speaking, we do but speak, we do not pray. As the Word of God coming upon us doth us no good, prevails not upon our hearts, unless it be mixed with faith (Heb. 4. 2.) The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. So the word that goes out from us, the word of prayer, prevaileth not at all with God, obtaineth nothing from him, unless it be mixed with faith. All the promises are made to believers, All things are possible to them that believe (Mark 9. 23.) Ask in faith, nothing wavering, for he that wavereth is like a wave of the Sea, driven with the wind and tossed (Jam. 1. 6.) To ask in faith, is to ask, resting upon the power of God, whereby he is able; upon his truth, whereby he is faithful; and upon his goodness in Christ, whereby he is ready to make good his promises. He that asks thus doth not wave. Few are without doubting, but all sound believers are without wavering. The Greek word signifies to question, or dispute a thing, a degree beyond doubting; as when a man is at no certainty with himself, being sometime of one mind, sometime of another; the judgment being so carried, that the man is at variance with his own breast, or is between two wayes, not knowing which to take. We translate the word (in Rom. 4. 20.) by staggering. Abraham staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief. The similitude which the Apostle James uses, illustrates this sence, He that wavereth is like a wave of the Sea, which by tempestuous winds is sometimes carried up to heaven, and anon down to the deep. A man who is tossed with such waves of unbelief, staggers like a drunken man, in his practice and profession; he is now on this side, to morrow on that; he doth not only stagger or halt in his way, but he staggers and halts between two wayes; and is therefore called (vers. 8.) A double-minded man: The prayers of such a man are faithless prayers, and therefore fruitless prayers; Let not that man think he shall receive any thing (unless a rebuke and a denial) of the Lord (vers. 7.) There are no promises made to such, and therefore no mercies conveyed to such. Believing prayer is gaining prayer; yet they who believe least, presume most. Hence the Apostles check, Let not that man think; as if he had said, I know such will flatter themselves into a perswasion of great matters, they will have high thoughts, but they shall receive nothing.

Fourthly observe, That, How strongly soever a godly man acts faith for the answer of his prayers, yet he hath no faith that his prayer deserves an answer.

I would not believe that he had answered to [my] voyce. Christ calleth the Spouse to prayer (Cant. 2. 14.) Let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voyce, for sweet is thy voyce, and thy countenance comly. Christ loves prayer. The prayers of the Saints upon earth, are musick in heaven. That invitation to the Spouse, let me hear thy voyce, seems to be an allusion to those, who loving Musick, call upon a friend who hath a good voyce, or exquisite skill to play upon an Instrument, Come, sing us a song, play us a Lesson, let us have a fit of mirth. Thus, I say, Christ speaks to the Church, Come, let me hear thy voyce, 'tis sweet, I know thou hast a sweet one: But the Saints judge their own voyces harsh and unharmonical, they are apt to think their prayers jarrings and discords, at the best, but a rude noise, not a composed air in the ear of God. Faith makes our prayers melodious, because it carries us out of our selves. A believer lives not in the sound of his own prayers, but of Christs intercession. What are we that we should expect any acceptance upon our own account? or say, this we have gained, this we have obtained, thus God hath heard us, or thus we have wrestled it out with God? As when we have performed all our duties, we must say, We are unprofitable servants; so when we have obtained all our suits, we must say, We are unprofitable petitioners; I will not believe that God hath hearkened unto my voice. What's a mans voice, that God should hear it?

Fifthly observe, That, A godly man sometimes cannot believe his prayer is heard, when it is heard.

Though he calls, and God answers, yet (like Job) he believes not that God hath answered to his voice; he cannot think his prayer is heard, though one should come and tell him it is heard. When the Jews returned from Babylon, the mercy was so great, that they could not believe they had it, when they had it; When thou didst turn our captivity, we were as them that dream (Psal. 126. 2.) The deliverance was incredible, they could not think they were delivered. Their return to Jerusalem was suspected for a dream of it in Babylon. The Church prayed without ceasing for Peter, when he was in prison (Acts 12. 15.) yet when the Lord brought him out of prison, and he was knocking at the door of the house where they were assembled, while they were knocking at the door of heaven for his deliverance, yet they would not believe the report of the Damosel, who said he stood before the gate. They tell her she is mad; and when she affirmed it with sobriety, as well as vehemency; then they have another help for their unbelief, It was not Peter, but his Angel. Thus it is to this day with the Saints in their great personal suits and petitions, both about spiritual things and temporal, they are so overcome, astonished and amazed at the goodness of God, that though they see the thing done, yet they can scarce believe it done. As if a Prince should send a message to a poor man by some great Lord, and tell him he hath bestowed honour and favour upon him; the poor man is ready to say, I cannot believe it, the blessing is too big for him to digest and let down in his narrow heart: No, saith he, sure it is not so. Though the people of God ever preserve a high respect and esteem of the works of God towards them, yet their faith is often below his workings, and they cannot receive or take in mercy so fast as it cometh. Faith widens the vessels of the soul to receive much, but God can powr in faster then faith can widen the soul to receive.

Forsan hoc dicit, quia sæpe præ nimia lætitia non credimus verum esse quod maximè verum esse optamus. Rus.

Sixthly observe, Faith hath its decayes.

Faith doth not keep up alwayes at the same height, in the same plight and degree: There is a faith which believes that God doth answer before he answers; and there is a faith that cannot believe that God will answer, when he hath answered. Faith in strength prevents the answer of God. As God in answering, sometimes prevents our askings (Isa. 65. 24.) Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear: so faith saith, Before the Lord giveth, I know I have it; before the Lord doth this thing, I see it is done. Faith in its strength, realizes the mercies of God before they have a being, and is an evidence to us of what we see not. When mercies are but in their principles, in their conception and birth, or at most, when they are but in their cradle and swadling-clouts, faith speaks as gloriously of them, as if they were fully acted and grown up before the eye. Strong faith in God (like God himself) quickens the dead, and calleth those things which be not, as though they were. Weak faith deadens the quick, and calleth those things which are, as if they were not. The Israelites were no sooner over the red Sea, but they believed themselves in the Land of Canaan (Exod. 15. 13, 14, 15.) And in their Song tell the story of the submission and fears of the uncircumcised Nations round about, which yet their after-unbelief kept off forty years.

There is a further understanding of the words, which I shall clear in connexion with that which followeth.

I would not believe that he had hearkened to my voyce; for he breaketh me with a tempest:] As if the reason why he doubted his [voyce] was not heard, lay in this, because of those continual breakings which were upon him; I would not believe that he had hearkened to my voyce; for he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without a cause: As if Job had said, the dealings of God are such towards me, that I know not how to make it out that I am heard; for though the Lord in some things carries it so graciously towards me, that I have great assurance I am heard, yet many things appear, reporting that I am not heard. Afflictions continued are no evidence that prayer is not heard, yet usually it is very inevident to an afflicted person, that his prayer is heard.

Etiamsi Deus me precatem exaudierit, minimè credo cum malorum nimbo me obruat.

I shall now examine vers. 16, 17. as holding a reason why Job's faith was thus weakened.

Verse 17. For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause.

שער Turbo.

Job's sorrows put him to his Rhetorick still, He breaketh me with a tempest. An expression raising his afflictions to the height, yet not beyond the reality of them; He breaketh me with a tempest.

שוף Contudit, contrivit, obtrivit.

The word we translate [breaks] signifies an utter confusion, or the total ruining of a thing or person, the dashing of either to pieces. The word is used reciprocally of Christ and the Devil, in that great promise of Christ, The seed of the woman (Gen. 3. 16.) It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Christ having infinite power, utterly destroyed the Serpents power; he spoiled and ruined him for ever: The Apostle phrases it so (Col. 2. 15.) He spoiled principalities and powers; he took away the prey or booty of souls which they had got, and led them disarm'd like prisoners of war: And the Devil did what he could to ruine and spoil Christ, to break Christ to pieces. Thus Christ and Satan strove and contended one with another. And the word (Shuph) hath an elegant hearness in sound to our English. We call that noise which is made by the ruder motion of the feet, shuffling; and when men contend much, we hear the shuffling of their feet. Job was striving and shuffling with God in prayer, and God was striving and shuffling with Job in storms and tempests.

He

He breaketh me with a tempeſt.

Chaldæus legit, uſq; ad filum lineũ, vel ad fila pilorũ ſubtiliter diſputat mecũ. שערה Filum ſignificat.

The word ſignifies not only ſtorms and tempeſts; but likewiſe, a little hair or twined thread. So the Chaldee Paraphraſt tranſlates it here, He diſputes or contends with me to a hair, or to a thread; making the ſence out thus, I will not believe that God hath anſwered me; why? He ſtandeth with me upon the ſmalleſt matters; he diſputes with me to a hair, and debates every thing to a thread. As Abraham ſaid to the King of Sodom (Gen. 14. 23.) I will not take any thing that is thine, from a thread, even to a ſhoe-latchet; that is, I will not make the ſmalleſt gain by thee: So, to diſpute to a hair, or to a thread, notes contending upon or about the ſmalleſt differences.

But generally the word is rendred a Tempeſt; and thus God is often deſcribed contending with man (Nahum 1, 3.) His way is in the whirlwind, and in the ſtorm, and the clouds are the duſt of his feet, that is, he ſends ſtorms and whirlwinds, by theſe he afflicts the children of men; and as an army of horſemen raiſes clouds of duſt from the earth with their feet, ſo the Lord raiſes the duſt of clouds with his; Behold, a whirlwind or a tempeſt of the Lord is gone forth in fury, even a grievous whirlwind; it ſhall fall grievouſly upon the head of the wicked, Jer. 23. 19.

To break with a tempeſt or with a whirlwind, implies two things.

Firſt, A ſudden and an unexpected affliction. Tempeſts are never welcome, and but ſeldom looked for. When the ſea is ſo calm and ſmooth that you may throw a Die upon it, a ſtorm ariſeth in a moment, and the veſſel is in danger of a wreck.

Secondly, It noteth the fierceneſs and violence of an affliction. Tempeſts are the moſt violent motions, they come with power. A Tempeſt is irreſiſtible, who can ſtand before it? Who can contend with ſtorms and winds? When the Lord made total conqueſts of his enemies, he contended (in the letter) by ſtorms and tempeſts. As in Joſhua 10. and in (1 Sam. 7. 10.) When the Philiſtims drew near to battell againſt Iſrael, the Lord thundred with a great thunder that day upon the Philiſtims, and diſcomfited them. The Story is famous of a Legion of Chriſtian ſouldiers, called the thundering Legion, becauſe by prayer they obtained a refreſhing rain for the Army in which they were commanded, and a terrible ſtorm of Thunder and Lightning, &c. upon the enemy. The word is uſed figuratively in war, when beſiegers coming to a Town or Fort, are reſolved to carry it preſently whatever it coſt them, they are ſaid to ſtorm the place, or get it by ſtorm. The Prophet alludes to this (Iſa. 25. 4.) When the blaſt of the terrible ones is as a ſtorm againſt the wall; that is, when their rage ſhall be at the higheſt, moſt violent and impetuous, then the Lord will be a refuge from the ſtorm. The ſame God who ſaves many from the ſtorms of man, did himſelf ſtorm Job,

He breaketh me with a tempeſt.

Job was ſtormed, yet ſuppoſes his prayer was anſwered. Hence obſerve,

Prayers may be heard and anſwered when greateſt afflictions are upon us.

Quædam nõ negantur, ſed ut congruo tempore dentur, differuntur. Aug. Exaudit ſæpe ad profectum, licet non ad votũ. Aquin. in loc. Sævitur in vulnus, ut homo ſanetur. Aug.

Do not think your prayers are loſt, becauſe your afflictions are not removed, or that God hath not heard you, becauſe he doth not preſently relieve you. God forbears, when he doth not deny. He anſwers to our profit, when he anſwereth not to our feeling. He anſwereth to our ſpiritual intereſt, when not to our corporal. The ſick man calleth to the Phyſitian to take away the bitter, loathſome potion; and the wounded man calleth to the Chirurgeon, to take away thoſe corroding plaiſters, and to forbear thoſe torturing operations; but the one gives him his potion, and the other lances his ſores, and layes corroſives to his fleſh; both theſe, while they vex the Patient, anſwer him; for what's the reaſon why the Patient would have his bitter potion taken away? Is it not becauſe he would be better? And why would he have thoſe painful operations forborn? is it not becauſe he would have eaſe? Now for both thoſe very reaſons, the Maſters of thoſe Profeſſions keep him to both; neither could they give him his deſire, but by doing contrary to his will. Thus alſo the Lord is healing us, when we think he is only wounding us; and fulfilling our deſires, while we cry out he is croſſing them.

Secondly obſerve, Even while we are praying, the Lord may be thundering; he may be breaking us when we are beſeeching him.

We muſt learn to keep to our duty, whatſoever the dealings of God be; whether it be foul weather or fair, pray ſtill; whether it be ſtorm or calm, go on in prayer ſtill. Pray ſtill, though God break ſtill. It is our duty to pray, and it is Gods priviledge to break.

Thirdly, Obſerve from the loftineſs of the language,

That, The Lord layes very ſore afflictions upon thoſe that are very dear to him.

Job expreſſeth his afflictions by breaking with a tempeſt. Stroaks from the clouds are moſt terrible. The ſame afflictions and ſcourges which he layes upon his enemies, he layes (in the matter, yea, and often in degree) upon his beſt friends? What can the Lord do to his greateſt enemies, but break them with a tempeſt? He doth not only chaſten with a rod, but ſometimes ſcatter with a ſtorm: He hath not only a ſword, but a thunderbolt for his ſervants: He hath terrible ſtroaks and blows for them who lie in his arms, and live in his embraces. Therefore we cannot diſtinguiſh men by the matter, no, nor by the meaſure of their afflictions; that which is a judgment to one, is but a chaſtening to another; with the ſame weapon he wounds a friend, and deſtroyes an enemy.

Fourthly obſerve, That, Afflictions continued, cauſe us to ſuſpect that our prayers are not anſwered.

Why doth Job think that God hearkened not to him? I would not believe (ſaith he) that God hath hearkened unto my voyce; why? becauſe ſtill he continues to break me. Faith is put hard to it at ſuch a time; and this is the thing which ſtumbled Job, he could not tell how to make it out, that God had heard his prayer for him, becauſe he heard ſo great a noiſe of tempeſts and ſtorms againſt him. It is very difficult for faith to ſee mercy through clouds of trouble. It is a hard thing for faith to look upon the pleaſed face of God through a lowring tempeſt, or to believe the calmneſs of Gods heart to us in troubleſome diſpenſations. Therefore he ſpeaks here as if his faith were even maſtered. The providences of God are often too hard for man. And with this temptation Satan helps on unbelief. If he come to a ſoul in affliction, which keeps cloſe to his intereſts in Chriſt: Yea (ſaith he) you may do ſo though afflictions were upon you, but yours are more then afflictions, yours are tempeſts and ſtorms: God dealeth with you as with an enemy, yours are no ordinary matters, yours are like the portion he gives to thoſe he hates; I would not weaken your faith becauſe of a chaſtening rod, but you are beaten with Scorpions, and will you ſtill believe? Can God love you, and deal thus with you? Thus the Serpent whiſpers in thoſe louder tempeſts of affliction.

Licet Deus verè exaudiat, tamen homo in miſeriis conſtitutus ſe exaudiri non credit. Aqu.

Fifthly obſerve, That, Afflictions continued, cauſe us to ſuſpect that our prayers ſhall not be anſwered.

And ſo I find ſome rendring the former verſe in connexion with this; If I have called, and he hath anſwered me, yet will I not believe that he will hearken to my voyce: As if he had ſaid, I know God hath heard me heretofore, but I fear he will hear me no more, becauſe I find his hand ſo heavy upon me. Surely then, he hath forgottten to be gracious, and hath ſhut up his tender mercies. Former experiences can hardly keep Faith whole, while we are under preſent breakings.

Laſtly, If we take the words, as importing a calling to God for anſwer in a way of provocation (as was ſhewed before) then the ſence is, If I had an ambition to contend with God, and he had anſwered me by condeſcending to that courſe, yet I could not believe he had hearkened to my voyce; that is, I could not believe that he had yielded the cauſe to me: Why? Becauſe he goes on ſtill to break me with tempeſts; he follows me with trouble ſtill; he ſhews he hath done me no wrong in my former afflictions, by his going on to afflict me ſtill; he is ſo far from acknowledging the leaſt injuſtice in what is paſt of my ſufferings, that I ſuffer more; He breaks me with a tempeſt, and,

Multiplies

Multiplies my wounds without cause.

חנם Gratis.

But is not this injustice, to multiply wounds without cause? Is not this a charge of blasphemy upon God? May we not think that now Satan had his wish, and that Job cursed God indeed?

Vulnera sine causa sunt mala & flagella, quæ non ob aliquod mittuntur peccatum.

The Hebrew word which we translate, Without cause, hath been opened, Chap. 1. 9. & 2. 3. and it hath occurred elsewhere. Here, He multiplies my wounds without cause, is not a charge of injustice upon God, Job's heart was far from the least thought of that, as you may see in all the dispute: But it is an acknowledgment of the soveraignty and power of God, Though he hath wounded me already, yet he may wound me still, without giving me a reason; or, though I have given him no cause. What? Do you think God would yield to me, if I should contend with him? He multiplieth, or, He hath multiplied my wounds without cause, that is, without giving me any account hitherto; and do you think that now I shall have liberty to call him to an account, or that he will give me one? He wounds without cause, is, * without cause manifested. God hath not told me the reason of his chastenings; and I do not perceive the reason; I know not why he contendeth with me. And so he expounds what he spake at vers. 12. Lo, he passeth by me, and I see him not. There are mysteries in providence. Mans eye is not clear enough to see all that God doth before his eyes. Job is his own expositor. This latter expression gives us a comment upon the former. And it is observable, that both in this book, and in the whole body of the Scripture, easier Texts may be found to interpret the harder, and clear ones to enlighten those which are darker and more obscure. The word of God is not only a light and a rule to us, but to it self.

* Sine causa manifesta, & ab homine afflicto perceptibili. Aquin.

His verbis evidenter exponit, quæ supra occultè dixerat, si venerit ad me, non video. Hoc enim ubiq; ferè in dictis Jobi observandū, quod obscurè dicta per aliqua consequentia exponuntur. Aquin.

Or, He multiplieth my wounds without cause.] Is, as if Job had said, I know the Lord deals not with me as with a guilty person, nor doth he judge me as a malefactor; mine is a probation, not a punishment: God doth only try me, to see what is in my heart, and how I can stand in an evil day. He multiplieth my wounds without cause; that is, without the cause which you have so often objected against me, namely, that I am an hypocrite and wicked. I know God looks upon me as a child, or a friend, not as an enemy. Therefore I have no cause to multiply words with God, though God go on to multiply my wounds without cause.

Hæc à Job dicta sunt, quod intelligat se non tā flagellari quā probari.

Animus in Deum præclarè affectus, sed tamen affectus dolore. Sanct.

To multiply wounds] Notes, numerous and manifold afflictions; many in number, and many in kind. Job's were deep, deadly wounds, and he had many of them, he was all over wounds, body and soul were wounds, he was smitten within and without; as to multiply to pardon, is to pardon abundantly (Isa. 55. 7.) So to multiply wounds, or to multiply to wound, is to wound abundantly.

Here a question would be resolved, How the justice of God may be acquitted, in laying on and multiplying afflictions without cause?

I shall refer the Reader for further light about this point to Chap. 2. vers. 3. where those words are opened; Thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause; yet take here three considerations more, by way of answer to the doubt.

First, Whatsoever the Lord wounds and takes from any man, he wounds and takes his own. He is Lord over all. Our health and strength are his, our riches are his; The world is his and the fulness of it (Psal. 50.) If he be hungry, he needs not tell us; he can go to his own store. It is no wrong to dispose what is our own, wheresoever we find it. That rule is as true in revocations, as distributions: Friend, I do thee no wrong (Matth. 20. 15.) Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Though there were no sin in man, yet there were no injustice in God, because he takes nothing from us, but what he gave us, and hath full power to recal, and take away.

Secondly, Suppose man could say, that, what he had were his own; that, his riches were his own, that, health and strength of body were his own, yet God may take them away, and do no wrong. It is so among men, Kings and States call out their Subjects to war, and in that war their wounds are multiplied without any cause given by them: They gave no occasion why they should be appointed to such hazards of life and limb, to such hardships of hunger and cold; yet there is no injustice in this. When God casts man into trouble, he calls him out to his service, he hath a war, some noble enterprize and design to send him upon. To you it is given to suffer for his sake (saith the Apostle, Phil. 1. 29.) he puts it among the special priviledges, which some Saints are graced with, not only above the world, but above many of the Saints, To whom it is given (and that's a royal gift) only to believe. Now, if in prosecuting this suffering task, whether for Christ, or from Christ, a believer layes out his estate, credit, liberty or life, he is so far from being wronged, that he is honoured. Thousands are slain in publick imployments, who have given no cause to be so slain. If according to the line of men, this be no injustice, much less is it injustice in God, who is without line, himself being the only line and rule to himself, and to all besides himself.

Thirdly, I may answer it thus, Though the Lord multiply wounds without cause; yet he doth it without wrong to the wounded, because he wounds with an intention to heal, and takes away with a purpose to give more; as in the present case, God made Job an amends for all the wounds, whether of his body or goods, good name or spirit. Now, though it be a truth in respect of man, that we may not break anothers head, and say we will give him a plaister; or take away from man his possession, and say we will give it him again, yet God may. Man must not be so bold with man, because he hath no right to take away and wound, nor is he sure that he can restore and heal; but it is no boldness, but a due right in God to do thus, for he as Lord hath power to take away, and ability to restore. And he restores sometimes in temporals, as to Job, but alwayes to his people in spirituals and eternals. Hence the Apostle argueth (2 Cor. 4. 7.) Our light afflictions which are but for a moment, work for us an eternal weight of glory. Afflictions work glory for us, not in a way of meriting glory, but in a tendency to the receiving of glory, and in preparations for it. There is no wrong in those losses by which we are made gainers: Those losses being sent that we may gain, and the sender of the loss being able effectually to make us gainers.

He multiplieth my wounds without cause.] Hence observe,

First, Afflictions are no argument that God doth not love us.

As the Lord hath a multitude of mercies in his heart, so a multitude of afflictions in his hand; and a multitude of afflictions may consist with a multitude of mercies. At the same time when we are visibly encompast about, and besieged with an army of sorrows and opposers, an army of invisible comforts and protectors may be encamping round about us: As Elisha assured his servant, 2 King. 6. 17.

Secondly, (Which I shall but only name, because I have met it heretofore.)

The Lord is not accountable to any creature for his actions.

He multiplieth my wounds without cause, or, He multiplieth my wounds without shewing cause. God is the only Judge, who may give sentence without hearing parties, or shewing cause. It is unrighteous in an earthly Judge to do so: he must not judge a man to any suffering, and not shew reason of his judgment. But the first cause needs not shew second causes. God hath the reason of all things in himself, and therefore we cannot call him to give his reason. Where the will of the Agent may lawfully be all the reason of his actions, there is no reason he should give any account of his actions, but what himself wills.

The next verse is of the same tenor in sence with the former, the difference is only in expression.

Vers. 18. He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness.

He not only breaks me with a tempest, and multiplies my wounds, but He will not suffer me to take my breath. This implies the unintermittedness of afflictions; as if he had said, I have not only many afflictions, and great afflictions, but continual afflictions. The Hebrew is, He will not give me to draw back my breath, or, suffer my breath to return: The words are of the same importance with those of Chap. 7. vers.

Non dedit mihi retrahere spiritū.

verſ. 19. How long wilt thou not depart from me? Nor let me alone till I ſwallow down my ſpittle? That is, wilt thou not give me ſo much reſpite as to ſwallow down my ſpittle? Here (which is more) he affirms, He will not give me ſo much as a breathing time.

Quidam ad morbum referunt, qu ſi Job Aſtmate laboraſſet. Beda.

Some interpret this of a bodily diſtemper or diſeaſe: that God had brought a ſickneſs upon him, which did even ſtop his breath, as if Job had been troubled with hardneſs of breathing, with the Tiſſick (as Phyſitians call it) or a ſtopping in the lungs. But we may rather take it figuratively, my ſorrows put me out of breath; the Lord doth not only afflict me without giving me any account, but I have unceſſant afflictions which cannot be accounted. No man can tell how often he doth or ſuffers that which he alwayes doth or ſuffers. I am ſo far from ſeeing a period of my troubles, that I have not ſo much as any pauſe or ſtop. He ſpeaks in that high ſtrain of Rhetorick, called hyperbole; for in ſtrictneſs of the letter, not to ſuffer a man to take his breath, is to kill and quite deſtroy him; but when he ſaith, God will not ſuffer me to breathe, it noteth the continuation of his ſorrows, not the expiration of his dayes.

Fortaſſe proverbiũ erat, ad ſignificandũ facere aliquid indefinenter & abſq; ulla vel minima morula aut intermiſſione Una ſaliva. Hieron. in ep. ἄπνευστι, i.e. uno ſpiritu aliquid facere, eſt diligenter facere. Theoph. in Charact. Clivum iſtũ uno ſi potes ſpiritu exupera. Sen. * Va preſto, & non fietare, q.d. uno halitu egreſſum & regreſſum perfice.

Again, Not to ſuffer a man to take his breath, before he hath done ſuch a thing, is a Proverb for ſpeedy doing. Like that uſed by ſome of the Ancients, to do a thing with one ſpit, that is, in as little time as a man may ſpit. When the * Italians would expreſs acting without delay, they ſay, Go about this buſineſs, and do not fetch a breath till you are here again, go and come with a breath. That direction given by Eliſha to his ſervant Gehezi, when he ſent him to reſtore the Shunamites ſon (2 King. 4. 29.) Take my ſtaff in thine hand, and go thy way; if thou meet any man, ſalute him not; and if any ſalute thee, anſwer him not again, &c. And that of Chriſt to his Diſciples, when he gave them their Commiſſion to preach the Goſpel (Luke 10. 4.) Salute no man by the way, are of the ſame intendment. Chriſt did not mean that his Diſciples ſhould be uncivil (nor Eliſha his) he did not forbid them to uſe common courteſies to men, when they went to call men to ſpecial grace. No, but his meaning is, Go ſpeedily about the work, do not ſtand complementing and talking, with How do you, and how do you? by the way: do not entertain the time, or trifle it away with Ceremonies, having an imployment of ſuch infinite concernment put into your hands. So he ſeems to allude to, and reprove that ill cuſtom of idle ſervants, who when they are ſent forth upon buſineſs, will yet ſtand and talk with every one they meet. Now, as not to ſuffer a man to talk a word while he is upon a ſervice, imports ſudden diſpatch: ſo when Job ſaith, He will not ſuffer me to take my breath in theſe my ſufferings, his meaning is, mine are no lazy, dull ſufferings, I am forced to be active at them, I cannot ſtand breathing and cooling my ſelf, I have no leiſure, no vacation at all from this paſſive ſervice: He will not ſuffer me to take my breath.

But (or, for) he filleth me with bitterneſs, or with bitternesſes.

* Sicut dulcedo omnia jucunda & amica naturæ ſignificat ſic nomine amaritudinis, graviſſimaq; afflictiones intelliguntur. Bold. Vicit iræ non dulcuerunt, Hoſ. 9. 4.

I have opened this word before, Chap. 3. 10. As in Scripture, ſweetneſs implies all comfort: ſo bitterneſs all trouble and ſorrow. When God complains about the ſervices of his people (Jer. 6. 20. Hoſ. 9.) he ſaith, Your ſacrifices are not ſweet to me: So the Original; that is, your Sacrifices are not acceptable to me, or pleaſing to me. Sweet things are pleaſing things, bitter things are unpleaſing. Afflictions are unpleaſant to fleſh and blood, (Heb. 12. 11.) No affliction for the preſent is joyous, but grievous.

Bitterneſs] is put for the extreameſt affliction, and in the plural (as here) for all afflictions; Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt, ſaith Agag (1 Sam. 15. 32.) that is, I have eſcaped bitter death at this time; the Souldier ſpared me in the heat of the battel, ſurely then a Prophet will not ſlay me in cold blood: To be filled with bitterneſs notes abundance of afflictions. As to be filled with the Spirit, to be filled with the fulneſs of Chriſt, &c. note the plentiful receiving of the Spirit, and of the grace of Chriſt. To taſte of a bitter cup, to ſip a little of it is unpleaſant, but to drink large draughts, to be fill'd with bitterneſs, who can abide it? When Chriſt was come to Golgotha, They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall; but (though he drank up that cup of his fathers wrath to the very bottom, though he drank up all the gall and wormwood of ſin, for the ſalvation of men, yet) when he had taſted thereof, He would not drink (Matth. 27. 34.) If it be grievous to taſte but a little of a bitter cup, then judge how grievous Job's ſufferings were, who was filled with bitterneſs; he had his belly full of trouble, his belly full of gall and wormwood, his ſtomach could hold no more, bitterneſs was both his meat and drink. Note,

First, Afflictions may come unceſſantly.

Not ſo much as a breathing time between. Then while thou art aſſaulted prepare for freſh aſſaults. Obſerve, Secondly, The Lord ſometimes mixes a very bitter cup for his own people.

Yea, They have not only a bitter cup, but bitterneſs is their cup; and they have not only a taſte of it, but are filled with it. The Pſalmiſt ſhews us a bitter cup, which is the proper portion of wicked men; There is a cup in the hand of the Lord, and it is full of mixture, the wine is red, and the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth ſhall wring them out, and drink them (Pſal. 75. 8.) The Lord hath a cup of red wine, that is, a cup filled with wrath, fury and indignation. Wicked men (how much ſoever their ſtomachs loath it, and turn againſt it) ſhall drink it up to the bottom, or, he will pour it down their throats, whether they will or no. They ſhall be filled with bitterneſs after all their ſweet morſels and pleaſant draughts. The Saints are filled with bitterneſs from God, but not with the wrath of God; many ſorrows may be mingled in their cup, but everlaſting love is ever mingled in it. Saints never drink pure wrath, as wicked men never taſte pure love.

To conclude, we may obſerve here a Climax, or gradation of four ſteps.

First, (Verſ. 14.) Job acknowledged that he was unable to anſwer the Lord.

And ſecondly, He profeſſed that if he could, he would not, no, he would humble himſelf (Verſ. 15.)

Thirdly, If in mercy God ſhould anſwer his petition, yet he would not be confident at all (in regard of himſelf) that God had heard him, or hearkned unto his voice.

Laſtly, He acknowledged that God might go on to afflict him ſtill; for ſome read this Text in the future tenſe, He will multiply my wounds, and afflict me without cauſe; He will fill me with bitterneſs. A godly man reckons up his afflictions as well as his comforts to the praiſe and honour of God. And the more God afflicts him, the more he abaſes himſelf, though he doth not think the worſe of himſelf, becauſe God doth afflict him.

VERS. 19, 20, 21.

If I ſpeak of ſtrength, lo, he is ſtrong; and if of judgement, Who ſhall ſet me a time to plead?
If I juſtifie my ſelf, mine own mouth ſhall condemn me; If I ſay, I am perfect, it ſhall alſo prove me perverſe.
Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my own ſoul, I would deſpiſe my life.

JOB goeth on to lay himſelf yet lower before God: and having in the three former verſes proved that weak man is not able to contend with the Almighty; he giveth an additional proof in Verſ. 19. from the conſideration of a twofold adjunct in God. First, His ſtrength. And ſecondly, His juſtice. From both he concludeth according to the former argument given upon the whole matter in Verſ. 10. ſeeing God is ſo ſtrong and juſt, Surely, if I juſtifie my ſelf, my own mouth ſhall condemn me; and if I ſay, I am perfect, it ſhall alſo prove me perverſe.

If I ſpeak of ſtrength, lo, he is ſtrong.

There are two wayes whereby a man makes his part good againſt another man.

First, By the ſtrength of his arm, and dint of his Sword.

Secondly, By the equity of his cauſe, and the goodneſs of his conſcience. Job declareth his inability to deal with God in either, If I ſpeak of ſtrength, lo, he is ſtrong, &c.

Mr. Broughton tranſlates thus, As for force, he is valiant; if I think to carry it by force with God, He is a God of valour, valour, or, as Moses in his Song (*Exod.*15.3.) describeth him, The Lord is a man of war, I cannot deal with him upon that point.

In originali indifferens est, quam tantùm habetur, si ad potentiam: ut suppleri possit, venero, aut respexero, vel aliquid simile.

The original speaks only thus much, If of strength, he strong; we supply the word, speak. If men talk of strength, or boast of strength, or shew forth their strength (we may supply it with any of those words) Lo, he is strong. As it is usual with us when we would set a man up, in the perfections of any quality, we say, What do ye speak of knowledge, why, There's a learned man! What do ye speak of riches, why, There's a rich man! &c. Such an emphasis is carried in this expression, If I speak of strength, why, here's one that is strong indeed!

אמץ Prevalens, vincens, invitto quodam & obfirmato animo præditus dici solet de eo qui viribus superior est.

There are five words in the Hebrew which signifie strength. The first, notes strength in general: The second, strength to endure labour: The third, efficacy: The fourth, vigour: The fifth, which is that of the Text, superiority of strength, or prevailing strength. It is one thing to be strong, and another thing to prevail. The Lord is not only strong, but strongest: he hath a strength above all strength, he is strong overcomingly, strong prevailingly. Christ in the Gospel speaks of a strong man (he means the Devil) that kept the house; but he was not strong prevailingly, for there came a stronger then he, that spoil'd him, and took away all his armor from him, wherein he trusted (Luke 11.22.) but when the Holy Ghost saith, That the Lord is strong, the meaning is, that he is stronger then all: and so generally the positive is expounded by the superlative, If we speak of strength, lo, he is strong, that is, he is most strong. Thus we find the word used, 2 *Sam.*22.18. He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them that hated me, for they were too strong for me: they were prevailingly strong for me, and therefore unless I had found a supply of help, unless some Auxiliaries had come from Heaven to take my part, they had been too hard for me, I had been overmatcht, they were prevailingly strong, or too strong for me. We have the word in the same sence (*Gen.*25.23.) in that resolution which the unerring oracle of Heaven gave Rebekah enquiring about the children striving in her womb, the Lord answereth thus, Two Nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people; and then addeth, The one people shall be stronger then the other people; it is this word, the one people shall be prevailingly strong, and shall overcome the other; both people shall be strong, mighty and potent, but there is one of them shall have the rule, and shall conquer and subdue the other. If I speak of strength, he is strong. The sum is, If the Question be about strength and power, then the Lord carries the day and the honour, he is most powerful, he is strong above all. Hence observe, Regnum regno prævalebit, sci. populus præ populo robustior.

That, God is of infinite and insuperable strength.

He hath strength: Many have malice and wickedness, boldness and presumption enough to oppose, but none have power enough to overcome him. He hath force which none can subdue; and he hath authority which none ought to resist. These two must concur wheresoever there is full determining power. A man may have authority or right to do a thing, and yet have no strength to execute and effect it. And many have strength to do those things (as to oppress a man, to take his goods or his life from him) for which they have no authority: both meet in the Lord, therefore he is the Soveraign Lord; he hath authority to do as much as he can, and he hath strength to do as much as he will. Some men would make strange work in the world, if they had strength sutable to their authority: and others would make a good world by their works, if they had authority sutable to their strength: both these meet in God, who can contend with him? If we speak of strength, lo, he is strong.

There are three things wherein this insuperableness of the strength of God appears.

First, He hath strength to do whatsoever he will, There is nothing not feible, or too hard for him.

Secondly, He hath strength to do what he willeth not, the Lord is able to do more then ever he will do; he could presently take vengeance upon all the wicked, but he will not; he is patient and good toward them, who look not at all towards repentance, to which his goodness and patience leads them, Rom. 2. 5.

Thirdly, He is so strong that he can do whatsoever imports strength, because he only doth what he will do. To do that which is not our will to do, is a note of disability. It argues a want of power to be forced to do a thing, as well as not be able to do it. He that doth what he would not, is not able to do what he would. God is therefore able to do whatsoever he wills, because he never did, nor can be drawn to do any thing against his will. It follows then, That the Lord is so strong that he can do whatsoever names him strong, and only cannot do those things, which if he did, he must be weak, as was further shewed at vers. 4. of this Chapter. Hence it appears,

Secondly, That, No creature is able to grapple with God.

He is strongest. The Apostle gives that admonition, (1 Corinth. 10. 22.) Do we provoke the Lord to jealousie? Are we stronger then he? Surely, except man thought he were able to match God, he would not be so fool-hardy, so vain, to throw down the Gauntlet, or enter the lists with God: The weakness of God is stronger then men (1 Cor. 1.25.) not that there is any weakness in God: but take that which men conceive to be weakness, or weakest in him, that's stronger then man. Or, The weakness of God, that is, the weakest instruments which God useth, are stronger, scil. in their effects, then the strongest which men use. God can do more with ten men, then man can do with an hundred. The most stammering tongue and flattest language shall perswade more, if God speak with it, then the most fluent tongue and sparkling Oratory spoken meerly by man, If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong.

And if of judgment, Who shall set me a time to plead?

If I cannot by force and power, may I not by subtilty and wit, by reason and argument, by Eloquence and Rhetorick prevail against him? No, If of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead? As I cannot deal with God at the sword, or in the field; so neither can I deal with him at the bar, or at the judgment seat.

There are two words in the Hebrew which are used for judging, The first is, Dan, the name of one of the twelve Patriarchs, and from him of a Tribe in Israel: Dan shall judge his people (Gen.49.16.) And that word (in strictness) signifies to give doom or sentence in a cause. The other word is that in the Text, Shaphat, which signifies more especially the doing of right, or the righting of a man in any controversie. The Greek word takes in both. Now, while Job saith, If of judgment, or if we speak of judgment, the Question is, What judgment doth he mean?

Judgment is taken three wayes.

First, For the rule of judging, or for the Law whereby we judge. It is said (1 *Sam.*10.25.) that Samuel (after he had annointed Saul for King) told the people the manner of the Kingdom, and wrote it in a book. This manner of the Kingdom was not the common practice and custom of the Kingdom, but (it is the word of the Text) the judgments of the Kingdom, that is, those rules and laws by which the Kingdom ought to be governed and judged.

Secondly, Judgment is put for an ability or fitness to judge, to discern and weigh things, to scan a cause, and try out the uttermost truth of every circumstance: judgment is the ability of the person judging. And Thirdly, Judgment is taken for the sentence given upon the person judged, after the evidence of his cause is heard and taken. Judgment in this third sence is the result of the former two. For when by judgment, as it is the rule of judging, and an ability to judge, the Judge hath wrought and tried out what the merit of a mans cause, and the truth of a business in controversie is, then the issue of both is, Judgment in this third sence; that is, an act which is passed, or a sentence pronounced upon the person that standeth in, or the cause which is brought to judgment.

So, If of judgment, is, If I bring forth my cause to be tried by the abilities of the Judge, and by the rule of the Law, this will be no relief to me, I shall be in as ill a case, as if I were to deal with God by plain strength.

There is an opinion that takes in a fourth sence about this word Judgment, as if judgment were not a forensical, or a judicial term in this Text, but signified only afflictions or

or punishments upon a people or person. These are called the judgments of God, Rom. 11. 33. How unsearchable are his judgments, and his wayes past finding out? That is, the several acts which he passes upon men, his providences and outward dispensations (for he speaks of casting off of the Jews, and laying them aside for so long a time, which is one of the greatest, if not the greatest judgment which God ever burdened his own Covenant-people with) These (saith he) are past finding out. And then, If I come to speak of judgment, is, If I speak with God about his judgments shewed in those terrible providential acts upon others, or upon my self, and cite him to answer for what he hath done towards me or them, Who is able to plead? Who will undertake this cause against the Lord?

Who shall set me a time to plead?

יעד In suo Kal conducere, convenire & tempus certè tuere, propriè significat. In Hiphil (sicut hic), convenire facere.

It is but one word which we translate [To set a time to plead] but the sence is very large and various; it signifies to appoint, constitute or prescribe either time, place or persons, any or all the circumstantials of action. It is here translated by divers in reference to the time, and by some in reference to the place. And because the people of God are to meet at appointed times and places for solemn and publick worship, therefore this word signifies the Church or the congregation, which is alwayes to meet by publick appointment at such a time, or in such a place, lest there should be scatterings and confusions amongst those who should be most unanimous and harmonious. It is taken also for any meeting, Psal. 48. 4. Lo, the Kings were assembled or gathered together. And, Amos 3. 3. Can two walk together except they be agreed? That is, except they be friends. They who have not one heart, seldom have one way. Or, except they be agreed, that is, upon time and place; two men cannot converse or have any business one with another, unless they consent and appoint where and when; if one be for this time and place, and the other for that, they can never walk together. It is put for a set time, 2 Sam. 24. 15. The Lord having sent the pestilence upon Jerusalem for the sin of David in numbring the people, it is said, the pestilence destroyed from the morning, even to the time appointed; the Lord had set the pestilence a time, it wrought to that time and no longer.

עֵרָה Conventus status locis & locis aggregari soliti, cœtus, collegium, ecclesia, congregatio.

Further, The word is applied to any covenant, pact, or mutual agreement: Hence the Tabernacle is indifferently called The Tabernacle of the Testimony, or, The Tabernacle of the Congregation; because there God confirmed and setled his Covenant, and made an agreement with his people, and his people resorted to the Tabernacle, to have the Articles of that Covenant made good to them by his own appointment. Hence (I say) it was called The Tabernacle of witness, The Tabernacle of the Testament, or, The Tabernacle of the Covenant. Upon this ground also all the solemn feasts of the Jews were exprest by this general word, they being all observed at set times and places. And for this reason the word is used for the Grave. So in Job 30. 23. Which we translate thus, The house appointed for all living; there is a time when, and a place appointed where all that live shall be laid down when they die, or where their bodies shall be housed after they are dissolved, therefore it is called The house of appointment; the house which the Lord hath setled both for time and place where it shall be made, and when we shall be carried to it. No man goes to his grave by accident; the Lord hath appointed man his place, and bounded his habitation, when he is dead, as well as while he lived.

Again, For a clearer understanding of this, it may have an allusion to that course which is observed in Courts of Justice, where, when either Plaintiff or Defendant wants Council to plead for him, the Court assignes Council; and it is observed by the Learned, that among the Romans, the Prætor would say, What, is there none to plead for him? I will appoint one to take his cause into consideration, and to plead for him. It is ordinary with our Judges to appoint Council, as also time and place, when and where to hear causes. The words may have an allusion to this course of Judges; If I come to judgment, who will assign me council? where shall I get any one to plead this cause, and to stand up for me against the Lord?

Prætor dicere solebat, Si advocatũ non habet, ego dabo.

There is yet another understanding of the word; as having reference to the testimony or witness which is brought in. So the Vulgar reads it, No man will be so bold as to give in evidence for me, or to be a witness on my behalf.

Nemo audet pro me testimonium dicere. Vulg.

Take all these sences, If I come to judgment, who? &c. I shall get none to give in evidence for me, none to plead for me; I shall get none to assign counsel for me, none to appoint time and place for a hearing; therefore I may as well contend with God by strength, as by judgment. The sum of all is, Job confesses, in case he had a mind to go this way, he should not find any in the world to assist or help him in it.

We have had divers passages of like nature with this, wherein Job declared his utter inability to plead with God; therefore I shall but briefly note one thing from it.

There is no standing before God in judgment by the help of any creature.

Who shall set me a time to plead? Or, Who shall be my pleader? One man cannot do it for another; all the Angels in heaven are not able to do it for any man. If man enter into judgment with God, men and Angels cannot help him. As the Apostle speaks in another case, about the want of love, If I speak with the tongue of men and Angels, and have not charity, it profits me nothing: So, if we should speak for our selves, or others for us, with the tongues of men, that is, with the tongues of the most excellent Orators or Pleaders; yea, with the tongues of Angels, with tongues that exceed all that men can speak, yet in judgment with God these will be but sounding brass and tinckling Cymbals.

Job goes yet a step further. If I should undertake to manage my cause my self (some Clients will desire their Counsel to stand by, and they will argue their own cause) why, saith Job, if I should do so, if I should be my own Advocate or Attorney, and appear my self in my own cause, it would be all one; If I justifie my self, my own mouth shall condemn me; I shall be as bad, if not worse then before. I can get none to plead for me, and if I plead for my self, I am sure to be cast; I cannot mend my self by speaking in my own cause: That's the meaning of this twentieth verse, which is but a continuation, with a further illustration of what he had spoken before, therefore I shall but touch upon it.

Verse 20. If I justifie my self.

That is, If Witness fail, and Counsel fail, if all help and succours fail me, and then I resolve to go to work with my own strength and wit, if I go about to make or declare my self just before God (for so the word is to be understood, as in the doctrine of Justification) what shall I gain? The profit will not countervail the charge or pay for the expence of one breath; For,

Mine own mouth shall condemn me.

Os meum condemnabit meum testimonium, &c. Pisc. Ex hoc modi judicio condemnatus, &c. Piscat. oratio non fiet in peccatum.

My tongue would cut my own throat; the sentence or words which I should bring forth to plead my cause before God, would be found against me; the Lord would turn all my arguments back upon me, and wound me with mine own weapons. I should go out condemned, and my plea should be turned into sin. I shall certainly spoil my cause, if I handle it. As, if I should put it into the hands of Angels or men, they could make nothing of it, so, neither can I make any thing of it if I manage it my self.

There are three things which evince that if man undertake the matter with God, he shall be condemned by his own mouth.

First, Man is insufficient. How can he who is ignorant, weak and unrighteous, plead his cause with God, who is infinite in wisdom, righteousness and holiness? And therefore mans own mouth will condemn him, his words will speak him guilty while he pleads, Not guilty.

Secondly, He that justifies himself, must appear in his own commendation, he must bring forth all his good works, and shew the Lord how he hath fasted, prayed and mourned, how humble, how liberal he hath been, what alms he hath given; he must (as it were) paint and adorn himself in all his excellencies, and stand before the Lord in this array. Now mans own mouth must condemn him, if he do thus. The Heathen could say by the light of nature, That a mans praises are sullied by passing through his own lips. To sound our own praise, sounds our shame. If a man have never so much worth in him, he dishonours himself by being the trumpet of it.

Ut laus, testimonii proprio sit deficit in

Thirdly, A mans own testimony is not legal in his own cause. The same person must not be a witness and a party. He that justifies himself, condemns himself; for his very justification is an accusation. If a mans own witness may be taken, who shall be condemned? Who will not acquit himself? The witness of our own hearts is much (1 John 3.21.) but not enough; If our own hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God. But the reason of this confidence is not in the bare, single witness of our own hearts, but in the co-witness of God with our hearts. Conscience is therefore a thousand witnesses, because God who is more then a thousand Consciences, joynes with Conscience, both in accusing and in acquitting. The Pharisees said unto Christ, Thou beares record of thy self, thy record is not true (John 8.13, 16.) They spake upon a legal ground or Maxim; Christ answereth, Though I bear record of my self, yet my record is true. Christ doth not deny the Rule, but shews that he was above it; and therefore adds, It is said in your Law, that the testimony of two men is true, I am not alone, for the Father is with me: As if he had said, I alone bear not witness of my self, I have another, even the Father that sent me, he beareth witness of me; therefore mine is not a single testimony: in that case indeed I were to be reproved, and my witness were insufficient; My own mouth would condemn me, if there were no mouth to testifie for me, but only mine: If I were but as an ordinary man, I might be kept to the ordinary rule. God only is a sufficient witness to himself.

Mine own mouth shall condemn me. But of what? Surely of folly (2 Cor. 12.21.) I am become a fool in glorying, saith Paul to his Corinthians; but I am not a fool of my own making; ye have compelled me, for I ought to have been commended of you. That is, ye ought to have given a testimony of me; if ye had been just to me, I had been condemned in justifying my self. Then it is a duty to witness for our selves, when others neglect that duty.

The Original word which we translate condemn, is directly oppolite to that which we translate justifie; and some render it by a new-coyn'd word in Latine, which we cannot put literally into English, but by coyning a word for it, thus; If I justifie my self, my own mouth would ungodlifie me, or declare me to be ungodly.

Here two Questions arise; the one is, Why may not Job justifie himself? The Lord hath justified him, the Lord said that he was a perfect man (that's the next expression, If I say I am perfect, it shall prove me perverse.) The Lord had said of Job, chap. 1. That he was perfect and upright, one that feared God, and eschewed evil; why may not Job say as much of himself as the Lord had done?

Solomon resolves this Query (Prov. 27. 2.) Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth, a stranger, and not thine own lips. Man must not speak the evil he knows by others unless called, nor the good he knows by himself. To speak good of our selves with our own mouths, is much like doing good by other mens hands. We must not act things praise-worthy by proxie, but it is best to be praised by proxie for our good acts. Now as man may not praise himself, though other men may praise him, so he must not praise himself, though God praiseth him. Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but he whom the Lord commendeth, 2 Cor. 10. 18.

Secondly, Why doth Job say here, I will not justifie my self, I will not say I am perfect, Whereas in other places he justifies himself, and saith that he was perfect? If you read the twenty ninth and thirtieth Chapters of this Book, you shall find them to be but a continued justification of himself, or a Manifest of his own innocency. There he proclaims how holy he had been, and how righteous in all his wayes, that he had put on judgment as a Robe, and justice as a Diadem; that he had delivered the oppressed, and distributed of his fulness to the necessities of the poor. Those two Chapters being a professed Catalogue of his good deeds, why is he so shie and modest here?

I answer, In this and the like expressions, while Job saith, he will not justifie himself, or say he is perfect, he declines the plea of personal righteousness or perfection in the sight of God, as hath frequently appeared in this Argument.

But in those Chapters, and in other places where he is upon his defence, he speaks only in reference to the charge of his friends; as if he had said, Ye accuse me for an hypocrite, and censure me deeply, I can justifie my self, and plead my innocency with you, though I have not a word to say for my self before the Lord; I will bear any thing at his hands, let him say of me, and do with me what he pleaseth, I will take shame to my self, and give him glory; but as for you, my friends, I will justifie my self in your sight, I am not the man ye take me for.

nunc peccatum suum dimisse confitentis, nunc justitiam suam acerrimè defendentis. Merl.

These speakings are not cross to each other, but help us to understand Job's sence in this Argument. He stands much upon his integrity, but it is to his friends; he humbles himself in the sight of his own vileness, but it is to God. Paul (Rom. 7. 24.) bewailes his sinfulness; O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of sin and of death! I find a law in my members rebelling against the law of my mind: Yet, when he answers false Apostles about his personal carriage, and the discharge of his Apostleship, then he saith, I know nothing by my self (1 Cor. 4. 4.) I am charged thus and thus, I am slandered so and so, but my conscience acquits me, I know nothing by my self: The sinfulness of his Nature made him groan and sigh out, O wretched man that I am! The sincerity of his heart made him boast and sing out like a happy man, as sorrowful, but alwayes rejoycing. A man may be conscious of his own natural corruption, and yet confident of his own practical integrity.

Mominis innocentia duobus testibus constare debet. 1. Deo, 2. Conscientia. Ergo si tibi vides habere bonum conscientiæ testimonium, bene quidem sed divinum adhuc de tua innocentia expectandum est.

If I say I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse.

These words in strictness of sence refer to the inward purpose of his heart or bent of his mind, as the former did to the outward way of his life; If I say I am perfect, that is, if I say there is no meditated obliquity in my heart, no intended goings astray or wandrings, no close hypocrisie or falseness there; If I should say, I am perfect in the bent and purposes of my heart, yet this is not such as I dare appear before God in; as if I justifie my self by the actings and puttings forth of my life, my mouth will condemn me, so, if I say I am perfect in the thinkings and secret motions of my spirit, it will prove me perverse.

The word which we translate [perverse,] signifies to wander, as a man uncertain of his way (Prov. 28. 18.) Whoso walketh uprightly (having the frame of his inward man right) he shall be saved; but he that is perverse in his wayes (having a wandring, vagrant mind, going sometime this way, and sometime that, holding somewhat of this, and somewhat of that, but nothing to purpose or steadily of any thing, this man) shall fall at once; a man of an uncertain spirit shall have a certain downfal. But was Job thus perverse? No, Job was perfect, and not perverse; yet a boast of his perfection, had been a proof of his perverseness: Nothing discovers an evil heart more then a profession of its own goodness.

חם Qui certo est proposito. עקש qui vago & diverso, qui se dividit & distorquet in duas vias. Coc. In Hebræo simplex est, perversicavit me.

It shall prove me perverse.] What shall prove me perverse? Some refer it to the former clause, My mouth (or the speaking of those words, I am perfect) shall prove me perverse. Others refer it to God; God will prove me perverse, if I justifie my self. The Seventy leave it without restriction to any antecedent; If I say I am perfect, I shall go away perverse, or I shall appear perverse.

Perversus evadam.

Observe hence that famous Gospel-doctrine, No man can be justified before God by the works of the Law.

It is as noble a proof of free justification in the Old Testament, as any in the New. The Saints have been acquainted with this truth from the beginning, That man is nothing in himself, and that free grace doth all. The doctrine of Free Grace is no new doctrine: the doctrine of Free Will is (Prov. 20.9.) Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin? And that he must say, who justifies himself before God. Every Legal Justiciary takes up this language, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin. It is a task too hard for men, yea, for all the Angels in heaven to make one heart clean; only Jesus Christ is able to fetch out the filth and rubbish that lodgeth in, and pollutes our spirits. To be a heart-cleanser is the peculiar work and honour of Christ. A man that knows himself, and sees his face in the glass of the Word (which flatters no man) will never say, I am clean: nor will he say, Nobilis locus clarissimè ostendens neminem ex lege justificari. Coc.

say, I can cleanse my self. How many spots and blots, how many defects and deformities will that glass represent unto him, which he is not able to heal or fetch out? Every mans face will blush, who sees his heart or his life in that glass, unless he, Who beholding himself, goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was (Jam. 1. 24.)

Secondly observe, Job had received testimony from He could produce Letters testimonial, subscribed by the hand of heaven, that he was a just and a perfect man, one that feared God and eschewed evil. Yet this Job (let God speak as well as he will of him) he will not speak well of himself to God: Let God report him perfect to men, he will not report himself perfect before God. Though Job had a free and a full Certificate of his innocency (not one bought, begged, or got with flattery) yet he forbears in this case to bring it forth and read it to his friends.

They who have most real worth and holiness in them, are least in their own eyes, and lowest in their own thoughts.

They of whom God gives the fairest testimony, give the meanest of themselves; he cares not much to appear to be, what God assures him he is. God was positive (without Ifs or Ands) in his opinion of him; Thou art perfect, but he puts it into a supposition, and concludes with an If, If I were perfect, &c.

In ver. 21. Job carries on the same business, and bewraies a more humble and self-denying frame of mind then before.

Though I were perfect, yet, &c.

There is a contention among Interpreters, to which part of the Chapter this verse 21. belongs, whether to that which went before, or to that which follows after. I shall open it first, as the sence of it may be connected with the matter preceding.

Verse 21. Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my own soul; I would despise my life.

Though I were perfect.] Observe the gradation. He had said before, If I plead with God, and justifie my self, I shall be condemned and proved perverse. But put my case at the best, that I justifying my self, the Lord should accept my justification, and should concur with my vote that I am perfect, yet I could take no joy in this. If the Lord should condescend to know me under that notion, I would not adventure to know my own soul under the notions of my perfections. The thing is an abhorring to me.

I would not know my soul.

Why not? There are two senses given: First, thus; If I were perfect, that is, if upon debate and pleading with God, I should come off perfect in my own judgment, certainly then I did not know my own soul. That's one sense, and so it falls in well with the former words; If I should justifie my self, my mouth would prove me perverse. And so the point that I shall note from it, is,

That, Ignorance of our selves is the cause of proud and high thoughts of our selves.

He that knows himself, must know himself to be imperfect, seeing our greatest perfection in this life, is, to know our own imperfections. When we see any standing upon their own bottoms, and crying up themselves, poor souls, how they are benighted? How little do they know of their own hearts and lives? How little do they know of God? They are in darkness, therefore they see not their own spots. If a man, whose face is foul or deformed, should boast of his beauty, would you not say, this man knows not his own face; or, surely he hath not look'd in a Glass to day. May we not much rather say to him who justifies himself, and saith he is perfect, sure you never saw your face in the glass, in the pure Crystal glass of the Word. He that is in Gospel-light, sees himself, and as light encreaseth, so doth his sight of himself: And the more he sees himself, the more evil he sees in himself. In a cloudy day we think the air is clear, but the shining of the Sun shews us millions of motes in the air: if a man sees no motes in his life (some see not beams there) it is, because he walks in darkness, and hath not the light, he doth not know his own soul. That's a useful interpretation of the words, and the first sence.

Secondly, If I were perfect; If it should be told me I were perfect, I would not know my own soul, that is, I would not take notice of my self as perfect, I would be a stranger to my self under that title, I would shake the thoughts of such a perfection out of my mind, as much as I would shake the thoughts of sinful corruption out of my mind. It is as dangerous to lodge or nourish thoughts of our own perfection, as to lodge thoughts of the most sinful corruptions. A holy heart loves good thoughts, but it loves not thoughts of its own goodness.

Talem de me cogitationē non admittam, sed omnino contemnam, & de mente mea penitus excutiam.

So then, I would not know my soul] imports not affected ignorance, but elected knowledge. Job was no stranger to his own soul, he had studied himself, and was well vers'd in his own bosom. Self-knowledge is a duty, and self-knowledge may be a sin. Christians should read themselves more then Books, and yet they may pore too much upon themselves. Heathens gave us this Lesson, and they say it came from heaven, Know thy self. Augustine is quick upon it, Lord, I know MEE, and I know THEE. To know God and our selves, is the sum of all knowledge. God doth not know him who knows not himself. There is a double knowledge of our selves.

Quamvis bene recleq; vixerim, hoc penitus despiciam. Eol.

Admirabili & omni acceptatione dignissima doctrina, ac si effet ex purissimis evangelii fontibus hausta. E cœlo descendit, Nosce teipsum. Noverim me, noverim te. August.

First, Of sinful self, or of our sins and failings.

Secondly, Of renewed self, or of our virtues and graces. Not to know how frail we are, how sinful we are, to what corruptions and temptations we are most subject, is a sinful and corrupt ignorance. To know our imperfections, is a part of our perfection.

Talis ignorans à Deo ignoratur.

Secondly, Not to know our Graces and Virtues, what the work of the Spirit, and the new Nature within us is, this also is a sinful ignorance. It is no honour to be what we do not know our selves to be; it is to be in the state of a beast, not to reflect upon our own estate. The new creature is light, and carries a light for its own discovery. The reproveable knowledge of our own souls is not the knowledge of intuition, whereby we apprehend what we are, but the knowledge of ostentation, whereby we are proud of, or trust upon what we are. We have an ordinary saying amongst us, which reaches this sence fully, Such a woman is beautiful, and she knows it; such a one is a proper man, and he knows it; such a one hath many good parts, a very fine wit, and he knows it; that is, such persons pride and lift themselves up in their perfections. You shall have a soul that will know it self into I know not how much pride; many stand reflecting upon their own perfections; either external, how proper, strong and beautiful they are; or internal, how witty and eloquent they are, what excellent parts and gifts, what a nimble tongue, what sound judgments they have, till they lose Christ in this crowd of themselves. This is a dangerous knowledge, a knowledge worse then ignorance. Better be without knowledge, then know our knowledge thus. As to reflect upon sin, to know our selves in our unbelief, vanity and passions, &c. humble us; and a soul in confessing of sin before God, looks long upon his dark part, upon his wants and failings for this end, that he may be humbled; so to reflect upon our good deeds or graces, to know our selves in those adornings of love, patience, humility, faith, &c. hazards us upon pride, and some stand gazing so long upon these excellencies, that they are lifted up, and become very proud.

Non noscere animam, phrasis est Hebræa, quantum rei despectum præ se ferat, ut illam etiam respicere aut aliquo modo no, cere quis renuat.

Thus all men who are proud in spirituals, know their own souls. So Job would not know his own soul. Hence note,

That, A gracious heart rejoyceth in nothing but in the righteousness of Christ alone.

He will not know his soul in his own perfections. A godly man would have God know him in the worst, but he will not know himself in the best. He would not have a sin hid from God, but he would hide all his goodness from himself. He will know every good thing before he doth it, but when tis done, he cares not to know it any more. So the Apostle (Phil. 3. 8, 9.) I account all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and may be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the Law, &c. Paul the Apostle would not know Paul the Pharisee. Legal righteousness was loss to him, when he had found Christ. Legal righteousness was dung to him, when he had a sight of righteousness by Christ. The Pharisee, Luk. 18.

had all upon account, and he hoped to make good gain upon his accounts: he knew how many alms he had given, how well he had paid his tithes, and how often he had fasted. He made a stock of those things, and put them among his treasures, which Paul made his loss, and put among the dung. He that thus knows his own soul, hath no true knowledge of Jesus Christ.

So much of this vers. 21. as it is a supposition, and hath connexion with the words foregoing; as it refers to what follows.

The words are rendred in the form of a position, I am perfect, I know not my soul, I despise my life. And so divers interpretations are given of it.

Non novi animam pra integritate mea, i.e. ea integritate sum, ut nunquam anima aut vitæ meæ ratione abduci potuerim ab integritate mea.

First, Thus, I am perfect, &c. that is, my heart is upright, and I have ever prized and valued mine own integrity at such a rate, that in comparison thereof, I have not at all regarded or prized my own life or soul, that is, the greatest comforts and sweetest enjoyment of my life. My life is but a trifle to my conscience. And so the meaning is, like that (Deut. 33. 9.) where the word know is used in this sence, concerning Levi, Who said to his Father and Mother, I have not seen him, neither did he acknowledge his Brethren, nor know his own Children. Levi slighted all relations, when they stood in competition with the discharge of that duty which the Lord called him to, he knew neither father nor mother, nor brother nor child, one nor other, he had no regard at all to them, so he might do the will of God. This was the commendation of Levi, and the priviledge of the Priesthood was assigned to that Tribe upon this Service. Grace will not hearken to the cry of Nature, when it hears the call of God. Job is conceived to speak here at the same rate as Levi did, or higher; I am upright and perfect in heart toward God, and such hath my perfection and uprightness been, that I have not known my own soul, I have not regarded any self-interests which have stood in the way of my obedience unto God, or justice toward man. His friends charged him as if he had been a corrupt Judge, or an oppressor of the poor; I (saith he) am so far from valuing worldly goods or riches beyond my own integrity, that I do not value my life to my integrity. The Apostle Paul makes a like profession (Acts 20. 24.) His spirit was never so free and royal, as when he was going bound in spirit to Jerusalem: The Spirit witnessing to him, that bonds and afflictions did abide him in every City. None of these things (saith he) move me, neither count I my life dear (I will not know my life, let it go which way it will) so I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus. Paul was none of your poor Merchants, who are afraid of their skins. Paul's life was cheap in his thoughts, when he was to make an adventure for Christ; he (as Job here) would not know his life for the omission of a necessary known duty, or the commission of a known sin.

This first sence yields this profitable meditation,

He whose heart is upright, prefers his uprightness before all worldly commodities, and before his own life.

Christ calls his Disciples to this height of resolution (Luk. 14. 26.) If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother, and children, yea, and his own life, he cannot be my Disciple, that is, the service of Christ, and his life into the balance, life must be a light thing weighed with the service of Christ.

חסם אני Absumor dolore, & sic חם aliter sumetur quam priore versiculo Nescio animam, i.e. meipsum præ dolore, ideo averfor vitam meam. Rab. Levi.

A second interpretation gives this sence, I am perfect, yet I know not my own soul; that is, I am so pressed and overwhelmed with these afflictions, that I cannot feel my self, I scarce know whether I am alive or dead; I know not where I am, my soul doth not act its offices, my soul is (as it were) benum'd in me, or asleep; there is not that vigor or activity in my spirit which I have found heretofore: I despise such a life as this is; who would live a life which is a continued death? There is a truth in this. For as extream and excessive joyes carry a man so far beyond himself, that he scarce knows whether he be alive or no (some have had experience of such raptures and extasies of joy in communion with God) 'twas so with Paul in a case somewhat like (2 Cor. 12. (Whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell (saith he) for my part, I could not tell what to make of my self, or what became of my body: As (I say) it is thus in the excesses of spiritual joy and consolation, so sometimes in the excesses of anguish and sorrow, a man scarce knows whether he be alive or dead, what his state is, whether in the body or out of the body; he regards neither hot nor cold, friend or foe, wife or children, he forgets to eat his bread.

A third expounds the words as an admiration, I am perfect, and do ye think I know not my own soul? Do ye think I am not acquainted with my self? Am I a stranger at home? Have I so despised my life (think ye) that I take no notice of it, and am either careless or insensible how things go with me? As if he had said, I am perfect, and this is the work of a man, whose wayes are perfect before the Lord, he knows and considers his own soul, and grows assured how matters are with him: Ye, my friends, charge me with these and these failings, and will force them upon me whether I will or no; though I deny your charge, yet ye re-join and re-affirm it upon me, as though I knew not my own soul, or as if ye knew me better then my self: But I am perfect in heart, and I know my own soul, I do not so despise my life, as if it were not worth the looking after, or as if I were not worth the ground I go upon.

Integer sum, nec scio animam meam, i.e. quicquam perversi in anima mea.

Lastly, Others understand it thus (which appears the fairest and most sutable interpretation of these latter ones) I am perfect, neither do I know my own soul; that is, I am not conscious of any evil in my soul, I know of no secret guilt or corruption hidden there; and so science is put for conscience; I know not, is, I am not privy to any evil that my soul delights in and keeps close, either against God or man, yet such evils are upon me, that I despise my life. The spirit of a man (saith Solomon) will bear his infirmity. Then what a load or infirmity presses that man whose life is a burden to him, though no sin burden his spirit? Troubles of conscience do often make the most peaceable outward estate of this life troublesome. And troubles in the outward estate may make those who have great peace of conscience weary of their lives. What it is to despise life, and that afflictions make this life burdensome, hath been shewed in the third and sixth Chapters, and will come more fully to be considered at the first verse of the tenth Chapter, whither I refer the Reader, and forbear to insist upon it here.

Ingreditur in alteram sua responsionis partem qua justitiæ suam defendit à gravi & libera integritatis suæ & animi bene conscii assertione. Mere.

I shall only add, that Job makes these words as a transition to the second part of his answer to the charge of Bildad. For having before given glory to God, by acknowledging his Justice, Wisdom, Power and Soveraignty in all his actings, he passes to an apology for himself, or a defence of his own integrity against the insultations, suspitions and accusations of his friends: As if he had said, I have desired to save the honour of God from the least touch of an uncomely thought, much more then do I abhor proud and rude contendings with him; but as for you, my friends, ye must give me leave to be plain with you, I am not the man you take me for, I have none of that baseness of spirit with which ye charge me, I am no hypocrite, I am perfect in heart with God, and upright in my dealings with men; and yet I cannot but complain of my sad afflictions, and renew my desires, that the Lord would give me ease by death, and acquit me from the hand of these calamities, by cutting the thread of my life. I know ye judge these outward evils as the brand of a wicked man, of a man hated by God: but Ile maintain a Proposition contradictory to that your Opinion; ye shall never prove me wicked, because afflicted; for thus I hold, and will hold it against you all, as long as I am able to speak, That the Lord destroyeth the perfect and the wicked. The Argument may be formed up thus;

That cannot be made a clear proof of mans impiety, which falleth alike upon good and bad.
But great and destroying outward afflictions fall equally upon good and bad.
Therefore great and destroying afflictions cannot be made a clear proof of mans impiety.

The proof of the Minor Proposition or Assumption is contained in the three verses immediately following. The discussion and opening of which will give both light and strength to this Argument.

VERS. 22, 23, 24.

This is one thing, therefore I said it, He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked.
If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent.

The

The earth is given into the hand of the wicked: he covereth the faces of the Judges thereof; if not, where, and who is he?

Videtur hic locus impietatem includere, quasi apud Job unum & idem sit piorum & improborum judicium, quodq; Deus hæc inferiora non curet. Iſid. Clar.

THis ſpeech of Job cauſed a Learned Interpreter to tremble, when he read it, conceiving, that it ſavoured ſtrongly of impiety and blaſphemy, as if Job had mingled the ſtate of the wicked and of the righteous in one; or, as if his mind were, that the Lord did not diſtinctively order the affairs of the world by the dictates of his wiſe providence, but left them to be huddled together by inexorable fate or blind fortune; therefore he concludes that Job rather perſonates a man void of the true knowledge and fear of God, then ſpeaks his own opinion. Thus he cenſures: but let Job be well weighed, and his diſcourſe will appear full of truth and holineſs.

This is one thing, therefore I ſaid it.

This is one thing.] As if he had ſaid, You have ſpoken many things to me about the power, greatneſs, juſtice and wiſdom of God, in all which I agree with you, ye, and I have no difference about thoſe points, I have alwayes thought highly of God, and I deſire to think humbly of my ſelf: but here is one thing, wherein I muſt for ever diſagree from you, here we muſt part.

Hoc unum eſt meæ aſſertionis caput.

So that this verſe is as the limit-ſtone between Job's opinion, and that of his friends. Here he ſpeaks out the ſpecial tenet which he holds in oppoſition to them. As if he had ſaid, I yield and ſubſcribe to your judgment in all but this one, and in this one thing I muſt be your adverſary, though I will not be your enemy. I ſay it, and ſay it again,

He deſtroyeth both the righteous and the wicked.

This is one thing.] This is uniform: So Mr. Broughton reads it, and in this thing I am uniform, or of the ſame mind and judgment, I am not at all moved from my hold, or ſhaken by any thing ye have ſaid.

Therefore I ſaid it.] That is, becauſe I am of this opinion and judgment, therefore I will not conceal; but bring it forth, and tell you plainly what my thoughts are. The manner of ſpeech, I ſaid it, ſignifies a vehement aſſeveration, a liberty and boldneſs of ſpeech, or a conſtant adhering and ſticking to what hath been aſſerted, I will abide by this poſition as long as I live, I cannot be beaten from it, not becauſe it is my opinion, but becauſe it is a truth.

Before I come to the aſſertion it ſelf, obſerve from the preface, This is one thing,

That truth is ever the ſame, and we ſhould be the ſame in maintaining truth.

When a man ſpeaks a thing, of which he is very ſure, and reſolved to hold, he ſaith, in our language, That's once, that is, I have ſaid it, and I will not unſay it, or eat my words. As Pilate when he was deſired to change the inſcription which he had put upon the croſs of Chriſt, anſwered, What I have written, I have written, I will not alter a letter or a tittle: So a confident aſſertor anſwers, What I have ſaid, I have ſaid; This is one thing, therefore I ſaid it. Truth changes not, why then ſhould I, who have born witneſs to this truth? Truth muſt be ſtood to. We have reaſon to ſtick to truth, for truth will ſtick to us; we may ſay it, and ſay it again, for it will do us good again and again. The declarative truth of God is like Chriſt the eſſential truth, The ſame yeſterday, and to day, and for ever. Though it be very old, yet, it waxeth not old.

And becauſe this in the Text was a great truth, the very hinge upon which the whole diſpute between Job and his friends turned, therefore he is ſo reſolute in it. Whence note further,

That great and fundamental truths are to be maintained with much boldneſs and ſtrength of reſolution.

As it is a good bargain to buy a little truth with the expence of much peace: So it is our wiſdom, as well as our duty, to maintain it with the expence of our peace. They are the worſt ſort of cowards who render up the Holds of truth upon compoſition. No terms honourable enough can be given for the giving up of that. I grant that our peace and lives are richer commodities, then ſhould be hazarded about trifling nicities, and the crochets of Schoolmen: but we ought to contend earneſtly (and we cannot contend too reſolutely) for the faith which was once delivered to the Saints. Jude v. 3. Obſerve, Thirdly, A man that hath got one ſound principle about any point, will from that refute and repel all objections that can come againſt him.

Super hoc axioma tanquā ſuper firmiſſimum fundamentū quicquid ad ſuæ innocentiæ contra eos defenſionem allaturus eſt, ſtabiliat. Bol.

Job bottoms himſelf upon this principle, That God deſtroyes both good and bad alike with outward deſtruction. This is his great Axiome, the very foundation upon which he buildeth all he holds contradictory to his friends; the Fort-Royal in which he defends himſelf againſt all their oppoſitions and aſſaults. One truth well mann'd and mannag'd ſcatters and foils a whole Army of errors. One Text thorowly underſtood, gives anſwer to all objections, and unites all the knots of a controverſie.

But what's this one thing upon which Job makes his boaſt, and cries victoria? 'Tis this, He deſtroyeth the perfect and the wicked. A harſh doctrine, yet a good one. God is to be honoured deſtroying, as well as ſaving, killing as well as making alive.

Propriè delet, diſperdit, frequenter ad extremam conſummationē & conſumptionē refertur.

The word which we tranſlate to deſtroy, ſignifies an utter blotting out or conſumption of a thing; noting that the outward diſpenſations of God may be ſevere and terrible to the perfect, as well as to the wicked. He doth not ſay, the Lord afflicts the one, and deſtroyes the other; chaſtens the one, and conſumes the other; but he conſumes and deſtroyes the one as well the other, He deſtroyes

The perfect.] Who is a perfect man in the language of Scripture, and wherein this perfection conſiſts, hath been opened more then once already, and therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon it here. Only in general, The perfect man is the man in the higheſt form of holineſs; a man full of knowledge, faith and good works, one of the firſt three in grace, yea, he may be the firſt of the three: yet all this is no ſecurity againſt the ſoreſt affliction, againſt affliction to deſtruction temporal, He deſtroyeth the perfect,

תם

And the wicked.] Or the unquiet and tumultuous man. Every wicked man is an unſetled and an unquiet man. He hath no where to reſt, who hath not Chriſt to reſt upon: He is alwayes out of the way, who is not in him, who is the way. Wicked men reſt only in doing evil, they are never quiet but in motions unto ſin. God ſhews us their nature in their name. Unquiet is their name, and unquietneſs is with them. Wicked men trouble and vex others as much as they can, but they trouble and vex themſelves moſt of all.

Inquietum per multas hujus ſeculi curas ſolicitudineſq; vagantem.

By theſe wicked ones the Septuagint underſtand mighty and rich men. Riches are ſo often got by wickedneſs, and are occaſions to ſo many of making them wicked, that wicked and rich may ſometimes change names, or ſignifie the ſame perſon.

LXX. Impium propotente & locuplete ſumunt.

One of the Greek Expoſitors underſtand the Text, of thoſe who are great in goodneſs, and ſtrong in faith, He deſtroyes the perfect, and he deſtroyes him that is moſt perfect, even the moſt eminent in holineſs, the talleſt Cedars in grace. As if the words implied only a gradation of good men, and not a diſtinction of good and bad.

Qui pietate inſignis & vita clarus. Polychr. Olymp.

But the letter of the Text hath no ſhew of reaſon at all for ſuch an interpretation, and therefore I ſhall paſs it by, and take the words as our tranſlation renders them, holding forth that grand dichotomy of mankind, He deſtroyeth the perfect and the wicked.

This Job affirms againſt Bildad's aſſertion (Chap. 8. 20.) who there gives his judgment thus. God will not caſt away a righteous man: which (though it may have a true ſence, yet Bildad's meaning being, that God will not caſt a godly man away in this life, or totally deſtroy him in temporals) Job denies, affirming that a godly man may not only be afflicted, but afflicted all his life, and die under that affliction, which in Bildad's ſence is to be caſt away. For though Bildad did not hold (as Eliphaz) that every man who is afflicted, is afflicted for wickedneſs (he thought a good man might be afflicted for the trial and exerciſe of his graces) yet he was very confident, that God never ſuffered a righteous man to be overwhelmed with affliction: but after ſome ſhort, though ſharp aſſaults, reſtored him again. And therefore Bildad numbred them alſo with the wicked, who were deſtroyed as well as afflicted. This Job refutes and argues againſt all along, conſtantly holding the contrary principle, that a godly man may be ſo afflicted, as to be deſtroyed, that he may be utterly and for ever ſtript of worldly comforts. Hence obſerve,

Good and bad, righteous and wicked are often involved in the ſame outward evils.

The ſpiritual eſtate of a righteous man is ſo ſtrong, and ordered in all things, that he can neither totally nor finally fall from it, or loſe it. Grace is above theſe hazards. But the temporal eſtate of a righteous man may be loſt, both totally and finally. Riches, and health and honour, are like themſelves, whoſoever is their maſter, fading and periſhing. A righteous man hath a higher tenure of things below, and holds them upon better terms then a wicked man doth; yet he holds them but for a term, they are not enduring ſubſtance to him, as not to others. A little that a righteous man hath is better then the riches of many wicked, (Pſal. 37. 16.) But the righteous may be deprived of what he hath, as ſoon as any of the wicked (Eccleſ. 1. 9.) No man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before him; all things come alike to all, there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; as is the good, ſo is the ſinner, and he that ſweareth as he that feareth an oath. Externals diſtinguiſh not internals. No mans ſpiritual eſtate is knowable by the view of his temporal. Say to the land of Iſrael, Thus ſaith the Lord, Behold, I am againſt thee, and I will draw forth my ſword out of his ſheath, (Ezek. 21. 3.) And what will the Lord do with it? Will he not bathe it in the blood of his enemies, and ſheath it in the bowels of wicked men? he will: but ſhall it be bathed in the blood of none elſe? The next words reſolve the doubt, And I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked. It is a terrible ſentence; ſword, famine, peſtilence, make no difference of men or manners; they know neither faces nor hearts. The beſt in a Nation may taſte the bloody cup, and feel the cold iron in their bowels, together with the worſt. The green tree, and the dry tree may be devoured by the ſame fire, as the Prophet ſhadows good and bad; or, as ſome think, good and better, falling into the ſame calamity (Ezek. 20. 47.) with which that of Chriſt (Luke 23. 31.) ſeems more agreeable. The basket of good figs goes into captivity with the basket of evil figs, under which the good and bad among the Jews were typed, Jer. 24. 1, 2, 3.

Pœna ſatisfactoria, & medicinalis.

But though they fall under the ſame deſtruction, yet their caſe under it is as different, as the perſons are. Faith and holy Reaſon diſtinguiſh where ſenſe cannot.

Judgments upon the wicked men, are for ſatisfaction to the juſtice of God. They who are heirs of eternal death receive part of their inheritance in this life. All their puniſhments are payments, the fore-taſtes and beginnings of further ſorrows. Theſe judgments upon the Saints are only corrective or purgative. Their hopes are not deſtroyed, when their bodies or eſtates are. Their afflictions are medicinable, and heal while they kill. We muſt not wrap up the diſpenſation of God to different perſons in the ſame apprehenſions; though his act be the ſame to both, yet his meaning is not. How the afflictions of the wicked and righteous differ, the Reader ſhall find more diſtinctly opened, Chap. 5. 17.

Job goes on to confirm his opinion by a further Argument, in verſ. 23. For if any ſhould deny his minor propoſition, That the Lord deſtroyes the righteous and the wicked, he proves it thus, If the ſcourge ſlay ſuddenly, he laugheth at the trial of the innocent, that is, he carries himſelf (ſo far as the eye can judge) toward the innocent in their trials, as he doth toward the wicked under greateſt judgments: He laugheth at the one, and he laugheth at the other; which words are at once a confirmation and an aggravation of what he ſpake before.

Verſ. 23. If the ſcourge ſlay ſuddenly, he laugheth at the trial of the innocent.

Nullum eſt verbum hac ſententia & illa, elegit anima mea ſuſpendium darius alias apperimin hoc libro. Philip.

The former words gave offence to ſome minds, conceiving them inconſiſtent with grace and holineſs. Others are more offended with theſe. And in the letter it is ſtrange language to ſay, The Lord laughs at the trial of the innocent. This verſe, with the fifteenth of Chap. 7. So that my ſoul chooſeth ſtrangling, are concluded by a learned Writer, the ſharpeſt and moſt queſtionable paſſages in the whole book. Hence his conceit, that in Chap. 40. ver. 5. Job aims at theſe two ſpeeches, Once have I ſpoken, but I will not anſwer; that is, I will never ſpeak ſuch a word again, that, I chuſe ſtrangling; yea twice, but I will proceed no further: I ſaid alſo, That thou laugheſt at the trial of the innocent, but I will never ſay ſo any more. I am aſham'd that ever I opened my lips ſo unadviſedly; 'tis too too much that I have ſpoken twice ſo ſinfully, I will not ſpeak ſo thrice. The conceit is witty, but the charge lies too heavy. The ſence of the former hath been made out fair for Job, and I doubt not but his meaning may be ſo cleared in this latter, that he will need neither reproof nor apology for ſaying,

If the ſcourge ſlay ſuddenly, &c.] The Verb ſignifies to encompaſs or incircle a thing, to twine round about it. And ſo it alludes to the faſhion of a ſcourge, which begirts the offender, and at every blow winds about his body.

שוט Flagellum a circumeundo vel circumdando dicitur, quod videatur circumcingere hominē.

The ſcourge in Scripture is put for any affliction: Plague, Sword or Famine, are called ſcourges, Iſa. 10. 26. The Lord of hoſts ſhall ſtir up a ſcourge for him; what ſcourge? the next words expound it, a ſcourge, not of cords or wiers, but of Swords and Spears; a ſcourge, according to the ſlaughter of Midian at the rock Oreb, that is, the Lord will ſend a Sword upon him: So Gideon ſlew the Midianites, Judg. 7. commanding his Souldiers to make that terrible ſhout, when they fell on upon their Camy, The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon. That great warrior Attila King of the Hunnes, who haraſſed a great part of Chriſtendom with Fire and Sword, was called, Flagellum Dei, The ſcourge of God. The unbelieving Jews having made a Covenant with death, and an agreement with Hell, were very full of faith, ſuch as it was (Iſa. 28. 15.) When the over-flowing ſcourge ſhall paſs thorow, it ſhall not come unto us. An over-flowing ſcourge ('Tis an elegant metaphor taken from waters) is a common, ſpreading, ſweeping judgment, which like an over-flowing river encompaſſes, circles about, and fetches in all.

Flagellum inundans, i. e. omnes ſine delectu involvens et proculcans.

Slay ſuddenly.] Every ſcourge doth not ſlay, and many which ſlay do not ſlay ſuddenly. We uſually hear the claſhing of the ſcourge before we feel the ſmart of it. The Lord ſhews the ſcourge, and threatens it before he ſmites with it; he lets judgment hang like a black cloud over the heads of ſome, long before it falls upon them. But others He ſlayes ſuddenly.

פתאם Subito, ſtatim, ita ut non ſentiatur donec res fiat.

Some take this ſuddenneſs of the ſcourge in ſlaying, for a mitigation of the judgment, and others for the heightning of it. In the former ſence ſuddenneſs doth not imply the ſudden coming of it, but the ſudden killing of it, a ſcourge which doth it's work quickly; ſo that a man doth not hang long as it were upon the rack of an affliction. The Church of the Jews (Lam. 4. 6.) complains of their afflictions, as if the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah had been more eaſie and eligible then that which the Lord brought upon Jeruſalem; not that they thought God had dealt worſe with them then with Sodom and Gomorrah, but as to this particular, becauſe Sodom was overthrown in a moment, but Jeruſalem was pined away by degrees with famine. A ſudden ſcourge is a kind of mercy. Better die once then die alwayes: Or, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks concerning the afflictions of the Saints (Rom. 8. 36.) To be killed all the day long. When one under torture petitioned Tiberius the Roman Emperor, a bloody cruel Tyrant, that he might be quickly diſpatcht, he deſired not life or pardon, but a ſpeedy death: the Emperor ſent him word, That as yet he was not reconciled to him, or become his friend. His cruelty would neither ſuffer the man to live longer, nor die ſpeedily. And ſome obſerve, that as the Prophet expreſſes his trouble at the proſperity of the wicked in their lives, ſo at this kind of proſperity in their deaths, There are no bands in their death, but they are luſty and ſtrong, (Pſal. 73. 4.) that is, when they die, they die in their ſtrength, they are not pined away with long and tedious ſickneſs: They live in pleaſure, and die with eaſe. They are not bound to their beds, and tied down with the cords of chronical, lingering diſeaſes. It is ſome favour (if the ſcourge muſt ſlay) to be ſlain, in this ſence, ſuddenly.

Nondum tecum in gratiā redii

Non ſunt nodi in morte eorum.

But here the ſcourge ſlaying ſuddenly, is a judgment coming unexpectedly, They who ſleep in ſecurity ſeldom dream of ſcourges. Obſerve hence,

God can ſend death and affliction in a moment.

When they ſhall ſay, Peace and ſafety; then ſudden deſtruction struction cometh upon them, as travel upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape (1 Thes. 5. 3.) Wicked men are never so near destruction, as when they are most secure. And that (by the way) is the reason why we have least cause to fear those men, who fear God least: Security springs from infidelity, and both from sleighting, if not contemning the Word of God; no marvel then if the Lord hasten his wrath to justifie his truth, and slay them on a sudden, who would not believe, no not at leisure. But to the point. The Prophet describes it elegantly (Isa. 30. 13.) This iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall; that is, this iniquity shall produce a judgment, which shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, Swelling out in an high wall, whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant. If once a high built wall do but swell, down it comes. Such a swelling wall fell upon, and slew twenty and seven thousand of Benhadads scattered army (1 King. 20. 30.) And such a tower in Siloe fell upon eighteen, and slew them (Luk. 13. 4.) The Prophet Jeremy at once imprecates and foretels a speedy scourge upon the gain-saying Jews, Let a cry be heard from their houses, when thou shalt bring a troop suddenly upon them, Jer. 18. 22. This hath been the case of many among us, who thinking of no danger have been surprized by a troop, themselves made prisoners, and their houses spoil'd in one hour. Such was the condition of our Brethren in Ireland; it is almost incredible how suddenly that scourge slew them: there was scarce a Protestant that had so much as a suspition of the danger; nay, some would not believe it, when a great part of the Country was on a flame, and the enemy had butchered thousands. That scourge (if ever any) slew suddenly the perfect and the wicked. As mercies may come so suddenly to our senses, that they overcome our faith, so may judgments. Some have been surprized with mercy, (Psal. 126. 4.) When the Lord turned our captivity as the streams in the South: that is, gave us sudden deliverance, (Rivers in the South, rise not from a constant spring, but from accidental rains, which make violent land-flouds on a sudden.) At the approach of this sudden mercy, the Jews were like to them that dream. So when the Lord sends sudden judgments, rivers of calamity, rivers of blood, as rivers in the South; when he brings in captivity, as rivers in the South, then are we in a dream too, and are not only destroyed, but distracted and amazed. But how fast soever judgments come, they come not suddenly upon them who are awake, much less on them who are watching for them when they come.

If the scourge slay suddenly; What then?

He will laugh at the trial of the innocent.

Mr. Broughton reads it thus, He scorneth at the melting away of the innocent. The reason of the different reading is, because the Hebrew word may spring either from a root, signifying to tempt and try; or from another, To melt and dissolve; He scorneth at the melting away of the innocent. Afflictions are melting, They dissolve our comforts, yea, our very hearts; in the same sence that godly sorrow breaks our hearts. Pity should be shewn to him that is melted, Chap. 6. but ye forsake the fear of the Almighty. So Mr. Broughton translates there, The Lord tempted Abraham (Gen. 22. 1.) that is, the Lord tried his faith, to find out of what strength it was, and how much he could trust him in that great business of sacrificing his son.

לעג Ridere est irridere, subsannare, ut sit ab hostibus, cū eos quos captivos detinent diuturnis malis conficiunt. Pined. Significat derisionem quæ fit externo corporis gestu LXX. vertunt per μυκτηρίζειν Vide in 1 Cor. 14. 21.

He will laugh at the trial of the innocent.] At their melting or trying by afflictions. The difficulty is, How God laughs at this trial? The word notes derision or scorn, (Psal. 2. 4.) He that sitteth in Heaven will laugh, there he useth the ordinary word for laughter, and he will have them in derision, that's the word in the Text. So that properly and strictly it signifies to scorn and deride, and that either by words or gestures, as putting forth of the finger, shaking the head, or gnashing the teeth, which are Scripture expressions of highest scorn by gesture.

But how shall we fit this to the business in hand? Will the Lord thus scorn and deride at the trial and probation of the innocent?

The Vulgar was it seems so much straitned to make out the sence, that he reads it negatively, If the scourge slay suddenly, he will not laugh at the trial of the innocent. Others, though they put not in a negation formally and in terms, yet they do it equivalently, and therefore they render it by an interrogation, If the scourge slay suddenly, will he laugh at the trial of the innocent? No, he will not, that's their meaning: the Lord will not sleight or neglect the trial of the innocent: though he destroyes them, yet he will not deride them. But we, and most of the learned Hebricians, keep close to the affirmative; If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent.

Suppositum verbi ridet di dæmon est, qui gaudet videre homines diuturnis malis cruciari. Caje.

There is a dispute, whom we are to understand by this He; for some taking this laughing and deriding in the broadest sence, think it too low and dishonourable to be ascribed unto God, and therefore they carry it down low enough, ascribing it to the Devil, If the scourge slay suddenly, then the Devil laugheth to see the upright tried. He makes merry with the sorrows of the Saints: the Devil hath no great cause (how much mind soever he hath) to laugh, considering his condition; but the meaning is, that which gives the Devil most content, is to see righteous persons vexed. And that's a truth. As there is joy in Heaven, when good men sorrow for sin; so there is a kind of joy in Hell, when good men are enwrapt with the sorrows of suffering.

Impius judicium subsannat malis implicitum.

Others make the antecedent to He, a wicked man (such are within one degree of Satan, his children) If the scourge slay suddenly, then the ungodly, who yet thrive and prosper, rejoyce and make sport at the trial of the innocent; See what these good, honest, innocent men have got, they thought by their prayers and fastings, by their zeal and strictness to exempt themselves from these common afflictions, they presumed they should be spared, though all the world were consumed: but see they are destroyed as well as others, they smart under the lash, as well as we their neighbours, whom they looked upon as the only whipping stocks, when a scourge should come. That wicked men laugh and deride the innocent under affliction, and jeer them with, Where is your God now? What's become of all your praying and fasting? Where are the hopes and confidences, the priviledges and protections ye talked of? is a truth.

But thirdly, We need not ease the Text thus, nor relieve it out of this difficulty, by fastening the interpretation upon wicked men. Let us take the relative to be God himself, and see how we can make the sence out, with a saving to his honour. If the scourge slay suddenly, He, that is, the most holy and gracious God, laugheth at the trial of the innocent. How so?

First, I premise this, God doth not laugh or deride properly at the afflictions of his people. No, the Lord is a tender, a gracious and a merciful Father to his people at all times; and most tender of them, when they are in their afflictions, when they are in their soreness, and in their sorrows: he is more tender then the most tender-hearted Mother (Isa. 49. 15.) Can a mother forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. Will a mother laugh and deride a poor infant, when it lies sprawling and wants her help? No, much less will God laugh at his people: therefore as laughing noteth hard-heartedness, or unnatural harshness of spirit, the Lord doth not laugh at his afflicted Saints, it is against his nature, against his practice and all experience.

What is it then he laughs at?

First, Positively thus, Job would here express that the Lord carries himself in outward things, with an equal hand both to the good and to the bad, as was touched before. The Lord laugheth at, and derideth the wicked (Prov. 1. 28.) I will laugh at their destruction, and mock when their fear cometh. The carriage of God to his own people is such, as if he did mock and laugh at them also. He that laugheth and derideth at a mans affliction, doth not regard what he suffers, he gives him no help, nor delivers him out of his sufferings. Nay, a man that laugheth at another in affliction, will lay more affliction upon him. Even thus in regard of outward dispensations, God deals with his own people; that is, when innocent ones are in affliction and cry unto him, he makes as if he did not hear or regard them, but let them lye crying, it may be day after day in their pains and wants; yea, sometimes in stead of easing them, he layes more afflictions upon them; poor souls, since they sought the Lord they found an increase of their sorrows. God seems to deal with them, as Pharaoh did with the Israelites in Egypt, who crying to him for release of their burdens, are answered only with, Ye are idle, ye are idle; let more work be laid upon theſe men, Exod. 5. Or, like Rehoboam, who threatned his people to make their yoke heavier, while they petitioned he would make it lighter; and told them of ſcorpions, while they complained of whips. David gives us this in his own experience (Pſal. 77. 2, 3.) In the day of my trouble I ſought the Lord, my ſore ran in the night, and ceaſed not (or, my hand was ſtretched out in prayer, and bedewed with tears) my ſoul refuſed to be comforted (David ſought for comfort, but his troubles encreaſing, he could not take in the comforts adminiſtred) I remembred God, and was troubled; I complained, and my ſpirit was overwhelmed. If any thing in the world can eaſe a troubled heart, thoughts of God can. Thus David once relieved himſelf; When the people talked of ſtoning him, he encouraged himſelf in the Lord his God (1 Sam. 30. 6.) Yet ſometime God ſeems to think of us leaſt, when we think of him moſt. A ſoul complaining may be overwhelmed, inſtead of being helped. Now he that layes on further afflictions, ſlights and laughs at the former. And this is the firſt way in which it may be made out, how God laughs at the trial of the innocent. When they complain he doth not preſently relieve them, nay, he layes heavier burdens of affliction upon them, and makes them more matter of complaining, before they have any matter of rejoycing.

Dicitur ridere, quia sic judicat hominum vulgus.

Ridere dicitur, cum contemnere videtur orationem postulantis opem.

Poſt orationes meas, ita me ſemper in miſeriis reliquit, acſi me deriderit.

Deus ex virorum fortium, ſc. piorum conflictu non levē capit voluptatem.

Secondly thus, The Lord is ſaid to laugh, in regard of the pleaſure he takes in the fruits, effects and iſſues of thoſe troubles wherewith his people are exerciſed: He laugheth, not at the affliction it ſelf, but at the effects and ſucceſs of it; he knows the iſſue will be matter of high contentment to himſelf, and benefit to the Saints. He laughs at their trial, becauſe he knows they will honour him in their trials. He laughs not becauſe they are pained, but becauſe himſelf is glorified. As a Father, who puts a child upon a very hard task, which yet he is aſſured the child is able to go through with, takes content to ſee him ſweat at it, to pant and blow at it: Or, as a Commander in war, rejoyceth when he puts a Party, of whoſe valour and skill he is confident, upon ſome dangerous ſervice; though he knows many of them muſt bleed for it, and ſome of them (perhaps) die for it, yet it pleaſes him to ſee ſuch engaged in it. Thus God laughs at the trials and moſt deſperate adventures of the innocent; for he ſees they are men who will bide a trial; nay will neither ſhrink in the wetting, nor will their ſpirits conſume in the burning.

And thus a Believer is exhorted to laugh at his own trial; My brethren (ſaith the Apoſtle James, chap. 1. 2.) count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations or trials. The more trials, the more joyes. And thus one Believer may laugh and rejoyce at the trial of another, becauſe he knows that the trial of our faith, being much more precious then of Gold that periſheth, though it be tried with fire, ſhall be found unto praiſe, and honour and glory at the appearing of Jeſus Chriſt, 1 Pet. 1. 6, 7. Hence obſerve,

First, The Lord may bear himſelf toward his own people in their affliction, as if he mockt at their afflictions.

As he laughs at wicked men in earneſt, and hath them in deriſion; ſo he puts out an appearance of deriſion in what he doth to his own people.

Secondly, To ſee good men tried, is a delight unto God.

Laughter is an expreſſion of our inward content and joy. Though the word of the Text is ſcarce uſed for laughter in a good ſence, yet here it may. The Propheſie ſaith of Chriſt (Iſa. 53. 10.) It pleaſed the Lord to bruiſe him; God the Father was delighted to bruiſe his Son. Not that he delighted in afflicting or ſtriking him, he was tender and dear to him as the apple of his eye: But with reſpect to the iſſue and fruit of it, the Lord was pleaſed; His father laughed to ſee him caſt down and ſuffering, whom he foreſaw conquering and triumphing: So it is here. A man delights to ſee wreſtlers ſhew their ſtrength, as alſo to behold men ſtriving for maſteries in fencing or running a race, which are but trials of activity, and contendings for honours. Thus when the Lord bringeth his innocent ſervants into affliction, he doth but bring them to a wreſtling, to a running or a fencing, to ſee how they can make uſe of their hands and legs, how they can make uſe of their ſpiritual armour, how they can wield the ſword of the Spirit, how they can defend themſelves with the ſhield of faith, how they can bear a knock upon the helmet of ſalvation, how they can walk upon thorns and ſharp ſtones, himſelf having before ſhod their feet with the preparation of the Goſpel of peace. This is the ſpectacle which God delighteth in and laughs at, and it is a glorious ſpectacle. The Roman triumphs were but childiſh playes to theſe of the Saints, called out and clad with the armour of righteouſneſs, which makes them more then conquerors, over tribulations and diſtreſs, over perſecution, famine, nakedneſs, peril and the ſword, yea, over principalities and powers, over things preſent and to come: The Saints in their trial, conquer not only all preſent evils, but all that are poſſible. They are real victors over thoſe evils which they ſhall never feel or ſee. As in doing, ſo in ſuffering, all is reckoned to us which we are willing to engage in, though actually we do not; no marvel if God laugh at the trial of ſuch Champions and Chriſtian Heroes. It is the obſervation of Seneca, a Roman Moraliſt and Philoſopher, in his Book of Providence, ſpeaking of ſome of the ancient Worthies of Rome, I ſee not (ſaith he) what Jupiter hath on earth more contentful to him, or to which he would rather turn his eye, then to behold Cato ſtanding firm in the midſt of publick ruines, and that, though (after all his wreſtlings, as a noble Patriot, for the ſaving of his Countrey) he found both his honeſt counſels broken, and his unwearied labours loſt, yet he did not loſe his ſpirit, nor was his heart broken. Now, if an Heathen could ſay, that to ſee ſuch a man conteſt with all manner of troubles, was, he thought, a delight for Jupiter, and laughter to the Idol-gods; may not we, changing the perſons, make his ſence the comment of this Text, and a proof of this Obſervation? It is a holy delight to the holy God to ſee his faithful ones, his Abrahams in a trial, to ſee his Jobs in a trial, his Pauls in a trial, to ſee thoſe Grandees in Graces, ſhew ſuch admirable skill, ſuch courage, ſuch zeal, ſuch faith, ſuch patience, ſuch ſubmiſſion of ſpirit, to ſee Saints play the men thus in ſuch ſpiritual trials and hotteſt ſervices, is not this juſt matter of laughing and rejoycing to the Lord?

Non video quid habeat in terris Jupiter pulchrius ſi convertere animum velit, quàm ut ſpectet Catonem, jam partibus non ſemel fractis ſtantem hiliominus inter ruinas publicas rectum. Sen. l. 1. Di Provid.

And if the Lord take a kind of pleaſure in the trials of his Saints, then ſurely the Saints ought not to be diſpleaſed at their trials. Hence the holy Ghoſt bids the Saints laugh as well as the Lord laugheth, Jam. 1. 2. My brethren count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations. Chriſtians, never look upon a trial with ſuch ſad and ſowr faces, the face of God is full of ſmiles to ſee you at it: Shall that make you ſad, which makes God rejoyce? Never grieve, but when you fear you have grieved God. Further note,

That, The afflictions of the Saints are trials of the Saints.

They are occaſions to ſhew forth their virtues and their graces. They give proofs both to God and the world, what manner of men they are. Tried ones are precious ones: many others are ſo, but theſe appear what they are, they have ſhewed their metal. All true faith is good, but tried Faith is beſt (1 Pet. 1. 9.) That the trial of your faith (that is, that your tried faith) being much more precious then of gold that periſheth, may be found unto praiſe, &c.

Beſides theſe two interpretations, I ſhall add for a cloſe, two more, which may further illuſtrate the meaning of this laughter aſcribed to God, at the trial of the innocent. Firſt, or,

Thirdly, He laughs at the fears and ſad forecaſts of his people, who not being able to look through ſecond cauſes, and ſee the ends of things in their beginnings, preſently judge all's loſt, the Church muſt be ruined, and the Saints undone, becauſe thus tried. Now God knowing the end of all actions, not only at their beginning, but from the beginning (yea, from eternity) he looking through the blackeſt clouds and darkeſt nights, upon the iſſues of all things, derides the ſimple conjectures of men about them. The very Heathens have given us ſuch a notion of God in laughter.

Prudens futuri temporis exitum caliginoſa nocte premit Deus, ridetque ſi mortalis ultra fas trepidat &c. Horat. l. 3. Car. Od. 29.

Secondly, or fourthly, God laughs at the laughter, and derides the joyes of wicked men, who ſee his innocent ones tried. For they ſay in their hearts, and it may be with their tongues, Happy we who have ſcaped ſuch a ſcowring, we would not have been in their coats for a world, better die then live to bring our ſelves into ſuch troubles. Or thus, Now the day is ours, we have prevailed, theſe men men are catcht and entangled, we ſhall do well enough with them now. The Lord hearing ſuch language at the trial of the innocent, laughs, to think how how thoſe wretches ſhall ſee themſelves deceived, when they ſee theſe who are fallen riſing again; or, God by their fall raiſing others, and ſetting his King upon his holy hill of Sion.

Laſtly, As God laughs at the trial of the innocent; ſo let the nocent and impenitent remember and tremble at it, that God will laugh at the approach of their torments, and mock when their fear cometh, when their fear cometh as deſolation, and their deſtruction as a whirlwind.

Job having thus ſhewed how the innocent are afflicted, ſhews in the next verſe how the wicked are exalted, from both he infers that there can be no judgment made of any mans inward ſtate, whether he be innocent or wicked, upon his outward ſtate, whether he be proſperous or afflicted: The innocent are under the ſcourge, and the wicked are upon the throne, and who doth theſe things but God himſelf? that's the ſum of this twenty fourth verſe.

Verſe 24. The earth is given into the hand of the wicked, he covereth the faces of the Judges thereof; if not, where and who is he?

The earth is given into the hand of the wicked.

The earth.] Earth may be taken ſtrictly for the Element of earth, as it is oppoſed to fire, water and air. Not ſo in this place: But more largely, earth is put for all earthly things, Pſal. 115. 6. The heaven of heavens is the Lords, but the earth hath he given unto the children of men, that is, he hath divided all earthly comforts as a portion or inheritance among men; their lot falleth there.

Thirdly, Earth is put for the inhabitants or people of the earth, Pſal. 100. 1. Praiſe him all ye earth; ſo the Hebrew, which we tranſlate, Praiſe him all ye people of the earth. Iſa. 24. 4. The earth mourneth and fadeth away, that is, they who dwell on the earth.

Fourthly, By the earth we may underſtand ſpecial Countries or Nations, Tracts or Parts of the Earth.

Fifthly, The Earth is put for earthly minded men, and for the falſe Church, Rev. 14. 3. The Saints are redeemed from the earth, that is, God hath fetcht them out from amongſt falſe worſhippers and impure ones, he hath reſcued them from the world of Idolaters, and from the ſuperſtitious multitude.

In this place Earth is to be underſtood in the ſecond, third or fourth notion, namely, for all earthly comforts; or, for the Provinces and Kingdoms of the earth; or, for the Inhabitants and People of the earth. Theſe are given into the hand of the wicked.

Given.] The Lord makes (as it were) a deed of Gift of theſe things unto wicked men. So in the fifteenth of this Book, ver. 19. Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no ſtranger paſſed among them; which ſome expound of the righteous, No ſtranger paſſed among them, that is, none came in to invade them; or, as others render it, No ſtrange thing, that is, no unjuſt thing came in amongſt them, they had the earth in their own power and rightful poſſeſſion.

Nihil eſt alienum, ſc. injuſtum. Juu.

To be given, noteth two things; or there is a double act of giving.

There is a gift by providence, and a gift by promiſe. When the Lord is ſaid to give the earth into the hand of the wicked, we are to underſtand it of that common providential gift, whereby he diſpoſeth of all things to all men; no man hath any thing but by the gift of God. Thus wicked Jeroboam had the Kingdom of Iſrael given him, and ſo had hypocritical Jehu for four generations: They ſerved the providence of God, and the providence of God exalted them. (Acts 17. 26.) He hath made of one blood all Nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation, that is, he hath (as it were) chalked out, and drawn a line where the bounds and habitations, whither the dominions and poſſeſſions of ſuch men ſhall be extended, and where they ſhall be confined. That's a gift of providence.

There is a ſpecial gift of promiſe peculiar to Believers (Rom. 8. 32.) He that ſpared not his own Son, but gave him to die for us, how ſhall he not with him alſo freely give us all things? that is, all worldly things; or we may take in whatſoever elſe concerns our ſpiritual eſtate beſides Chriſt: All the things of Chriſt, yea, and all worldly things come in to the Saints, as a gift by Chriſt, who is himſelf the greateſt gift that ever man received, or that God could beſtow. How ſhall he deny us any thing, when he hath given him who is above all things? 1 Cor. 3. 22, 23. Whether Paul or Apollos, or the world, all is yours (for ye are Chriſts. Believers enjoy earthly things by an heavenly title. Chriſt is their conveyance. In this ſence the earth is not given to the wicked; the Lord gives them nothing in Chriſt, or for Chriſt as a Saviour, in the Covenant of Grace: Chriſt, as a Lord, hath bought the wicked (2 Pet. 2. 1.) and he gives them what they have, as they are his creatures; as he hath given them a ſubſiſtence and a breathing in the world, ſo he allots them maintenance in the world.

So then, to receive by donation from God, may note any way of poſſeſſion. What wicked men inherit by ſucceſſion and deſcent from their Anceſtors, is a gift of God.

Yea, what they get and hold by violence and oppreſſion, is a gift of God. The earth which wicked men tear out of the hands of the godly, the earth which they ſtain with the bloud of lawful owners, that they may enjoy it; even this is ſaid to be given unto them by God, in that common way of providence. Nebuchadnezzar was a cruel oppreſſor, yet he had the earth given him by God, Jer. 27. 6. Now have I given all theſe Lands into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babylon my ſervant, and the beaſts of the field have I given him alſo to ſerve him. God gave him the Land, yet Nebuchadnezzar invaded it and got it by violence; God ſent him, Iſa. 10. 6. but he went of his own errand, v. 7. He had no thought of ſerving the will and commands of God, but of ſerving his own ambition and covetouſneſs; yet of this cruel oppreſſor the Lord ſaith, I have given him all theſe Lands, &c. Thus the earth is given.

Into the hand of the wicked.

There is a queſtion, whom we are to underſtand by theſe Donees, or the receivers of this gift? Some expound the text (with a ſpecialty of the Devil) The earth is given into the hand of that wicked one, who is, as the Prince of the air, ὁ πρέσβυς Θ. ſo, the Prince of this world, and hath great power upon the earth. But take it of wicked men, who are the ſervants and heirs of Satan; as the Saints are the heirs of Chriſt, and receive all thing from him, ſo wicked men are the heirs of Satan, his children, and what they receive as a common gift from God, they receive by a ſpecial gift from Satan. The Devil boaſted to Chriſt (Mat. 4.) All theſe things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worſhip me. Though the Devil be a very beggar, and hath not a ſhoe-latchet of his own to give, yet for ſuch ſervices and homages he gives out large poſſeſſions of the world (common providence ſo ordering it) to wicked men, his vaſſals.

Hence theſe words are interpreted as a reaſon of that confuſion before ſpoken of. No wonder if innocent men are under the ſcourge, for the earth is given into the hand of the wicked. When they have moſt power, who have leaſt honeſty, things muſt needs be turned upſide down, and all put in diſorder. What can be expected from ſuch a tyrannous Prince as Satan, from ſuch wicked inſtruments as rule under him, but continual diſturbance amongſt the children of men; eſpecially that good men ſhould go by the worſt. Godly men are like to have but little peace while theſe have the preheminence. The Devil clouds the underſtandings, and vailes the eyes of thoſe Princes and Judges, whom he (in this ſence) advances: And juſtice is equally wounded and diſtorted, when Judges cannot ſee Things, as when they ſee Perſons in judgment. The bounty of God to the wicked is an occaſion of their injury to the righteous.

Si flagellatur innocēs, quid mirum, cum mundi judices corruptiſſimi ſint? Terræ poteſtas permiſſa eſt impiiſſimo dæmoni, qui dicitur mundi rector, ille efficit ut reges, principes, judices, quaſi obvelatos habeant oculos, cæcè & ſine diſcrimine de rebus judicantes. Eugub.

But rather take the words (which was hinted before) as an argument whereby Job further proves, that there can be no ground of judgment upon any mans ſpiritual eſtate, by the appearances of his temporal; for as righteous and innocent perſons are under the ſcourge, and laid low in the world, ſo wicked men have the earth given them, and are exalted.

I find ſome reading the text as an expoſtulation; Wherefore is the earth given into the hand of the wicked? Wherefore doth he cover the faces of the Judges? As if Job did chide with God about this unequal carriage of things in the world, and called him to give a reaſon of it. But we have found Job (in other places) acquitting himſelf from the ſuſpitions of ſuch a charge, and therefore I cannot joyn with theſe in laying it upon him here.

Job doth not complain, but affirm, That the earth is given into the hand of the wicked.

Hence

Hence observe, First, Wicked men may abound in earthly things.

They may have the earth and the fulnes of it; The earth, and all that is earthly; their bellies are filled by God himself with hidden treasure (Psal. 17. 14.) Precious things are usually hidden, and all that's named treasure (though it be but earthly) hath a preciousnes in it. Hidden treasures of the earth fill their bellies who sleight the treasures of Heaven, and whose souls shall never have so much as a taste of heavenly treasures: riches and honour are the lot of their inheritance, who have no inheritance among those whose lot is glory. They have the earth in their hands, who have nothing of Heaven in their hearts: they bear sway in the world, who are slaves to the world: they govern and order others at their will, who are led captive by Satan at his will. Be not offended and troubled to see the Reins of government in their hands, who know not how to govern themselves; or to see them rule the world, who are unworthy to live in the world. Remember the earth is given into the hand of the wicked. We must submit to the judgment of God, though it leave us under the injustice of men. And we have little reason to envy them a great portion in this life, who have all their portion in this life.

The most wise God, who hath all things to dispose, disposes them with infinite wisdom: He gives good things to those that are evil, but he gives better things to those who are good; He hath a Benjamins mess, a rich portion for his own children, after all these disbursements to the children of disobedience. Their portion lies not in earth and dust, or in the rubbish of the world: Heaven is given into the hand of the Saints: Spiritual blessings in heavenly things are given into the hand of the Saints: The pardon of sin, the love and favour of God, the blood of Jesus Christ, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, are gifts worth the having; These are given into the hands of the Saints. As for the earth, he gives that into the hand of the wicked; and yet all that is not given into their hands. Wicked men have not all the earth, and some wicked men have none of the earth. The Lord often makes the portion of his own people fat and plenteous, and the portion of his enemies lean and poor. Heaven hath not all the earthly poor, nor Hell all the earthly rich. God doth not give wicked men all the earth; but all the earth which they have, is of his giving. Most of the earth is given to be their possession; and all the possession which is given them, is of earth; therefore it is said, He giveth the earth into the hand of the wicked.

And seeing God giveth the earth into the hand of the wicked, we may observe also,

That wicked men have a just title to the earthly things which they enjoy.

They are not meer usurpers, neither shall they be dealt with as meer usurpers. They have no spiritual title, no title by Christ, they claim not by promise, which the Saints do: They have forfeited their title by sin, all is lapsed and escheated into the hand of the great Land-Lord. Their goods are forfeited, and so are their lives into the hand of God, and he gives both back for a while into their hands. He gives them their lives back, and reprieveth them; for which time of their reprieve, he giveth them the earth to live upon, or to maintain their lives: and so far as they use earthly things for the continuance of life, they shall not be accounted or reckoned with as usurpers. They shall not be charged for using the creature, but for abusing it; for making the earth serve their lusts, not for making it a support of their lives. And seeing as the Lord hath given them back their forfeited lives, so also their forfeited lands by a deed of gift, sealed with general providence: this is enough to secure them in those worldly possessions (which they have neither got nor hold by injustice) from the brand of usurpation, and from the violence of dispossession. As what God hath joyned, no man may put asunder; So what God hath given, no man must take away. Neither riches nor rule are founded in grace. He hath given the earth into the hand of the wicked.

Dominium non fundatur in gratia.

He covereth the faces of the Judges thereof.

He covereth. There is some Question whom we are to understand, as the Antecedent to this Relative, He: who is he that covereth? Some make the Antecedent a wicked man. Others say 'tis God, The earth is given into the hand of the wicked, and he, that is, the wicked one covereth the faces of the Judges thereof. Or, He, that is, God covereth the faces of the Judges thereof. I shall a little open this expression, it needeth some uncovering, for it is dark in both relations.

Tegit ne videant quod æquum & justum est. Drus.

First, Look upon that interpretation, which refers it to wicked men. He covereth; namely, That wicked man, who is preferred and exalted, covereth the faces of the Judges; that is, he stops the course of justice. And there are four wayes by which wicked men cover the faces of the Judges.

First, By gifts and rewards. Bribes vail, yea, put out the eyes of a Judge, that he cannot see to give every one his due. Hence that charge (Exod. 23. 8.) Thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous.

Munera cæcos reddunt judices.

Secondly, The faces of the Judges are covered by threatnings; fear of loss blinds as well as hope of gain. Some send terrible messages to the Judge; Will not you do as we would have you? Will not you give your sentence and opinion thus? At your peril be it. Now the Judges face is covered, his eyes are put out by a threat; the mist and cloud of a Princes displeasure, of a great mans indignation is before his eyes, His face is covered.

Thirdly, The Judges faces are covered by actual putting them to shame, by casting them out of favour, and clouding them with disgrace, by taking away their commissions, or sending them a Quietus est, laying them by as unfit for service; any of these is a covering of the Judges face.

There is a fourth way of covering the Judges face, to which the second and third are often made a preparatory; And that is, by putting the Judge to death. So much that expression implies in Job 40. vers. 13. where the Lord with infinite wisdom and holiness, insulting over Job to humble him, bids him arise, and do some great thing, somewhat which might speak him a man of might. Deck thy self now with majesty and excellency, and array thy self with glory and beauty; cast abroad the rage of thy wrath, and behold every one that is proud and abase him; look on every one that is proud and bring him low, and tread down the wicked in their place; Hide them in the dust together, and bind their faces in secret; that is, cover their faces as men prepared for death, as men ready to go out to execution. We may expound it by that (Esth. 7. 8.) where as soon as ever the word went out of the Kings mouth, They covered Hamans face. And by that (Mar. 14. 65.) where when Christ was judged worthy of death, the Text saith, They spit on him, and covered his face: The covering of the face was a mark of a condemned man, held as unworthy to behold and enjoy the light of the Sun, or the light of the Princes countenance. Thus to cover the faces of the Judges is to condemn the Judges, and to take them out of the world by sufferings, rather then suffer them to do right. I find that of Elihu (Job 34. 29.) interpreted to this sence, When he giveth quietness, who can make trouble? That is, when the Lord doth absolve and acquit a man, giving him a discharge, then he is free, no man can sue him or trouble him, much less condemn him; but if he hide his face, who can behold him? So we translate it, meaning thus, If the Lord hide his own face. But this exposition saith, If the Lord hide the face of that man, that is, If the Lord condemn that man, or pass sentence of death upon him (of which covering or hiding the face was a symbol) then, who can behold him? That is, who then can see his face, or have society with him, whom God hath separated to death? It was a custom also among the Romans, when sentence was pronounced upon a malefactor, thus to command the executioner, Take him away, bind his hands, cover his face, hang him up. And usually with us, malefactors, who are ready to suffer the pains of death, put a covering upon their faces. This also may be a good sence of the words, He covereth the faces of the Judges, that is, a wicked Prince oppresseth and putteth the Judges to death. And whereas good Princes say, Let justice be done, though the world perish: he saith, Let the Judges perish, rather then justice should be done.

Quis rei faciem poterit amplius videre, quasi absolutus sit. Bold.

I Lictor, colliga manus, caput obnubito, infœlici arbori suspendito. Cic. in orat. pro Rabir.

Yet further, the word Judges, in the original, notes not only such as are in actual office to determine controversies, שפטים Judices vel officio, vel aptitudine.

Nomen judicis apud Hebræos latius patet quam apud Latinos, non enim ille tantum vocatur judex qui controversiu vacat, sed etiã qui rempublicam armis tuetur. Bol. Vidi servos, i. e. servire dignos, & principes, i. e. dignos imperio.

sies, whether criminal or civil; but any man that is worthy to be a Judge, or is fit to govern and mannage publick affairs, whether in peace or warr. And so it implies a suppressing and keeping down of those that are most able, and best qualified to undertake any service for States and Kingdoms (Eccles. 10.7.) I have seen servants upon horses, and Princes walking as servants upon the earth; that is, I have seen men who are worthy no better imployment then that of a servant to rub horse heels, or do the meanest offices, such as these I have seen in the saddle, and in their trappings. And, I have seen Princes walking upon the earth on foot; that is, men who deserve to bear rule and to govern Kingdoms, who both for ability and integrity, are worthy to have the reins of Authority in their hand, and to sit at the helm, these I have seen walking upon the earth, or tugging at an oar, as common men: that's an evil which Solomon saw under the Sun: So here, He covereth the faces of the Judges, may have this meaning, Evil Princes keep down and hold in obscurity men of parts and gifts, of spirit and courage, of honesty and uprightness, and prefer only those who are base and corrupt, who will serve turns, and comply with times.

Hence note, That it is the policy of wicked Princes to corrupt and blind Judges, or to employ such as are blind and corrupt.

They take away power from those who would use power well, and give power to them who are slaves to their wills.

Secondly, It is the character of a wicked man to bribe a Judge, to put out the eyes, and cover the face of a Judge with gifts.

A good cause fears not the eye of the Judge, and a good man had rather lose his cause, then pervert the Judge.

So much of mans covering the faces of the Judges: now see how God covers them. He who opens the eyes and uncovers the faces of the Judges, that they may discern between cause and cause, doth also cover the faces of Judges, that they cannot discern between cause and cause. As the Lord hardens the heart and blinds the eye in spiritual things, so also in civil, not by taking away the sight which man had, but by withdrawing or denying his own light. The Lord covers the faces of the Judges, when he doth not give them light, nor shew them the path of justice. If God suspend his light, the greatest lights are presently in darkness: God doth not hood-wink or muffle up the Judges by putting any thing before their eyes, but by hiding his own eyes from them. The Psalmist speaks of Judges thus covered (Psal. 62. 5.) They know not, neither will they understand, they walk on in darkness, all the foundations of the earth are out of course. We have here the character of evil Judges, and what the consequents of it are. They know not, neither will they understand, they walk on in darkness (these three expressions explain this Text) and what follows? Then all the foundations of the earth are out of course; Law and justice are out of course, no man knoweth where to have right, or by whom to be protected against wrong.

Tegit, ne videant quod bonum & æquum est. Drus.

Hence observe, Ignorant and evil Judges are sent by God as a scourge.

Hinc elicimus malos judices etiã à Deo esse. Drus.

I gave them a King in mine anger, Hos. 13.11.

Lastly, (for the clearing of this) The covering of the faces of the Judges notes three things.

First, Ignorance and blindness, or an inability to judge.

Judex oculatissimus esse debet.

Secondly, Inhumanity and cruelty, The faces of the Judges being covered, they will not look upon the case of a poor man. It is usual for an oppressed petitioner to say to the Judge, Look upon me, good my Lord, cast an eye upon me; the Judge who will not see, is covered with incompassion.

Solebant judices intra cortinas se continere cũ contra reum capitis sententiam pronunciabant. Pined.

Thirdly, Covering of the face imports the affected partiality of Judges; many do as if they could not see, as if their faces were covered. Affection blinds the judgment, and none are so blind as they that will not see. The reason why the Heathen pictured their Fortune blind, was, because she distributed things, as if she affected blindness, giving good to those that were evil, and evil to those that were good. When Judges give rewards to those that should be punished, and punish those that should be rewarded, their faces are covered, they are blind. Judges were anciently pourtray'd or pictur'd without hands and without eyes; without hands, as noting that Judges must not receive or take gifts: And without eyes, because they must not see friend or neighbour, great or small, kinsman or stranger; they were to distribute justice according unto every mans cause, and not with respect to any mans state or relation. It is said of Christ (Isa. 11, 3.) where his Kingdom is described, that he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes; that is, by what appears to the eye, but he shall judge righteous judgement. In this sence, it is the Judg's duty and honour to have his face covered. But the covering here meant, is either of ignorance and inability, or of corruptness and partiality: All which hinder the Judge from doing his duty, and are blemishes of his honour.

Antiqui fortunam cæcam pingebant, quòd malis bonas, mala bonis indiscriminatim conferrentur.

But some may object, Shall we attribute this to God? Doth he cover the faces of the Judges? God is pure from all sin, while he leaves men in their impurity. He is just in giving man over to his own injustice. So we answer, and the next words challenge all to make another answer.

אם לא פאי

Si non, ubi ille? Pagn. Si non, ergo Quis ille? lingua sancta concisa valde. Si non (supple, Deus qui hoc faciat) ergo quis est? supple, qui faciat.

If not, where, and who is he?

If it is not the Lord who doth this, tell me who is it? as if he had said, Some may be offended and scandalized at my doctrine, that I assert, The earth is given into the hands of the wicked, that he covereth the faces of the Judges; If any man shall deny or scruple this, let him shew me whence these things are, and who is the cause of them.

There is a three-fold understanding of these words: Some make the Antecedent to be the wicked; As if he had said, Who but a wicked man will cover the faces of the Judges, and hinder the execution of justice? And so they acquit God, accounting it blasphemy to attribute the act of covering unto him: The Lord is a God of justice, he loves judgment; he opens the mind, and clears the eye, he doth not cast clouds and mists before it. It's true, so far as the act is sinful, God forbid we should ascribe it unto God: But (as was shewed before) we need not use this subterfuge, least we should lay any aspersion upon his justice and holiness. God can leave men to their injustice without any thought in, or touch of injustice in himself.

Others interpret this Question as a challenge; It is thus, If it be not, where, and who is he? Who and where's the man that will argue or implead me of falshood in what I have asserted? Who is it that undertakes to convince me of error in the doctrine I have delivered? This is my opinion; these positions I have laid down for truth, That the Lord destroyeth the perfect and the wicked, that he laugheth at the trial of the innocent, that he gives the earth into the hand of the wicked, that he covereth the faces of the Judges; If it be not thus, if any one hold otherwise, Let me see the man, Let him appear as my Antagonist, or Opponent. Where, and who is he that dares charge me with error? I am ready to answer him.

Sinon, ubi est, scil. qui mè falsi arguat? prodeat si quis me possit falsi arguere Merc. Ubi est, qui mentiri me censet? Pagn.

But rather take it in the sence before given, If it be not the Lord who doth this, then shew me who it is, Where, and who is he? There is an elegant conciseness in the Hebrew, which speaks only thus, If not, where he, or, who he? The sence is, If it be not God who doth this, shew me, tell me, Who is it? And so the words are an exclusion of any other power, ordering and disposing the things of the world. When old Isaac was disappointed in his intention of giving the blessing to Esau, he trembled exceedingly, and spake in the language of this Text, Who, where is he? (Gen. 27.33.) As if he had said, I thought thou my son Esau hadst brought me venison before, and if it was not thou, I know not who it should be, I was never so deceived in my life, if it was not thou. Such a broken speech Job uses here, If it be not God who doth these things, I am much deceived, for I know not any in the world to whom I might probably assign them, but only unto him. You must be wiser then I, if you find any thus powerful besides God. If not, where, and who is he? Whence observe,

First, That, the greatest confusions in the world are ordered by God.

What greater confusion then this, to see the earth given to those who deserve not to live upon the earth? that they should ſhould rule the world who are unworthy to breathe in the world? Yet even theſe things are diſpoſed of by the Lord, and are the iſſues of his counſels. That wherein we ſee no order, receives order from the Lord.

Secondly, Obſerve, The very confuſions that are in the world are an argument of the power of God.

For ſeeing the world continues in the midſt of ſuch confuſions, it ſhews there is a mighty power, ballancing theſe confuſions ſo exactly, that they cannot ruine the world. If there were not an over-ruling power in God, wicked men ruling would ſoon ruine all. There are myſteries of providence, as well as of faith. And many are as much puzzl'd to interpret what God doth, as what he hath ſpoken. I find Heathens often ſtumbling at this ſtone, and ungodding their Idol gods at the ſight of ſuch diſtributions among men. When evil takes away good men, this is my next thought (ſaith one of them) I am ſollicited to think there are no gods. Another obſerving how unequally men were buried, buries God in that obſervation. Licinus a cruel oppreſſor lyes interred in a ſtately monument. Cato, a ſober, grave, wiſe, and juſt Senator hath a mean and poor Sepulchre, ſcarce looking above the ground. Pompey the Great, that famous Commander and Conqueror had no Tomb at all, he was buried no man knoweth where. When we ſee (ſaith he) things go thus, who would think that there are any gods?

Cum rapiunt mala fata bonos, ignoſcite faſſo, Sollicitor nullos eſſe putare Deos. Ovid.

Marmoreo Licinus tumulo jacet, & Cato parvo, Pompeius nullo, quis putet eſſe Deos?

Thus they ſtumbled at the ſuppoſed uneven diſpenſations of their Idol gods. And we find great offence taken, and an horrible blaſphemy belched out againſt the true God, upon the ſame occaſion, and almoſt in the ſame terms (Mal. 2. 17.) Ye have wearied the Lord with your words, yet ye ſay, Wherein have we wearied him? When ye ſay, Every one that doth evil is good in the ſight of the Lord, and he delighteth in them, or where is the God of judgment? Though they fell not directly into the former blaſphemy, to conclude that there was no God, becauſe wicked men proſpered; yet they fell into a blaſphemous opinion, that God delighted in, and loved wicked men, becauſe they proſpered. Wherein have we wearied the Lord? Yes, ye have: Not that the Lord is at all moved or troubled in himſelf with the contumelious ſpeeches of men: but thus, if any thing would tire, and weary him, this may, to hear himſelf arraigned and judged by the world, as a lover of evil men, becauſe he doth not preſently ſmite them with the viſible marks of his diſpleaſure; that becauſe the earth is given into the hands of the wicked, therefore the Lord muſt needs be a friend to the wicked.

Thirdly, Obſerve, That no creature is maſter of his own wayes or ends.

The Lord giveth the earth into the hand of the wicked. Man cannot get the earth into his own hand, let him be as wicked as he will: The Lord covers the faces of the Judges: If he enlighten them, no man can cloud them; if he open, no man can ſhut.

No creature can do good without the directing and enabling hand of God.

No creature doth any evil without the ſupporting and over-ruling hand of God (Iſa. 41. 23.) Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods; yea, do good or evil, that we may be diſmayed, and behold it together. Let us ſee you do any miſchief, if ye can. Man is ſet upon miſchief, but he cannot act miſchief, unleſs God (at leaſt) permit. We were in an ill caſe, if man could do all the evil he hath a mind to.

It is matter of comfort, to conſider that the wayes and iſſues of good and evil, are in his hand, who is good, and doth no evil.

VERS. 25, 26.

Now my dayes are ſwifter then a poſt, they flée away, they ſée no good.
They are paſſed away as the ſwift ſhips, as the Eagle that haſteth to the prey.

THeſe two verſes are a confirmation of Job's former argument: As he had ſhewed in general, that the wicked are exalted, and the innocent afflicted; ſo now he ſhews the latter branch from his own experience or example.

Verſ. 25. My dayes are ſwifter then a poſt, they flée away, they ſée no good, &c.

We have here three ſimilitudes, by which Job ſets forth the uncertainty of his proſperous eſtate, and how ſoon the time wherein he enjoyed it was blown over.

1. 2. 3. } The ſimilitude of a { Poſt. Ship. Eagle.

As in Chap. 7. he uſed three ſimilitudes, viz.

1. 2. 3. } Of { A Weavers ſhuttle. The Wind. A diſſolving Cloud.

So here he bringeth in three more to clear the ſame point.

Job's thoughts travel'd thorow all parts of the world to find out illuſtrations of mans frailty. In theſe two verſes three of the four elements are enquired into. The Earth, the Air, and the Water. A Poſt upon the Earth, a Ship upon the Water, an Eagle in the Air, are called in as witneſſes to this truth.

Now my dayes are ſwifter then a Poſt, &c,

Now my dayes.] That is, my proſperous dayes, ſo Mr. Broughton gloſſes. Troubleſom times are all night and darkneſs, yet we may take it of dayes in general; They are ſwifter then a Poſt.

The word which we tranſlate Swifter, ſignifies any thing that is light, becauſe light things are quick in motion. We call a man that is ſwift of foot, light of foot. And here it is joyned with that which among men is moſt ſwift and paſſing, a Poſt, who rides or runs without any ſtop or ſtay, without the leaſt conſiderable ſtop or ſtay: So that it is grown into a Proverb, To run Poſt, or, To ride Poſt, is as much as to be in haſte: To ſay, You are in Poſt haſte, is to ſay, you are in great haſte. My dayes (ſaith Job) are ſwifter then a Poſt, they out-run thoſe curreers ſent out upon the moſt important meſſages. The Poſt, whether ſent to carry news good or bad, or intelligence for the diſpatch of buſineſs, publick or private, is engaged to ride hard; he muſt not ſpare horſe-fleſh, or (as we commonly ſpeak) ſuffer the graſs to grow under his horſe-heels. Hence Obſerve,

Firſt, Time is very ſwift, 'tis gone ſuddenly.

My dayes are ſwifter then a Poſt.] We ſeldom conſider' or conſider as we ought, this common truth. We live, for the moſt part, as if we could not tell how to get rid of our time; or, as if we were weary of our time, and knew not how to ſpend it out, as if time were rather chained to a ſtanding poſt, then were like a running Poſt. The Ancients emblem'd Time with wings, as if it were not running, but flying.

The next word in the Text comes near that ſence, They flée away. My dayes (ſaith Job) flee away. The word doth not ſignifie flying, as a fowl with wings, but flying as a fugitive from hard bondage, or as a man from ſome imminent danger, which, becauſe 'tis done with ſpeed, therefore the word imports any ſpeedy motion, eſpecially that of a Poſt. A Poſt riding or running, is an excellent embleme of Time. There are many conſiderations in Poſt-riding, which ſhew how exceeding ſpeedy time muſt be, to which it is here compared.

Firſt, A Poſt rides upon fleet or ſpeedy Horſes.

Secondly, He rides his Horſes upon their ſpeed; a man may have ſpeedy Horſes, and go ſoftly; but a Poſt ſpurs on.

Thirdly, A Poſt hath change of Horſes at every ſtage, that he may keep them upon their ſpeed.

Fourthly, He hath Horſes ſtanding ready for change; they are not to fetch out of the field, or to make ready when he comes to his ſtage, it is but leaping into the ſaddle and away.

Fifthly, He that rides Poſt, makes no long meals, much leſs feaſts, he takes a bit and away.

Sixthly, He lies not long a bed, he ſcarce goes to bed till he comes to his wayes end.

Seventhly,

Seventhly. A Post hath extraordinary pay for his service, and that will cause him to make speed.

Eighthly, Sometimes he rides upon pain of death, with a halter about his neck. No man will loiter, when his life lies on it.

Ninthly, If a man rides post, all must give him way, he picks and chooseth his path, and no man must hinder him.

Tenthly, He stayes not to salute, much less, like other Travellers, to gaze and view the Countrey, the Towns, Buildings, Gardens, &c.

All these things laid together, evince that the Post makes speed. Yet saith Job, My time outrunneth the Post, my time goes faster then he; the Post must stay a little sometimes, but time will not stay at all: The Post must stay for change of horses, but the Chariot of the Sun never stayeth to change horses (the Sun is the measure of time) and that makes no stop, hath no stages or baiting-places; Our dayes are swifter then a Post.

Further, Experiences speak this most true of that special time, the time of prosperity. The best things of the world are in a moveable, in a passing, posting condition. They scarce abide with us long enough to learn what they are. If a man ride post, we can hardly discern who he is; the good things of the world, the pleasures and profits, the form and fashion of it pass away so fast, that none can perfectly report what they are, excepting this, Transitory and Vain: As the artificial fashions of the world, the fashions in building and in apparel, pass so speedily, that few know what the fashion is before tis gone; a new one is abroad, before the greatest number are in the old; so the natural fashions of worldly things (some in themselves, all as to our enjoyment) the excellency and dignity, the lustre and beauty of the creature are out of sight, before we can well say of what colour and shape, or what manner of things they were. When the Painter takes the perfect feature of a mans face, or the lineaments of his body, he must sit. The world sits not so long with any man, as for him to take the picture of it. Creatures perish in their using, while they are in our hands we know not what they are, for even then they are perishing and declining from what they were. One said, when a creature-comfort was taken from him, If I had it again, methinks I could enjoy it; we seldom enjoy what we have. And what we have, is alwayes in transitu, passing from us while we have it; it is in motion while in possession. We can scarce be acquainted with it, because it stayes so little with us. Hence Job concludes this similitude;

They see no good.

My good dayes run so fast, that I cannot see the good of them. Not to see good, is, not to have the least experience of good. For the eye takes in its objects, and judges of them (so much Philosophers teach) sooner then any other sense. The eye is not long about its business: It is the sense of quickest dispatch. So that it is, as if Job had said, The good things of this life are so transient, that I am so far from feeling or tasting them, &c. that (which is done with the least delay and expence of time) I have not time enough to see them. When men ride upon speed, or when any thing passes swiftly before us, we have but a glimpse, scarce a sight of those objects.

Omnia mihi præcepta sunt priusquam tangerim. Bez.

Besides, To see good, is to enjoy good, as was shewed. chap. 7. 7. And when he saith, they (scil. his dayes) saw no good, his meaning is, that he saw no good in his dayes. Till there is a consistency or a fixedness of good, there cannot be a full enjoyment of good. The reason why in heaven we shall have so much happiness, is, because all the good in heaven is a fixed good. Time passes, but Eternity stands. Eternity is a fixed Now. The things of heaven shall not perish in the using, nor shall the fashion of them pass away. In heaven vision will be everlasting, we shall ever see good, and that ever seeing shall be an ever enjoying of good. Here on earth we see God through a glass darkly, and we see all good in such post-haste, passingly, that we rather see it not, then see it; especially while we remember that good passes by us in the company, yea, in a crowd of evils, our sight of it (as when we are called to behold one man riding speedily among many) must needs be hindered. Yea oftentimes evils stand so thick about us, while good posts by us, that we cannot look through them to the good which is before us. In heaven, as good stands to our eye, so it stands alone; there's no interposition of evil to eclipse the beauty, or darken the sight of it. There we shall see, and see nothing but good. Here we see much besides, yea, see either none at all, or very little good, and that but a little.

They flee away, they see no good.

From the Post, who runneth upon the Land, Job's next comparison carries us to the motion of a Ship at sea, and anon to that swifter motion of an Eagle in the air.

Verse 26. They are passed away as the swift ships, as the Eagle that hasteneth to the prey.

They are passed.

That is, My dayes are passed, and with them all the contents and comforts which I had in those dayes: we are to take dayes, as cloathed with with all their contentful occurrences and circumstances.

They are passed away.] Or, they are glided away insensibly. נלף

As the swift ships.

Not only as the ships, but as the swift ships. A ship is a fabrick for the sea, a house upon the sea, a moveable house; and as it moveth variably, so it moveth swiftly: The inconstancy of the winds makes the motion of the ship unconstant; and the strength of the winds makes the motion of the ship swift. So that to say, His dayes passed as a ship, is an aggravation of their sudden passage. A ship passeth without any stop from it self: The ship needs not stay to bait, to sleep or rest while it is upon its journey; whatsoever they do who are within the ship, the ship moves on, if they prepare it for motion.

אני Navit, ab אנה In Pihil, obvenire, occurrere fecit, qua sic dicta est, quod remigum aut velorum impetu impellatur & feratur.

Job puts an Emphasis upon this comparison; His dayes were not only as a ship, but as a swift ship; there is much in that addition.

The Hebrew is, My dayes are as the ships of Ebeh, which is diversly rendred.

First, Some take the word Ebeh to be the name of a River in the Eastern part of the world, about Arabia, near the place where Job lived. A late Traveller hath observed a River of very swift motion, near Damascus, and not far from the Sepulcher of Job. Now a ship that moveth in a swift River, besides that it may have the wind, hath also a great addition to the speed of its motion, from the force and strength of such a current. Thus saith Job, My dayes move as the ships upon Ebeh, as ships upon the streams of that fierce, swift River, which go down with speed, as we see Boats with the Tide, and so proportionably greater Vessels, where there is a River and a Current proportionably to bear and carry them.

Ebeh, flumen rapidissimum in Arabia. Rab. Sol. Bold.

Secondly, Others conceive the word, not as a proper name, but as signifying desire, from Abah, to desire with earnestness; and then the sence is rendred thus, My dayes are passed away as ships of desire, that is, as ships, which being laden with rich commodities, the Master and the Pilot desire earnestly to bring the ship speedily to her Port, that so they may put off the commodities, and make sale of the rich lading that is in her. The wind doth not so much fill the sails of such a ship, as desire doth the minds of her Mariners. Thus Daniel was called a man of desires, because he was a man so precious and desirable. A ship richly laden is much desired; such a ship is a great charge to the Owners and Merchants, they therefore send to speed the ship home as fast as they can. Thus (saith Job) My dayes pass as a ship that hath the most desired commodities.

Thirdly, The Chaldee and others give a further note upon it, deriving the word from Abah, whence Ebib, which signifies a stalk growing up early from the earth, and bringing forth the first ripe fruit of any kind; and so it is put for any early-ripe Summer-fruit, for early Plums, Apples, Cherries, &c. And then the sence is, My dayes are like to a Ship which carrieth early fruit: So the Vulgar, Like a Ship carrying Apples.

Fructus primitivus.

Naves poma portantes.

Now a Ship that carries such fruit, makes great haste, because the fruit will spoil and rot, if not speedily put off. Ripe fruit is a commodity that will not keep, unless they have Pertransiêrunt cum navibus.

fructus delicatos portantibus. Targ.

have a quick passage, all is lost. My dayes (saith Job) pass even as a ship that carries ripe Summer-fruit, which are hasted away with all speed, lest they perish before they come to the port.

Fourthly, There is another sence given by those who derive the word from a root which signifies, to hate and oppose, or to be an adversary; and then it is thus rendred, My dayes pass away as a Pyrates ship, or as a ship that goes to take a prey, as a Ship that goes out to take prizes upon the Sea. Now we know, when ships go out either upon piracy, which is robbery at Sea, or upon any lawful way of taking prizes by publick authority; these ships of all others are the swiftest, they are prepared on purpose to make way and overtake other ships; their lading is not burden, but ballast, that they may be swift of sail; so saith, Job, My dayes pass away like a swift ship; not like some great Merchant-ship deeply laden, which can make no great way in the Sea, but as a ship of pyracy, that hath nothing in her but Weapons, Artillery and Ammunition, to oppose those they meet, such are as your nimble Frigats, Fly-boats and Catches, which sail with every wind, or Gallies which pass without wind, carried with strength of arms and oars, all being Vessels used to run in upon, and surprize a booty. This also is a good interpretation; and so Mr. Broughton translates it, My dayes do fleet away as the Pyrates ships. That's the second similitude, My dayes are passed awas as the swift ships.

Piraticani, piratarum naves, quæ ornatariæ non sunt, sed tantum ad capiendam prædam.

And as an Eagle hasteneth to the prey.

This is the third similitude. A ship moveth swiftly, especially a ship upon a swift River; or a ship laden with desirable commodities, or a ship laden with Summer-fruit, or a Pyrates ship, a man of war. But here is an instance implying greater speed then that of the most speedy ship; As an Eagle hasteneth to the prey.

An Eagle of all the fowls in the air, is the swiftest and strongest of wing: An Eagle is the chief of Birds. We find in Scripture, swiftness expressed by this similitude of an Eagle (Hab. 1. 8.) The Chaldeans, who invaded the people of Israel, are thus described, Their horsemen shall come from far, they shall flee as the Eagle that hasteth to eat. See the like instances, Jer 48. Jer. 49. Ezek. 17. And in Isa. 40. 31. They shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as Eagles, &c. Noting the exceeding swiftness of the Saints in the wayes of God, the speed they shall make in the wayes of holiness; though the youths faint, and the young men utterly fall, yet they that wait upon the Lord, shall mount up with wings as Eagles, that is, they shall be swift and strong.

But here is more expressed then the natural swiftness of the Eagle, here is somewhat occasional, which adds wings to her wings. We had four interpretations of the ships swiftness. Here is one expression exceeding all those four; An Eagle hastening to the prey.

Quoniam avidissimè appetit, ideo perniciissimè volat. San.

An Eagle is a greedy Fowl. Hence that of Christ (Matth. 24.) Where the Carkass is, there the Eagles gather together; that is, look where ever there is any prey, there you shall have Eagles; if there be a carkass to be had, the Eagle shall be sure to make towards it. My dayes (saith Job) are passed away, as the Eagle hasteneth to the prey. The Naturalists observe, that the Eagle soars aloft in the air, so high, that the eye of man cannot discern her; yet the Eagle is of such a piercing eye (Eagle-eyed is a proverb for quick-sighted) that she can discern her prey upon the earth, yea, in the water; and as soon as the Eagle espies her prey, she powrs or sowces down upon it like a Thunder-bolt, like a Bullet out of a Gun, or an Arrow out of a Bow. Thus Job's dayes passed as an Eagle in her flight, and not in her ordinary flight, but as an Eagle that hasteneth to the prey, when hunger adds swiftness to her wings; such was the passage of his dayes.

Tanquam fulmen se è sublimi in terram jaculatur.

Numquid est navibus vestigium viæ, aut aquilæ volantis? Sept.

There is somewhat further observable in this, from the Translation of the Seventy, who render it thus, Is there any sign or mark in the way of a Ship, or of an Eagle? So the meaning of Job should be, that his life in respect of former comforts and contentments, was past away, and had left no mark, no sign behind it. The ship in the Sea passeth away, and there is no rode, no tract left; and the Eagle in the air passeth, and you cannot see where the Eagle made her flight, the air closeth presently, there is no way to be seen: Solomon useth those Similies, Prov. 30. 19. There be three things which I know not, the way of an Eagle in the air, the way of a Serpent upon a rock, and the way of a Ship in the Sea: And it is frequent in Authors to express those things which pass away, not leaving any tract or print behind them, by the motion of a Ship in the Sea, and of an Eagle in the Air. Hence note, Quæ nullum sui cursus signum relinquant per avium volatum & navium trãsmissionem significantur. Sanct.

That, The best worldly things when they are gone, are as if they had never been.

There are two motions which will certainly leave a mark behind them: First, Motions in sin. Secondly, In holiness. Every step we tread in the wayes of sin, or of holiness, leaves a print, a remembrance behind it; but when the riches and honours, the pleasures and contentments of this life are past, nothing remains of them. It is said, Dan. 8. 5. (which may serve for the illustration of this place) in the vision of the He-goat, that he touched not the ground; that He-goat was a type of Alexander the Great, who set up the Grecian Empire; and he is compared to a He-goat, which did not touch the ground, because of his speedy conquests. When man or beast runs upon the ground with extream speed, we say, they do not touch the ground. When the Hare leaves a deep tract, the Hunter knows she runs slowly, and is almost spent. Alexander conquered the world sooner then a man could well travel over it. And as Alexander came in, so he passed out, both in his person and posterity; for within a short time no man could tell what was become of the Grecian Monarchy; the conquests of Alexander could not be found, no more then the way of a Ship in the Sea, or of an Eagle in the air, or of a man running so fast, that he leaves no print behind him.

Secondly, Taking both these similitudes in the ordinary notion, as they import the swift passage of Job's prosperity, 'tis questioned, how Job can be excused for speaking thus slightly and undervaluingly of his temporal estate, which was so raised, and so enriched, that he was an eye-sore to the Devil. Satan envied him, because of his abundance: And doth he now make nothing of it? Was it nothing to be the greatest man in the East? Is he not very unthankful for, or very forgetful of the goodness and bounty of God to him? Should he not rather have said, I have had my dayes of prosperity, my worldly comforts, and I enjoyed these a long time?

I answer, Job speaks not this to obscure the favours of God to him, or ungratefully to pass by his blessings; but he answers the objections of his Friends, and maintains the argument he brought against them. His argument was, That the estate of a godly man in this life, is as transitory and as brittle as the estate of a wicked man, and that therefore there can be no distinction made of men by outward dispensations: To clear which, he saith, Look to my good dayes, they are past away swiftly, and there is nothing remaining of them. Hence observe,

That, The outward estate of the best men in the world, is as transitory and fading as that of the worst in the world.

My dayes (saith Job) my comfortable dayes are passed away: Every man at his best estate is altogether vanity, Psal. 39. 5. It is not only a wicked man, whose outward estate is vain, but every mans: David's Crown and Scepter were fading, vanishing flowers. Abraham and all the Patriarchs said (Heb. 11.) We have here no continuing City; neither City nor Citizens have long continuance here. The Apostle (1 Cor. 7. 31.) speaks to the Saints, and bids them take their hearts off from the world, and not to drench or steep their spirits in things here below; why? The fashion of this world passeth away, the fashion of the world in your hands; if you have the world in your hands, the fashion of it will perish there, as soon as in the hands of other men. Do not think that the world is put into an abiding state, or into an unalterable fashion for your sakes. A godly man and a wicked man (though made of the most different fashion) live in a world, and possess worldly things of the same fashion.

Secondly,

Quemadmodum qui navigat, sive flet, sive sedeat, vadit, quia impulsus navis ducitur: ita & nos, sive vigilantes, sive dormientes, sive tacentes, sive loquentes, sive nolentes sive valentes, per momenta temporum quotidie in finem tendimus. Greg.

Secondly, As from the first similitude, so from these we learn how transitory our time is. See how Job multiplies comparisons, That if we will not learn by the first, we might yet be convinced by a second and a third. Go to the Land, see Time upon the spur, in the swift riding Post. Go to the Sea, see Time upon the winds, in the swift-sailing Ships. Go to the Air, see Time upon the wing, in the swift-flying Eagle. These all preach the speedy passage of Time. How sad is it to see men live as if their dayes were Snail-pac'd, not Post-pac'd? As if Time lay alwayes at an Anchor, or were wind-bound, and could not use her Sails? As if it had leaden heels, and not wings, or were bound hand and foot, and could not stir? The Apostles caution is, Redeem the time; and now we have the Apostles argument to enforce it, The dayes are evil. If time go out of your hand, you cannot fetch it back again; there is no Rhetorick can recal it, or Price redeem it. Time is such a commodity, as all the power in the world cannot recover, if lost and let slip. If all the Crowns and Kingdoms of the world should be laid down as a reward for the bringing back of one hour, yea of one moment of time, they could not obtain it. Therefore improve the present time: No time is yours but the present: the time that's gone, comes no more; the time that is to come, may find you gone before it comes; your time is only the present time, and that is past as soon as present.

But not to stay upon that which moveth so swiftly, our dayes and time; I will pass to the other Branch, wherein Job further clears the point in the five following verses.

VERS. 27, 28, 29, 30, 31.

If I say I will forget my complaint, I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort my self;
I am afraid of all my sorrows, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.
If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain?
If I wash my self with Snow-water, and make my hands never so clean;
Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own cloaths shall abhor me.

THese words contain a proof of the latter part of Job's Assumption. He had affirmed, That an innocent and righteous person may quickly lose all his outward comforts; which he illustrated by three similitudes: now he proves that he may be entangled and lime-twigg'd with afflictions beyond hope of escape. This he doth in the twenty seventh, twenty eighth, and twenty ninth verses. Which he amplifies with Hyperbolical strains, in the thirtieth and thirty first verses. The highest Rhetorick of his sorrows being let out, to shew how remediless his sorrows were. If I wash my self with Snow-water, and make my self never so clean; Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own cloaths shall abhor me: Things are ill with me, and I see not which way to mend my self. I am so far from any probability of help by contending and striving with God, that I have no hope of it by washing and cleansing my self. As carnal and earthly succours fail me, so these heavenly and spiritual duties will not succour me. I will give you the sum and substance of these five Verses in a few words together, and then open the Particulars.

The general sence of the Context may be thus conceived; as if Job had said,

I poor man in this condition, study to forget the troubles which are upon me; and laying aside all anger, passion and discontentments with which ye charge me, I labour to refresh and revive my self with hopes of some dawning or near-drawing deliverance; but while I am essaying to do this, my sorrows assault me afresh, and even overwhelm my Infant-hopes, my beginning, budding comforts, with mighty terrors; so that now I even despair of recovery out of the hand of my affliction, and am perswaded that I shall not only not be delivered that I may appear or be accounted pure and innocent, but if continued afflictions be an argument of wickedness (as you affirm) I shall have the bonds of my present troubles so fastened upon me, and such new ones, it may be, stronger ones, added, than I shall still look in your eyes, and viewed in the glass of your opinion, like a wicked man; Wherefore then should I deceive my self with hopes that I shall be delivered? Or that God will awake for me, and make the habitation of my righteousness prosperous? Whenas I believe and am very confident that how pure and righteous soever I am, or (by further washing and cleansing, believing and repenting) shall appear to be, yet the Lord hath an intent to try me further, even to the uttermost; and will cast me into the ditch, mire and dirt of further afflictions; so that they who make up their judgments by your rule, though they were as near to me as the cloaths upon my back, must yet abhor and loath me (as ye my Friends now do) as a wicked person. He seems to speak as the Apostle doth, 1 Cor. 4. 9. I think that God hath set forth us the Apostles last, as it were men appointed unto death, for we are made a spectacle to the world, and to Angels, and to men.

This is the sum and general sence of these five Verses. The words are full of difficulty, and there is much variety of judgment about them; but I hope in the close to make out a sence upon every particular, which shall be matching and suitable with this which hath been given in general.

If I say, I will forget my complaint.

If I say.] In this Job answereth directly to the charge of Bildad at the eighth Chapter, vers. 2. How long wilt thou speak these things, and shall thy words be like an East-wind? To which Job answers Bildad, If I should cease speaking (as thou seemest to chide me into silence) If I should say, I will not complain any more, I will give over these mournful discourses, and bite in my strongest pains, What then? Will the event prove what thou hast promised? Surely no, I am afraid of all my sorrows, and almost assured that they will return upon me If I say, I will forget my complaint.

I will forget.

The word which we render [forget.] may signifie a threefold forgetfulness.

שכחה Est oblivisci ut זכר Recordari cum cura & diligentia.

First, Forgetfulness coming from the neglect of our natural abilities; when we are careless and take no heed to remember.

Secondly, Forgetfulness arising from the weakness of our natural abilities; when though we are careful, yet we cannot remember.

But Job means neither of these, he intends a third kind of forgetfulness, even a studied and affected forgetfulness; when how able soever we are, yet we will not, or would not remember. If I say, I will forget my complaint; that is, If I purposely set my self, or labour to forget my sorrows, yet I cannot get off their remembrance. As the Hebrew (Zachar) signifies not only the natural act of memory, but diligence in remembring; so doth the Hebrew (Sachah) to forget. It is sometimes as hard a work to forget, as it is at any time to remember. How do the damned in hell strive to forget their pains and complaints? They would count it a happiness, if they could put their misery out of mind and memory one hour; but they cannot. And they can no more forget what they have felt, then not be sensible of what they feel: If I say, I will forget

My complaint.

שיח Sapit hoc verbum meditabundum quendā fermonem, & anxium intellectus vocisq; discursum. Miseriæ memoriam omnem deponam. Drus.

The word notes Meditation; and here, a mournful Meditation, a breathing forth in mournful expressions. The same word is used, chap. 7. 13. When I say my Bed shall comfort me, and my Couch shall ease my Complaint (or, my mournful meditation) then thou scarest me with dreams. So then Job's meaning is, If I should set my self with greatest intention to forget, that is, to lay aside the thought of my troubles and sorrows, and say, I will leave off my heaviness, and complain no more, I will not pore upon my afflictions, but resolve to be above them; yet it will not be. I find no ease; Forgetfulness is a medicine for some diseases and pains, but I find no cure, no remedy that way for mine. Hence observe,

There are some things which man can very hardly forget, or get out of his mind.

We may study their forgetfulness, and yet not be able to forget them. And they are of two sorts. First, Worldly pleasures. Secondly, Worldly sorrows. These will not fail to mind us. We need the art, or rather the grace of forgetfulness, to lay these aside. And there are two things which we are slow to remember. First. Our own Duties. And secondly, The Mercies of God. About these we need the art, or rather the grace of memory. And usually they who have most neglected to remember duty, are most afflicted with the constrained remembrance of their own sorrow. And they shall not be able at all to forget the wrath of God, who would not remember the mercies of God. If I say I will forget my Complaint,

I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort my self.

פני Notat faciem, iram etiam & tristitiam.

Leave off my heaviness.] The Hebrew word for word is, I will lay aside my face; for that which strictly, and in the Letter of that Language, signifies the face or countenance of a man, doth also signifie, First, Anger and wrath; Secondly, Sorrow and heaviness. 'Tis put for anger, Psal. 34. 16. The face (or anger) of the Lord is against such as do evil. So (Lam. 4. 16. Levit. 17. 10.) I will set my face, that is, I will shew my anger, and manifest my displeasure against them.

And the reason why that word which signifies the countenance or face, signifies also anger and wrath, sorrow and heaviness, is, because both anger and sorrow break forth in the face. If a man be very angry, you shall see his anger scribled in the uneven character of his countenance: If a man be very heavy and sorrowful, you shall see the lines of sorrow drawn in his face. Therefore it is said of Hannah (1 Sam. 1. 18.) When she received a refreshing and a reviving answer from the Lord in prayer (the poor soul sate drooping and mourning, as much as praying, but as soon as she had a hint of audience and acceptance, it is said) She went away and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad; the sadness of her heart appeared no more in her countenance, there was fair weather in her face, and Sun-shine in her forehead, the rain and showers of her tears were blown over and dried up. As in some sinners, The shew of their countenance doth testifie against them (Isa. 3. 9.) that is, they are so grosly wicked, that you may see sin in their faces; whereas others can keep sin close enough in their hearts, they can keep the disease in, and shut themselves up, when they are sick of the plague in their hearts (1 Kings 8.) Nothing but holiness is discernable in the face of their conversation, when nothing but rottenness and corruption lies at the bottom of their spirits. But as the corruption of many a mans heart breaks forth in botches upon the face of his actions, and the rottenness of his spirit blisters upon his tongue in unsavoury speeches; so those passions and affections of the heart, joy and sorrow, anger and heaviness appear in the face, and we may read the distempers of the heart in the disguisedness of a look. The face is the Index of the heart, that tells you how things go within. Therefore Job saith, If I leave off my face, meaning, as we translate, If I leave off my heaviness, which is so evident in my face, or which is as easie to be seen as my face: If I resolve to appear chearful and merry, and will not let clouds darken my countenance any longer, yet, &c. The face is put generally for the appearance or outside of any thing; as we say, the face of the earth, the face of the heavens, the face of the Church or Common-wealth. So that, To leave off heaviness or the face, is to leave off all shew of heaviness. As Joseph left off his tears of joy, (Gen. 43. 30, 31.) who, having eased his heart of his joyful sorrows, by weeping secretly in his Chamber, washed his face, went out and refrained himself. Thus Job would have washed his mournful tears from his face, he attempted to refrain himself; but he could not, his sorrows were too strong for him; and as he could not remove so he could not dissemble them. For this leaving off, is to be taken as the precedent act of forgetting, for an affected, resolved laying aside. If I make it my business to be chearful and leave off my heaviness, yet, &c. Hence observe,

Cordis index vultus, totusque homo est in facie. Nomen faciei in Scriptura significat externum habitum, sicut facies terræ, cœli, reipu. Bold. Latina vox facies significat non solum os, oculos, genas, sed formam omnem, modum & faciem totius corporis, à faciendo dictam. Aul. Gel.

Sorrow is not easily shaken off.

Sorrow sticks close. It is very hard for a man to play the hypocrite with his sorrow, or dissemble the sadness of his heart, but is far harder to be really delivered of it. Sorrow is a companion that will not be cast off with a word. A man may more easily cover his sin then his sorrow. Many can put a vizard of holiness upon their faces, when nothing but wickedness is in their hearts; but it is not easie to make a shew of comfort, when nothing but sorrow is in the heart. Grief will out. Heaviness in the heart is like the Ointment in the right hand, of which Solomon speaks (Prov. 27. 16.) That it bewrayeth it self. One said of a merry Atheist, He laugheth to thee and to me, that is, he seems to laugh, but he mourns to himself, the mans heart is heavy. If it be not so, yet it may be so with all wicked men, when they are merriest in the face, they have reason to have sorrow even unto death in their hearts: It is a hard thing (I say) to put sorrow out of the face, much more to get it out of the heart; when it is lodged there once, it will not soon be dispossessed. The Apostle (Heb. 12. 1.) exhorts, To lay aside every weight, and to cast off the sin that doth so easily beset us; he means it of the sin of nature, which we bear about us; this sin (saith he) doth easily beset us; but let us cast it off, that is, let us study and strive to lay aside this heaviness of sin, which is the truest cause of the heaviness of sorrow. One would think that a man needs not much perswasion, when he hath a heavy burden upon his shoulders, to lay it aside; yet (so it is) man can hardly be perswaded to lay aside this burden; and it is the business we have with your souls every day, to perswade you to lay it aside: It is a weight that easily besets us. Now as we need much exhortation to cast off the weight of this sin, which is so pleasing, so also of sorrow, though it be unpleasant. When sorrow besets us, it leaves us without ease; but sorrow easily besets us. Job found it a hard task to lay aside his burden. Because his Friends thought he fed too much upon his afflictions, therefore he tried what he could do, but it would not do. If I say, I will leave off my heaviness, I will comfort my self, &c. See the issue by and by.

I will comfort my self.

Comfort is the very life of our lives, the Spring of our Year, the Light of our Day, the Sun in our Firmament, the complement of mercy; and therefore Christ gives his Church the sum of all mercy, in that one promise of sending the Comforter. The Hebrew word signifies to strengthen, because when a man is cast down with sorrows, his spirit is weakened: Comfort is the repair of strength. If I say, I will comfort, that is, corroborate and strengthen my self (Psal. 39. 13.) O spare me (saith David) that I may recover my strength; or, that I may a little comfort my self: The Septuagint renders it, That I may get my life again; that I may be enlivened, and re-insouled, or fetch back my soul again. Here, if I say I will comfort my self, take heart at grass (as we say) and play the man, then my sorrows renew upon me.

כלן Roboravit, confortavit, vires collegit. Sept. ἀναλύσω.

But some may object; How is it that Job takes upon him to comfort himself? Is it any wonder if Job come short of comfort, when he went to himself for comfort?

Comfort is not a commodity to be found in the hand or power of any creature; the great God hath all in his own hand; if any man will have comfort, he must trade to heaven for it. It is the honour of God to be called, The God of all comfort (2 Cor. 1. 3.) that is, the God who hath all comfort at his dispose. As some Kings have a denomination from the great staple-commodities of their Kingdoms. Our King is called, The King of the Wool, because Wool is the chief commodity, and more plentiful here then in any Countrey of the world. Another is called, King of the Wines; and another of the Flax. Comfort is the Staple-Commodity of Heaven; and God is called, The God of all comfort, not only because the chiefest and best comforts are in his hand, but because there is not the least imaginable comfort to be had out of his hand. He hath the monopoly of comfort, or rather the sole gift of comfort. We can trouble and perplex our selves, but God only can comfort us. And he is the God of all comfort, of all sorts and of all degrees of comfort: the God, not only of spiritual, tual, but of worldly comfort; of temporal comfort, as well as of eternal. As the joyes of the Holy Ghoſt are in his hand, ſo are the joyes of civil relations; the joy of meat and drink, the joy of riches and honour are in his hand alſo; How then ſaith Job, I will lay aſide my heavineſs, I will comfort my ſelf? It is a hard thing to comfort others (Luther ſaid, It is as eaſie a work to raiſe the dead, as to comfort the conſcience) but it is harder for a man to comfort himſelf. Eliphaz gave teſtimony to Job in (Chap. 4. v. 3, 4.) that he had upholden him that was falling, and had ſtrengthened the feeble knees. But now it is come upon thee, and thou fainteſt, it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. Thou, who haſt holpen others, canſt not help thy ſelf. Yet here Job was upon a reſolve to comfort himſelf.

I anſwer, Though it be a truth, that no man is able to comfort himſelf, no more then he can convert himſelf; and that a man is no more able to change his heart from ſorrow to joy, then he is able to change his heart from ſin to grace; yet a man may attempt or aſſay, he may uſe means to comfort himſelf. When Job ſaith, I will comfort my ſelf; the meaning is, I will do the utmoſt I can, I will not be behind in my endeavours, I will take the beſt courſe, and improve all opportunities to get out of theſe dumps, whoſoever will preſcribe me a way, or direct me to a remedy of theſe ſorrows, I will ſubmit to it; I will comfort my ſelf. From whence note,

That, What a man really endeavoureth to do, that he may be ſaid do.

I will comfort my ſelf; Why? Becauſe though he were not able to attain ſuch an end; Joy and comfort lieth beyond the line of the creature, yet he reached at it, he attempted and aſſayed all means to comfort himſelf. Thus the ſalvation of a man is aſcribed to himſelf; A man is ſaid to ſave himſelf, though ſalvation belongeth to the Lord, even temporal ſalvation, but eſpecially eternal ſalvation; yet, a man may be ſaid to ſave himſelf: As the Apoſtle exhorts Timothy (1 Epiſt. 4. 16.) to walk by a holy rule, to ſettle himſelf in his ſtudies, to read the Scriptures, and to meditate in them, to be faithful in diſpenſing of the Goſpel, aſſuring him, If thou doeſt theſe things, thou ſhalt both ſave thy ſelf, and them that hear thee; ſave thy ſelf. No man can be his own Saviour, he may be as well his own Creator; Timothy was thus encouraged, becauſe in ſo doing, he did all that a man ought, who expects ſalvation. That was the way to, though not the cauſe of ſalvation. Salvation is all Chriſts; yet he who doth his beſt to ſave himſelf, may be ſaid to ſave himſelf. Thus alſo a man comforts himſelf, converts himſelf, inſtructs himſelf, when he putteth himſelf out to the utmoſt of gifts, graces, and opportunities to do or attain duties and bleſſings. No man (ſaith the Prophet) doth ſtir himſelf up to take hold of the Lord. The word in the Prophet, ſignifies, to awake, or to watch; no man wakes or watches his opportunity to take hold of the Lord. It notes alſo that action of old birds, who flutter with their wings, and beat up their young ones, to urge and provoke them to uſe their wings, and flie abroad. Thus he complained, becauſe the lazy, dull-hearted Jews did not raiſe up and waken their hearts to do what they could, though to do it was more then they could.

Secondly, Obſerve, That a man in affliction may help on his comforts or his ſorrows.

I will comfort my ſelf, I will leave off my heavineſs. Some add to their afflictions, and are active to aggravate and increaſe them: they make their night darker, and obſcure the light of counſel that is brought unto them: they joyn with Satan their enemy, and by the black melancholy vapors of their own hearts, ſtifle the conſolations that are adminiſtred them by faithful friends. Like Rachel (Jer. 31.) they refuſe to be comforted; when reviving Cordials are offered, they ſpill them upon the ground, and will not take in a drop: they are ſo far from comforting themſelves, that they will not receive comfort from others. The Prophet ſeems to be reſolved upon the point, he would go on in ſorrows; Look away from me, I will weep bitterly, labour not to comfort me (Iſa. 22. 4.) As ſometimes a man under great affliction beſpeaks comfort from others: O, I am in a ſad caſe, come, comfort me, ſhew me how I may get eaſe from theſe ſorrows. Many beg prayers, and ſend bills of their afflictions, deſiring to have them ſpread before the Lord in the Congregation, that ſome comfort may be dropt from Heaven into their diſeaſed bodies, or wounded ſpirits. Others ſlight prayers, and care not to be comforted, as if it were an eaſe for them to mourn, and a refreſhing to be in heavineſs. There is a twofold ground, upon which comforts are thus put off.

First, Some put off their comforts upon ſullenneſs of Spirit; black and dark ſpirits love to bathe themſelves in ſorrow. Sorrow is the bath of drooping ſpirits, and it is Satans bath too; Melancholly is commonly called, The Devils bath; he takes delight to waſh in the ſtreams of our unneceſſary tears. Sorrow for ſin puts the Devil to the greateſt ſorrow. Godly grief is a grief to Satan: but he delighteth in our worldly ſorrows, as the Devil may be delighted: if he have delight in any thing, this is one thing he delights in, our forbidden ſorrows. Some ſorrows are as much forbidden as any pleaſures. The Devil is as much pleaſed with our unlawful ſorrows, as he is with our unlawful pleaſures. And he labours as much to make us pleaſed with them.

Secondly, Others help on their own ſorrows, and leſſen their comforts through forgetfulneſs or ignorance; they (as the Apoſtle chides the Hebrews, Chap. 12. 5.) have forgotten the exhortation, which ſpeaks unto them as unto children. Now, as wicked men rejoyce, becauſe they forget or know not their ill condition: So godly men are, when they forget or know not how good their condition is. Yet Job ſuppoſes the review of his good eſtate, would neither check his ſorrows, nor eſtabliſh his peace; If I ſay, I will forget my complaint, I will comfort my ſelf, I am afraid of all my ſorrows.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Man is not able to comfort himſelf.

We can make our ſelves croſſes, but we cannot make our ſelves comforts. A man may ſay, as Job did (Chap. 7 13.) to his bed, comfort me; or to his riches, comfort me; or to his wine and good chear, comfort me; or to his friends, comfort me: He may ſay to all outward acts of pleaſure, to merry company, and muſick, comfort me; Yea a Saint may ſay to his graces and holineſs, comfort me; and yet none of theſe can comfort him, or, they comfort him in vain. To ſeek comfort any where but in Chriſt, is to ſeek the living among the dead. Chriſt is comfort cloathed in our fleſh, and he is the comfort of our ſpirits. Till he gives comfort, every man muſt conclude as Job, I am afraid of all my ſorrows.

I am afraid. The word ſignifies ſtrong trembling and ſhaking fear.

Of all my ſorrows. The root hath a double ſignification. First, To afflict with grief (Iſa. 63. 10.) They vexed his holy Spirit. Secondly, To faſhion or form a thing (Job 10. 8.) Thy hands have made me, and faſhioned me round about. The ſame word by a Metaphor ſignifies both to grieve and to faſhion, to vex and to form, becauſe a man that forms and faſhions a piece of wood or ſtone, ſeems to put it to pain by cutting and hewing. And he that forms wax, vexes and chafes it in his hands. Thus I ſay, becauſe in the faſhioning of a thing a man doth bruiſe, cut, and (as it were) put it to pain; therefore the ſame word ſignifies both to vex or grieve, and to form, or faſhion. And this word is applied unto the ill uſage of words (Pſal. 56. 5.) Every day (ſaith David, ſpeaking of his enemies) they wreſt my words; or they put my words to pain and grief, or they painfully and grievouſly wreſt my words. David's enemies took up what he ſpake, and put a new ſhape upon it, and this they did ſo vexingly, that they are ſaid to wreſt his words; a thing is vexed when it is wreſted, or wrought quite out of the form it before had. The ſame Metaphor the Apoſtle Peter uſeth in reference to Doctrine, 2 Pet. 3. 16. ſpeaking of the Epiſtles of Paul, in which are ſome things hard to be underſtood, which they that are unlearned and unſtable, wreſt, or put upon the rack; they painfully form his words, and repreſent them in a meaning which he never intended. What is ſpoken may be right, both in the matter and intendment of the ſpeaker, yet another wreſts, forms, and faſhions it in his own mould, and makes it bear a ſence which the ſpeaker never dream'd of.

In this Text we have the Noun only, which importeth either the labour or pains, which a man taketh, or the pain and grief, which a man feeleth. Hence in the Hebrew this word ſignifies an Idol, and both acceptions fall into the reaſon of it.

Firſt, Becauſe Idols are made, faſhioned and formed up curiouſly, with a great deal of art and labour: the wax, or clay, or ſtone is put to pain; you muſt cut it and carve it to make an Idol.

Secondly, Becauſe Idols are ſerved, attended and worſhipped with much pain and grief. Falſe worſhip, or the worſhip of Idols, is alwayes more ſervile and painful then true worſhip is. Falſe worſhip is a painful ſervice, a ſervile ſervice, a toil rather then a worſhip; but the ſervice of the true and everliving God, is an holy, an ingenuous, a noble and honourable ſervice. Idols are troubleſom, both in their making, and in their worſhipping. From this two-fold interpretation of the word, I find a two-fold tranſlation given.

Verbar omnia opera mea. Vul.

Firſt, Thus, I am afraid of all my works, as if Job, having a deſign to comfort himſelf in a reflexion upon his good works, and former holy walkings, feared they would not ſerve his turn or bear up his ſpirit in the evil day, which was come upon him. As if he had ſaid; I have lived as exactly by the rule of the Word as I could; I have had reſpect to all the Commandments of God, that I might not ſin againſt him. Yet I am afraid of all my works, the anger of God will ſurely ſoak thorow them all, or find holes and breaches in them to come in upon me at.

Thus he is conceived reaſoning with himſelf. But doubtleſs it was not Job's meaning to look to the innocency or holineſs of his life paſt, as the ground of his preſent comfort; he that would do ſo, may juſtly be afraid of all his works. When we ſee the beſt of our ſelves, we have more reaſon to be afraid, then to be comforted. As we muſt work out our ſalvation with fear and trembling: ſo we have cauſe to fear and tremble at our works.

But rather as we tranſlate, I am afraid of all my ſorrows; that is, I no ſooner endeavour to comfort my ſelf, but preſently my ſorrows throng about me, they appear before my face, and make ſuch a gaſtly apparition, that I am afraid. Sorrows charge and aſſault me afreſh, when I am purpoſing to make an eſcape from the hands of ſorrow. When I think of leaving of my heavineſs, or of getting out of the ſight of it, ſorrows come upon me with greater violence then before. While a priſoner is quiet and content with his reſtraint, the Keeper layes no great reſtraint upon him; but if he perceive him meditating an eſcape, or attempting to break priſon, and ſet himſelf at liberty, preſently more irons are clapt upon him, and an advantage taken even to load him with chains. Such hard uſage this poor priſoner feared at the hand of his ſorrows, If I ſay, I will leave off my heavineſs, I will throw off my bolts and fetters, and get out of theſe troubles, I am afraid of all my ſorrows; I ſhall have all the Keepers and Jailers about me, they will lay more load upon me, and watch me more ſtrictly then before: You tell me I am in love with my ſorrows, but the truth is, fears of ſorrow incompaſs me round about, I am afraid of all my ſorrows.

Note hence this general truth,

Firſt, That affliction is the matter of fear.

Natural fears ariſes from the apprehenſion of ſome approaching evil; and as fear grows more boiſterous and inordinate, ſo it repreſents us with ſadder (though but ſuppoſed) evils.

Secondly obſerve, A godly man may be much oppreſt with the fear of afflictions.

When I would comfort my ſelf, I am afraid of all my ſorrows: It is terrible to me to think that they ſtill encreaſe upon me, and that whileſt I hope to eſcape, I am more enſnared. Chriſt himſelf, when he was in our nature, and clothed with our fleſh, was afraid of all his ſorrows: he was a man of ſorrows, and he was afraid of his ſorrows too, Matth. 26.38. He ſaid, My ſoul is exceeding ſorrowful even unto death; and he offered up prayers and ſupplications with ſtrong cryes and tears unto him that was able to ſave him from death, and was heard in that he feared (Heb. 5.) His were extraordinary ſorrows indeed, ſuch as no creature ever felt or taſted. The Cup of ſorrow which he drank was mixed and tempered with all our ſorrows, and with the cauſe of them, our ſins. This was it he feared, being in our nature; though as that nature was hypoſtatically united unto the divine nature, it had infinitely more power to bear all thoſe ſorrows, then we have in our nature to bear the leaſt ſorrow. Now if Chriſt himſelf in our fleſh was afraid of his ſorrows, which yet he knew he ſhould overcome, how much more may the fear of ſorrows overcome us, while we are in the fleſh?

Laſtly obſerve, That the fear of afflictions aſſaults and oppreſſes ſome moſt, when they ſet themſelves moſt to conquer and overcome them.

I, ſaith Job, would comfort my ſelf, but I am afraid of all my ſorrows; I fear they will be doubled and trebled upon me, therefore I had rather ſit ſtill, then, by ſtriving to unlooſe, ſtraiten the cords of my affliction faſter upon me. The next clauſe ſeems to hint this as a reaſon, why his ſorrows hung ſo cloſe upon him.

I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.

But how did Job know this? As God ſaid to Adam, (Gen. 3.11.) Who told thee that thou waſt naked! So I may ſay to Job, Who told thee that God would not hold thee innocent? Or, where hadſt thou this aſſurance of thy condemnation? The Saints may know, or be aſſured that God will pardon them; but a wicked man cannot know or be aſſured that God will not. This knowledge of Job was but a ſuſpition, or at the moſt a conjecture. And the giving out of this conjecture was but the language of his fear, his faith could ſay no ſuch thing, for God had no where ſaid it, The beſt men ſpeak ſometime from their worſer part. Their graces may be ſilent a while, and leave corruption to have all the talk. When the fleſh is under great pain, the ſpirit is hindered from acting its part, and then ſence gets the maſtery over faith. Had it not been upon ſuch a diſadvantage, Job had never offended with his tongue, by ſaying he knew what he could not know.

I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.] The word which we tranſlate innocent, cometh from a root which ſignifieth pure and clean, and in the Verb to cleanſe, and make pure: And becauſe innocency is the purity or cleanneſs of a perſon, therefore the ſame word ſignifies to cleanſe, and to hold or make innocent: In which ſence it is uſed frequently, Exod. 20. Thou wilt not hold him guiltleſs (or innocent) that taketh thy Name in vain. The counſel that David gave upon his death-bed unto Solomon concerning Joab, was, Therefore hold thou him not innocent, or guiltleſs (1 King. 2. 9.) that is, let the blood which he hath ſhed be upon him, let his honour and his name continue ſtained and blemiſhed in thy thoughts and judgment, Hold him not innocent.

Here the Queſtion is, To what Antecedent we are to refer the Relative Thou, I know thou wilt not hold me innocent; Thou, who?

There are two opinions about it. Some refer it to God, and ſome to Bildad, to whom Job maketh anſwer in this place.

Adverſus illud quod amici ſtatuunt, probos, videlicet etiam caſtigatos nunquam ſuccidi, hoc pro certo ſtatuã ô Deus, nunquam eſſe me ab iſtis quibus totus ſcateo fœdiſſimis ulceribus ac vermibus repurgandum. Bez.

They that refer it unto God, make out the ſence thus, Either, firſt, taking the word properly for cleanſing and healing the ſores and wounds which were upon his body; I know thou wilt not cleanſe my body from this filthineſs, from theſe diſeaſes that now annoy me: And ſo it is an anſwer to the words of Bildad, telling Job, that in caſe he ſought unto God, and humbled himſelf before him, he would awaken for him, and remove thoſe judgments. No, ſaith Job, when I think of eaſe and deliverence, all my fears return upon me, and I know God will not yet cleanſe, eaſe or deliver me from them.

Novi quod non ſit me liberum dimiſſurus, Coc.

Again, Taking it tropically (as we render it) for a judicial cleanſing or purification; ſo, Thou wilt not hold me innocent, is as much as this, Lord, ſuch ſorrows and troubles are upon me, that I fear thou wilt not declare, or pronounce, or give teſtimony concerning me to the world, that I am an innocent perſon. Becauſe the ſores and troubles upon him, were as an evidence againſt him in the judgement of his friends, that he was a wicked perſon, therefore (ſaith he) Lord, I am afraid, Thou wilt not hold me, that is, Thou wilt not declare me to be innocent by taking away away these evils, that so this opinion of my friends concerning me may be removed or confuted. From this sence Note,

Non mundadabis, i. e. parum, justum, vel etiam innocentem non declarabis.

First, That even a godly man in deep afflictions may have misgiving thoughts of God.

The soul mis-gives sometimes about the pardon of sin, and is even swallowed up with despair, concluding, I know God will not hold me innocent; he will not be reconciled unto me, or blot out my transgression.

But especially (which is rather the mind of Job) the soul misgives about release from punishment. Some being hamper'd in the bands of affliction, conclude, God will never let them loose, or set them at liberty again. Such a conclusion David's unbelief made against himself, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul (1 Sam. 27. 1.) When Jonah was cast into the deep, in the midst of the Seas, when the flouds encompassed him, and all the billows and waves passed over him, then he said (Chap. 2. 4.) I am cast out of the sight of thine eyes. Indeed Jonah began to recover quickly, his next words being a breath of faith, Yet I will look again toward thy holy Temple.

Secondly observe, That until fear of guilt be removed, fear of trouble will not remove.

Job was not very clear about the pardon of his sins, somewhat stuck upon his spirit, while he was under the clouds and darkness of this temptation; therefore, saith he, I am afraid of all my sorrows. Till the soul is setled in the matter of pardon, or freedom from guilt, it can never be setled about freedom from punishment. Hence the Apostle (Heb. 2. 10, 15.) speaking of the Saints before the coming of Christ, calls Christ, the Captain of our salvation, and assures us, he took flesh, that through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil, and deliver those who through fear of death, were all their life time subject unto bondage. The language is very near this of the Text, I am afraid of all my sorrows. As Job was in bondage under his affliction through the fear of his returning sorrows, So, they were all their life time subject unto bondage through the fear of approaching death. All the Saints before the coming of Christ, were under such a bondage: for the Apostle speaks as of a general state, That he might deliver those, who through the fear of death, were all their life time subject unto bondage. The reason hereof, was, because they had not so manifest and convincing a light concerning the pardon of sin, the freeness of grace, and the abundance of that mercy which was brought in afterwards, and revealed by Jesus Christ, when he actually made our atonement by the blood of his cross: For howsoever it is undeniable, that the faithful under the Old Testament, had knowledge of that satisfaction which was to be made by the Mediator for the removing of sin, and the taking away of guilt (every sacrifice spake this, shewing that there was an atonement to be made by some other blood, which the blood of the sacrifice typified) yet notwithstanding there was not a clearing and a quieting of their hearts, because Christ (though in the promise slain from the beginning of the world) was not actually slain, nor offered up for sinners. The Apostle (Heb. 10. 1, 2.) argues upon the same point, That the Law, with those Sacrifices, could not make the comers thereunto perfect, that is, it could not assure the heart that sin was taken away, for if it could, then (saith he) the sacrifices should not have needed to be offered up so often. What needed any repetition, seeing they who were once so purged should have had no more conscience of sin, that is, sin should never have troubled and vexed their consciences any more? But now Christ by one offering hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified (vers. 14.) that is, he hath made a perfect satisfaction for them; and compleated the peace of their consciences. So then, while there remaineth any scruple about sin, fears of evil will hang upon the spirit. And we find that the old Saints were very fearful of outward afflictions, because they had as it were a relish or taste of the disfavour and displeasure of God in them. And in proportion, as any of them had more or less of free grace appearing to them, so they were more or less enthralled with these fears. We may observe throughout the Old Testament, that there was not such a spirit of rejoycing in sufferings and afflictions, as we find breakings forth in the New: Paul never saith, I am afraid of all my sorrows; No, he saith, As sorrowful, yet alwayes rejoycing. You never hear him complain of his afflictions. He indeed complains of his corruptions, O miserable man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death! But he never said, O miserable man, how am I afflicted, I am in deaths often, who shall deliver me from this death of the body! We find the Saints under the Gospel clothed with a spirit of exultation and rejoycing, of which we hear little, if any thing at all under the Law: The want of which we are to ascribe to their want of a clear light about the removing of guilt, and the pardon of sin, I know thou wilt not hold me innocent.

Thirdly observe, That God often deals with his best servants, in regard of outward troubles, as if they were guilty.

I know thou wilt not hold me innocent; that is, thou wilt not deal with me as with an innocent person. As the Lord dealt with his Son, so he deals with his servants. God the Father dealt with Jesus Christ as with a guilty person (Isa. 53. 9, 12.) He was numbred among transgressors, and made his grave with the wicked. The Lord reckoned him as a sinner, while he was satisfying his justice for sin, and making an atonement for sinners. Job is no where called a type of Christ, but he was like him, and their parallel might be drawn in many things, especially in this, that both were numbred with the wicked, and in that both were used, as if they had been guilty. The dispensations of God to his own beloved Son once did, and to his faithful servants often do look like those to the greatest transgressors. His son was handled so that he might redeem sinners; his servants are so handled, sometimes to prevent, often to purge them from sin; sometimes to try their graces, alwayes to make them fitter vessels for glory. Though we cannot make any earnings toward glory by the weightiest afflictions, yet these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

I shall pass from this reference of the word, Thou, when I have briefly vindicated the Text from the corruptions of some Papists, who urge it to prove the uncertainty of our justification. Job (say they) doubted whether God would declare him just or no. I answer, Justified persons may have doubts, yet that doth not argue the uncertainty of justification. Justification is a sure act in it self, and we may be sure of it, though some are unsetled about it. This Scripture gives no shelter, much less support to that doctrine of doubting. The Vulgar reading, grosly varying from the original, is all the shadow it hath in this place. For as that Translator mistakes the former clause, which he renders, I am afraid of all my works: So this latter, which he renders, Knowing that thou wilt not pardon or spare him that offendeth. He that seeks to be justified by his works, shall not want fears about his justification: And if this be a truth, which their translation seems to hold forth, that God will not pardon him that offendeth, the best and holiest men in the world have reason, not only to fear whether they are justified, but to resolve they can never be justified in his sight. If every man that sinneth must doubt of the pardon of sin, all men must doubt. In that common acception of the word offend, it is false, that God will not pardon him that offends: whom should he pardon but such as offend? They who are above sin, are above pardon. Job never thought God would not pardon him, because he had sinned, it being one of the royal titles of God, The God pardoning iniquity, transgression and sin. But if we take sinning or offending in a stricter sence, as it imports a man obstinate and still engaged with delight to sin (in which sence the next title of the Lords great name, after, Forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, is to be understood, and that will by no means clear the guilty (Exod. 34. 7.) The Hebrew is, And that clearing will not clear. We supply the word guilty; which the Chaldee well explains by this Periphrasis, Him that will not convert, or turn to the Lord) such offenders the Lord will not pardon. But to say that the Lord will not spare and pardon such guilty persons, such delinquents as will not return unto him, but go on to add one wickedness to another, is no denial of the Saints assurance of pardon, they being already turned and converted to the Lord. So much much for that clause, as the antecedent refers unto God, I know thou wilt not hold me innocent.

Bellarm. l. 5. de justific. cap. 5.

Sciens quòd non parceret delinquentis Vulg.

But rather take the Antecedent to be Bildad. I know, thou Bildad, wilt not hold me innocent; as if Job had said, When I think of comforting my self, my wounds bleed afresh, and my sorrows present themselves to my thoughts again, by the sight of which I am assured I shall not be judged innocent by thee, but rather more wicked, as my sorrows appear to be more; for seeing thou art resolved to conclude the multitude of my sins from the multitude of my suffering, in vain shall I labour to shew and approve my self as an innocent person before thee, whenas I shall still be an afflicted person before thee: I know thou canst not hold me innocent, while abiding afflictions leads thy judgment to conclude that a man is wicked. How shall I being in trouble, gain any credit of integrity in thy opinion, so long as outward troubles render me a hypocrite in thy opinion?

In vanum laborabo ut ostendam tibi afflictum simul & innocentem me esse posse. Bold.

I shall only note this from it,

He that judgeth of a mans innocency by his outward estate, may for ever condemn an innocent,

Bildad judged so of Job, this caused Job to say, I know thou wilt not hold me innocent, or think me good, seeing evils are still upon me, and are like to continue upon me still. Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment, is the rule of Christ (John 7.24.) As if they could hardly judge what is right, who judge by what appears. We must not judge of things till they appear; nor may we judge of persons by their appearance. As oftentimes in holiness, so sometime in sinfulness, men are not what they seem to be. All is not Gold that glisters, and some Gold doth not glister. Many are not that in holiness which they seem to be by their actings toward God, and some are not in sinfulness what they seem to be by Gods acting toward them. It is easier to do do good then to be good; and usually they who are good, suffer that which is evil.

Verse 29. If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain?

These words may be connected with either of the interpretations given upon the former verse, I know, thou (O God) or thou (O Bildad) wilt not hold me innocent. Now then,

If I be wicked, &c.

אנכי ארשע Ego impius. Impius hoc loco non qui sit, sed qui ut improbus tractetur, vel qui impius videatur, & liquet Jobum suis amicis impium fuisse visum ut qui in hoc Christum præferret, qui cum impiis reputatus fuit. Fr Joh.

The original word hath been heretofore opened. Only note, that the Hebrew is absolute, and not by way of supposition; plainly thus, I am wicked, or, I shall be accounted wicked, why therefore labour I in vain? Or, now therefore I labour in vain. When Job saith, I am wicked, it is not as if he gave the cause, and assented to his friend; Ye have as had an ill opinion of me all this while, now I begin to have ill an opinion of my self, I am wicked. No, he means it only thus, I am handled or accounted as a wicked man; I am wicked in your thoughts, and the providence of God seems to give you occasion of thinking so; ye look upon me as if I were a wicked man, and I look like one; Why then labour I in vain?

Why labour I in vain?

The word signifies hardest labour? why do I travel so painfully to vindicate my self, and to stand fair in your eyes? It is labouring with toil, or moiling labour, answerable to that Greek word (κοπιάω) which signifies sore and extream labour. It is too much to bestow any labour in vain (that is, without fruit and success) much more to bestow hard and sore labour.

But what was this sore, hard and painful labour? He means all those labours which he bestowed, either to extricate himself from his sufferings, or to clear himself from their prejudice of his sinfulness, because he suffered: As if he had said in particulars,

Why do I labour in Apologues to excuse my self? Or in Arguments defend my cause? Why do I labour in prayer to deprecate these troubles, and get out of the bands of my afflictions? Pleading for our selves with men, is hard labour; but especially pleading for our selves with God. Prayer is strong labour, therefore it is called wrestling. Bildad advised Job to pray unto God, in the eighth Chapter: here Job seems to answer, Why labour I in prayer, and in seeking unto God, seeing all's in vain and lost labour? to what end should I labour in any of these duties? for I am wicked (in the opinion of man) or, if I am wicked in the sight of God, or seeing God hath cast me into such a condition, as appearingly and visibly casts me among the wicked?

For the better understanding of this, we may consider the words as an argument by way of Dilemma, If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain? If I wash my self with snow-water, &c. As if he had said, Either I am wicked, or I am clean and pure; if I am wicked (as you say I am) I deserve more punishment, then I labour in vain to be eased of this. If I am pure and clean, as washed with snow-water, what will the issue be? God will yet cast me into the ditch of affliction; so that I am between two walls, hemmed in on both sides; Wickedness would certainly ruine me, and my righteousness will not deliver me, why therefore do ye feed me with vain hopes that I should be delivered if I were righteous? So Bildad assured him in the former Chapter.

More particularly, If I am wicked, why then labour I in vain?

Si vita præterita laboribus & pietatis studio sanctitatem non comparavi, neq; coram Deo justus habeor, certè labor meus inanis fuit. Aquin.

First, Some interpret his words as a contest with God; thus, If by my study of holiness, and care to walk circumspectly in thy wayes, I have not yet gained the reputation of holiness; If I cannot yet pass in thy account for a godly man, surely I shall still labour in vain about that point, as hitherto I have done.

But secondly (for I lay this aside) Others thus, If I am wicked, it is a vain thing for me to seek the Lord, as you advise me. Why will you put me upon a business which will be fruitless and without success? It was the word of God in Job's time, though no Scripture, That God heareth not sinners: Not such sinners as Job's friends challenged him to be. So Job seems to compare their opinion of him, and counsel given him, thus together; your opinion of me, is, that I am a wicked man; your counsel to me, is, tha tI should seek unto God: Surely your opinion of me, and your counsel to me, can never agree: for if I am wicked (as you hold me to be) I labour in vain, while I obey your counsel.

Si autem & sic impius sum frustrà laboravi, i.e. si impius sum ut vos de me dicitis. Vul.

There is a sence, wherein it is in vain for a wicked man to seek unto God, and a sence wherein it is not in vain for a wicked man to seek unto God. We must distinguish of this interpretation.

If a man be wicked, it is in vain for him to seek unto God, while he loveth his wickedness, and delighteth in it, Psal. 66.2. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer. He that is so wicked as to love wickedness, prayes in vain, fasts and humbles his soul in vain. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, that is, the Lord abominates his sacrifice; but, The prayer of the upright is his delight. Solomon describes an hypocrite in the former words; he is one that will pray and offer sacrifice, and yet puts the stumbling block of his iniquity before his face (Ezek. 14.4.) So they (Jer. 7.4.) cried, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord are these; The Prophet discovers who these zealous Templers were, vers. 9. Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsly, and then come and stand in this house which is called by my Name, and say, We are delivered to do all these abominations? Some mingle prayer and fasting with stealing and murdering; such praying and fasting are as unacceptable to God, as stealing and murdering are: Such labouring to please the Lord, is displeasing to the Lord. What hast thou to do (saith God to the wicked) to take my Covenant into thy mouth (Psal. 50.16.) Doth God say to the wicked, What hast thou to do with my Covenant? For whom is the Covenant made, but for the wicked? If men were not wicked or sinful, what needed there a Covenant of Grace? The Covenant is for the wicked. And the Covenant brings Grace enough to pardon those who are most wicked: why then doth the Lord say to the wicked, What hast thou to do to take my Covenant into thy mouth? Observe what follows, and his meaning is expounded; Seeing thou hatest to be reformed: As if God had said, Thou wicked man, who protectest thy sin, and holdest it close, refusing to return, and hating to reform; what hast thou to do to meddle with my Covenant? Lay off thy defiled hands. He that that is resolved to hold his sin, takes hold of the Covenant in vain; or rather he lets it go, while he seems to hold it. Wo unto those who sue for mercy, while they neglect duty. Thus a wicked man labours in vain.

But there is a sense in which a wicked man doth no labour in vain, how wicked soever he is. What else means the Prophets invitation? (Isa. 55. 5.) Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Let him forsake his wayes, and then no matter what his wayes have been; let him return to the Lord, and then his former departures shall not hinder acceptance. Christ died for the ungodly, Rom. 5. 6. And God justifieth the ungodly, Rom. 4. 5. It is not in vain for an ungodly man to come to God indeed, and when he doth, he ceases to be ungodly. They draw nigh only with their lips, whose hearts are not changed, and they draw nigh in vain. As God hath not said to the seed of Jacob (real Saints) Seek ye me in vain; so he hath not said in vain to wicked men, Seek ye my face. For with the word which bids them seek, he gives them power to seek, and the mercy they seek for. The Grace of God prevents us that we may seek him, and blesses us when we do seek him. If all who are wicked, labour in vain, then all had laboured in vain, forasmuch as all were wicked.

Si adhuc mecum agit Deus tanquam cum impio, quorsum frustra laborem? Philip. Hæc sunt verba hominis à Deo derelicti. Vatabl.

Thirdly, You may take the meaning of it thus, If I am wicked, that is, if I am reputed by men, and still afflicted by God, as a wicked man, then why should I labour in vain, or trouble my self any further to so little purpose? if this sense may be admitted, 'tis a passionate speech, proceeding from impatience and distemper of spirit; much like that of David, and very near it in words, Psal. 73. 13. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency; for all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning. David's afflictions wrought as hard conclusions in him, as Job's did. Grace acts and speaks ever like it self, but a gracious man doth not. David shewed there was vanity and remainders of defilement in his heart, by saying, I have cleansed my heart in vain. Mr. Broughton renders to this sence, I shall be holden as wicked, now why do I labour in vain? Hence observe,

That, Where hope faileth, endeavour faileth too.

I have no hope, saith Job, to get out of these afflictions which fall upon wicked men, or to get one step beyond a wicked man in your reputation, my labour is in vain, why then do I labour? When the heart sinks, the hands hang down. Where the one gives over believing, and hoping, the other gives over acting and working. Hence the afflicted are called upon by the Apostle, to lift up the hands that hang down, and the feeble knees (Heb. 12. 12.) Hands and knees are the instruments of action and motion; and the hanging down of these, imports both retarded or stopt: Those afflicted Hebrews saw little or no hope of deliverance, therefore they gave over endeavouring and moving after deliverance.

In vanum laboravem, si coram Deo justificare me tentarem ut falsò me hoc velle præsupponis

Taking the words (as in the original) absolutely, without any supposition, I am wicked, why then labour I in vain? As if he had said, I am wicked not only in the opinion of men, but I acknowledge my self to be wicked indeed, considered with the most holy God; and then his sence is, Lord, if thou art pleased to go this way to work with me, to set the rigor of thy justice a work, to find out my sin, and to judge me according to what thou findest, then in vain do I seek to comfort my self; for in thy sight no flesh can be justified: I (as well as others) am wicked. In which acknowledgment, he seems to meet with, and confute that supposition of Bildad, chap. 8. 6. If thou wert pure; pure, saith Job, alas, I can never be pure before God. When the Lord examines my purity, he will find it impurity. You tell me, if I were pure, the Lord would awaken for me; I shall never be pure in your sence, I am as pure as ever I shall be, that is, I am impure, and shall be at my best; which sence falleth in directly with the two verses following: Though I wash my self with Snow-water, and make my hands never so clean; yet thou wilt plunge me in the ditch, and mine own cloaths shall abhor me. Taking up that interpretation, I shall connect it with these two Verses, and open them in order.

Verse 30. If I wash my self with snow-water, and make my hands never so clean.

Washing is an act proper to the cleansing of the body or of bodily things; and in Scripture-Story we find travellers had water provided for them at their journeyes end, to refresh and cool their bodies. These were civil washings. But besides these, we find many ceremonial washings of the body, or bodily things, which implied the removing and taking away of sin, and so were a token of internal purification. Therefore the Apostle (Heb. 9. 10.) describing the Jewish worship, and shewing the several parts of it, saith, It stood (we supply that word, but it suits the Text well; for the substantials, the pillars upon which their worship stood, were shadows, consisting in meats and drinks, and divers washings. In allusion to which the Lord promises (Ezek. 36. 25.) I will sprinkle you with clean water: And the Apostle Peter speaks of the sprinkling of the blood of Christ (1 Pet. 1. 2.) And Paul, of the Laver of regeneration, Tit. 3. 5. The Saints who came out of great tribulation, are said to have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 7. 14.) Sanctification, which is cleansing from the filth of sin, and justification, which is cleansing from the guilt of sin, are set forth by washing, 1 Cor. 6. 9. But ye are washed. Thus the Prophet counsels the polluted Jews (Isa. 1. 16.) Wash you, make you clean; which he expounds by a moral duty in the next words, Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, cease to do evil; learn to do well. It was usual among the Heathen to wash, as a sign of purification, especially before they went to worship their gods, or after they had defiled themselves with some grievous crime. One of the Poets gives them a reproof; O ye who are so credulous, or easie of belief, to think that the bloody sin of murdering the bodies of other men, can be taken away by washing your own bodies! They had a great opinion of a cleansing virtue in the Sea; to which some think the Prophet Micah alludes (Chap. 7. 19.) He will cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.

The ancient Christians, using to wash before they prayed, shewed a little touch at least of Judaism, or of their old Gentilism. Some have given this for one reason, why the Lord appointed so many washings among his people, that the Heathens might be the easier gained to the Religion of the Jews, when they found somewhat symbolizing with their customs among them: which, if it were so, yet it cannot bear out those who have mixed Christian Worship with Heathenish Observations, thereby to facilitate their conversion. But doubtless Job had reference to those Rites either of the Jews or Gentiles, when he said, rent, quo cætera quæ violata sunt, expiari putantur. Cic. in Orat. pro Resc. Christianus lotus erat. Tert. De Orat. c. 10. Clem. l. 8. Const. c. 88.

Though I wash my self with Snow-water.

Why with Snow-water; That is (say some) with the most pure water, with the clearest springing fountain-water, or in the most crystall streams, not in the water of melted snow, but in water like snow for purity and orient clearness.

Aliqui ex Latinis legunt aquis vivis, non aquis nivis. Pined.

Others conceive it an allusion to that peculiar Rite in those times, when they took Snow-water to wash with, rather then Spring, or River-water, because that came from the Heavens, not from the Earth here below, and was therefore (in their opinion) more excellent in its nature, because it had a more excellent Original.

Thirdly, Job is thought to specifie Snow-water, because in those Countries the Fountain, or River-water was not pure; and therefore they preserved Snow, and took that water to wash and cleanse with. As the custom still is in those places where good water is a rare commodity.

Or lastly, He may say, If I wash in Snow-water, because he would express the cleanest washing, such as makes the body look like snow, white and pure. White as snow is proverbial (Isa. 1. 18.) for the most resplendent whiteness.

And

In Scriptura talibus aliquis dicitur lotus, qualium referre videtur ſimile Chriſt. Sanct.

And we find in Scripture, a thing is ſaid to be waſhed with that, the likeneſs of which after waſhing it repreſents: Thus the Church glories in Chriſt, That his eyes were as the eyes of a Dove by the rivers of water waſhed with milk, (Cant. 5.12.) that is, his eyes were white as milk, after waſhing. So here, Though I waſh my ſelf with ſnow water, that is, though I waſh my ſelf, till I become as white and pure as ſnow, &c. We read a like phraſe (Pſal. 51.9.) Purge me with Hyſop, and I ſhall be clean, in alluſion to the Levitical Law, which appointed the Prieſt to ſprinkle both things and perſons with a bunch of Hyſop (Levit. 14. Numb. 19.) So the Chaldee Paraphraſe expounds the Pſalm, Cleanſe me, as the Prieſt ſprinkling with Hyſop cleanſed the people. Though I waſh my ſelf with ſnow-water,

And make my hands never ſo clean.

The Hebrew Text is very emphatical, Though I waſh my hands in purity; which ſome expreſs by that which is the inſtrument of purifying the hands, Though I waſh my hands with ſope; So Mr. Broughton, Though I waſh my hands with waſh-balls, to make my hands clean and ſweet. We tranſlate, though not to the letter of the Hebrew, yet to the ſence, Though I waſh my hands never ſo clean, yet, &c.

As the former expreſſion referreth to internal holineſs; ſo this latter to external. The hands in Scripture note our outward works. Hands are the executive part, the inſtruments of action. Your hands are full of blood, Iſa. 1. that is, your actions are cruel and bloody: there is not only blood in your hearts, but in your hands too (Pſal. 26. 6.) I will waſh my hands in innocency, ſo will I compaſs thine altar; that is, I will make all my outward converſation pure and holy. The Lord hath rewarded me according to the purity of my hands, (Pſal. 18.20.) Again (Pſal. 73. 13.) I have, in vain, waſhed my hands in innocency, that is, I have lived innocently in vain. The Apoſtle James calls for the holineſs of the outward man in the ſame language, Cleanſe your hands, ye ſinners; and purifie your hearts, ye double-minded, Chap. 4. 8.

Beſides, it was uſual to waſh the hands, as an emblem or token of innocency, and freedom from guilt. The Law of Moſes appointed, in caſe a man were ſlain, no man knowing how, that the Elders of the neareſt City ſhould waſh their hands over the Heifer that was offered in Sacrifice, ſaying, Our hands have not ſhed this blood, neither have our eyes ſeen it, Deut. 21.6,7. So Pilate, when he would make it viſible unto all the world (as he thought) that he was free from the blood of Chriſt, called for a baſin of water to waſh his hands: all the water in the Ocean could not waſh Pilates conſcience from the guilt of Chriſts blood, yet he called for a baſin of water, and waſhed his hands, ſaying, I am free from the blood of this juſt perſon, ſee ye to it. So then, the meaning of Job is, Though I be clean within and clean without, though my heart be as clean, as waſhing can make my hands, though (as the Apoſtle taught long after) I lift up pure hands in prayer, without wrath and doubting, yet

Verſ. 31. Thou ſhalt plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes ſhall abhor me.

טבל Tinxit, intinxit, ita lavit ut res non mundetur, ſed tantùm attingat humorem.

The word which we tranſlate Plunge, ſignifies a dipping or immerſion, rather to die or ſtain, then to cleanſe, Ezek. 23.15.

There are two interpretations of theſe words, Thou ſhalt plunge me in the ditch.

Futura apud Hebræos ſæpe debitum indicant.

They may be underſtood either, firſt thus, that God would adjudge him ſinful, notwithſtanding all his purifyings: and ſo it anſwereth the expreſſion of the latter clauſe of the former verſe; As if he ſaid, Though I make my ſelf as clean as clean can be, and thereupon judge my ſelf never ſo clean, yet thou mayeſt account me unclean; yea the more I labour to juſtifie my ſelf in my cleanneſs, the more unclean mayeſt thou judge me to be; Yet, Thou wilt plunge me in the ditch; For we are to underſtand the words, Thou wilt plunge me; not as of that which the Lord would do, but as of that which the Lord might juſtly do. As if he had ſaid, Thou mighteſt have greater cauſe to plunge me in the ditch, when I am ſo fine and clean in mine own eyes, then before. When I think I have waſhed my ſelf as white as ſnow, thou mayeſt look upon me, as drawn thorow a dirty channel, or as wallowed in the mire. After all my cleanſing and rinſing, and purifying, thy pure eyes can eaſily ſee a ſinner in me, and diſcover that I am polluted, though I am waſhed.

Phraſis Hebræa eſt, qua famæ nominiſq; nitor pollui dicitur. Bold.

This Phraſe of plunging in a ditch, notes the greateſt defilement, it imports a man all over defiled: The Jews ſay of a man that hath loſt his credit and is exceedingly blemiſhed in his reputation, That he is caſt in the dirt, or thrown in the mire.

שחת Corruptio interitus illas igitur ſordes intelligit, quas affert ſqualida mors, me demerget in locum putredinis. Varro l. 4. de Ling. Lat.

Again, The word which we tranſlate Ditch, ſometimes ſignifies corruption only (Pſal. 16.10.) Thou wilt not ſuffer thine holy One to ſee corruption. And ſecondly, it ſignifieth a pit digged and prepared, wherein dead and corrupting carcaſes are laid (Pſal. 94.13.) Till the pit be digged for the wicked; that is, till they be deſtroyed and put into the pit.

Beſides, We learn from Antiquity, that they had ſpecial pits or graves for offenders, who were ſlain by the Law (as ſome ſpeak) or cut off by the hand of juſtice; who being enemies to humane ſociety while they lived, were not admitted ſociety with the bodies of honeſt men, when they died. The Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 14. 18, 19, 20.) deſcribing the ruine and ignominious down-fall of the King of Babylon, ſaith, That all the Kings of the Nations, even all of them lie in glory, every one in his own houſe (that is, in their Fathers Sepulchres) But thou art caſt out of thy grave like an abominable branch: and as the raiment of thoſe that are ſlain, thruſt through with a ſword, that go down to the ſtones of the pit: Thou ſhalt not be joyned to them in burial.

And hence, to be caſt into a ditch notes any great humbling or affliction, reproach or contumely.

We may take it here in either ſence, Thou wilt plunge me into filth and corruption, or ſhew me to be filthy and corrupt, though I cleanſe my ſelf; or thou wilt caſt me into the greateſt afflictions, notwithſtanding all my purifications. I ſhall give a note, ſuting this laſt ſence, at the cloſe of the whole verſe.

From the firſt, here Obſerve,

They who would make themſelves moſt holy, appear moſt unholy before God.

Thoughts of our own purity, render us impure. We are never ſo black before God, as when we are whiteſt in our own eyes. We find the Phariſee (Luke 18.) waſhing himſelf in ſnow-water, and making his hands very clean, he tells us that he had Faſted and Prayed, and given Alms, and paid Tithes (this is to waſh our ſelves in ſnow-water, and to make our hands very clean) but the Lord plunged this Phariſee in the ditch, he caſt him for a wicked man. The poor Publican plunged himſelf in the ditch, and judged himſelf fit to be thrown into the mire; But he went home to his houſe juſtified, rather then the other. The Lord tells his people (Jer. 2.22.) Though thou waſh thee with nitre, and take thee much ſope, yet thine iniquity is marked before me. The ſpeech is of the ſame importance in the letter with this of Job; yet there the Holy Ghoſt rather intends an hypocritical waſhing, by excuſing or denying our ſins; or (as ſome gloſs that Text) by ſhewing images or imaginations, fancies or forgeries of holineſs. If thou ſhalt put thy ſelf in theſe dreſſes of holineſs, as if thou wert waſhed with nitre, and cleanſed with much ſope, yet thou canſt not avoid mine eyes, For thine iniquity is marked before me, I can ſee thy ſin through all the daubings and paintings, through thy deckings and coverings put upon it. Now, as God ſees iniquity through all the masks and coverings of hypocrites; ſo he can ſee ſpots through all the waſhings and cleanſings of the moſt ſincere. And if we waſh our ſelves to juſtifie our ſelves, our very waſhing is our defiling. God will not only ſee, but mark their iniquity, who think they can put all their iniquity out of his ſight. And ſuch ſhall be made ſo vile, that not only God, but their own clothes ſhall abhor them, as Job expreſſes himſelf in the next words.

Eſt ſe accuſare, culpam abnegare ſimulamenta pietatis oſtentare.

Mine own clothes will abhor me.

We have the word at Chap. 8. verſ. 14. Whoſe hope ſhall loath him, which we render, Whoſe hope ſhall be cut off. Clothes may be taken either properly or figuratively. Taken properly, the words may import, firſt, his degradation from from all former dignities. I ſhall be deprived of all honour and eſtimation, and ſo the cloaths which I wore in the dayes of my proſperity, will ſo much unbecome me, that they will abhor me. Or ſecondly, Taken properly, they are conceived to be a circumlocution of death.

Thou wilt plunge me in the pit, that is, I ſhall die, and mine own cloaths will abhor me. The dead are ſtript; garments do not become a dead carcaſe. Mr. Broughton's paraphraſe upon his own tranſlation intimates this; Mine own cloathes ſhall loath me; namely, ſaith he, When I go naked to the grave, as though my cloaths did loath me.

Others underſtand it figuratively, Mine own cloaths ſhall abhor me, that is, Firſt, Thoſe that are my deareſt friends ſhall abhor me, Thou wilt make them flee from me, who are as near to me, as the cloaths on my back.

Or ſecondly, In a figure, Mine own cloaths, that is, mine own works ſhall abhor me. Hypocrites are ſaid to come in ſheeps clothing (Matth.7.) that is, doing the works of thoſe who are ſincere, appearing like them in practice. And when we are warned to keep our garments (Rev.16.15.) the meaning is, that we muſt keep faith and a good conſcience in every act of our lives.

Thirdly, It may have reſpect to lepers, whoſe cloaths did abhor them, becauſe they wore ſome mark of difference upon their garments, ſhewing that they were to be ſhunned, and their company avoided.

Tam ſqualidus ero ut ea quibus nullus eſt ſenſus tantũ ſqualorem ſentiri & abominari videantur.

But rather in general, Mine own cloaths ſhall abhor me, notes extreme pollution. If I juſtifie my ſelf before God, I ſhall be ſo unclean that my cloaths will be loth to touch me. We ſay of one that is very filthy, A man would not touch him with a pair of tongs. And it is uſual in Scripture (to give you that rule for the underſtanding of this, and other the like forms of ſpeaking) when a matter is ſpoken of in a way of exceſs, that things inſenſible have ſence, yea reaſon and underſtanding aſcribed to them: abhorring, is an act beyond ſence, it hath a mixture of reaſon and underſtanding; now to note his exceeding lothſomneſs to God and man, who attempts to juſtifie himſelf before God, the Text ſaith, His cloaths (which have neither life nor ſence) ſhall abhor him. When the Phariſee, envying the acclamations which the multitude of Chriſts Diſciples gave him at his entrance into Jeruſalem, deſired that he would rebuke and ſilence them: Chriſt anſwered, I tell you, if theſe ſhould hold their peace, the ſtones would immediately cry out; importing how juſt an occaſion there was, why his Name and glory ſhould be lifted up; Do ye think much that reaſonable men ſpeak? If theſe ſhould hold their peace, the ſtones that have neither life nor ſenſe would ſpeak. Thus (Gen. 4. 10.) to note the foulneſs of Cain's ſin, and his cruelty towards his brother, God ſaith, The earth hath opened her mouth to receive thy brothers blood from thy hand, as if the earth had been ſenſibly affected with the cruelty of Cain towards his brother; thou wouldſt not let his blood ſtay in his body, therefore the earth in kindneſs opened her mouth, and took in his blood from thy hand, and that cries up unto me. So here, I ſhall be ſo foul, that if my cloaths had ſenſe, life and reaſon, and could diſpoſe of their own actings, and ſet themſelves upon what body and limbs they pleaſed, ſurely they would put themſelves off from my body, and ever come on again, they would abhor me; I ſhould be as filthy before God in ſoul, as he is in body, who muſt be waſhed before he is fit to have his cloaths put on him: As to be clothed with ſhame, ſo to have our cloaths aſhamed of us, notes the greateſt diſhonour.

Ubi aliquarum rerum exceſſus eſt dicuntur aliquando in Scripturis ſentire inſenſibilia. Sanct.

Job ſummã fœditatem animæ per ſummam fœditatem corporis indigitat. Tam fœdus à judicio tuo diſcederem, ut is corpore eſt ſordidus quem veſtes ſuæ horrent. Coc.

Laſtly, This caſting into the ditch, and the abhorring of his cloaths, may refer to the continuance of his afflictions; though I ſhould make my ſelf never ſo pure, yet the Lord would caſt me again into the ditch of affliction, he will put me into the pit of trouble, till (like a man drawn out of the mire) Mine own cloaths abhor me, or make me an abhorring to all that ſee me. I know the Lord will make further trial of me. Hence note,

God caſts his ſervants again and again into the miery ditch, as refiners caſt gold again and again into the fiery furnace, to make them more pure.

That which defiles the outward man, may be cleanſing to the inward: And the abominable clothing of the body, may be a means to put the ſoul into the moſt handſom dreſs. Hence obſerve, Quamvis ego mundus ſum à culpa, tamen pœnis atq; dolorũ & ægritudinam ſordibus & ſqualore obſoloſcam.

Secondly, That, After purgings and cleanſings, the Lord often goes on with further chaſtenings.

Though I waſh my ſelf, &c. yet thou wilt caſt me in the ditch, and mine own cloaths will abhor me. Ye our purgings and cleanſings are ſometimes ſo far from cauſing God to take off our afflictions, that they do but fit us for more affliction: For the Lord will not truſt an impure ſpirit, or an heart defiled under many corruptions, under great afflictions. He therefore cleanſes many, and makes them more holy, that they may be more fit to bear afflictions. No certain argument can be grounded upon this, that a man ſhall come out of affliction, becauſe he is cleanſed, for God chuſes (in ſome caſes) to afflict ſuch moſt, who are moſt cleanſed. The Lord hath as much ſervice from us, while we ſuffer, as while we do his will; Paſſive obedience is higher and harder ſervice then active, and an unclean heart is of the two (though it be fit for neither) more unfit for ſuffering then for doing. Therefore Job's friends could not groundedly affirm, that he ſhould be delivered, if he were cleanſed. Indeed if Gods thoughts were like mans thoughts, or if he were tied by ſuch rules as we, we might make ſuch concluſions; but (Job concludes) He is not a man as we are.

VERS. 32, 33.

For he is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him, and we ſhould come together in judgment.
Neithe is there any Dayes-man betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.

JOB doth two things in the cloſe of this Chapter.

Firſt, He again renounceth all thought or intendment of anſwering God by any worthineſs or goodneſs in himſelf. A point he had often touched before, it being the grand objection, which his friends brought againſt him, as if his ſpirit were heightned up to the preſumption of a trial or conteſt with God himſelf. 'Tis a duty to clear our ſelves moſt, where and in what we are moſt ſuſpected.

This he doth in Verſ. 32, 33.

He is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him, and we ſhould come together in judgment.
Neither is there any Dayes-man betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.

In which words Job offers two things to aſſure them that he was far enough from ſuch on engaging with God.

Firſt, From the diſparity of their condition (verſ. 32.) He is not a man as I am. God is not like me, I am no match for God; and I will not be ſo fool hardy, as to contend with one, who is infinitely above me.

Secondly, Leſt any ſhould think, that though himſelf hand to hand (as we ſpeak) would not venture upon God, yet he might (poſſibly) get ſome friend or ſecond, to interpoſe and umpire it between them, or to determine whether Gods dealings with him were juſt and equal, or no: And ſo (though not alone, yet) by a friend, or a third party to them both, he would try out the matter. No (ſaith Job in verſ. 33.) not ſo neither, as I alone will not undertake him; ſo neither is there any Dayes-man betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.

In the two laſt verſes Job makes a petition to the Lord deſiring a favourable condeſcenſion, that he would be pleaſed to abate of the preſent height and extremity of his pain, and then he hoped yet that he might anſwer him, though he would not contend with him, anſwer him in reference to his own integrity, about which his friends had charged and wounded him, though not in reference to his own righteouſneſs, about which the Lord might charge and condemn him, Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrifie me, then would I ſpeak and not fear him; but it is not ſo with me. He concludes with the difference of his ſtate, from what he deſired of God it might be: And he begins with the difference of his perſon from what God himſelf is. It is not with me as I could wiſh, and God is not ſuch an one, nor can be, as I am, and muſt be, Verſ. 32. For he is not a man as I am, &c.

He doth not ſay, God is not ſuch a man as I am, but God is not a man as I am. One man may ſay unto another man, Thou art not ſuch a man as I am: Every different degree or endowment among men, may bear a man out in ſaying ſo, and pride will prompt a man to ſay ſo, when he is not in degree better, but in kind worſe then other men. Such was the language of the Phariſee (Luke 18. 11.) God I thank thee, I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjuſt, adulterers, or even as this Publican: yet no man can ſay to another man, Thou art not a man as I am.

But ſeeing God is not a man at all, what is there in this aſſertion of Job? He is not a man as I am.

The words import a double difference; Firſt, A difference in qualification. Secondly, In nature: here Job chiefly intends the difference of quality (which yet in God is his nature) that he was not wiſe, and juſt, and holy, and pure as God.

Non tam eſſentiæ ad eſſentiã quã qualitatis ad qualitatem i. e. ſuæ ad divinam paritatem collatio fit & denotatur. Bold.

Moſes in his ſong (Exod. 15. 3.) after the overthrow of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, ſpeaks thus, The Lord is a man of War; that phraſe intends not a humane nature to God; when he ſaith, God is a man of War, he meaneth only this, God is a great Warrior. We call a Ship of War, a Man of War. As a man of words ſignifies an eloquent man, though with ſome only a talkative man: So a Man of War ſignifies a famous Warrior, or one trained up for War; in which ſence Saul ſaith of Goliah, that he had been a man of war from his youth (1 Sam. 17. 33.) God is a great Warrior, the moſt potent Commander, The Generalliſſimo of all the Armies in heaven and earth, The Lord of hoſts is his Name, He is a man of war, though he is not a man.

Ratio eſt omnium ſuperiorum, etſi juſtus ſim, cum Deo tamen contendens proſonte habeor, quia non eſt par utriuſq; noſtrum conditio. Merc.

Further, when Job ſaith, He is not a man as I am, he gives us the reaſon of all he had ſaid before, eſpecially of what he had ſaid immediately before, Though I waſh my ſelf with ſnow-water, and make my hands never ſo clean, yet thou ſhalt plunge me in the ditch; For he is not a man as I am, that is, though I by waſhing my ſelf ſhould think I were all white, and not a ſpot to be ſeen upon me (as hypocrites by covering themſelves, think they are all hid, and not a ſin to be found about them) yet he would throw me into the ditch again, as like to like, dirt to dirt, for he is not a man as I am, he hath other eyes, and thoughts, and wayes then creatures have.

Secondly, As they contain a reaſon, why the Lord would judge him impure, though he ſhould waſh himſelf with ſnow-water; ſo alſo, why the Lord would afflict him, though he ſhould waſh himſelf with ſnow-water, He is not a man as I am. As if he had ſaid, Should I ſee a man without ſpot or ſpeck, without blame or fault, yet full of wounds and ſtripes, full of troubles and ſorrows: Should I ſee him afflicted, of whom I could not ſay, He had ſinned, it were beyond my reaſon. But though I cannot, yet the Lord can ſee reaſon to afflict a man in whom I ſee no iniquity. He knows why and wherefore; he may and doth caſt them into the fire in whom I can ſee no droſs. He is not a man as I am. God exceeds man in his actings, as much as he doth in his nature; as he is what man is not, ſo he can do what man cannot. Every thing is in working, as it is in being. God alwayes works like himſelf, and infinitely above man.

As to the preſent buſineſs, he works above man chiefly in two things.

Firſt, Man cannot juſtly commence a ſuit againſt, or contend with another man, except he be able to charge him with ſome wrong that he hath done him, or lay ſome crime to his charge.

Secondly, A humane Judge cannot condemn or caſt a man, unleſs he firſt legally convict him of his crime. Thus it is with men in their judicial proceedings. He that contends muſt know ſome crime; and the Judge paſſes ſentence as he ſees the crime proved and made good againſt him; but God is not as man, he may proceed to judgment without an accuſation, and he may give judgment before the crime be proved; Job was ſmitten without cauſe truly alledged, much leſs atteſted. God afflicts, that grace may be proved, not becauſe ſin is proved; He is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him.

Reſpondere, hoc loco, poteſt eſſe verbum forenſe.

Anſwer [im.] It is a judiciary word, or anſwering in judgment; To juſtifie is a Law-term, and ſo is to anſwer; one puts in his Bill, and another his Anſwer; ſome Courts proceed by Bill and Anſwer. If the Lord (ſaith Job) ſhould put in his Bill againſt me, I would not put in my Anſwer; He is not a man as I am that I ſhould anſwer him.

Or we may take the word [Anſwer] in general, for the returning of ſatisfaction to a queſtion. If the Lord demand a reaſon or an account of me, I could not ſatisfie him. Many, who can give a reaſon of the hope that is in them, cannot give a reaſon of the ſufferings which are upon them: But though they know no particular reaſon why they ſuffer, yet they believe it is not without reaſon. Some holy Martyrs have ſaid to their cruel Perſecutors, urging them with Sophiſtical Queſtions, We can die, but we cannot diſpute. And ſo the Saints, under the moſt difficult providences of God, are reſolved to ſay, We can die under them, but we will not diſpute them. He is not a man that we ſhould anſwer him in what he ſpeaks or doth. Hence obſerve, Firſt, The conſideration, that God is above man, is enough to humble and ſilence man.

No man is proud in the preſence of another whom he thinks to be his better. The ſight of greater beauty, keeps down pride of beauty. Pride cannot live in the eye of that which is above the reaſon of it in our ſelves: Yea, he that finds he is but equal, or upon even ground with others, can hardly be proud of any thing in himſelf. While we ſuppoſe our gifts or knowledge, but like thoſe of other men, we are not lifted up in the opinion of them. Now, If equality check pride, a thought of ſuperiority muſt needs kill it. And if the common ſuperiority of a man kills our pride, how much more doth the knowledge of that ſuper-excellent ſuperiority which is in God? Doth not the beauty and dignity of God, obſcure the luſtre and darken the beauty of all creatures? Is the ſhining of the Stars any thing, when the Sun appears? Much leſs is the holineſs, ſtrength, and goodneſs of man any thing, when the goodneſs, holineſs, and ſtrength of God ſtand forth or appear: we muſt ſay we are nothing, when we ſee what God is. The ſight of him, in whom nothing of our imperfection can be found, cannot but humble us in the ſight of all our perfections. Hence, when the Lord would abaſe man, and extol himſelf, he removes all of man from himſelf, (1 Sam. 15. 29.) God is not a man that he ſhould repent; Men are full of repentings, and that they are ſo, ſhews them to be men. There is a repentance which is a grace of God, and there is a repentance which is an infirmity in man. By the former, men turn to God from that ſin, in which they were, or have done. By the latter, men turn both from God and man in what they promiſe or purpoſe either to be or do. They are this day of one mind, and to morrow of another; to day they love, and to morrow they hate; now they will, and anon they will not. They are in and out, no man knows where to find them; but God is ever the ſame, he changes not. Elihu ſends a challenge to all teachers in the name of God, Who teacheth like him? (Chap. 36. 22.) God himſelf challengeth Job in his own name, (Chap. 40. 9.) Haſt thou an arm like God? Or canſt thou thunder with a voice like him? To whom will you liken me (ſaith God, when he would bring down the pride of the creature) To whom will you liken me, and make me equal, and compare me that we may be like? (Iſa. 46. 5.) Why do ye exalt your ſelves? Why have ye ſuch high thoughts of your ſelves? Can ye find out any to compare with me? Or can ye make a parallel of me among all my creatures?

All the unevenneſs of man towards God, ariſes from preſumptuous thoughts of his unevenneſs with God. Take a taſte in two or three particulars.

Firſt, Man grows into a boldneſs of ſinning againſt God, becauſe he thinks God is but ſo holy as man is; he conceits that which ſuits his ſpirit, ſuits Gods Spirit alſo: This cauſeth him to do many things moſt unſuitable to the Spirit of God (Pſalm 50. 18.) When thou ſaweſt a thief, then thou conſenteſt with him, and thou haſt been partaker with the adulterer: thou giveſt thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit, &c. Theſe things haſt thou done. And what encouraged or hardned him to do theſe things? The next words give us an account of that, Thou thoughteſt that I was altogether ſuch an one as thy ſelf; that that is, thou didst frame conceptions of me according to the Idæa of thine own brain, or the model of thine own heart. Thou wast well pleased with such filthiness and abominations, therefore thou didst conclude, I would not be displeased with them. The true reason why most men make nothing of evil, is, because they make God nothing in goodness (as to that point) beyond themselves; this doth not trouble our spirits, we see no hurt in what we do: Surely then God sees no hurt in it, neither is his Spirit troubled with our doings.

Secondly, Boldness in pleading with, and complaining against God, when he doth what likes not us, arises from thoughts that we are like him. None would quarrel what God doth in cutting out and proportioning their own estates to them; or in casting down the humble and meek, in exalting the proud and vile, if they did fully believe God had as much right and reason as they see he hath power to do what he doth. Man draws God into his own compass, and then wonders to find him work so out of compass. If I were as God, saith one I would do thus and thus; surely, God is as I am, he hath such thoughts as I have, saith another, then why doth he thus? Till we have fully studied this Point, That God is not as we are, we shall never rest fully satisfied in what God doth, if he doth what we would not.

Thirdly, Unbelief springs from the same muddy fountain; unbelief of the power of God to deliver us when we are in outward straights and dangers; and unbelief of the mercy of God to pardon us, when we are in spiritual straights and desertions. What's the reason why, when great dangers encompass us, we cannot believe deliverances? Do we not make God like to our selves? Do we not shorten his hand to our own measure, and think it cannot be done, because men cannot do it? And for mercy about the pardon of sin; man being awakened, sees how he hath provoked God, sin stares upon his face, and he finds out many aggravations upon his sin; then he begins to collect thus, certainly if a man had so provoked his neighbour, he could never pardon or forgive him; can then such sins as these be forgiven by God? Mans mercy cannot reach so high as this, therefore surely the mercies of God will not. We have a very gracious promise, backt with a caution, to prevent these jealousies (Isa. 55.6,7.) Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Now, as when God calls upon man to obey his will, and do his Commandments, he is apt to say, at least in his heart, the duties are too many, and the burdens too great to be born: So when the Lord calleth upon wicked men, the worst of wicked men to repent or turn unto him, and he will abundantly pardon, or he will multiply to pardon (as it is in the original) they are ready to object, what, pardon such as we are? we are too filthy and vile for washing, Surely he will not pardon us: These mercies are too many for us, and these favours too great for us to receive. Well (saith God) I preconceive your conceits of me, ye are measuring me by your selves, ye think it cannot be done, because ye cannot do it; your hearts are too narrow to pass by so many, so great provocations; therefore ye say mine is too narrow also. Do ye thus measure me, the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? I would have you know, My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes; for as the heavens are higher then the earth, so are my wayes higher then your wayes, and my thoughts then your thoughts, vers. 8, 9. As if he had said, your thoughts are as much below my mercy, as your wayes were below my holiness. Cease then from doubting what I have promised, as I would have you cease from doing what I have forbidden. Your unbelief that I will not pardon your sin, dishonours me as much as your disobedience did in committing sin. Till we believe God is holy above us, we fear not to sin; and till we believe God is merciful above us, we cannot believe he will pardon our sin.

Thus we see how the lifting up of our selves in our thoughts to an equality, or to some similitude with God, or the drawing down of God to an equality, or some similitude with our selves, is the ground and cause of all our unequal carriage towards God, of our boldness in sinning, of our boldness in pleading with, and complaining against him, of our extream unbelief in the point of deliverance from troubles, or of the pardon of our sins.

Secondly observe, There is no comparison between God and man.

He is not a man as I am. Man is like to man, face answers face, and heart answers heart, strength answers strength, and wit answers wit. Solomon concludes this (Eccles. 6.10.) That which hath been, is named already, and it is known that it is man. A man is but a man, be he never so great in worldly wealth or honour; as he bears the name, so he hath the nature of man still: Nor can he contend with him that is mightier then he, i. e. with God. If he venture beyond his line, or move out of the sphear of his activity, if he would act more then a man, he shall quickly find that he is but man; He cannot contend with him that is mightier then he. Man was indeed made in the likeness of God, Gen. 1.27. In the image of God created he him; yet we must not say God is like man; he is not in our image. God put some impressions of himself upon man, but he took no impressions of man upon himself; He is not a man as I am. He hath given us some of his own excellencies, but he hath not taken upon him any of our weaknesses. God hath honoured man to give him somewhat of himself, but God should dishonour himself to take any thing of man. Thus man is in the likeness of God; but God is not in the likeness of man. Take heed of such thoughts. It is as dangerous to frame a likeness or a similitude of God to our hearts, as to frame a likeness or a similitude of God upon a wall (Exod. 15. 11.) Who is like unto thee, O Lord, amongst the gods? That is, there is none like unto thee: None amongst the gods, neither among those who are falsly called gods, the Idols of the Heathen, or among those who are truly called gods (for God calls them so) the Angels in heaven, and Magistrates here upon earth: among these truly called gods, there is none like the true God, much less is there any among the meer pure mortals, like unto the immortal God. Who is like unto thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? So (Micah 7. 18.) Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? Who is a God like unto thee? Not only is there no man that can pardon as God, but there is no god that can pardon like God; he puts it upon that: Who is a god like unto thee? Not as if he granted that there were any other gods besides the Lord, but to meet with the thoughts of men, with those sinful principles and conceits which lodge in man, and make other gods. To say of God only this, He is God, is to say all; we cannot say more good of God, then to call him God; as we cannot say more evil of sin, then to call it sin; when we have called it sin, we have called it all. The Apostle (Rom. 7. 13.) puts that upon it, as the worst he could say of it, Sin that it might appear sin. We cannot represent it in a worse likeness then its own. All men say they sin, but sin appears sin to very few. And when the Apostle would put a disgraceful title or epithete upon sin, he invests it with its own name, sinful sin. Thus to the point in hand, we cannot call God more, then when we call him God: Nothing can be predicated of him better then himself. When God appears to be God, all excellency appears. All men (almost) acknowledge God, but God appears to very few. 'Tis but little of God that can be known; and there are not many who know that little; very many know but little of that little, and most know nothing of it at all.

Thus also to say that man is man, is proof and aggravation enough of his depraved condition (Hos. 6.7.) They like men have transgressed the Covenant; they have done like themselves. When we see men vain, and wicked, and sinful, and covetous, and earthly, we may say of them, they have done like men; and how wondrous and glorious things soever God doth, we can but say, He hath done like God.

As a consectary from the whole, take this caution, If God is not a man as we are, then God must never be measured by the rule and line of man. Man hath not line enough to measure God by. The Lord exceeds man in all; he is not only above mans infirmities, but he is above all his perfections. The Lord is not only not weak as man is weak, or unholy as man is unholy, but the Lord is not strong as man is strong, nor holy as man is holy, nor just as man is just, nor wiſe as man is wiſe: Then, man muſt not venture to judge of the wiſdom of God by his own wiſdom; or of the juſtice, holineſs and ſtrength of God by his own ſtrength, holineſs and juſtice. Man is not able to meaſure God in any of his Attributes; and in three things eſpecially man ſhould take heed of meaſuring God in his actings.

First, In the great work of election. In this man is very apt to be medling and to be meaſuring God by the line of natural reaſon, or of civil juſtice: The Apoſtles diſpute beats down this preſumption, Rom. 9. We read there how man begins to buſtle and ſtartle at that great concluſion (verſ. 18.) Therefore he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. If it be thus, ſaith he, if every mans ſtate be peremptorily determined by the will of God, if he loves and hates before men have done either good or evil, why doth he find fault? for who hath reſiſted his will? What need any trouble themſelves about the way, when their end is under an unmoveable decree? Why ſhould any ſtrive to forſake evil and do good on earth, ſeeing it was reſolved in heaven what ſhould become of them before they had done either good or evil? Thus the pride and ignorance of man cavils at the decrees of God. But ſtay (ſaith the Apoſtle) O man, who art thou that repliеſt againſt God? He is not a man as thou art: he hath done what he hath done by virtue of his juſt Prerogative, and therefore he is not unjuſt in doing it. Beſides, if ye will needs argu from reaſon, then ſee how common reaſon confutes this Blaſphemy: Hath not the Potter power over the clay, of the ſame lump to make one veſſel unto honour, and another unto diſhonour? What if God hath done thus, and what if he will do thus? What haſt thou to do with it? Know thy place, and keep thy rank; art not thou clay in the hand of the Potter?

Secondly, Meaſure not God by your own line in his providential diſpenſations: He may have a method of his own in giving or taking away, in pulling down or building up, in wounding or healing, in abaſing man; or in raiſing him, becauſe all is is own. He who hath a right to all, can wrong none; and he who poſſeſſeth all, is debtor to none.

Thirdly, Meaſure not God by your own line in the matter of your ordinary Approvings: And that two wayes.

First, Do it not in your approving of things. And,

Secondly, Do it not in your approving of perſons. Take heed firſt of meaſuring God by your ſelves in your approving of things; as if becauſe you approve it, therefore God ſurely doth: This miſconceit hath been the cauſe of almoſt all, and almoſt all the cauſe of all the Superſtition, Idolatry and Will-worſhip rhat ever was in the world. Man thinks God muſt needs like any thing which is done to his honour; hence becauſe the adorning and adoring of Images, are directed to the honour of God, therefore man concludes, ſurely God likes them. Whereas he is never honoured but when he is obeyed. As no man hath been his Counſellor, to direct him what to do with us; ſo no man can be his Counſellor, to direct him what to require of us. Not that which we commend is approved, but that which the Lord commends.

Secondly, Take heed of this in your approbation or eſtimation of perſons: Not he whom you commend is approved, but he whom the Lord commends. We ſhould judge of men as we believe God judges. Or (to come nearer) let no man think himſelf is approved of God, becauſe he is approved by himſelf. Many flatter themſelves in their own eyes, till their iniquity is found to be hateful (Pſal. 36. 2.) Chriſt intimates this, ſpeaking to the Phariſees (Luke 16. 15.) Ye are they that juſtifie your ſelves; ye have high thoughts of your own worth, and glory in your own excellencies, and ye think God hath high thoughts of you, that he glories in you too; but let me tell you, That which is highly eſteemed amongſt men, is an abomination in the ſight of God. We are the men, ſaid the Phariſees, ours are excellent gifts; thus they admired and doted upon themſelves: but the Lord found them out, and what they highly eſteemed, he abominated. Some write and ſubſcribe their own Letters teſtimonial, and get no hand to them but their own. Not he who commends himſelf, is approved, but he whom the Lord commends: Such ſhall find, that their own good word will do them no good; He is not a man as they are. He, ſaith Job, is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him.

And we ſhould come together in judgment.

It hath been ſhewed what Judgment is at the nineteenth verſe of this Chapter, and at the third verſe of the eighth Chapter, therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon it, only as to the matter in hand, Judgment may be taken three wayes.

First, For pleading, which is but preparatory to Judgment, the opening and arguing of the caſe or fact under trial. 1. Diſceptatio & mutuus λογος & rationum.

Secondly, For the deciſion and determination of the caſe according to Law, or the award of Judgment. 2. Juris definitio.

Thirdly, For the inflicting and executing ſentence according to the judgment awarded. 3. Exactio caſtigationis & debiti.

Here Job chiefly intends the firſt; He is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him, and we ſhould come together in judgment, that is, that I ſhould plead, argue and debate my matters with him before any other Judge: God and man cannot come together to be judged; for all mankind muſt receive their judgment from God. Or nearer the Hebrew (which ſuits the former clauſe better) He is not a man as I am, that we ſhould come alike to judgment: No, we ſhould be very unlike, very unequally matched in judgment. Man and man, who are upon even terms in their nature, may yet be upon ſuch uneven terms in their condition, that they cannot come alike to judgment. A poor man cannot grapple with a rich man, nor a mean man with the honourable. Now, if they who are of the ſame nature, cannot come alike in judgment, becauſe of a diſparity in their condition, how ſhall they who differ not only in condition, but in nature? Can God and man, can poor, wretched and miſerable man, come alike in judgment with the great and glorious God? And ſo the meaning of Job may be thus conceived, If I had only a man (like my ſelf) to deal with, then I would venture a trial with him at any ſeat of Judgment or Court of Juſtice; but he is not a man as I am, much leſs ſuch a man as I am. How ſhall I ſet my ſelf with him to be judged, whenas himſelf is the Judge of all, and is himſelf judged of none? Ut veniamus pariter in judicium.

Hence obſerve, Man is not able to contend with God in judgment.

Who is like me, and who will appoint me a time? or (nearer the Letter) Who will convent me in judgment? Who is that Shepherd that will ſtand before me? Iſa 49.14. Man muſt come before God in judgment. We muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt (2 Cor. 5. 10.) None ſhall eſcape his Tribunal. But man cannot ſtand before God in judgment. The wicked cannot ſtand at all before him in judgment, becauſe they ſtand upon their own bottom. The righteous dare not ſtand before him in judgment upon their own bottom; if they ſhould, themſelves and their cauſe would quickly fall together.

There are ſeven conſiderations which tell us, that we cannot come together, much leſs alike together with God in judgment.

First, He is of ſuch ſtrength, that none can wreſt themſelves out of his hand: No power can daunt him.

Secondly, He is of ſuch ſincerity, that bribes cannot corrupt him, nor can gifts put out his eyes.

Thirdly, He is of ſuch wiſdom, that none can over-reach him, nor can our wit entangle him.

Fourthly, He is ſo knowing, that none of our ſins or failings, no, not the leaſt of them, are ſecrets to, or hidden from him.

Fifthly, He is ſo holy, that he cannot bear with the leaſt ſin, and ſo juſt, that he cannot but puniſh it, unleſs he receive ſatisfaction for it.

Sixthly, He cannot be a party in judgment, for he is the ſupream Judge, and there is no appealing from his ſentence.

Seventhly, He is the laſt, yea, an everlaſting Judge, and therefore there is no repealing of his ſentence. Who is able to contend with him whom no power can daunt, no bribes corrupt, no wit over-reach, who knows all our ſins, and will ſpare none of them, from whoſe ſentence there is no appealing, and whoſe ſentence cannot be repealed? There is no Judge above God, therefore we cannot appeal from him; there is none to come after ter God, therefore what he hath judged, cannot be repealed.

Job having thus waved and profeſſed againſt contending with God in judgment, proceedeth in the thirty third verſe, to ſhew that there is none to whom his caſe might be referred for arbitration. There are two wayes by which controverſies are ended.

Firſt, By the Legal Sentence of the publick Judge.

Secondly, By the moderation of a private Friend. This latter Job means, when he ſaith, Verſe 33. Neither is there any Dayeſ-man betwixt us, that can lay hand upon us both.

Ἦθ ἦν ὁ μεσίτης ἡμῶν καὶ ἔλεγχων. Sept.

The Septuagint render theſe words as a wiſh, or as a prayer; O that there were a Dayeſ-man, or a Mediator betwixt God and me, that might lay his hand upon us both! But the Original bears it clearly in the Negative.

Neither is there any Dayeſ-man betwixt us.

The word which we tranſlate [Dayeſ-man,] cometh from a root which ſignifieth to argue or reprove, and ſo ſome render it here; Neither is there any Arguer or Reprover; none to ſet the matter right between God and me; none to ſtate the queſtion between us, none to reprove the Lord, if I ſhould ſay, or if by the common rule of Juſtice it ſhould appear he hath done me wrong. The word is uſed in that ſence (Gen. 31. 24.) Where Jacob tells his Uncle Laban, The Lord rebuked thee yeſternight; the Lord himſelf came as an Umpire, as a Dayeſ-man betwixt Jacob and Laban, and rebuked Laban for his hard and unjuſt thoughts of, and intentions concerning Jacob: Take heed (ſaith God) thou ſpeak not unto Jacob either good or bad, that is, do not threaten or perſwade him to return, thou wilt repent it if thou doſt. Thus alſo the Lord appeared, as a Dayeſ-man between his people of old and the great ones of the world (Pſal. 105. 14.) He ſuffered no man to do them wrong; yea, he rebuked Kings for their ſakes. God is alwayes able to, and often doth interpoſe for, and vindicate his people from the oppreſſions of men. 'Tis coſtly medling with the Saints, Kings may get a rebuke for it: Yea, Kings may ſmart, and Kingdoms ſhake for it.

Fere omnes interpretes hunc verſum de Mediatore ſeu Arbitro, quem juriſconſulti vocant Sequeſtrem, intelligunt; quaſi Job optaſſet ordinarium judicem præcedenti verſiculo, mediatorem verò ſeu arbitrum hoc verſu.

What a Dayeſ-man is, is ſo plain and well known by the cuſtom and uſage of moſt places, that it needs little explication. We in our Language, ſometimes call him an Umpire, ſometimes an Arbitrator, ſometimes a Mediator, ſometimes a Referree; and in ſome Countreyes with us, when a queſtion ariſes between Neighbours, concerning which they are unwilling to ſpend money and time in Suits of Law, they ſay, We will refer it unto men; which kind of ſpeaking ſeems to allude to the Title of Magiſtrates and Judges, whom the Scripture calleth gods; and when a buſineſs is brought before them, it may be ſaid to be referred or put to God. In oppoſition to which, when it is taken up by the Umpirage of friends, it is ſaid to be referred or put to men. We in our Engliſh Tongue, call ſuch Dayeſmen, either becauſe they beſtowed a dayes pains upon the ending of a buſineſs, or becauſe they were obliged to end it by a ſet day; whereas Judges may take more liberty to themſelves. Yet ſome of the Greeks expreſs all mans judgment by this word, Mans-day, becauſe certain dayes were appointed for Judicature. The Apoſtle Paul uſes the ſame phraſe (1 Cor. 4. 3.) in oppoſition to the Lords-day, the great day of Judgment, to which he there appeals, from all the dayes ſet for mans judgment in this world. The Latines call Dayeſ-men, Sequeſtres; and Criticks tell us, that as the Dayeſman is expreſſed by a word in the Hebrew, whoſe root ſignifies to rebuke, becauſe a Dayeſ-man had power to rebuke and reprove him that had done the wrong; So he is called Sequeſter in the Latine, from a word that ſignifies to follow, becauſe of a power committed to him, that which way ſoever he ſhould ſtate and determine the buſineſs between the parties, they were bound to follow and ſubmit to his award; or, becauſe he was ſuppoſed a man of ſuch wiſdom, faithfulneſs and integrity, that both parties might ſafely follow him. Hence he was called Sequeſter, that is, one whom they muſt or might follow and abide by his ſentence. To aſſure which, the parties uſually engaged themſelves under penalties (of valuable dammage to the buſineſs in queſtion) to ſtand to his arbitration.
